THE Translators Preface.

Intend not to enter into a large Discourse of the Excellency and Usefulness of History : That Province has been undertaken by a thousand abler hands. Tully's short Character is just, and very significant, when he calls it, Times Witness; Truths Light; The Life of Memory; The Herald of Antiquity; and the Mistress of Life.

But as amongst all prophane Histories, none can for Greatness of Action, prudence of Counsels, and Heroick Examples of all sorts of Vertue, compare with That of the Commonwealth of Rome; so of all Roman Historians, Titus Livius, both for Copiousness and Elegance, for Accuracy and unblemish'd Fidelity, is justly preferr'd. Whose Excellent Works (as far as Extant, with Supplements for all that is wanting) we undertake to present you with in English; and the business of this Preface is to give

1. Some Memoirs of the Authors Life and Writings.
2. An Account of this present Translation.

Titus Livius was born at Padua (whence his common Addition is, Patavinus) a City of Italy, renowned for its Antiquity (said to be built by Antenor, four hundred Years before Rome) as well as for its strength, having been able to bring into the Field one hundred thousand Combatants, and from which, as Venice was but a Colony, so it still belongs to that Illustrious Republick (such being the fate of Towns, as well as Persons, that sometimes the Mother is forc'd to depend on the Daughter) and remains to this day a place famous for Learned Men, being honour'd with an University, renowned especially for the study of the Noble Art of Medicine. He was born about the Year 694. after the building of Rome; that is, (according to the best Chronologers) in the Year of the World 3906. and fifty six years before the Incarnation of our Blessed Saviour.

How he spent his younger years, though no Authors particularly mention, yet we may easily guess at the Tillage by the Crop, and conclude him then laboriously and no less successfully employ'd in the Studies of Literature and Eloquence, whereof he gave an early Specimen in certain Philosophical Dialogues mention'd by Seneca (Epist. 100.) which 'tis likely he might present to Augustus, and thereby first attract the Esteem of that most Illustrious Prince, and grand Patron of Learned men. For 'tis certain, our Author was not only well known to him, but so much in his Favour, that though afterwards he gave him a very free Account of the Civil Wars, and spoke so honourably of the Republican Party, that the Emperour Cæsar jocularly called him Pompeianus, one of Pompey's Faction; yet that Generous Prince did not for all that refuse him his Friendship, as is attested by Tacitus in the fourth Book of his Annals, but made choice of him (of all the Famous men then at Rome) to be Tutor to his Grand-Son Claudius, afterwards Emperour.

Thus he flourish'd under the Reign of Augustus, and began to write this History after the thirteenth and before the eighteenth year of that Emperour, as we may gather from those words in his first Book: Since Numa's time Janus's Temple has twice been shut; once when T. Manlius was Consul after the first Punic War ended, and again the Gods vouchsafed the same favour to our Times, when after the Actian War the Emperour Augustus Caesar had obtain'd Peace both by Land and Sea. Now 'tis well known, that Janus's Temple was thrice shut up by Augustus: First, after his Victory over Mark Anthony and Cleopatra at Actium here mentioned, which was in his fifth Consulship: And again, when he had subdued the Calabrians in his tenth Consulship; and the third time in the Year of the City 748. (within two years after which our Blessed Lord was born of the Virgin.) Since therefore Livy mentions it to have been then only twice shut, 'tis plain, that he wrote (at least that first Part of his History) before Augustus's second Closure thereof.

'Tis likely, that he repaired very young to Rome, and spent there most of his time. For as in that Imperial City he had the best Advantages of Books; and all the Records of Antiquity to furnish him with Matter, so he had also the best Company both to inform his Judgment, and improve his Stile. And in this respect never was Author more happy, as living in an Age when Letters were at the highest pitch both of Perfection in themselves, and Estimation from others.

For 'tis not improbable but he might have seen, heard, and been acquainted with Cicero, that great Master of the Latine Eloquence (for he was twenty years old at his death) with the most Learned, and in Roman Antiquities incomparably skilful, Varro; with that ingenious Parent of Lyrick Elegance, Catullus; with Virgil, the Prince of Poets, and Salust, the most excellent (at least till this our Livy out-vy'd him) of Historians; with Cornelius Nepos and Diodorus Siculus, both no contemptible Authors in History. Certain it is, that he was Contemporary, not only with those most famous Poets, Ovid, Horace, Propertius, and Tibullus, but also with Seneca the Declaimer, and Vitruvius the Architect, and Dionysius Halicarnassensis, who wrote the Roman Story most exactly in Greek. Nor was he much elder than Strabo the Grecian Geographer, than Valerius Maximus and Velleius Paterculus, none of the least considerable Roman Historians. In a dark Night Glow-worms may shine, and Sporad's in the Sun's absence cast a glimmering lustre; but for a Star to appear in open Day-light, is almost miraculous. Amongst such a Crowd of Excellent men in the most polite Age that the World can boast of, for Wit, Learning, and Eloquence, that our Author should come behind none of them, and in his Historical Province outstrip all (as in the Judgment of the literate World he has done) is certainly an Argument of a most happy Genius, and Accomplishments altogether extraordinary.

Nor is it easie to determine, whether his Industry, or his Sufficiency were the greater; for he wrote the whole History (as well Civil as Military) of the People of Rome for the space of seven hundred forty five years, viz. from the Foundation of that City till the Death of Drusus, that is, until within eight years of our Saviour's Incarnation.

This mighty Undertaking (which by what hath been said, appears to have taken him up at least above twenty years time) he performed in one hundred and forty Books (or as Petrarch and others think, one hundred and forty two) which were divided (but whether by Livy himself, or afterwards by the Transcribers for better conveniency, is disputable, though not much material) into fourteen Decads, that is, so many Tomes of ten Books apiece, of which there are now only five and thirty Books extant; for the second Decade, and all the rest after the fifth Book of the fifth Decade, are lost. But we have still the Epitomes of the whole one hundred and forty, of which L. Florus is commonly reputed to have been the Author.

The Causes that contributed to this unhappy Shipwrack, so passionately regretted by the whole Commonwealth of Learning, were probably these.

1. The Malice of the Emperour Caligula, who whether out of Envy, or his natural Aversion to all Learning, Vertue and Industry, endeavoured to remove both Livy's Works and Statues out of all Libraries; alledging, That he was too full of Words, and false in his Relations: Reproaches which ought to leave no stain on our Historian, since they proceeded from the same ignorant Monster who condemned Virgil as a Sot; and was contriving to have abolisht both his and Homer's incomparable Poems out of the World, and to have made a Bonfire of all the Law-Books in Rome. We could expect no better from a Caligula, but I am somewhat surprized at the zeal of S. Gregory, who (as S. Antoninus tells us) burnt Livy's Works for this Reason, Quod in Superstitionibus & Sacris Romanis perpetuo versetur; Because he was so perpetually mentioning the Roman superstitious Rites and Idolatries. I confess his over-frequent Stories of Prodigies and their Expiations, cannot but be somewhat nauseous to a judicious Christian Reader, but we must consider him as he was an Heathen, and then we can scarce blame him for shewing so much respect to those feigned Deities, which were all he knew: and Bodin's Apologie may excuse him, Superstitione præstat quàm impietate obligari, & falsam quàm nullam habere Religionem; Better Superstition than Impiety, and to be zealous in a false Religion, than either to have no Religion at all, or to neglect and profane with irreverence that which we do profess.

2. The vast Bulk of his whole Work, not to be transcribed without a world of pains. And here some could have wisht the Epitomizer (whoever he was) had spared himself that trouble, it being suspected, that many out of Laziness contenting themselves with his Abridgments, the Original thereby became the more neglected, which otherwise, perhaps, had not perisht; however this accidental Consequence was unforeseen, and those Breviats, now in the want of the whole, have proved of great use.

3. Add to this the Rage of the Goths and Vandals (and other Barbarians that since over-run Europe) against all Monuments of Literature, and how many choice Volumes have been swallowed by the devouring Jaws of Time, in the Revolutions of above sixteen hundred years, and we may rather wonder how five and thirty Books of Livy came to escape, than that one hundred and five are perisht.

What we have, came not all at once to light; for the first five Books of the fifth Decade were found Anno 1531. at Wormes by Simon Gryneus in the Library of the Laurissene Monastery: And in the Year 1615. the beginning of the forty third Book was regained from an old Manuscript belonging to the Chapter of the Church of Bamberge, by John Horrion a Jesuit, and first printed at Venice.

Some have formerly reported, That all Livy or the greatest part of what we want, might be found in his most Catholick Majesty's Library at the Escorial; but if it had been so, yet that Library being not many years since casually consumed by Fire, we must despair of retrieving it from thence. And as little hopes are there to have it from the Grand Seignior's Palace at Constantinople, where others have fancied it to be. Paulus Jovius in his Description of the Orkney Isles, seems to insinuate as if in that remote Corner of the World, the same lay dormant, preserved by King Fergusius, a Companion of Alaricus the Goth, when he sackt Rome, and laid up there for security, when the Danes made their Invasions on Scotland. I could heartily wish our Sacred Sovereign of Great Britain might have the Honour to oblige the World with this Treasure from any part of his Dominions, but still must fear that we are no more to expect them than the lost Leaves of Solomon.

But though Livy publisht his History under the auspicious Reign of Augustus, yet he lived somewhat longer; though after the death of that good Emperour, weary, 'tis like of Rome, he retired back to his own native City Padua; for there we find he dyed on the first of January in the fourth year of Tiberius's Reign, the twentieth after our Lord's Nativity, and the seventy sixth of his own Age. He had two Wives, the first named Cassia; two Sons, T. Livius Priscus and T. Livius Longus (to one of them he wrote an Epistle of the Art of Rhetorick, mentioned by Quintilian) and four Daughters. The Names of his first Wife and two Sons are found in a most ancient Inscription on Marble, extant not long since in the House of Annibal Capilisti, a Captain of Horse in the service of the most Serene Venetian Republick, near St. Daniel's Church in Padua. Thus

He was buried at Padua, in the Temple of Juno, where since was erected the Monastery of S. Justina, possessed by Monks of the Order of S. Benet. By whom long since was found a Marble Inscription with these words.

This the Monks and others took to be made by Livy himself, interpreting so those Letters V. F. that is, Vivens Fecit, T. Livius, &c. That Livy living made it. But Marquardus Gudius, and from him Dujatius, conclude that it was put there by Halys, the Freed man of Livia his Daughter; And thus it ought to be read in English. T. Livius Halys the Freedman of Livia, the fourth Daughter of Titus, being Priest of the Temple of Concord at Padua, in his Life time, made this for himself and all his; That is, to testify their respects to the Great Livy there Interr'd, plac'd this Monument and Inscription.

In the Year of our Lord 1413. upon occasion of digging to lay the Foundation for some new Building in that place of the Monastery, the Bones of Livy were found in an Iron Chest; upon the Report of which, there was such a vast concourse of people, that the good Monks had thoughts to have burnt them, to prevent such unusual veneration to the Reliques of a Pagan; But at last, they were given to the Nobility, (at their earnest request) to remain as an honour to their City. Then was the Coffin carried on the shoulders of divers persons of the first Quality to the Town-Hall, where their Courts of Justice are held [Palazzo delle Ragioni, they call it] under the West Wall whereof the same was repositied, with this Epitaph.

Anno 1548. these Bones were again-remov'd to a more eminent place in the aforesaid Hall, and a magnificent Tomb erected to be seen there at this day, with brass Tables and Inscriptions, and a most antient Figure of him in Marble, given the City by Alexander Bassianus, a great Antiquary (the very same which you have here in the Frontispiece) under which was placed the before-recited Inscription, V.F. T. Livius, &c. On the right hand was the Statue of Eternity, on the left that of Minerva, under their Feet the Rivers Tiberis and Po, between them a Wolf suckling Romulus and Remus. And under all in a brass Table this Hexastick compos'd by Lazarus Bonamicus.

It would be too tedious to recite the several Eulogies given of our Author by Learned men, in their Writings, scarce any mentioning his Name without Epithets of Honour. Pliny the younger L. 2. Epist. 3. relates, That whilst he was living, his Fame and Renown was such, That people came to Rome from the farther parts of the World on purpose to see him; And St. Hierome takes notice thereof more at large in these words to Paulinus, We read that several Noblemen came from the furthest parts of Spain and France for a view of Livy, and those whom the City of Rome (though then in its highest Glory) could not attract with all its splendour, the Fame of one Man drew to make Journeys thither, and to prefer a sight of him before all the Magnificence of that Metropolis of the World. The same most Learned Father in his Proem before Daniel, recommends the reading of Livy for the better understanding of that Mysterious Prophet: and of more modern Writers, the Judicious Comines affirms, That Livy (whom he calls the Polybius of the Latines) is most necessary to be perused by Princes, Governours, Senators, and all persons concern'd in Political Affairs.

It

The Translators Preface.

It remains now, that we say something of this present Translation, and perhaps it may be objected, That the same is needless, Livy's History being long since in English; which is acknowledged; but yet we conceive the same ought to be no Bar to our Translating it anew. For

1. Though that was perform'd by a Learned Man*, and very conversant in Labours of that kind, yet without any reflections on his worthy pains, we may have leave to say, That our English Language is much refined within the last fourscore years (for his Work is Dedicated to Queen Elizabeth.) And we have been very unhappy if we have not express'd the Authors sense more briefly and somewhat more significantly, and agreeable to the Gusto of modern English Readers; But that must be left to their Judgment who shall be pleas'd without prejudice, to compare the one with the other, and both with the Original.

2. The Latine Original it self is since that time not a little improved. A great part of the forty third Book discovered, which was then unknown; each Book divided into distinct Chapters, the Year of the City placed at the beginning of each Book; a multitude of depraved passages restored, and obscurities illustrated, by industrious Criticks; and especially by Monsieur Dujatius, (who not long since Printed it, with large Notes, by the express Command of his present Most Christian Majesty, for the use of his Son the Dauphin;) From whose diligent pains we have borrowed much Light.

3. Our intent is to give the English Reader the whole Roman History to the Times of Augustus, where Livy left off, to which purpose we have in this First Volume, inserted (in its proper place), A Supplement of the second Decade, Written in Latine by the Learned Johannes Freinshemius. As also have added, at the end of the five Books extant of the Fifth Decade, Supplements of sixteen several defective passages therein, compos'd by the before-mentioned Dujatius.

4. You have here not only a more exact and useful Table of the principal Contents, but the Fasti Consulares better methodiz'd, with Chronological Notes, shewing in what Year of the City, and under whose Consulship, the most remarkable Occurrences happen'd.

5. That nothing might be wanting to serve the meer English Reader, because in the Translation, the retaining of divers Terms (uncouth perhaps to his Ears and understanding) could not be avoided, as Dictator, Prætor, Comitia, &c.
We have annext An Alphabetical Index, wherein the same are Explained, and thereby a general insight given into the whole Roman Policy, Civil and Military.

This first Volume brings down the story to the Year 588. after the Building of Rome. The remainder (which Livy had compil'd in ninety five Books, that are lost) being excellently supplied in two Tomes, by the aforesaid Freinshemius, we are now preparing for the Press, in a second Volume; whereby the intire Body of Roman History, from Romulus to the latter part of the Reign of Augustus, will be compleat.

EPITOME.

1. 2. THE coming of Aeneas into Italy, and what he did there. 3. The reign of Ascanius at Alba, and of Silvius Aeneas, with the other succeeding Kings called Silvii. Numitor's Daughter got with child by Mars, who brought forth two Sons called Romulus and Remus. Amulius murdered. 6. The City built by Romulus. 8. The Senate chosen. 11. A War with the Sabines. 10. Rich Spoils consecrated to Jupiter Feretrius. 13. The People divided into Curias. 14, 15. The Fidenates and Veians conquered. 16. Romulus canoniz'd. 18. &c. Numa Pompilius makes a Scheme of Religion, he builds a Temple to Janus, and was the first that shut the gates of it, when he had made peace with all the neighbouring Nations, pretending to have secret conversation with the Goddesses. 19. He converts the vehement Spirits of the people to holy Duties. 22. &c. Tullus Hostilius makes War upon the Albans. 25. After that, the Combat of the Three to Three. 26. Horatius absolved. 28. The Punishment of Metius Sufferius. 29. Alba demolished. 30. The Albans received into the City: and a War proclaimed against the Sabines. 31. At last Tullus was consumed by a Thunderbolt. 32. Ancus Martius renewed the Ceremonies instituted by Numa. 33. He assigned the Aventine Mount to the Latines, being now overcome and taken into the City, he demolished Pollitorium a City of the Latines, which the ancient Latines inhabited, he made a wooden Bridge over the Tiber: added the Hill Janiculum to the City: enlarged the bounds of the Kingdom: built Ostia; and reigned 13 years. 34. In his Reign Lucumo the Son of Damaratus a Corinthian, came from Tarquinii, a City of Etruria, to Rome, where being received into Ancus's friendship, he began to bear the Name of Tarquinius, and after the death of Ancus, succeeded in the Kingdom. 35. He augmented the number of the Senators, by making an hundred more, subdued the Latines, appointed a particular place called the Circus, for Games, and gave the People an entertainment in it with such sports: being attack'd with a War from the Sabines, he augmented the Centuries of Horsemen. 36. He likewise try the skill of Attius Navius the Augur, is said to have asked him, whether that which he thought of could be done or no? to which he answering, yes; he commanded him to cut a Razor with a whetstone, which Attius immediately did. 37. He also conquered the Sabines in a pitched Battle. 38. He enclosed the City with a wall, and made common Sewers. 40. He was killed by Ancus's Sons, when he had reigned 38 years. 41. Servius Tullius succeeded him, who was the Son of a noble Lady taken in war at Corniculum; and they say, when he lay in his Cradle, his head was all on a flame. He defeated the Veians and Etrurians. 42, 43. He was the first that made a Poll. He set up a Lustrum [a survey and purgation of the people] at which the people were rated in 8000 Sesterces. He determined and set in order the Classes and Centuries. 44. He enlarged the bounds of the City. He added to the City the Viminal, Quirinal, and Esquiline Hills. 45. He built a Temple to Diana in the Aventine among the Latines. 47, 48. He was killed by L. Tarquinius, the Son of Priscus, by the contrivance of his Daughter Tullia, when he had reigned 34 years. 49. After him Tarquinius Superbus usurp'd the Kingdom, without the consent either of the Senate or the People; on which day impious Tullia drove her Chariot over the dead body of her Father, that lay in her way: he had a Lifeguard. 50, 51. He killed Turnus Herdonius by a stratagem. 53. He waged War with the Volsci, and out of their Spoils built a Temple to Jupiter in the Capitol. 54. Terminus did not consent to it, whose Altars could not be removed. 55. He reduced Gabii into his own power by the treachery of his Son Sext. Tarquinius. 56. His Sons going to Delphi, and asking of the Oracles which of them should reign at Rome, they were told he should be Sovereign there, who first kiss'd his Mother; which answer they interpreting the wrong way, Junius Brutus, who went along with them, pretended to fall down, and kiss'd the Earth: which action of his had the foretold event; for when Tarquinius Superbus by his Tyranny had made himself odious to all men; at last, for a Rape committed in the night by his Son Sextus upon Lucretia (who calling her Father Tricipitinus, and her Husband Collatinus to her, who she engaged to revenge her Death, with a knife stab'd herself) 59. was expelled by Brutus's means more than any body else, after he had reigned 25 years. 60. Then Consuls were first created, whose names were L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus.

PREFACE.

WHether I shall make it worth my while to write the History of the Romans from the time their City was first founded, I neither well know, nor if I do, dare be so bold to declare: Because I observe it is the old and usual way, for new succeeding Writers, to pretend that they outdo mistaken antiquity, either in the certainty of their account, or their stile and method of writing. However this will be my satisfaction, that I, among others, as much as in me lay, have preserved the memory of those great Actions which have been performed by the most glorious People in the whole world. And, if amidst so great a throng of Writers, my fame be eclipsed, yet I shall please my self in the renown and grandeur of those whose very lustre obscures my my Name. Besides, it seems a vast, laborious enterprize, to collect all the records of things done above seven hundred years ago, and of a Nation that from so small an Original grew to such an height, that it now tires under its own bulk: Nor do I doubt, but the account of its first rise, and that which thereupon immediately fell out, will be too tedious for most Readers, who will therefore hasten to take a view of those more modern Exploits, which long ago have ruined a powerful People, even by their own strength. I on the contrary will desire this one other reward for my pains, that I may not be in sight of those Ills, which our Age for so many years has suffered, at least so long as I am studiously bent to relate those former Events, but that I may be free from all care, which though it do not carry a Writers mind away from what is truth, may discompose it. Those things which before the City was built, or design'd to be built, may seem more fit to employ a Poets pen, than one who delivers down the uncorrupted memories of real Actions, I shall neither confirm nor confute. 'Tis a liberty always granted to Antiquity, that by mingling divine and humane things together, it might make the rise of Cities more August and Venerable. Now therefore, if any People ought to have that freedom to consecrate their Original, and make Gods the Authors of it: The Roman People have gained such Glory in War, that, having Mars above all the Gods, for yours and their Founders, Father and Protector; mankind may as easily allow them this Liberty, as submit to their Dominion. But these things and all such others as shall occur (however they may be censur'd or esteem'd of) I shall not make any great account of; I only desire every Reader, for his own sake, carefully to mind the Lives and Manners that I describe, by what Men and Arts both at home and abroad, that Empire was both gained and augmented. And then, when their Discipline fell by degrees to decay, let him observe how their manners first declined; as also, how they afterwards slid down still farther and farther, till at last they tumbled headlong down the Precipice, and rowled into these times, wherein we cannot indure either our own Vices, or even the Remedies against them. This is that, which in the knowledge of things is most for your benefit and advantage, that you see all the instructions of former Examples, set up as it were on some conspicuous Monument; from whence you may take for your self, and the State you live in, what may be worth your imitation, and have a view of all the ill Enterprises and Events which you ought to avoid. And truly either I am too fond of what I have undertaken, or there never was any Republick, either greater, more religious, or richer in good Examples, or into which Avarice and Luxury so lately crept; or where so long Men bore so much respect to Poverty and Parsimony; in so much that the less they had, the less they desired. 'Tis but of late that Riches have introduced Covetousness, and lavish Pleasures want, through a prodigal inclination that Men have had to ruine and confound themselves and the State. But Complaints perchance will scarce be grateful, even when they are necessary, and therefore ought not to come in the front of so great a Work as this; let us begin then with good boadings, Wishes and Prayers to the Gods and Goddesses, that (if we may do like Poets) they would prosper this our undertaking.

- I. NOW in the first place 'tis well known, that when Troy was taken, though the other Trojans were Massacred, the Greeks gave quarter to two of them, Aeneas, and Antenor, not only upon the score of former friendship and acquaintance, but because they had still been Sticklers for Peace and the restoring of Hellen. And then that Antenor after many Adventures, came with a company of People called Heneti, (who being driven out of Paphlagonia upon an Insurrection there, were to seek a new Country as well as a Captain or Commander (for they had lost their Governour Pylamenes at the Siege of Troy.) into the innermost bay of the Adriatick Sea, and that the Heneti and Trojans, having beaten out the Euganei, who dwelt between the Sea and the Alps, took possession of that Countrey, and that the place where they first landed, is called Troy, which we Latines (as the Trojans did their City) call Troja, and the whole Nation are stiled Veneti or Venetians. That Aeneas upon the same sad occasion being forced to fly his Country, but led by Fate to be the founder of a far greater Empire, came first into Macedonia, and thence carried into Sicily to find an abode, was from Sicily driven upon the Italian Coast near Laurentum, which place was likewise named Troja. There the Trojans being got on shore, and having nothing left after their tedious Voyage, besides their Arms and their Ships, went into the Country foraging; whereupon Latinus and the Aborigines (or ancient Natives) who at that time lived in those parts, came flocking out of the City and Country with Arms, to repel the violence of those invading Strangers. Concerning which there goes a double report. Some say, that Latinus being defeated, first made a Peace, and after that an Alliance with Aeneas. Others say, that when two Armies were set in Battalia, before the Signal was given, Latinus march'd forth attended by some of his chief Officers, and demanding a Parley with the Captain of those Strangers, ask'd em, What kind of Mortals they were, how they happened to leave their own Country, or what they meant by landing on the Coast of Laurentum? But when he heard, That they were Trojans, and their Captain Aeneas, the Son of Anchises and Venus; who being forced to fly their own Country and City, which was all destroyed by Fire, came thither to seek an Habitation and a place wherein to build a City. They say, that he admiring the Grandeur of their Nation, and of Aeneas above the rest, as well as his equal temper of Mind, which was prepared alike for War or Peace, gave him his hand, and with that established a solemn promise of future Friendship. Thereupon their two Leaders having entered into a League, the two Armies saluted each other; and Aeneas was entertained by Latinus, with all the

Civility

Civility due to a Stranger. That then Latinus reinforced and confirmed their publick Agreement by a domestick Obligation before his own Household Gods, and gave Aeneas his Daughter in Marriage; which Alliance made the Trojans hope they should at last settle there, and wander about the World no more. There then they build a Town, which Aeneas calls Lavinium, from his Wifes name, (which was Lavinia.) And in a short time this new Marriage produced a Son, whom his Parents called Ascanius.

After that the Aborigines and Trojans were at once invaded; for Turnus, King of the Rutuli, to whom Lavinia had been betrothed before the arrival of Aeneas, taking it ill that a Stranger should be preferred before him, made War against Aeneas and Latinus at the same time. But neither of the Armies had any cause to triumph for that Battel: The Rutuli were defeated; whilst the Aborigines and the Trojans lost their General Latinus. Then Turnus and the Rutuli finding their own weakness, fled for succour to the flourishing power of the Etrurians, and Mezentius their King; who at that time keeping his Court in a rich Town called Cære, and being at first dissatisfied with the building of a new City, but at that time especially, supposing that the growth and encouragement of the Trojans would be too great a security to their Neighbours, was very willing to assist the Rutuli. Aeneas, to take off the terror of so great an Enemy, and that he might engage the Aborigines to love him, call'd both the Nations, Latines, and put them all, not only under the same Discipline, but Denomination too. Nor did the Aborigines from that time forward ever come behind the Trojans in their respect and duty to their King Aeneas. Aeneas therefore relying upon the Affections of these two Nations, which were every day more and more united, (though Etruria were so strong and terrible, that it had filled not only the Land, but the Sea too, all along the Coast of Italy, from the Alps, to the Sicilian Streights, with the renown of its Name,) yet notwithstanding that he could have defended himself within his Walls, drew out his Army into the field: That was the second Battel that the Latines fought, and the last thing that Aeneas did whilst he lived, who was buried (what Title soever we may lawfully attribute to him,) upon the banks of the River Numicius, and his Stile there is, Jupiter Indiges, (a Man become a God.)

Ascanius, the Son of Aeneas, was not then old enough to govern, but the Empire however was kept entire for him till he came of Age; and in the mean time the Latine State, his Grandfathers and Fathers Kingdom was preserved for the Child, under the Protection of Lavinia, who was a Woman of extraordinary parts and conduct. I question (for who can be certain of a thing done so long ago?) whether it were this Ascanius, or an Elder than this, who was Son to Creusa, (Aeneas's Wife) born whilst Troy was standing, and a Companion to his Father in his flight thence, being the same, that the Julian Family call Julus, and make the Author of their Name. But this Ascanius, let him be born where he would, or of what Mother you please, 'tis certain he was Aeneas's Son) left behind him to his Mother or Stepmother a flourishing (as things then went) and a rich City, Lavinium being now grown very Populous: Besides that he built another new one also under the Mountain Albanus, which from the situation of it, as being carried on to a great extent upon the foot of the Hill, is called Lunga Alba, or Long Alba. It was almost thirty years between the time that Lavinium was built, and that when the Colony of Lunga Alba was drawn out of it; yet notwithstanding, so strong they grew (especially when they had conquered the Etrurians) that neither Mezentius nor any other neighbouring Nations durst engage with them, no, not when Aeneas was dead, nor ever afterward, when a Woman was their Protectress, or when the Youth Ascanius with his raw Politicks was first possessed of the Kingdom. They therefore made a Peace upon condition, that the River Albula, now called Tyber, should be the boundary both to the Etrurians and the Latines. After which Silvius begins his Reign, being Son to Ascanius, and by some accident or other, born in the Woods (in Latine, Silvæ) he begat Aeneas Silvius, and he, after that Latinus Silvius, by whom some Colonies were planted, and called the Ancient Latines. From that time Silvius was the Surname of all that reigned at Alba. Latinus begat Alba, Alba Atys, Atys Capys, Capys Capetus, and Capetus Tiberinus, who was drowned in his passage over the River Albula, and made the River ever since famous for his Name. Tiberinus had a Son called Agrippa, whom his Son Romulus Silvius succeeded in the Kingdom, till being Thunderstruck himself, he left it to Aventinus, who was buried in that Hill, which is now a part of Rome, and was thereby the occasion of its being named Mons Aventinus (the Hill Aventine.) After him succeeded Proca, who begat Numitor and Amulus, and to Numitor, who was the eldest Son of the Family, bequeathed the ancient Kingdom of the Silvian Race. But power prevailed beyond either the Will of a Father, or the respect due to primogeniture; for Amulus deposed his Brother, and reigned in his stead, nor only so, but adding one Wickedness to another, killed his Brothers Issue Male, and bereft Rhea Silvia his Brothers Daughter, whom under a pretence of Honour, he had chosen to be a Vestal Nun, of all hopes ever to have any Children, because she was by her Vow obliged to perpetual Virginity.

But the original of so great a City, and the founding of an Empire more powerful than any, except that of the Gods, was, I suppose, the effects of Destiny it self. That Vestal Maid being ravished, and having two Children at a birth (either because she thought he really was, or because a God would seem a more honorable Gallant, and by his Dignity lessen her Crime) declares clares Mars the Father of her Bastards. But neither do Gods or Men save her or her Children from the Kings cruelty; but she was bound and committed to custody, whilst he commanded the Boys to be thrown into the River. The Tiber by good luck (as if Heaven had so ordained it) was at that time out, so that a Man could not come near the main Channel; but the water upon the banks was not deep or rapid; yet the Persons that carried the Children thither, were in good hopes the poor Infants might be drowned even in that, as shallow and still as it was: So they, as if they had thereby executed the Kings command, expose the Children in the next water they came to, where now there stands the street called Vicus Ruminalis, which was formerly they say, called Romularis. Those parts were then all desert, and the story goes, that when the water of that stream, in which the Children were exposed, was fallen so low, that the dry land appeared; a thirsty the-Wolf hearing the Children cry, came that way out from the Mountains which are there round about, and that she gave the Infants suck so tenderly, that the Kings Shepherd found her licking them with her tongue; the Shepherds Name they say, was Faustulus, and that he gave them to his Wife Laurentia to nurse in the Sheepcoats. There are some that say Laurentia was called Lupa [i. e. Whore, or She-Wolf] among the Shepherds, because she was a common Prostitute; and that from thence this Fable or miraculous report was first occasioned. Thus were they begotten, and thus brought up: and as soon as they grew to some ripeness, they could not indure to lie like Sluggards in the Stables or Coats among the Sheep, but roved about the Woods a hunting. And by that means gaining not only strength of body, but of mind too; they encountered not only wild Beasts alone, but set upon Robbers too, whom they met laden with booty, and divided the Spoil among their brother Shepherds, among whom they worked and played with other Youths that daily flock'd to their Society.

V. At that time, they say, the Feast of Pan was kept upon the Mountain Palatine, and that Palatium was derived from an Arcadian City, called Palanteum, from whence that Mountain came to be called Mons Palatinus, and that Evander, who came of that race of Arcadians, and for many years before, had been in possession of those parts, commanded the keeping of that Festival according to rules brought thither out of Arcadia, which were, that so many young Men should run up and down naked in a wanton and lascivious manner, to the honour of Pan, surnamed Lycaeus, whom the Romans afterward called Imus. And that whilst they were celebrating this Festival (it being a noted time) the Thieves who were vexed to lose their booty, set upon them by surprize; and tho Romulus defended himself by main strength, took Remus Prisoner, delivered him to Amulius, and accusing him, made it the greatest charge against him, That they invaded Numitors Territories, and from thence with the help of a company of young Fellows, whom they two had mustered up, drove away his Cattel in an hostile manner; so Remus was put into Numitors hands to be punished as he thought fit. In the mean time Faustulus was always in good hopes that he had brought up two Children of the Family Royal, for he not only knew that they were exposed by the Kings order, and that the time when he found them agreed with that same circumstance; but he was not willing the thing which was not yet ripe for publick knowledg should be discovered, unless it were, either upon a good occasion, or out of necessity, of which two necessity first took place, and so being frightened into it, he revealed the whole matter to Romulus. It happened also that Numitor, whilst Remus was in his custody; having heard that they were Twin Brothers, by comparing their Age, and considering that their Genius shewed them to be of no servile extract, had some recollecting thoughts of his Grandsons, and by enquiring, proceeded so far, that he almost owned Remus to be one of them. Thus was the King beset with Plots on every side, for Romulus attack'd him, not with a multitude of young Fellows (as not being able to cope with him fairly, had to hand) but ordered the Shepherds to go several ways, and meet at the Palace at such a time, and Remus too got a company from Numitors house, to assist in the Affair, by which means they slew the King.

VI. Numitor as soon as the Tumult began, crying out, That an Enemy had invaded the City, and attack'd the Kings Palace; when he had called together the youth of Alba into the Castle, which he design'd to make himself Master of by force of Arms, and when he saw the young Men, after the Murther was committed, draw up towards him with gratulations in their mouths, immediately called a Council, and declared the injuries that his Brother had done him, the extract of his Grandsons, how they were born and bred, and how they were discovered, together with the death of the Tyrant, and that he himself was the Author of it. The young men marching through the midst of the Assembly, with a great number attending on them; when they had saluted their Grandfather, by the name of King, an unanimous consent of all the Company confirmed that name, and established him in the Empire. Thus the Government of Alba being settled upon Numitor, Romulus and Remus had a mind to build a City in that place, where they were exposed and educated; for there were a great many Albans and Latines alive, besides Shepherds, who all gave them great hopes that Alba and Latium would be but inconsiderable places to that City which should be there built. But whilst they were deliberating of this matter, the old misfortune intervened, that is, an immoderate desire of Dominion, and thence arose a fatal difference between them, though from a small cause: For they being Twins, and so not distinguished in point of Age or pre-precedence, would needs have the Gods (under whose protection those places were,) declare who should give the name to their new City, and, when it was built, who should Reign over it.

Romulus chose the Mount Palatine, and Remus the Aventine, for their several quarters to view the Augury. The Augury, they say, came first to Remus, and that was six Vultures: which when it was interpreted, and, after that, a double number had shewn themselves to Romulus, their parties and followers saluted both of them as King at the same time; the former pretending to the Kingdom as precedent in time, and the latter upon the account of the double number of Birds. Thereupon at first they wrangled, but fell at last from words to blows, and in the Crowd Remus was slain. The more vulgar report is, that Remus in derision of his Brother, leapt over his new Walls, and for that was kill'd by Romulus, who was vex'd at it, and said in his fury, so shall every one be served that leaps over my Walls. Thus Romulus made himself sole Governour, built the City, and call'd it by a name derived from his own. He first of all fortified the Palatine, where he was bred, and offered Sacrifice to other Gods after the Albane manner, bult to Hercules, the Greek Heroe, he did it as Evander had formerly ordered. They tell you, that Hercules when he had kill'd Geryon, brought thither an Herd of very beautiful Oxen and Cowes, and that near the River Tiber, over which he swam and drove the Cattel before him, he being tired with his journey, lay down upon the grass, to refresh himself and them with rest and convenient Food. But having eaten and drank so much Wine as that he fell asleep, a certain Shepherd that lived there hard by, called Cacus, a very strong fellow, being taken with the beauty of the Beasts, and having a great desire to rob him of them; because he knew, that if he drove them into his Cave, their very foot-tracts would lead their Owner that way to seek for them, he took the lovely brutes each one by the tail, and drew them backwards into his Den. Hercules, awaking early in the Morning, servay'd his Herd, and finding part of them missing, went to the next Cave to see if perchance the tracts of them went that way, where when he saw they were all turn'd as if they came out from thence, and did not go any other way, he was amazed, and did not know what to do, but began to drive his Cattel forward out of that unlucky place: But afterward when some of the Cows that he was driving along, low'd, as they use to do, for lack of their fellows which were left behind, the lowing of those that were shut up in the Cave, by way of answer, brought Hercules back again: Whom when Cacus endeavoured to hinder from going to the Cave, he received a blow with his Club, of which, though he call'd upon the Shepherds to assist him, he immediately Died. Evander at that time who was banished Peloponnesus, govern'd those parts more by his Authority, than any regal Power; for he was a Man that deserved a great deal of reverence upon the score of his wonderful Learning, which was a thing wholly new to those People who understood not the Arts, but much more venerable for the supposed divinity of his Mother Carmenta, whom those Nations admir'd as a Prophetess, before the coming of Sibylla into Italy. And this same Evander being at that time startled at the concurrence of the Shepherds, who trembled to tell of a strangers being guilty of a palpable Murther, when he heard the relation of the Fact, and the reason of it, and saw the habit and shape of the Man, which was somewhat larger and more august than that of ordinary mankind, he demanded of him, Who he was: And when he new his name, who was his Father and what his Country, accosted him, saying, Hail Hercules! Son of Jupiter; my Mother who was a true Prophetess told me, that thou shouldst augment the number of those that dwell in Heaven, and that an Altar should here be erected to thee, which the most wealthy Nation in the World in time to come should call Maxima [the Greatest] and Sacrifice upon it according to thy command. Hercules gave him his right hand and told him, he received the Omen, and would fulfil the Prophecie, by building and dedicating an Altar. And that was the first time that Sacrifice was made there, when he, taking a choice Heifer out of his Herd, slew it, calling the Potitij and the Pinarij (Priests of Hercules) who then were a very noble Family in those parts to assist him in performing of the ceremonies, and to partake of the feast. It so fell out, that the Potitij were then present, and that the Entrails were set before them; but the Pinarij came to the rest of the entertainment when the Entrails were eaten, and thence it became a rule, as long as the race of the Pinarij continued, that they should not eat of the holy Entrails. The Potitij, taught by Evander, were the chief Priests in that Solemnity for many Ages, till all the whole stock of the Potitij was decayed, and the ministerial function of their Family conferr'd upon publick Servants. And these holy foreign rites above all others did Romulus then undertake to perform, being even at that time a great admirer of Immortality, gained by Vertue and Courage, to which his very Destiny led him.

Having performed the holy Rites according to order, and called the multitude to council, who could not be united into one body by any means, except Laws, he made several, which he supposed would be the better observed, if he made himself venerable by some ensigns or badges of Kingly power; and therefore as he appear'd more august in his other habit, so also and most especially he did in that he chose twelve Lictors, (or Sergeants) to go with rods and axes before him. Some say he made use of that number from the number of birds that in the Augury had portended his being King. But I am willing to be of their opinion, who say that Apparitors or Sergeants and that sort of officers came from the Etrurians that were a neighbouring Nation, from whence also they derive the Sella Curulis [or Chair of State,] the Toga prætexta [a white Gown, that Children wore, guarded with purple] and this very number: and that the Etrurians had just so many, because their King being chosen out of twelve several sorts of People, each of them chose one Lictor (or Sergeant.) In the mean time the City increased in fortifications, in that they went still farther and farther with their works, more out of hopes of a multitude to come, than for the safeguard of those men they then had. And then lest the City should have been made so big to no purpose, He, according to the ancient rule of all those that ever built Cities (who when they had gathered into their walls an obscure and mean rabble of People, pretended their inhabitants were born out of the Earth) set open the Asylum, a place which is now hedg'd in with thick brambles between two Groves, and into that from the neighbouring Nations all the rabble ran, as being greedy of novelties, without distinction, or being questioned whether they were Free-men or Slaves: And that was the first step towards the greatness of his strength. When he thought himself strong enough, he prepared a Council to manage that strength, to which end he makes an hundred Senators, either because that number was sufficient, or because there were but one hundred only that could be created Patres (i. e. Fathers or grave Senators.) Now they no question, were called Patres [i. e. Fathers] out of respect and honour, and their descendants Patricij [i. e. such as were of a Senatorian Family.]

IX. By this time Rome was grown so strong, that it was able to cope with any of the neighbouring Cities, but for want of Women, its Grandeur was like to continue no longer than a Mans age; because they neither had hopes of Children at home, nor intermarried with their Neighbours. Then by advice of the Senate Romulus sent Embassadors to the adjacent Countries, to desire an Alliance and Nuptial Engagements between his and their People, and to tell them, That Cities, like other things, rose from small beginnings, and then, that such, as their own Virtue and the Gods advance, gain to themselves great power and renown; as also, that they knew very well, not only that the Gods were assitant in the production of Rome, but likewise that no Virtue would be wanting in that Nation; wherefore they should not think it any degradation to them as Men to mingle blood and contract an intimate relation with those who were Men as well as themselves. But this Embassy was no where kindly received, so much they all despised, and fear'd so great a power that was then growing up among them, not only in respect to themselves, but their posterity. Many dismissed them with this question, Whether they had opened any Asylum for Women too? for that would make their Marriages just and equal. The Roman youth took that in great dudgeon, and had a great inclination to use violence: for which that Romulus might give a good opportunity, he counterfeited himself out of humor, and ordered Games to be solemnly kept in honour of Neptunus Equestris purposely, [i. e. The God of Horsemanship,] which he call'd Consualia. Whereupon he commanded that the adjacent Countries should have notice given them of a Show that was to be made, and with as much preparation as they possibly could, they set things out, that they might do something that was extraordinary, and answer Peoples expectations. A great many people met together, not only upon that account, but likewise out of curiosity to see the new City; especially all the neighbouring People, as the Cæmenses, the Crustumini, and the Antemnates. Thither also came all the Sabines, with their Wives and Children; who being invited very hospitably from house to house, and seeing the situation, the walls and all the City so full of houses, admir'd that Rome was grown so great in so short a time. When the time for the Show was come, and their minds and eyes were all intent upon it, then by consent they made the attack; and giving the signal, the Roman youth ran up and down to ravish, or seize their Virgins, of whom great part were forced away at a venture, as each man lit upon them, though some great beauties design'd for the Chiefs of the Senate were carried to their houses by inferior persons employed for that purpose. They tell you, that one much handsomer than all the rest, was carried away by the retinue of one Talassius, of whom when many people enquired to whom they were carrying her, the parties that had her in custody cried out by way of answer (lest any one should take her from them) she is going to Talassius, from whence that became a Nuptial word. The sport being all spoiled by the fear that people conceived, the sad parents of the Maids ran away as fast as they could, accusing the Romans for violating the laws of Hospitality, and calling upon that God to whose Solemnity and Games they came, and were deceived even after a religious promise of the contrary. Nor had the Maids that were taken any better hopes of themselves, or less indignation within them; but Romulus went all about and told them, that what they suffered was for the pride of their Fathers, who had denied to contract any Marriage with their neighbours, but that however they should be Married, and bear a part not only in all their fortunes, but be free of their City, and (than which nothing is more dear to Mankind) share in the procreation of Children. That they would do well to remit their fury, and resign their affections to those men whom fortune had made masters of their bodies. That many times love had afterward sprung from injuries precedent, and that they were like to have the better Husbands, inasmuch as every man endeavoured as much as possible not only to satisfy his turn, but to fulfil the desire of his Parents and Country. Besides this too, the men shew'd a great deal of kindness, whilst they excused themselves, and strove to atone for their fault by love and address, which are the best arguments to pacify a Woman's soul. By

By this means the Maids minds were very much reconciled; but their Parents, in sordid habit, with tears in their eyes and great complaints, endeavored more than ever at that time, to instigate their several Cities: nor did their indignation contain it self within their own Towns only, but they flock'd from all parts to Titus Tatius, King of the Sabines; and Embassies were sent thither, in that the name of Tatius was most renowned of any in those parts. The Cæmenses, Crustumini, and Antemnates, were they who were partly concerned for that injury: and Tatius with his Sabines seemed to them to make but slow progress in the Affair; wherefore those three Nations prepared for a War at their own common charge, though the Crustumini and the Antemnates were not speedy enough for the heat and fury of the Cæmenses; inso-much that the Cæmenses made an inroad into the Roman Territories all alone. But as they were ravaging the Country without any controul or consideration, Romulus met them with an Army, and in a light skirmish taught them, that fury without strength is a very vain thing, scattered and routed their Army, and after that, pursued them, killed and rifled their King in the Battel; and having slain the Leader of his Enemies, took their City upon the first effort. Then bringing his Army back with Victory, he (who as he was a person that had done great exploits, so he would brag as much of them) hung up the spoils of the Enemies General whom he had slain, and carrying them upon a Machine conveniently framed for that end, went up into the Capitol: where when he had laid them down under an Oak which the Shepherds held to be sacred, he not only presented his Gift to Jupiter, but designed the bounds of a Temple for him, giving that god a new Surname; Jupiter Feretrius, said he, I King Romulus, having been victorious, bring thee here the Arms of a King, and dedicate to thee a Temple in that place that I have in my mind just now marked out, as a Repository for rich Spoils, which all Posterity, when they have slain Kings and Generals of their Enemies, in imitation of me, shall bring hither. This is the original of that Temple which was first Consecrated at Rome. And accordingly afterwards the Gods were pleased, that neither the Founder of the Temple should spend his breath to no purpose, when he said, that posterity should bring their Spoils thither, nor that the multitude of such as were capable of doing so should lessen the value of his Offering. For there were not above two such rich Prizes taken after that in so many years and so many Wars; so rare was the fortune of such an Achievement.

While the Romans were doing thus in those parts, the Army of the Antemnates taking their opportunity, and having no body to resist them, made an hostile Incurfion into the Roman Dominions; but a Legion of the Romans coming speedily up to them, defeated them as they were stragling about the Fields. So the Enemy was routed at the first attack and shout that the Romans gave; their Town taken, and Hirsilia, Romulus's Wife; who was tired with the importunities of the forced Maids, desired him, now that he came home in Triumph for a double Victory, That he would pardon their Parents, and take them into the City; for by that means the whole matter might be composed in Peace and Concord: which suit of hers was easily obtained. Then setting out in an expedition against Crustumini, who made War against him, he had less to do than before, because their courage was cooled by the sense they had of other peoples misadventures. Colonies were sent to both places, and many were found, who by reason of the fertility of the Soil, were willing to go and live in the Country of the Crustumini; and on the other side, many of the Parents especially, and Relations of the forced Virgins came from thence to Rome. The last War that happened was from the Sabines, and that by much the greatest: for they did nothing out of fury or heat, nor made any shew of a War before they were able actually to engage in it. And to their Counsels they added Policy and stratagem also. Sp. Tarpeius was Governor of the Castle at Rome, whose Virgin daughter Tatius corrupted with money, to let his Soldiers into the Castle, as she happened one day to be going without the Walls for Water to use at a Sacrifice. But when she had let them in, they threw their Arms upon her and killed her, either out of a design, that the Castle might seem to be taken by main force, or to shew an example of what ill success all Treachery has, and that Traitors may never think themselves secure. Some make this addition to the story, That the Sabines commonly wore golden Bracelets of a great weight upon their left Arms, and stone Rings that made a glorious show; whereupon she bargained to have all that which they had in their left hands, and that instead of their golden Presents, they gave her their Bucklers which they held in the same hand. And some again say, that she according to the compact of having what was in their left hands, demanded their Arms, and so seeming fraudulent in her request, was destroyed by her own reward.

But however the Sabines got possession of the Castle; nor did they the next day (when the Roman Army was set in Battalia, and fill'd all the Plain that lies between the Hill Palatine and the Capitol) come down into the Field, before the Romans (who were hurried on with fury and zeal to recover the Castle) came up on the other side. The Generals on both sides animated the Soldiers to fight: on the Sabines side, Metius Curtius, and on the Romans, Hofus Hostilius; who upon the first onset maintained the Roman cause even in an ill Post, by the strength of his courage and audacity. As soon as Hofus fell, the Roman Army gave way, and were driven as far as the Old Palace-gate; and Romulus himself being forced along by the croud of them that fled, lifting up his arms toward Heaven, cried out, Ju- pter! by the command of thy Birds I laid the first Foundations of this City here on the Mount Palatine: Now the Sabines have got my Castle which they have purchased by Treachery, and are coming from thence hither all in Arms over the Valley that lies between us. But do thou, O Father of Gods and Men! repel the Enemy at least from this place, remove this terror from the Romans, and stop their dishonorable flight. I vow, that here I will build thee a Temple by the name of Jupiter Stator [so called, for stopping those that fled] which may be a Monument to all posterity, that by thy present aid our City was preserved. Having made this Prayer (as if he had been sensible that his Prayers were heard) he cried out: From this place, Romans! the good and great Jupiter bids you rally and renew the Fight. Immediately the Romans faced about, and fought as if they had been commanded by a voice from Heaven, whilst Romulus made all the haste he could to the head of the Army. Metius Curtius, the Sabine General, ran down from the Castle and had driven the Romans the breadth of the whole Forum [or Market-place] nor was he now far from the Gate of the Palace, crying out, We have routed the perfidious Villains, cowardly, effeminate Fellows; and now they know it is quite another thing to force young Maids, than it is to engage with Men. Upon whom (as he was boasting on this wise) Romulus, with a company of brave young fellows made an attack. Metius by chance at that time fought on Horseback, and consequently was the easier defeated; which when the Romans had accomplished, they pursued him, and the other part of the Roman Army, encouraged by the example of their King, routed the Sabines. Metius, whose Horse was scared at the noise of them that pursued him, got into a bog, and that made the Sabines also concerned for the danger that such a great Man was then in. But he, by the consent and advice of his own Men, whose kindness increased his resolution, made his escape; whilst in the mean time the Romans and Sabines in a Valley between two Hills renewed the Fight, but the Romans won the day.

XIII.

Then the Sabine Women, who were the unhappy cause of the War, with their hair about their ears, and their garments all torn, having conquered all feminine fear by their misfortunes, were so bold as to run in among the flying darts, and across between the two Armies to part them and decide the quarrel, begging and intreating on the one hand the Sabines, as Fathers; and on the other, the Romans, as Husbands; That they who were all Fathers and Sons in law would not stain themselves with blood: that they would not defile their own Offspring with parricide, the Sabines the Progeny of their Grandchildren, or the Romans that of their Children. If you are vexed at the alliance and intermarriage that is between you, turn your anger upon us; we are the cause of the War, and of all the wounds or slaughter that has been made either of Husbands or Parents: 'tis better for us to die, than live either Widows or Childless without one part of you. This moveth both the common Soldiers, and the Commanders also: and immediately there was silence and a cessation of Arms, upon which the Generals marched forth to make a League; nor did they conclude a Peace only, but made one City out of two, join'd both the Kingdoms into one, and translated the Empire wholly to Rome. Thus the City was doubled; but, as a complement to the Sabines, the Citizens were after that called Quirites, from Cures [a Town of the Sabines:] and as a Monument of that fight, they called the place where Curtius, having escaped out of a deep Fen, first stop'd his Horse upon the Strand, the Lacus Curtius [or Curtian Lake.] That Peace which so suddenly succeeded such a fatal War, made the Sabine Women much dearer to their Husbands and Parents, and above all, to Romulus himself. And therefore when he divided the People into thirty Curiae [or Wards] he called those Curiae by their names. It is not said, whether those Women who gave their names to the several Wards (which were not so many, questionless, as there were Women) were chosen out upon the score of their age, the dignities of their Husbands, their own virtue, or by lot. At the same time also there were three hundred Horse raised; the Ramnenses, so called from Romulus; the Tatienses, so called from Titus Tatius, and the Luceres, the cause of whose name and original is uncertain. And from that time two Kings enjoyed that Kingdom, not only in common, but with peace and concord also.

XIV.

Some years after, certain Relations of King Tatius abused the Ambassadors that came from Laurentum; concerning which, the Laurenses desired to be tried by the Law of Nations, but the kindness that King Tatius had for his Kindred, and their intreaties prevailed more with him. Wherefore he turned their punishment upon himself; for at Lavinium, when he came thither to a solemn Sacrificing, they made a riot and killed him. Which thing, Romulus, they say, took not so ill as he might have done; either because he thought Tatius an unfaithful partner in the Kingdom, or that he looked upon him as justly slain. Wherefore he abstain'd from making War; but yet, to expiate for the injuries of the Ambassadors, and the death of the King, the League between those two Cities, Rome and Lavinium, was renewed. But when this unexpected Peace was made with that People, another War broke out more near at hand, even almost at their very Gates. The Fidenates thinking that a great and powerful Empire was growing too near them, took an occasion to make a War by way of prevention, before it attained to that strength which in time it was likely to have; wherefore they sent their youth all armed to ravage the Country that lies between Rome and Fidenæ. Then turning to the left (for on the right hand the Tiber hindered their passage) they waited all before them, to the great consternation and terror of the Country people, who, being put into a sudden tumult,

by

by that means brought the news into the City. Romulus, surprized at it, and being much concerned, immediately (for a War so near at hand would not admit of any long deliberation) drew out his Army, and pitch'd his Camp a thousand paces from Fidenæ. Where having left a small Guard, he marched out with all the rest of his Forces, and ordering some part of his men to make an Ambuscade in the thickets thereabout, went on himself with the greater part of his Foot and all his Horse, and (as his desire was) by a tumultuous, daring way of fighting, and riding about before their very Gates, provoked the Enemy to take notice of him; besides, that way of Fighting on Horse-back gave them less reason to wonder at that flight, which his men were to counterfeit: and so when the Horse seemed to be in a quandary, whether they should fight or run, and the Foot too gave back; the Enemy came full drive out upon them, and seeing the Roman Army make way, were so eager to press up and follow them, that at last they were decoy'd to the place where the Ambuscade lay. From whence the Romans started up all on a sudden and set upon the Enemies flank. But it was an addition to their fear, to see the Ensigns which were left in the Garrison, move out of their Camp. Thus the Fidenates, strook with manifold dread, before Romulus and they that were with him could turn their Horses, turned their backs, and with more speed (for this was a real flight) than they followed the Romans, who a little before pretended to fly, made to the Town again: yet they did not save themselves from the Enemy; for the Romans stuck close to their back, and before they could shut their Gates, broke all together into the Town.

XV.

At the calamity of this War with the Fidenates, the minds of the Veientes were likewise highly provoked, as well as upon the score of Consanguinity, (for both they and the Fidenates were Etrurians) besides that the nearness of the place, if the Roman Arms must needs be so uneasy to all their Neighbors, was a sufficient instigation: wherefore they made an excursion into the Roman Dominions, committing more havock than consisted with the rules of a just War. To which end they pitch'd no Tents, nor expected the Enemy, but carrying away what Forage they found in the Fields, returned to Veii [their City.] The Roman on the other hand, finding no Enemy in the Field, but being prepar'd and resolv'd to fight it out to the last Man, passed the Tiber. Whom when the Veientes heard of, that he had pitch'd his Camp, and was drawing up toward their City, they marched out to meet him, as choosing rather to make a Field-battle of it, than be shut up and fight from the tops of their Houses and Walls. But though they had strength, they had no Art, and therefore the Roman King overcame them with the declining strength of his old Soldiers, and pursuing them as they ran away even to their Walls, he retired from the City, because it was strong both in its fortifications and very situation too. But as he came back, he wasted the Country, more out of revenge than desire of prey. The Veientes were tamed by that slaughter which was then made among them, as much as if they had fought a set Battle, and therefore sent Orators to Rome to desire a Peace. Whereupon they were sentenced to lose part of their Country, but had a Truce granted them for 100 years. These things were transacted in the Reign of Romulus, at home and in the Wars; of which there is nothing that contradicts the belief of his divine Original, or that divinity, which 'tis thought he after his death attained to: not his zeal for the recovery of his Grandfathers Kingdom; nor his design in building the City; nor his strengthening of it by the arts of Peace and War: for from that glorious beginning, when he came to have strength enough, he was so powerful and prudent, that he preserved a Peace entire for forty years after. But he was more beloved by the common People, than the Senators; and the Soldiers admired him far beyond any other, of whom he had 300, called Celeres [Light-Horsemen] in his Life-guard, not only in War, but in Peace also.

XVI.

After he had done all these immortal Exploits, as he was mustering his Army in the Field next to the Fen called Capra palus [the Goat-Fen] there rose such a sudden storm with claps of Thunder, and covered the King with such a thick veil of tempestuous Darkeness, that the Assembly could not see him; nor was he ever seen upon Earth any more. The Roman youth (when the fright at last was over, and the troubled Sky clearing up, grew calm and serene again) seeing the Kings seat empty, though they were sufficiently persuaded by the Senators that stood next him, that he was carried up from them in the Storm; yet being stricken as it were with the fear of losing a Father, for sometime continued in doleful silence, though soon after a few of them began, who were seconded by all the rest, and cried out, All hail! to Romulus, a God, born of a God, the King and Father of Rome, we all pray to him for Peace, and that he would always be ready propitiously to protect and preserve his own Progeny. There were also, I suppose, some persons at that time, who privately reported, that the King was torn in pieces by the Senators, for such a rumor went abroad, though it were but a blind story. But the other is made creditable by the admiration which they shew'd for the Man, and their present consternation. And this they say was confirmed by the contrivance of one person; for Proculus Julius, when the City was all in great concern for the loss of their King, and angry with the Senate, came into a publick Assembly, and was, they say, the Author of a heinous lie, though a matter of great consequence. Romulus, says he, (O ye Romans!) the Father of this City, came down from Heaven on a sudden this morning at break of day, and stood in my way; at which I was astonished and stood trembling before him, but begged of him, that I might see his face; no, says he, get you gone, and tell the Romans, the Gods have so ordained obtained it, that my Rome shall be the Head of the World; wherefore let them study Military Discipline: and let them know and deliver the same to their Posterity, that no human power can withstand the Roman Arms: Having said this, says he, he fled up. 'Tis strange to tell you, what credit they gave to this mans relation, and how the grief both of the People and the Army for the loss of Romulus was mitigated, when they were once induced to believe that he was grown Immortal.

XVII. In the mean time the Senate had great differences among them, and were each of them mighty ambitious of being King: but no single person could make a party, because no one among that new People was much more eminent than another; but the controversy lay between the several ranks of men. Those that were descended from the Sabines, lest they (because since Tatius's death had none of them govern'd in equal dignity with Romulus) should lose the possession of the Empire, desired to have a King chosen out of their Body. The old Romans, on the other side, contemned and slighted the name of a Foreign King; but though they were divided in their Opinions, yet all of them were for having a King, having not yet had experience how sweet Liberty was. Then the Senate was afraid, lest any external force should invade the City now that it was without a Governor, the Army without a General, and many Cities round about their incensed Enemies: wherefore they thought it fit to make some body Head; but no one of them could endure the thoughts of submitting to another. The Senate therefore made up the matter among themselves, by making of ten Decuriae [or Precincts] and setting one Senator over each of them to manage all Affairs. So ten bore Rule, of which one had the Ensigns of Empire and Lictors [Serjeants] before him. Their Dominion lasted but five days, and so went round to all the House; and at that time there was an interval of Government for a year, from whence we have the word Interregnum, the space between one Kings Reign and the beginning of another. But this made the People murmur, and say, that their Slavery was multiplied, in that they now had an hundred Lords instead of one; nor did they seem to be willing any longer to have any other than a King, and him too of their own choosing. When the Senate saw that, they thought fit to offer what they must needs part with, and therefore to win upon them, they gave the People the supreme Authority, but in such a manner, that they granted no more power than they reserv'd for themselves; for they Decreed, That when the People had named a King, their choice should stand, if the Senate would agree to it; (and even to this day the same method is observed in the making of Laws and Magistrates, save only the animosity) but before the People had given their Voices, the Senate gave their consent at random, let the event be what it would. Then the Interrex, having called an Assembly, told them, Romans! I hope it will be to your advantage, and therefore pray choose a King; for so the Senate would have you do. And if you make choice of such a Person as is fit to be the second from Romulus, they will confirm it. This pleased the People so well, that lest they might seem to be outdone in Civility, they only ordered and required, That the Senate would Decree and Appoint one to be King of Rome.

XVIII. The Justice and Religion of Numa Pompilius was at that time very famous. He lived at a Sabine Town, called Cures, and was a Person, considering the Age he lived in, very well versed in all Laws, both divine and humane. They tell you (but falsely) that Pythagoras the Samian was his Master, (because they know of no other) though it is well known that he kept a School of young studious Lads above an hundred years after, in the Reign of Servius Tullius, upon the utmost borders of all Italy about Metapontus, Heraclea and Croton. From which distant places (though he had lived in the same Age) how should the Sabines have heard of his Fame, or by what intercourse of Language could he have excited any Person in that Country to the desire of Learning? or with what safety should a single man have travelled through so many Countries of different languages and manners? I therefore suppose, that his Soul was rather naturally endued with virtuous inclinations, and instructed not so much with Foreign Arts, as by the severe and rigid discipline of the old Sabine; than which none heretofore was more free from corruption. The Senate having heard of Numa's name (though they thought it might be a means to advance the Sabines above the Romans, if they should take a King from thence, yet) there was not any one of them that durst prefer either himself, any one of his party, nor in fine, any Senator or Citizen before that great Man; and therefore nemine contradicente, they Decreed, That Numa Pompilius should be King. Thereupon he was sent for, and like Romulus who built the City by the admonition of an Augury, took possession of the Kingdom. For he ordered, that the Gods should be consulted concerning him; and then being led into the Castle by the Augur [or Sooth-sayer] (who, from that time, out of respect to the present circumstance, was publick and perpetual Priest) he sat him upon a Stone with his Face towards the South. The Augur sat on his left hand with his head covered, holding a crooked staff without any knot (which they call'd Lituis) in his right hand: and when, having taken a prospect of the City and the Country round about, he had paid his Devotion to the Gods; he marked out the several regions of the Air, from East to West, with his right side to the South, and his left to the North. After which he looked towards a certain place, which in his mind he pitch'd upon, as far as his eyes could ken. Then removing his Lituis [or Augurs staff] into his left hand, and put-putting his right hand on Numa's head, he made this Prayer; Great Father Jove! If thou thinkest fit, that this same Numa Pompilius, whose head I now have in my hand, should be King of Rome; I beg of Thee, that thou wouldst shew us thy certain and manifest tokens of it within those bounds which I have marked out. When he had so done, he performed all other ceremonies belonging to his office; which being ended, Numa was declared King, and came down from the place where he sat.

Numa being thus put into the possession of the Kingdom, made it his business afresh to build that new City which Romulus had founded by force of Arms, and to adorn it with Laws and moral Institutions: To which, seeing he could not make that warlike People comply, (for they had lost all sense of Morality and Civility, by being so long in Arms) and thinking the best way to mollify them, was by disusing and taking them off from the fierce toils of War, he built a Temple to Janus at the lower end of the street called Argiletum, to be an advertisement both of Peace and War; which when it was open, might signify the City was in Arms; and when shut, might shew they had Peace with all Nations. That Temple was twice shut after the Reign of Numa; once when Titus Manlius was Consul, at the end of the first Punic War; and a second time, after the Battel at Actium, by the Emperour Augustus Caesar, who gained a general Peace by sea and land, which the Gods have been so favourable to let us see even in this our Age. Numa having shut up this Temple, and obliged all the neighbouring Nations by Leagues and Alliances which he made with them, was now freed from all fear of foreign dangers; yet, lest his Peoples minds might grow luxurious for want of employment, (for the continual fear of some Enemy and Military Discipline had formerly kept them within bounds) he thought Religion the best and most efficacious thing which he could introduce, to keep the then rude and unskilful multitude in awe. But, because it was not like to have any great effect on their minds, without the help of some feigned miracle or other; he pretended that he had nocturnal conversation with the Goddess Egeria; and that by her advice, he appointed such holy rites as were most acceptable to the Gods, and ordained peculiar Priests to each particular God. And first of all, he divided the year into twelve Months, according to the course of the Moon; which (because the Moon does not make up full thirty days each Month, but there are some days wanting of a compleat year) he so rectified, by putting in some odd days, that every twentieth year the days agreed exactly with that order and account by which they were at first computed. He also appointed which should be working-days, and which holy-days, because sometimes it might be convenient to give the People liberty.

Then he created the several Priests, though he himself performed many sacred offices, especially such as now belong to Jupiter's Flamen or High-priest. But because in such a warlike City, he supposed there would be more Kings like Romulus, than there would be like Numa, and that they would go to the Wars in their own persons; for fear the holy Rites which the King was to perform should be omitted, he created a Priest who was to be a daily Flamen [or sacrificer] to Jupiter; adorning him with a peculiar Robe, and seating him in a royal chair of State: besides whom he made two other Flamines [or Priests] one for Mars, and the other for Romulus. He likewise chose out Virgins for Vesta; which was a Female Priesthood that came originally from Alba [an adjacent City] and out of the same Country where their Founder was born: appointing them to be continual attendants in her Temple, allotting them a stipend out of the Publick Treasury, and making them venerable as well as sacred, on the score of their Virginity, and other ceremonies which they were obliged to. He also chose twelve Salij [or Priests] devoted to Mars surnamed Gradiivus, [from his stately marching to War] and gave them a painted Coat for a Badg of distinction, over which they wore a brazen Breast-plate, ordaining that they should carry those sacred Shields, called Ancilia, and go about the City singing and dancing in such a sett and solemn manner. After that, he chose Numa Martius the Son of Marcus out of the Senate, to be Pontifex [or High-Priest] and gave him a transcript of all the Holy Rites as he had designed them; that is to say, what Sacrifices should be offered, upon what days, in what Temples they were to be made, and whence Money should be had to defray the charge of them. Besides which, he put all holy things, both publick and private under the Jurisdiction of this same Pontifex [or High-Priest] that the People might have some certain person to come and advise with; lest there should happen any confusion in their religious Worship; either by neglecting the ancient Rites of their Country, or by introducing such as were foreign. Nor did he intend, that this same Pontifex should instruct the People in sacred ceremonies only, but in the Rites of Burial too, and how to appease the Ghosts of men deceased: and, for the interpretation of all prodigies that happened by Thunder, or other extraordinary events, he dedicated an Altar in the mount Arventine to Jupiter Elicius, and consulted the God by Auguries, to know which were to be taken notice of, or what was to be done upon any such present occasion.

The People being turned from force and arms to consult and mind these sacred rules, their thoughts were wholly taken up with this affair; and their daily devotion to the God (now that Divinity it self seemed to dwell among them) had so inflamed all their Souls with heavenly zeal, that truth and Honesty governed the City without the help of Laws, or or fear of Punishment. And, as they themselves squared their manners according to their Kings, who was their sole Example, so likewise all the neighbouring Nations, who before that time, believed that a Camp more like than a City was founded in the midst of them, to disturb their Peace, were reduced to that modesty and civility, that they thought it a very great crime to violate such a place which was now wholly converted to the Worship of the Gods. There was a Grove through the middle whereof there ran a stream out of a dark Grotto springing from a continual Fountain; whither because Numa oftentimes retir'd without any company as it were to meet his Goddess, he consecrated that Grove to the Camena [or Muses;] because, he pretended, they advised him at the same time when he conversed with his Wife Ageria. He appointed Solemnities to the Goddess call'd Fides [or common Honesty] only; to whose Temple he ordered the Priests to be carried in a Chariot, with an arched Canopy drawn by two Horses, and that they should sacrifice with their arms covered as low as their fingers; signifying, that Faith and common Honesty ought to be preserved, and that the sacred Seat of it is even in the right hand. He instituted many other Sacrifices, and consecrated many other places which the Pontifices [or High Priests] call Argei. But the greatest thing that ever he did was his preserving of Peace, no less than the Honour of the Kingdom all the time of his Reign. So, two Kings one after another, though in a different way, one by War, the other by Peace, advanced the Grandeur of the City. Romulus Reigned thirty seven years, and Numa forty three. Then the City was strong and well exercised in the arts both of War and Peace.

XXII. Upon the death of Numa, there was another Interregnum [or space of time between the Reign of two Kings;] and then the People chose Tullus Hostilius the Grandson of Hostilius King, who had behaved himself very bravely at the Foot of the Castle, against the Sabines. To which choice of the People the Senate gave their consent. But this Man was not only unlike his Predecessour, but more warlike even than Romulus himself: for, not only his age and strength but his Grandfather's glory also excited his ambition. He therefore fancying that the City grew old and lazy for want of employment, sought all occasions to make a War. It happened at that time, that the Roman Country People pillaged the Alban Dominions, and the Albans on the other hand, as much the Roman territories. Caius Cluilus was then Governour of Alba, and there were Ambassadors sent from both places about the same time to seek redress for mutual injuries done to each other: but Tullus had given his a charge that they should do nothing before they had executed his commands; for he knew very well, that the Alban would deny what he demanded, and so he might lawfully and plausibly proclaim War against him. The Albans were more negligent in their affairs, and Tullus's Ambassadors were very kindly treated by the King at a Feast. But whilst they staid, the Romans did not only demand back again what the Albans had taken from them; but upon their denial, declared they would make War in thirty days; all which negotiation they made Tullus acquainted with. Then Tullus gave the Alban Ambassadors audience; but they not knowing his design, at first delayed the time in making Apologies for themselves; That they should be unwilling to say any thing that might displease Tullus, but must be obedient to their Masters commands: that they came thither for redress of injuries which they had suffered, and unless they could have it, were commanded to declare War. To which Tullus replied and said, Tell your King, that the King of the Romans takes the Gods to witness, that whichever of the two People shall first despise and dismiss an Embassy that comes to demand Justice, he desires that all the calamities of this War may fall upon them. Which answer of his the Albans related to their King.

XXIII. Upon this, there were very great preparations made for a War on both sides, which looked much like a Civil War, as being a quarrel almost between Fathers and their Children: for they both came of the Trojan Race, Lavinium from Troy, Alba from Lavinium, and the Romans from the Albans. But the event of the War made the quarrel less considerable, because they did not fight in the open field, and besides that, the houses of one City being lately destroyed, those two People were united into one. The Albans first with a great Army made an incursion into the Roman Dominions, pitching their Camp not above five thousand paces from the City, and enclosing it with a ditch, which from the name of their General, was called Cluilus's Ditch, for some ages, till, by tract of time, the name was lost together with the thing it self. In this Camp Cluilus the Alban King died, in whose stead the Albans created a Dictator, Metius Suffetius. In the mean time Tullus grew very insolent, especially upon the death of the King, and saying, That, the Gods having begun at the head, would punish the whole body of the Albans, for the unjust War which they had made, he passed by the Enemies Camp in the Night-time, and with a dreadful Army marched into the Alban Territories. This removed Metius from his Camp, who drew his men up as near to the Enemy as he could, and thence sent an Ambassador before him to tell Tullus, That it was convenient before they began the Fight, for them to have a parley; and that if he would meet him, he was well assured, that he could tell him something no less advantageous to the Roman, than to the Alban State: which proffer Tullus did not slight, though it was but frivolous, and therefore led his men forth into the field, where the Albans met him. When the two Armies stood in Battalia on both sides, the two Generals marched up into the

the midway between them, with some few of the Nobility attending him. Then the Alban thus began; I understand that certain injuries, and the not restoring what was demanded back, has made our King Cluilus to seem the cause of this War; nor do I doubt, O Tullus! but you pretend the same thing: but if we may speak truth, rather than what seems specious and plausible only, it is desire of Empire which at present sets two people who are allied and Neighbours, at variance. Nor do I pretend to say whether it be well or ill done on either side: let him look to that, who undertakes the War; the Albans have chosen me their General in it. But this (O Tullus!) I must needs tell you, you have more reason to know how strong the Etrurians are, who border very near upon us, but are much nearer to you. They are very powerful by land, but much more by Sea; and therefore pray take notice, that when you join Battel, these two Armies will be in their sight only like a show or spectacle; so that when we have tired and ruined one another, they will set upon the Conquerour, as well as on the conquered. Wherefore, if the Gods have any favour for us, or we any care of our selves, at this juncture, when not content with certain liberty, we run the hazard of Empire or Slavery, let us take some course to decide the question, which of us shall govern the other, without any slaughter or bloodshed on either side. This proposal did not much displease Tullus, though he were heated both by his natural inclination and the hopes of victory. They therefore fell to consultation in the affair, and fortune herself found out an expedient.

There happened to be at that time three Brothers in each Army, whose age and strength was equal, and those were the Horatij and the Curatij, than whose engagement against each other there is scarce any thing more famous in all antiquity: but yet even concerning a thing of that moment, men are at a loss, nor can any body certainly tell which side the Horatij were on, or which side the Curatij. Authors are divided in their opinions, but I find most make the Horatij to be Romans, and I am very much inclined to believe they were so. The two Kings treated with these two ternaries of Brethren, that they would each fight a combat for their Country, and that that side should enjoy the Empire that got the victory. They did not at all decline it, but agreed upon the time and place. Before they fought, there was a compact made between the Romans and the Albans upon these conditions, that, That People whose Citizens won the day, should govern the other in peace and quietness. Some leagues are made with different Articles, but all in the same nature. At that time this we hear was thus made, nor is there any record of any league more ancient. The Herald asked King Tullus this question: Does your Majesty command me to strike a league with the Herald of the Albans? To which the King complying, the Herald made answer and said, I demand Vervain of your Majesty. The King replied, Take it up clean. Whereupon the Herald brought from the Castle some clean leaves of that Plant, and then asked the King, Sir, do you make me the Royal Messenger of the Roman People, with all my carriages and retinue? The King answered, I do all that may be done with Justice to my self and the Roman People. The Herald's name was M. Valerius, and he made Spurius Fufius the Pater Patratus [or Chief Herald] by touching his head and his hair with Vervain (the Pater Patratus was made to confirm and strengthen their Oath) and then he perfected the league in many words, and those in verse too, which are too long to relate. After that, having recited the conditions, he said. Hear, (O Jupiter!) Hear thou O Herald of the Albans! and all ye People of Alba! How that all those words which I speak both first and last here in publick from these waxed tables, without any fraud or design are to be understood, according to the plain sense of them; and that the Roman People will not first revolt from these conditions by any deceitful dealing, though they have gone contrary to publick advice; No, in that day, do thou, O Jupiter! so smite the Roman People, as I this day shall smite this hog; nay, do it as much more fatally as thy omnipotence is able! Having so said, he smote an hog with a flint-stone: and then the Albans, by their Dictator and their Priests, repeated their verses and their Oath.

When the league was thus made, the three Brothers on each side according to the agreement, took up their Arms: and having admonished each other, that the Gods of their Country, their Country and their Parents, and all their fellow Citizens, whether at home or in the Army, had their eyes fixed upon their Arms and their hands; being animated both by their own natural courage, and filled with the exhortations of all the by-standers, march forth into the midst between the two Armies. The two Armies sat down on both sides before their Camps, more free from present danger than from care; for their Empire was at stake, and ventured upon the courage and fortune of those few men: wherefore, with great suspense of mind, they were very intent on that ungrateful spectacle. The Signal was given, and the three young men on each side fell fiercely to it, with a courage and fury of two great Armies: nor were they concerned, either one or t'other for their own particular danger, but publick Empire and slavery possessed their minds, and the thoughts that such would be the fortune of their Country as they themselves procured. Upon the first onset, when their Arms clash'd and their Swords glitter'd, a great dread seized all the Spectatours, for the Combat enclining to neither side, the People had almost lost their voice and breath. But soon after when they came to grappling, and shewed not only agility of body and their dexterity in handling their Arms, but blood and wounds, two of the Romans fell down dead one over the other, having wounded the three Albans, at whose fall, the Alban Army gave a great shout for joy; which made the Roman Legions despair, and yet they were extremely concerned concerned for that one single Person who was encompassed by the three Curatij. But it so happened, that he was yet unhurt, and though being a single person, he was not able to cope with them all, yet he was strong enough for any one of them: wherefore, to divide the Combat, he pretended to fly; supposing, that they would each of them follow him as their wounds would permit. When he was got some distance from the place where the Combat began, looking back, he saw them pursue him a good way behind, but one of them, not far from him; and therefore he returned and set upon him very severely. And while the Alban Army cried out to the Curatij to help their Brother, the Horatius had now killed his Enemy, and being victorious, made what haste he could to engage a second of them. Then the Romans with a shout like that of People who are beyond all expectation animated to favour any party, encouraged their Champion; and he did all he could to make an end of the fight. Wherefore before the third who was not far off could overtake him, he dispatched the second Curatius. And now they were upon equal terms, as being one to one, though there was no parity between them either of hope or strength; for the Roman body which was untouched, and the double victory which he had gained, made him fit and eager to engage in a third encounter, while the Alban who was tired with his wounds had run so far, that he could hardly crawl, and was in a manner conquered by seeing his Brethren slain before him, was exposed to a victorious Enemy; nor was that Duel any difficulty at all to him. Wherefore the Roman exulting, cried out, I have sent two of these Brethren to Hell already; and will now send the third who is the cause of this War, that the Romans may bear Rule over the Albans. With that, the Alban being scarce able to support his arms, he ran him into the Throat, and rified him when he was down. The Romans with shouts and gratulations, received the Horatius, and their joy was so much the greater, by how much more their fears had been. Whereupon they went with very different thoughts to bury their dead; for one side was advanced to Empire, and the other side made subject to Foreigners. Their Sepulchres are to be seen in the several places where each of them fell; those of the two Romans in one place nearer to Alba, and those of the three Albans toward Rome, but at a distance from each other according as they fought.

XXVI.

Before they went thence Metius asked Tullus, according to the league which they had made, what his commands were? To which he replied, that all the young men should be ready in Arms; for he should make use of them, if he had occasion to make War against the Vientes: So the Armies were thence led home. Horatius marched in the head of them, carrying his triple Spoils before him, and being met near the gate called Porta Capena, by a Virgin his Sister who was betrothed to one of the Curatij; she knowing her Lovers robe upon her Brothers shoulders, which she herself had wrought, she let loose her hair, and in a mournful tone, called out upon the name of her dead Sweet-Heart. The moan which his Sister made much moved the generous Youth, even amidst his Victories, and all that publick joy. He therefore drew his Sword, and chiding her, ran the Maid through: Get you gone (said he) with your untimely amour to your Lover; you, that have forgot your Brothers that are dead, nor care for him that is alive, but with him and them neglect your Country too; and so may every Maid be served that is a Roman, and weeps for the death of an Enemy. That seemed a cruel act, both to the Senate and the People, but his fresh desert did somewhat lessen the fact: yet, nevertheless he was convened before the King. The King, lest he should seem the Author of so sad and ungrateful a Judgment in the opinion of the vulgar, or, after judgment of punishment, called an assembly of the People, and said, I constitute two Officers

This was the crime call'd Perduellio. i. he tried, in which, if the Duumviri carry the cause, let the Offenders head be covered, and be hanged upon a Gallows, and let him have so many stripes either within or without the Walls. By this Law the Duumviri were created, who thought, that they thereby were obliged not to absolve even an innocent person, when they had once condemned him; and therefore one of them said to him, P. Horatius, I judge thee guilty of Enmity to thy Country: go, Officer, bind his hands. Accordingly the Officer came and tied him; whereupon Horatius by the consent of Tullus, who was a favourable Interpreter of the Law, cried out, I appeal; and so the appeal was tried before the People. All men were concerned at that trial, especially, when P. Horatius his Father, declared, that he thought his Daughter was justly slain; and if it had not been so, that he would have corrected his Son according to the duty and power of a Father. Then he desired them, that they would not make him whose Sons they had so lately seen to be so conspicuous for their valour, quite childless. With that the old man, embracing his Son, and pointing to the Spoils of the Curatij, set up in that place which is now called Pila Horatia [or Horatius's Trophies] Can you (said he) O Romans, endure to see this youth whom you so lately beheld adorned with Victory and march triumphantly before you, bound, whipped and tortured under a Gallows? when even the eyes of the Albans could hardly bear so horrid a spectacle. Go, Officer, bind those hands, which not long since were armed to gain an Empire for the Roman People. Go, veil the head of him that freed this City. Hang him up; drub him even within the Walls, so it be near those Trophies and Spoils he took from the Enemy; or without the City, so it be within view of

of those Sepulchres where the Curatij lie buried. For, whither can you lead this youth, where his own brave Actions will not rescue him from the Dishonour of such a base kind of Punishment? the People were sorry to see his Fathers tears, and that he himself should shew so little concern in all that danger; wherefore they acquitted him more out of admiration of his Courage, than for the justice of his cause. But, that the manifest Murder might be atoned for by some means or other, 'twas ordered, that his Father should expiate his Sons guilt, by a publick expence. He therefore having performed some propitiatory Sacrifices, which were afterwards transmitted to the Family of the Horatij, made a Gallows cross the way and ordered his Son to pass under it, as Soldiers do when they are sold for Slaves. And that Gallows is still kept in repair at the publick charge, even to this day, being called Sororium Tigillum [or the Gallows set up on the account of a Sister.] The Sepulchre of the Maid that was killed was built in the place where she fell, of square Stone.

But the Peace with Alba did not long continue; for the Envy of the Common People, who took it ill, that the publick fortune of their Country should be committed to three Soldiers only, corrupted the vain disposition of their Dictators; and seeing that good Counsels had not succeeded well, he endeavoured to reconcile the minds of his Country-men by ill means. To which end, as before in time of War he had desired Peace, so now in time of Peace he desired War. But, because he saw their City had much more courage than strength to declare and wage an open War, he instigated other people thereunto, reserving the treacherous part to be acted by his own Country-men, under a shew of alliance and friendship. The People of Fidenæ, who were a Roman Colony, having taken advice with the Vientes, were moved to make War and take up Arms, upon condition, that the Albans would revolt to their party. When Fidenæ was in open Rebellion, Tullus sent for Metius and his Army from Alba, whom he led against the Enemy: and having past the River Anien, he pitched his Camp at the meeting of the two Rivers. Between that place and Fidenæ the Army of the Vientes got over the Tiber, and were posted in the right wing near the River, whilst those of Fidenæ stood in the left, more near to the Mountains. Tullus led his men against the Veian Enemy, and planted the Albans over against the Legion of the Fidenates. The Albans had no more courage than honesty; and therefore, not daring either to stand or move with any confidence, crept, by degrees to the Mountains. Where, when they thought themselves safe enough, they set their whole Army in array; but, being in doubt what to do, and willing to delay time, they took a great deal of pains to range their men. Their design was, which way soever Fortune should incline, that way to bend their forces. The Romans, who stood next to them, began to wonder at first when they saw themselves deserted by the going off of their Allies: and immediately, a Trooper galloping away, went and told the King, that the Albans were gone. At which Tullus was put into such a consternation, that he made twelve Salij [or Priests of Mars] and dedicated Temples to Pallor and Parvor, [i.e. to Paleness and Fear] wherewithal he chid the Trooper so loud that the Enemy might hear him, and bid him return into the Battel; telling him, They had no need to fear, in that the Alban Army had wheeled about by his order to surprize the Fidenates in their unguarded Reer. He likewise commanded the same Person to bid all the Horse advance their Javelins; which Action of theirs intercepted the flight of the Alban Army marching off, from a great part of the Roman Foot; but those who saw them, supposing it to be as they had heard the King say, fell on the more eagerly. The Enemies were terrified, for they heard what the King so loudly said; and many of the Fidenates, as being a Colony belonging to the Romans, understood Latin. Wherefore, last on a sudden they should have been blocked up by the descent of the Albans from the Hills, and hindered of regaining the Town, they turned their backs. Tullus pursued them, and having routed the wing of the Fidenates, he returned more fiercely upon the Veians, who were struck with a strange dread. Nor could they endure the shock; but, running hastily away, were driven to a River that was behind them; to which when they were come some of them shamefully threw away their Arms, and ran headlong into the water; the rest staying on the banks and doubting whether they should fly or fight, were all slain: nor was there ever, before that time, a blouidier Battel fought by the Romans.

Then the Alban Army, who had been Spectators of the Fight, was led down into the plains; and Metius congratulated Tullus his conquest over his Enemies: in answer whereunto, Tullus spoke very kindly to Metius and told him, He hoped it would be for both their advantages, if the Alban and the Roman Camp were both united into one; wherefore he gave order it should be so, and against the next day, prepared a Sacrifice to purifie the Army. Next morning, as soon as it was day, when all things were ready, He, as the custom is, commanded both Armies to meet in one Assembly. The cries began at the end and cited the Albans first; who, being concerned at the novelty of the thing, as much as at any thing else, that they might hear what the Roman King said, stood next to him. A Roman Legion all in Arms was ordered to enclose them, and the Centurions were employed to put their orders in execution without any delay. Then Tullus thus began;

Romans!

Romans! If ever you had reason, in any Battle before this time, first, to thank the immortal Gods and then congratulate your own valour, it was for yesterday's achievement. For you fought, not with Enemies more than (which is the most difficult and dangerous engagement) with the treachery and perfidiousness of your Allies. For, to undeceive you, the Albans went into the Mountains without my knowledge: nor was it my command, but my stratagem and only the pretence of a command, which I then made use of; to the end, that neither you, who knew nothing of your being deserted, might be discouraged from fighting, and the Enemy, supposing themselves to be circumvented in their rear, might be terrified and tempted to fly. But that fault which I now find, is not to be charged upon all the Albans; they followed their leader, as you also would have done, if I had been to have drawn you off to any other Post. That same Metius was the Ring-Leader in that Treachery, That Metius who was the contriver of this War, That Metius who broke the League betwixt the Romans and the Albans. Let some other hereafter dare to do the like, if I do not make him a signal example to all mankind. The Centurions stood about him, while the King went on as he began. I have a design, O ye Albans! which I hope will prove an happiness not only to the Romans in general, but to me and you also, that is, to translate all the People of Alba to Rome: to make the Commonalty free of the City, and to chase the Noblemen into the Senate; to make them one City and one Commonwealth; to the end, that as the Alban State was heretofore divided into two People, so now it may revert into one again. At that, the Alban youth, being themselves unarmed, but surrounded with Soldiers all in Arms, were in twenty minds, though common fear compelled them to hold their tongues. Then Tullus went on; Metius Suffetius, (said he) If thou couldest learn to keep thy word and not to break Leagues, thou shouldest live and I would teach thee how to do so. But now, seeing thy disposition is incurable, do thou by thy punishment, instruct mankind to believe those things sacred, which thou hast violated. As, therefore, thou didst lately shew thyself a Neuter, and that thy mind was divided between the Viduate and the Roman interest, so now shall thy body be. Having so said, he caused two Wagons to be placed near each other, and tyed Metius with his body distended to the bodies of them; which being done, the Horses were driven contrary ways, and carried his torn body upon each Wagon to which his limbs were fastened. The Company all turned away their eyes from such a cruel sight. That was the first and last Punishment among the Romans that was an instance of Inhumanity; for, in all others, they may very well boast, that no Nation was ever satisfied with easier penalties.

XXIX. At this time there was a party of Horse already sent to Alba to bring the multitude over to Rome; and after them the Legions were carried thither to demolish the City, who, when they entered the City, there was not that tumult nor consternation as usually is in Cities that are taken, when the Gates are broken open, the Walls battered down, or a Castle stormed; and when the noise of the Enemy and the fury of the Soldiers over all the Town mingles every thing with Fire and Sword; but a sad silence and a dumb sorrow put all their minds into such a melancholy posture, that they, through fear, forgetting what they left behind and what they carried with them, not knowing what to do and enquiring of one another, stood sometimes at their doors and other whiles ran distractedly about their Houses, which that was the last time they ever were like to see. But when the clamour of the Soldiers, who bid them be gone, was very urgent upon them, they heard the crash of the Houses that were pulling down in the remotest parts of the City, and the dust that arose from places distant covered all the Air as with a Cloud, each man in haste took what he could away, being he was to march off and leave his Native home, his household-Gods and that habitation, where he was born and bred. And now the whole troop of these departing Inhabitants having filled the streets, the sight of each other renewed their tears out of mutual commiseration; besides the lamentable cries that were heard, especially of the Women when they passed by the stately Temples, which were encompassed with Soldiers, and left their Gods, as it were, in captivity. The Albans having quitted their City, the Romans made all buildings both publick and private even with the ground, and one hour ruined and destroyed the work of those four hundred years that Alba had been standing. But they withheld their hands from the Temples of the Gods, because the King had so commanded.

XXX. In the mean time, Rome grew out of the Ruines of Alba, and the number of the Citizens was doubled. The Mount called Calvus was added to the City, and, to draw the more Inhabitants thither, Tullus had a Palace there, and dwelt upon it from that time forward. He chose the Nobility of the Albans into the Senate, that that part also of the Commonwealth might be augmented, that is to say, the Tullij, Servitij, Quintij, Geganeij, Curatij and the Clulij, and made a Temple to the Court for that order which he himself had augmented, which was called Hofilia even to our Fathers days. And, that he might make some addition out of this new People, to the strength of every order of men, he chose ten Troops of Horse out of the Albans. He also supplied the old Legions with the same number, and likewise raised new ones. In confidence of this his strength, Tullus declared War against the Sabines, a Nation, at that time, more opulent than any other except the Etrurians, both for Men and Arms. There were injuries done on both sides, and Goods in vain demanded back; Tullus complained, that the Roman Merchants were seized on at a great Fair kept near the Temple of Feronia; the Sabines, that theirs fled first into the Grove, and were detained at Rome: which actions are said to be the cause of the War. The Sabines well remembering, not only that part of their strength was carried to Rome by Tullus, but likewise, that, of late also the Roman State was augmented by the addition of the Albans, began themselves to look out for foreign assistance. Etruria was near them, and next to the Etrurians, the Veians; from whence, through their remaining animosities, which very much inclined them to a revolt, they had a great many Volunteers, besides that their pay also prevailed upon some Vagrants among the poor People. They had no publick assistance; for, the Veians (amongst whom it was a greater wonder than for any of the rest to do so,) kept the Truce which they had made with Romulus. When they had made very great preparations for the War on both sides, and the whole stress of the business seemed to lie in this, which of them should make the first onset; Tullus marched first into the Sabines Territories. They had a bloody Battle, hard by a Wood called Sylvia Malitiosa; where the Roman Army was very successful, not only through the strength of their Foot, but of their Horse too, which was so lately augmented. For, by the Horse, which rushed in suddenly upon them, the Sabine ranks were broken; so that, they from that time, could neither fight nor run away without confusion and great slaughter.

The Sabines being conquered, and Tullus, together with all the State of Rome, being in great glory, and advanced to great opulency, there was news brought to the King and the Senate, that upon the Mount Albanus it rained Stones; which being hard to be believed, there were certain persons sent to see that Prodigy; in whose sight there fell a shower of Stones from Heaven, in the same manner, as when the winds drive heaps of Hail together upon the Earth. They likewise thought they heard a shrill voice from the top of the Grove, which had the Albans do Sacrifice after the fashion of their own Country, which they had forgotten as much as if they had forsaken their Gods as well as their native soil; and, either had taken up with the Roman Rites, or, being angry with Fortune, as men in their circumstances generally are, had quitted the Worship of their Gods. The Romans also were moved by the same Prodigy, to appoint a publick Sacrifice of nine days continuance: whether by a voice from Heaven conveyed from the Mount Albanus, (for, that also is part of the tradition) or by the advice of the Soothsayers, is uncertain: but this we know, that the same solemnity continued, so that whenever they were told of the same prodigy, they sacrificed for nine days together. Not long after, there was a Plague among them; which, though it indisposed them to Military employments, yet their Warlike King would not permit them to lay down their Arms; because, he thought, the young mens bodies were more healthy even in the Camp than at home; till he himself also languished under a lingering Distemper. Then was his furious Spirit so far tamed, as well as his body, that he, who before thought nothing less becoming a King, than to give his mind to sacred things, became on a sudden, a very Bigot to all Superstitious both great and small, and filled even the People also with his religious notions. And now, the Commonalty, desiring to see that state of things renewed which they had enjoyed in the Reign of Numa, believed, that the only remedy that was left to recover their distempered bodies, was to make their peace and beg pardon of the Gods. They say, that the King himself having looked into the Commentaries of Numa, and there found some secret though solemn Sacrifices, made to Jupiter Elicius, performed them privately by himself: but that that Sacrifice was neither rightly prepared, nor carefully offered; and that he had not only no sign of favour shewn him from Heaven, but, that Jupiter also was enraged at his mock-Religion, and with Lightning burned him and his House. Tullus Reigned and gained great glory in War, two and thirty years.

When Tullus was dead, the Government, as it had been customary from the foundation of the City, revolved into the Senate, and they nominated an Inter-Rex, [or one that should rule between the Death of a former, and the Inauguration of a succeeding King] who called an Assembly, in which, the People chose Ancus Martius their King, and the Senate confirmed it. Ancus Martius was the Grandson of Numa Pompilius, being the Son of his Daughter; who, as soon as he began his Reign, being mindful of his Grandfathers glory, and because the last Kings Reign, though it was very remarkable for other things, yet was deficient in one part, and that was, either the neglect of Religion in general, or the disgrace he did it even by his pretence to it; and, supposing, it would be much the best way to perform the publick holy Rites in the same manner that Numa had ordained them, he commanded the chief Priest fairly to transcribe them out of the King's Commentaries, and make them publick: by which means, the Citizens, who were desirous of Peace, and the neighbouring Cities too, were put in good hopes, that the King would prove of a temper and inclination much like his Grandfather. Wherefore the Latines with whom King Tullus had made a League, grew very insolent, and when the Romans demanded satisfaction for an incursion, which that People had made into their Territories, they gave them a lawey answer; supposing, that the King of Rome would lead a slothful life, and reign only in Temples, and before the Altars. Ancus was of a middling disposition, as being mindful as well of Romulus as Numa; and, besides that he thought Peace more necessary in the Reign of his Grandfather, when the Romans were not only a new, but a fierce kind of People: He also thought that the leisure and ease which Numa had, himself should hardly enjoy without some inconvenience: that his patience was tried, and being tried condemned; and that the time of Tullus's Reign was much more suitable to his affairs, than that of Numa's. But yet, seeing Numa had instituted religious Worship in time of Peace, that he might set forth the due Ceremonies of War, and that Hostility might not only be maintained but proclaimed too with some formality, he promulgated the Laws which he received from the ancient People called Aquicoli (and are now in the hands of the Heralds) by virtue whereof, such things as are unlawfully taken away are redemanded. The Ambassador, when he comes to the confines of their Country from whom the reprisal is designed, has his head covered; (the covering is a woollen Shawl) and saies, Hear, O Jupiter! Hear, O yee Confines! (and names the Countrey, whose borders those are) and let Justice bear me. I am the publick Messenger of the Roman People, who come upon a just and a righteous account, and therefore desire I may be credited. Then he repeats his demands, and calls Jove to witness in this manner; If I require those men or those things to be delivered up to me, who am the Messenger of the Roman People, unjustly, and without reason, then mayst thou never suffer me to see my own Country again. These words he repeats when he passes the bounds of any Country, to whomsoever he first meets, as he enters in at a Gate, and when he is come into the Forum [or Market-place] though, with some little alteration, in the form and manner of them. If those persons whom he demands are not surrendered in three and thirty days, (for that is the usual time given) he proclaims War, in this manner; Hear, O Jupiter! and thou, O Juno! Romulus! All the Cælestial, Terrestrial and Infernal Gods, give ear to what I say! I call you all to witness, that, that People (and names the People who ever they be) is unjust, and does not do righteous things. But of these things we will consult the ancient men in our own Country to know how we may gain our right. Having so done, the Messenger returns to Rome, to advise in the Affair. Whereupon, immediately, the King, in words to this purpose, consulted the Senate; concerning controversies or causes, wherein the Herald of the Roman People demanded satisfaction from the Herald of the ancient Latins, and the ancient Latins themselves, as thinking it reasonable for them to be done, decided or resolved, since nothing is yet in that case by them performed; Tell me, (said he, to the Person whose opinion he asked) what think you of it? To which the party made answer; I think, those things are to be required in a just and lawful War; that is my opinion, which I will stand by. After him, the rest were asked in order; and when the greater part of them that were present agreed in the same opinion, they usually made a War by common consent; in which the ceremony was this, that the Herald carried a Javelin with an iron head or all bloody and burned at the end, to the confines of their Country, and in the presence of three young men at least, said these words; Whereas, the People of the ancient Latins, and the ancient Latins themselves have committed several Offences against the People of Rome, and whereas, the People of Rome have commanded a War to be proclaimed against the ancient Latins, to which the Senate of Rome have thought fit to consent; for that reason, I and the People of Rome denounce and make War against the People belonging to the ancient Latins, and against the ancient Latins themselves. When he had so said, he threw his Javelin into their Confines. This was at that time the manner in which the Latins redemanded things formerly taken from them, and how they declared War; which custom their Posterity also retained.

XXXIII. Ancus, having committed the care of Holy things to the Flamins, and other Priests, and raised a new Army, went to Politorium, a City of the Latins, and took it by storm; and imitating the custom of former Kings, who had augmented the Roman State, by taking their Enemies into the City, brought all the multitude to Rome; where, since the ancient Romans inhabited near the Palace, the Sabines, in the Capitol and the Castle, the Albans in the Mount called Clælius, and the strange People in the Arventine, new comers were not long after planted there also, when Telleni and Ficana were taken. After that, he made War against Politorium a second time, because the Latins had taken possession of it, being at that time empty: and that was the reason, why the Romans demolished that City, lest it should be a continual receptacle of their Enemies. At last, when the War against the Latins was reduced to Medullia only, they fought there for some time upon equal terms, and the Victory was uncertain; for, the City was not only fortified with Rampiers and Walls, and strengthened with a good Guard, but they had a Camp in the plains too, and the Latin Army engaged several times, hand to hand with the Romans. At last, Ancus drew out all his forces, and first overcoming them in a pitched Battel, where he gained great Spoils, he returned to Rome, and then, having admitted many Thousands of the Latins into the City, he joyned the Palace to the Arventine, by appointing them to inhabit near the Temple of the Goddess called Mercia. Faniculum was also added thereunto, not for want of room, but lest that might sometime prove a refuge for the Enemies: and that he thought good to joyn to the City, not only with a Wall, but also, for the convenience of passing, with a wooden Bridge, which was then first made over the Tiber. That Ditch also called Fossa Quiritium, which is no small defence against those that come from the Plains, was the work of King Ancus. And now, the City having re-

receiv'd a vast increase, seeing, that amongst such a multitude of men, it would be hard to judg, whether private Actions were well or ill done, he built a Prison in the middle of the City, near the Forum, for a terror to their increasing boldness. Nor did the City only flourish under this King, but their Territories and Confines were enlarg'd. The Wood call'd Sylva Mælia, was taken from the Veians; their Empire was propagated even to the Sea, the City Hestia was built at the mouth of Tiber, about which Salt-pits were made, and since their great Success in War, the Temple of Jupiter Phæreus was enlarg'd.

In the Reign of Ancus, one Lucumo, a diligent man, and one that was very wealthy, came XXXIV to Rome, out of a great desire and hope that he had of much Honour, which the Tarquinius (for there, he also, as well as they, was come of a Foreign Race) were not able to obtain. He was the Son of one Damaratus a Corinthian, who, flying his Country upon the Account of Sedition, and coming by chance to live at Tarquinius, [a City of Etruria] had there married a Wife, by whom he had two Sons, whose Names were Lucumo and Aruns. Lucumo surviv'd his Father, and was Heir to all his Estate; but Aruns died before his Father, leaving his Wife big with Child. Nor did the Father long survive the Son; but not knowing that his Daughter in Law was with Child, forgot his Grand-son in his Will, and dying, left him nothing; upon which Account, the Child, born to the inheritance of no part of the Estate after his Grand-fathers Death, was, from his Poverty, call'd Egerius [i. e. the Beggar.] Lucumo, on the contrary, who was Heir to the whole Estate, was not only proud of his Riches, but much the more so, because he had married one Tanaquil, a Woman of Quality, and one that would not easily be brought to live below her Birth. When she was married, and saw the Etrurians despise Lucumo, as being one that was the Son of a banish'd Stranger, she could not bear the indignity; and therefore, forgetting her natural Love to her Country (since she saw her Husband a man of such Worth and Honour) design'd to remove from Tarquinius. For which end, Rome seem'd the fittest place; for she suppos'd, That among that new People, where all Nobility sprung on a sudden from virtuous Actions, there might be some room found for a good and a brave man: she knew, that Tatius, a Sabine, had Reign'd there; that Numa was sent for from Cures, to enjoy the Crown; and that Ancus was the Son of a Sabine Woman, and remov'd upon the Account only of his being like Numa: wherefore, she easily prevail'd on her Husband, as being a Person ambitious of Honour, and one to whom the City Tarquinius was Country, only by the Mothers side. They therefore pack'd up what they had, and went for Rome. It happen'd, that, when they came to Faniculum, as he was sitting with his Wife upon the Chariot, an Eagle falling gently down, with her Talons took off his Cap; and then, flying above the Chariot, with great frilling and clapping of her Wings, she, as if sent from Heaven to do him that piece of service, came again and plac'd it exactly on his Head; which, when she had done, she flew aloft again. Tanaquil (they say) receiv'd that Augury with great joy, being a Woman well skill'd, as the Etrurians generally are, in Cælestial Prodigies: wherefore, embracing her Husband, she had him hope for high and lofty matters; telling him, That that Bird was a Messenger from that Region of the Heavens, and from that God who there presided: that she made a sign about the uppermost part of him; that she took up the ornament of his head, in order to restore it, by Divine Command. With these hopes and thoughts about 'em, they went into the City, and having taken an House there, gave out, that his Name was L. Tarquinius Priscus. And now, not only his being a new-comer, and his Riches made him conspicuous among the Romans, but he, likewise, advanc'd his Fortune by his Affability, Hospitality and Bounty, whereby he made all those he could his Friends: till, at last, the Fame of him was carried even into the King's Palace, and he grew, in a short time, so well known, by being very ready and liberal in the Kings Service, that he became familiar at Court, and was concern'd in all publick, as well as private Councils, both at home and abroad: and having been every way try'd, was, at length, by the Kings last Will and Testament, made Tutor also to his Children.

Ancus Reign'd four and twenty years, and was inferiour to none of the former Kings in XXXV. the Arts or Glory of War and Peace. His Sons were now almost of Age, and therefore Tarquinius was the more urgent, that, as soon as possible, an Assembly should be call'd for the choosing of a King. Which being appointed, he, a little before the time, sent the Lads a Hunting; and himself first, not only ambitiously desir'd the Throne, but likewise (as 'tis said) had a Speech ready made to reconcile the minds of the Common People; in which he told 'em, That he desir'd no new thing, in that he was not the first (to make any man angry or wonder at him) but the third Stranger that desir'd to be King of Rome; that Tatius was chosen King, though he was not only a Stranger, but an Enemy too, and that Numa, who was unacquainted with the City, and never sought it, was voluntarily sent for by the Romans, to be their King. That he himself, ever since he was at his own disposal, came to Rome with his Wife and all his fortunes, and that he had liv'd at Rome a greater part of his time, since he was fit for publick business, than in his own Country: and that he had learn'd the Roman Laws, together with their Customs, both at home and abroad, under a very Honourable Master, even King Ancus himself. That he had always us'd in his Allegiance and observance to the King, with all Mankind, and in his bounty towards others, with the King himself. Thus he spoke, and, because all he said was true, the Roman People unanimously chose him King. Whereupon the same ambition which which he shew'd in suing for it, attended him when he had gain'd the Kingdom; though he were otherwise a very excellent Person. Nor was he less mindful of strengthening his own Dominion, than of augmenting the Commonwealth in general; wherefore, he chose an hundred into the Senate, who, from that time, were call'd, Patres minorum gentium [i. e. Senators of a lower rank,] and prov'd a certain Faction for the King, because, by his bounty they came into that Court. He wag'd the first War with the Latins, and took a Town of theirs by Storm, call'd Appiolar; from whence, having brought back more Spoils than was ever talk'd of in that War, he set forth Games with more Opulency and Pomp than any former Kings. The place was then first design'd, for that Circus, [or place for Exercises] which is now call'd, Circus Maximus; and Partitions were made for the Senators and Knights, where each of 'em might set forth Shews, call'd Fori. They sat and look'd upon these Shews, which were rais'd upon props of Wood twelve feet from the Ground; and the sport was Horse-Racing, and Wrestlers, especially such as were sent for out of Etruria. And, from that time, there were solemn Annual Games kept, call'd by the various Appellations of Ludi Romani, and Ludi Magni. By the same King also, there were places set apart, about the Forum, for private Persons to Build upon, as well as Portico's and Shops made.

XXXVI. He likewise design'd to enclose the City with a Stone Wall, but the Sabine War prevented him; and that was so sudden, that the Enemy pass'd the River Anien before the Roman Army could meet and stop 'em. Thereupon, the Romans were much affrighted, and at first, while the Victory was doubtful, a great many men were kill'd on both sides. But, soon after, the Romans having put their Forces into the Enemies Camp, and gain'd some time to reinforce the War, Tarquinius, thinking that he wanted Horse-men more than any other part of his Army, resolv'd to add a new Troop to the Rammenfes, Titienses, Luceres, which Romulus had formerly rais'd, and to leave them behind him remarkable on the account of his own Name. But, because Romulus had done that by an Augury, Accius Nervius, a famous Augur at that time, deny'd his Proposal, and said, there could be no alteration made, nor any new Troop established, unless the Birds foretold it. At that the King was much displeas'd, and eluding his Act, (as the Story goes) Come (said he) you Diviner, tell me, by your Auguries, whether that be possible to be done, that I now think of. Whereupon, when Accius had found, by the Augury, that it might, and had told the King it would certainly come to pass, I thought (said the King) that you would cut a Whetstone with a Razor: here, take 'em, and do what your Birds portend is possible: with that (they say) he presently cut the Whetstone in two. The Statue of Accius was plac'd with the head cover'd, just there where the thing was done, at the Court of Assembly, upon the very Stairs on the left hand: and (they say) that the Whetstone too was put in the same place, for a Monument to posterity of that Miracle. This is certain, that, from that time, Auguries and the Priestly Office of the Augurs were had in such Honour and Esteem, that nothing was afterwards done, either in War or Peace, without their Predictions; for the Assemblies of the People, the Armies and the greatest Affairs were Dissolv'd, Disbanded and Disappointed, when the Birds did not admit of 'em. Nor did Tarquinius at that time make any alteration in the Troops of Horse, but only added something to their Number, so that there were one thousand three hundred Horse in three Troops. The later that were added were only call'd by the same Names, being those, that now, since they are doubled, they call the six Troops.

XXXVII. This part of their Forces being augmented, they had a second Conflict with the Sabines. But, besides that the Roman Army was now increased in strength, they made use of secret Policy and Stratagem also; sending a Party of Soldiers, to burn a great heap of Wood that lay upon the Bank of Anien and throw it into the River: which being help'd on by the Wind, a great deal of the flaming Timber got hold on the Wood of the Bridge, and set it on fire. That thing not only terrified the Sabines as they were fighting, but when they were Routed, was also a stop to their Flight; and therefore many of 'em, though they escap'd the Enemy, perish'd in the River: whose floating Arms being found in the Tiber at Rome, and known, discover'd the Victory there, even almost before News could otherwise be brought of it. In that Battel, the Horse got the greatest Renown, for 'tis reported) that they, being plac'd in the Wings, when the main Body of their Foot was now in a manner Defeated, ran in so furiously from each side, that they did not only stop the Sabine Legions who press'd so hard upon the yielding Infantry, but on a sudden also, put 'em to Flight. The Sabines made all the haste they could to the Mountains, of which, some few possess'd themselves; but the greatest part (as I said before) were driven into the River. Tarquinius, thinking it the best way to pursue them whilst they were in that Consternation, having sent the Booty and Captives to Rome, and burn'd the Spoils of the Enemies (for such was his Vow to Vulcan) in a great Pile, proceeded to March his Army into the Sabine Dominions: and though the Sabines had had but ill success, nor could well hope for better, yet they met him with a tumultuary Army: and being there a second time Defeated, when they were almost utterly undone, desir'd a Peace. Collatia, and all the Country round about it, was taken from the Sabines, and Egerius, who was the Son of the King of Collatia's Brother, was left in the Garrison. The People of Collatia (my Author tells me) made a Surrender, of which this was the form.

form. The King ask'd 'em, Are you Embassadors and Agents sent from the People of Collatia to surrender yourselves and them? We are. Are the People of Collatia in their own Disposal? They are. Do you surrender the People of Collatia, the City, their Land, their Water, their Bounds, their Temples, their Utensils, with all things Divine and Humane, into the Possession and Power of me and the Roman People? We do. Then I receive 'em.

When the Sabine War was ended, Tarquinius return'd in Triumph to Rome. After which, he made a War with the Antient Latins; in which, though they never came to hazard all at once, yet he, by carrying his Arms about to every single Town, extinguish'd the whole Race of the Latins. Corniculum, old Ficulnia, Cameria, Crustumium, Amerigo, Medullia and Nomentum, were Towns that were taken either from the Antient Latins, or such as had Revolted to the Antient Latins. Then he made a Peace, and from that time, began his Works of Peace, with greater vigour than he had carry'd on the Toils of War; to the end, that his People might not be less employ'd at home than they had been abroad. For, he not only began to encompass the City, where it was not yet Fortified, with a Stone-wall, the beginning of which Work was interrupted by the Sabine War, but he also drain'd the lower parts of the City, about the Forum, and the other Valleys that lay between the Hills, (because they could discharge the Water from those plain places) by Common-sewers, which he made from thence into the Tiber; besides that, he laid Foundations in a void space of Ground, by the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, which he had Vow'd to Build upon, in the Sabine War, because his mind did then Presage the future Glory of that place.

At that time, there was a strange and wonderful Prodigy seen in the Palace, where, as a certain Boy, whose Name was Servius Tullius lay asleep, (they say) a great many People saw his Head all on a Flame: whereupon, there being a great shout made, at that extraordinary Miracle, the King was much concern'd; and when one of his Servants was going to carry Water to quench it, the Queen stop'd him; till, at last, the Tumult being over, she gave Order, the Boy should not be stirr'd, till he wak'd of himself; and, that, soon after, the Clouds of sleep and that Flame vanish'd together. Then Tanaquil, taking her Husband into a private place, (said she) Dost thou see this Boy, which we breed at such a mean rate? Know, that he will one day be a Lustre to our doubtful affairs, and a Guard to our afflicted Palace; wherefore, let us cherish him with all possible Indulgence, who is like to prove the Author of our great Honour, both publick and private. From that time, they began to look upon the Boy as one of their own Children, and to instruct him in those Arts, whereby ingenious Lads are rais'd to great Fortunes. And, indeed, that easily came to pass, which the gods were willing to have; for the Youth grew up into a very Princely Disposition: nor, at that time, when Tarquin was looking out for a Son-in-law, could any of the Roman Youth be compared to him in any Art; wherefore, the King gave him his Daughter in Marriage. This great Honour, upon what account soever confer'd on him, forbids us to believe that his Mother was a Slave, or, that he himself was so, when young: I am rather of their opinion, who say, that when Corniculum was taken, the Wife of Servius Tullius, a Nobleman of that City, being, at the death of her Husband big with Child, and taken notice of amongst the rest of the Captives, was preserv'd from Slavery upon the Account of her Birth only, by the Queen of the Romans, and was brought to Bed at Rome, in the House of Tarquinius Priscus: upon the score of which great favour, she was not only her self introduced into the familiarity of the Court-Ladies, but the Child also, who was bred in the Family from his Infancy, was much beloved and respected: nor was it any thing else but his Mothers fortune, who, when her Country was taken, fell into the hands of the Enemy, that made him be supposed to be Son of a Bond-woman.

About the Eight and Thirtieth year of Tarquinius's Reign, Servius Tullius was very much honour'd, not only by the King, but by the Senate and the People also. At which juncture, the two Sons of Ancus, who before had always resented it as a very great piece of Treachery, that they should be depriv'd of their Father's Kingdom by the fraud of their Guardian, and that a stranger should Reign at Rome, who came, not only of a foreign, but also, not so much as of an Italian race; did then conceive more indignation than ever, when they saw the Crown was not like to return to them, even after Tarquinius's Death, but that it would fall successively to a Slave: that in the same City, after almost an hundred years, since Romulus, who was the Son of a God, and now a God himself, possess'd the Throne as long as he remained upon earth, a servant, and the Son of a servant should enjoy it, it would be, not only a disgrace to the Roman name in general, but more particularly, to their Family, if, whilst any male Issue of King Ancus were alive, the Kingdom of Rome should be govern'd, not only by strangers, but even Slaves also: wherefore, they resolv'd to avert that contumely by the Sword. But their concern for that injury, did not only excite them more against Tarquinius himself, than it did against Servius, but also, because the King, if he survived, was like to be a more severe revenger of the Murder, they thought, if they kill'd Servius, that whomsoever Tarquinius chose for his Son in Law, he would make Her of the Crown; and for that reason, laid a design against the King's life, which was this. They chose two of the sturdiest Shepherds for that purpose, both armed with Country Weapons, such as they used to carry; who, making as great a Riot as they could before the King's Palace, under pretence of a quarrel, caused all the King's Officers to come about them: whereupon, they both appeared to the King, and the noise of them reaching even the inmost rooms of the Palace, they were commanded to appear before the King; where both of them, at first began to bawl and rail at each other: but being restrained by the Licitor or Officer, and commanded to speak by turns, they, at length gave over their ill Language. Then, one of them began to tell the whole story, according as they had agreed; and while the King was wholly intent to what he said, the other lifting up an Ax that he had, gave him a cut in the head, and leaving his weapon in the wound, they both ran out of doors. While those that were about Tarquinius, who was now a dying, took all the care they could of him, the Officers caught hold of one of the Rustians that were making their escape: upon which, there was a great noise and concourse of the People, admiring what the matter was.

XLI. Tanaquil, amidst the tumult, commanded the Palace Gates to be shut, and turned out all strangers; procuring, at the same time, with all industry, whatever was necessary to heal the wound, as if she had some hopes of a cure, and planting fresh Guards, in case her hopes should fail her. Then, sending for Servius in all haste, and shewing him her Husband, who had now almost bled to death, she took him by the right hand, and desired him, that he would not suffer the death of his Father in Law to go unrevenge, nor permit her, his Mother in Law, to be a Laughing-stock to her Enemies. Servius (said she) If thou art a Man, the Kingdom is thine, and not theirs who have committed the greatest villany, by the hands of other men: take courage then, and follow the Gods, thy Leaders, who formerly pretended, that thou shouldst be a great Light to the World, by that divine fire which hovered round thy head; let that Celestial Flame now warm thee: be thou now truly awake: even we that are strangers have reigned here: think who thou art, not where thou wast born: and, if thy Councils are at a stand, by reason of this surprizing accident, follow mine. The clamour and violence of the Multitude growing almost intolerable, Tanaquil spoke to the People, from the upper part of the house, through the windows that looked into the new street, (for the King then kept his Court near the Temple of Jupiter Stator.) bidding them be of good cheer; that the King was foudred with a sudden blow, but the weapon did not go very deep into his body, and that he was now come to himself again: that the blood was washed away, the wound searched, and all things well, and that she was in good hopes, that they would see him very shortly. That, in the mean time, he ordered the People to obey Servius Tullius, who would administer justice to them, and perform all other Kingly Offices. Accordingly, Servius went forth with a Royal Robe, and the Licitors before him, and setting on the King's Tribunal, determined some Controversies, and concerning others, pretended he would consult the King. By which means, he, for some days, after the King was dead, concealing his death, and under the pretence of executing another man's Office, confirmed his own authority. Then, upon a common lamentation, which was made in the Palace, Servius having got a good guard about him, was the first that Reigned without the consent of the People, and by the authority of the Senate only. The Sons of Ancus, when the Regicides were taken, being told that Servius was King, and lived attended with so much Grandeur, went into banishment to Suessa Pometia.

XLII. Nor did Servius now seek to fortifie himself more by publick than private designs, but lest Tarquinius's Children might be so affected towards him, as Ancus's had been to Tarquinius, he married two of his Daughters to the Kings Sons, whose names were Lucius and Aruns Tarquinius: but yet, his human Counsels did no way interrupt the necessity of fate, for, the envy which he gained by being King, made all things, even among his domestick Servants, faithless and troublesome. The War with the Vetians and other Etrurians (for now the Truce was out) was very opportunely taken up in order to the present Peace of the State. In that War, not only the valour, but the fortune of Tullius was very signal; for having routed a vast Army of the Enemies, and not caring whether he lost the good will either of the Senate or the People, he returned to Rome: where he from that time, began the greatest work of Peace; and, as Numa had been the Author of divine Ceremonies, so he resolved to be esteemed, in the opinion of all posterity, the Founder of those several distinctions in the City, and of those degrees betwixt man and man, that make any difference, either in Dignity or Fortune. For, he made a Rate or Estimate of every mans Estate, which was like to be a very convenient constitution in that great, growing Empire; by which, the duties of War and Peace might be performed, not according to the number of single persons, as before, but as every man was able: and then he made several Classes and Centuries, and such a discrimination, by that Estimate, as might be convenient, either in War or Peace.

XLIII. Of those who had a thousand Pounds, or a greater Estate, he made eighty Centuries, that is to say, forty out of those persons who were called Seniores and Juniores [or the Elder and the Younger part of the Citizens;] all which were called the first, or chief Class: the Seniors, to be always ready for the preservation of the City, and the Juniors, to make War abroad. The latter were ordered to have for their Arms, an Helmet, a Shield, Boots and a Coat of Mail, all of Brass, for the defence of their Bodies: besides which, they had Darts, a Javelin and a Sword to charge the Enemy. To this Class there were added two Centuries of Artificers, who were to be in pay, but unarmed, and their business was, to make Engines for War. The second Class was rated between a thousand and seven hundred pounds; out of which, both Seniors and Juniors, there were twenty Centuries raised; whose Arms were to be a Target, instead of a Shield, and besides the Coat of Mail, all things as before. The third Class he rated at five hundred pounds, and they made up the like number of Centuries, with the same distinction of Age; nor was there any alteration made in their Arms, save only the Boots. In the fourth Class the Estimate was, two hundred and fifty pounds, and out of them as many Centuries made, but their Arms were changed, and nothing allowed them, except a Javelin, and a picked Dart like a Spit. The fifth Class was augmented, and thirty Centuries made out of it, who carried Slings and Stones with them: among whom were numbred the Trumpeters and Pipers, distributed into three Centuries; and this Class was rated at an hundred and odd pounds. But, the rest of the Multitude were assessed at a lower rate, and therefore one Century was discharged from the Duties of War. Having thus equipped and distributed the Foot Soldiers, he raised twelve Centuries of Knights, out of the best of the City; and established six other Troops, besides those three that Romulus had raised, by the same names under which they were by Augury listed. To buy them Horses, he gave an hundred pounds out of the publick Treasury; and the Widows were Assessed to pay twenty pounds every year, toward the keeping of those Horses. All these Taxes were laid upon the Rich to ease the Poor. After that, he made a distinction in point of Honour; for every man had not the privilege, (as it had been customary from Romulus downwards) promiscuously to give his Vote; but there were Degrees made in such a manner, that no one should seem to be excluded from Voting, and yet all the Power might remain in the Nobility of the City. For the Knights were first called, and then the eighty Centuries of the first Class, among whom, if there happened to be any difference, which rarely fell out, those of the second Class were called, nor did they hardly ever go so low, as to descend to the meaner sort of People. Nor ought we to wonder, that this distinction, which now obtains, since the making of five and thirty Tribes, the number of them being doubled, does not agree with those Centuries of Juniors and Seniors which Servius Tullius established: for, the City being divided into four Regions, according to the Hills on which they dwelt, he called those Divisions Tribes, as I suppose, from the word Tribuo [i.e. to pay Scot and Lot;] for he computed, by their Estates, what every one ought to contribute to the publick Stock: but these Tribes did not at all belong to the distribution or number of the Centuries.

Having settled this Rate, which he had the sooner done, for fear of the Law, which was XLIV. made against them, who gave not in the value of their Estates to the Cenfor, he set out an Edict, threatening Imprisonment and Death, to all the Citizens of Rome, whether Horse or Foot, who did not appear in their several Centuries at the Campus Martius [or Field of Mars,] as soon as 'twas day: where, having set all the Army in Array, and purified them by Sacrificing a Boar, a Sheep and a Bull; which was called, at that time, Conditum Lustrum [or a set day of Purifying the People,] because he then made an end of his Assessments. Eighty thousands Crowns were said to be rated in that lustration of the Citizens, and Fabius Pictor, a very ancient Writer, says, That was the number of those that could then bear Arms. But, besides this, he thought fit to enlarge the City according to the Multitude of the Inhabitants, adding two Hills, one called Quirinalis, the other Viminalis; after which, he augmented the Esquilæ, where he himself also dwelt, in Honour to the Place; besides which, he inclosed the City, with a Mound, Ditches and a Wall, and extended the Bounds of the Suburbs, called, Pomerium; which, some, who look only into the obvious signification of the Word, say, is so called, as if it were post marium, [i.e. behind the Walls] though it is rather, a place near the Wall, which, the ancient Etrurians, when they built their Cities, by Augury consecrated within certain Bounds, where they were to Build their Walls; to the end, that neither within, any Houses might be contiguous to the Walls, as they now commonly joyn them, and likewise, that without there might be some space left, where men neither Built nor Planted. This space of ground, which it was neither lawful to dwell upon, nor cultivate, the Romans called Pomerium, not because it was post murum [i.e. behind the Wall,] any more, than, because, murus erat post id [i.e. the Wall was behind that,] and, as the City was enlarged so far as the Walls extended, these Consecrated Bounds reached.

The City being augmented by the extent of their Walls, and all things ready at home, XLV. for the use both of War and Peace, he, lest they always should seem to gain advantage by their Arms, endeavoured with Policy to increase the Empire, and, at the same time, to add some new Ornament to the City. There was, at that time, a famous Temple Dedicated to Diana, at Ephefus, which was reported to have been Built at the common Charge of all the Cities of Asia. When Servius therefore had commended their unanimity, and magnified the gods that joyned with them, among the Nobility of the Latins, with whom he had both publicly and privately, on purpose, entered into bonds of mutual Hospitality and Friendship, he often repeated the same, and, at last, persuaded the Latins to joyn with the Roman People, and Build a Temple to Diana at Rome: for they all confessed, that Rome was that Metropolis for which they had so often fought. And though all the Latins seemed now to neglect it, as having had such ill success so often with their Arms, yet, fortune seemed to offer her self to one of the Sabines, with a private design of recovering the Empire. There was an Heifer said to be Calv'd, belonging to a certain Yeoman in the Country of the Sabines, of a wonderful bigness, and very beautiful, (the Horns of it were fixed, for many Ages in the Porch of Diana's Temple, as a Monument of that Miracle) insomuch, that she was looked upon as a Prodigy, and the Diviners foretold, that, in that City whereof any Citizen Sacrificed that Heifer to Diana, the Empire should afterwards be established. And that Prophecie came to the hands of the chief Priest belonging to Diana's Temple. The Sabine, as soon as he thought it a fit day for Sacrifice, drove the Heifer to Rome, brought her to the Temple of Diana, and set her before the Altar. Then the Roman Priest, being moved, with the Celebrated Fame of such a great Victim, and mindful of the response, accosted the Sabine in these words: What dost thou mean, Friend? (said he) to make an impure Sacrifice to Diana? Art thou washed in the living stream? See, Tiber runs in yonder Valley. At which, the Stranger, being awed, (for he desired to do every thing according to order, that the event might answer the Prodigy) went down immediately to the Tiber, and in the mean while, the Roman Priest Sacrificed the Heifer to Diana: which Action of his was exceeding grateful, both to the King and the City.

XLVI. Servius, although by tract of time, he was now put into undoubted possession of the Kingdom, yet, because he heard that young Tarquinius should sometimes say, He Reigned without the Peoples consent; having first reconciled the minds of the Multitude by dividing certain Lands that he had taken from the Enemy, among them, he ventured to refer it to the People; Whether it were their will and pleasure that he should Reign? Whereupon, he was Declared King, by a consent more Universal than any man had hardly been before him. But that did not diminish Tarquinius's hopes of gaining the Kingdom; no, he therefore conceiv'd a greater Animosity, (because he perceived, that the Peoples Property was Invaded against the will of the Senate) and thought he had a good opportunity to accuse Servius before the Fathers, and to grow great himself in that Court, being himself a young man of an hot Spirit, nor only so, but having at home a Wife called Tullia, who instigated his restless mind; for even the Roman Palace produced an example of Tragick wickedness, that out of hatred to the Tyranny of Kings, their Liberty might be the sooner accomplished; and that might be the last Kings Reign that was gain'd by injustice. It is not very well known, whether this Lucius Tarquinius was the Son or Grand-son of Tarquinius Priscus, but most Authors say, he was his Son. He had a Brother, called Aruns Tarquinius, a young man of a mild disposition; and these two, as aforesaid, had Married the two Tullias, Daughters to the King, who were likewise very different in their inclinations. It so fell out, lest two violent natures should be coupled in Marriage; through the good fortune, I suppose, of the Roman People, that the Reign of Servius might be the longer, and the Constitutions of the City in his time be made. The fiercer Tullia was mightily vexed, that she found nothing in her Husband that looked like Ambition or Audacity; wherefore, she was wholly inclin'd to the other Tarquinius, admired him, said, he was a Man, and came of Royal Blood; but despised the Sister, in that, she, by being Married, had lost the true Courage of a Woman. In a little time, the likeness of their manners, engaged them two, as it commonly happens; and their mischievous Designs were very suitable to each other; but the beginning of all confusion sprang from the Woman. For, she being accustomed to the secret conversation of another man, spared no disgraceful Words, either of her Husband to his Brother, or of her Sister to her Husband, but said, It had been better for her to be a Widow, and for him to have been still a Batchelor, than to be so unequally yoked, that she her self must languish under anothers sloth: that, if the gods had given her the man whom she deserved, she should quickly have seen that Dominion in her own House, which now her Father enjoyed. With these rash words, she soon fired the young man. Aruns Tarquinius, and Tullia the younger, when they, by almost continual Funerals, had made the Houses empty, upon their new Marriage, were joyned in Matrimony; not only with Servius's allowance, but approbation too.

XLVII. But then, Tullius's Age began every day to be more tedious to him, and his Reign more uneasy; for that Woman daily contrived some new Villany, nor did she suffer her Husband to rest, either night or day, lest her former Parricides should seem too little to deserve thanks: telling him, She did not lack a man who bore the Name of an Husband, nor one to whom she was a silent Slave, but she wanted one, who could think himself worthy of a Crown; who could remember, that he was the Son of Tarquinius Priscus; who could be desirous rather to have, than hope for a Kingdom. If thou (said she) art that man to whom I think I am married, I may make bold to call thee, not only Husband, but King; if not, the case is now much altered for the worse, since Villany here is joyned with slothfulness. Rouse up thy self! Thou hast no need to seek for Foreign Kingdoms, from Corinth or from Tarquinius, as thy Father had, thy Household-gods, and those of thy Country, thy Fathers Image, the Kings Palace, the Regal Throne in that Palace, and the Name of Tarquin, creates and calls thee King: But, if this be not enough to raise thy Soul, why dost thou frustrate the expectations of the City? Why dost thou go under the Name of a young Prince? Get thee hence, to Tarquinius or Corinth; run Retrograde into thy Family, and prove more like thy Brother than than thy Father. With these, and other taunting words, she teased the young man, nor could she rest her self to think, that Tanaquil, who was a Foreigner, could carry on such great Designs, as to confer two Regal Successions, upon her Husband first, and then upon her Son-in-law, and yet she, though come of Royal Blood, could be no instrument at all, either in the giving, or taking away a Crown. Tarquinius, being possess'd with this Female Fury, went about to get the Votes of the inferior Senators especially, whom he put in mind of his Fathers kindness to them, and upon that Account, desired their favour. He made the young men his friends by Money, and then, promising great things of himself, and laying great crimes to the Kings charge, advanced his Credit among all People. At last, when he thought he had a fair opportunity to effect his Design, he came on a sudden, guarded with a Company of Soldiers into the Forum (at which, all People were affrighted) and there, sitting down, in the Kings Seat, he commanded the Senators to be summoned into Court, by the common Cryer, and to appear before their King Tarquinius; whereupon, they immediately came, some being prepared for it before-hand, and others, for fear, lest their not coming, might turn to their Damage, but were astonished at the Novelty and Strangeness of the sight, and thought also, that Servius was taken off. Then Tarquinius began, with all the reviling Language that he could think on, and told them, That a Slave, and the Son of a Slave, after the death of his Father, who was basely murdered, without any Interregnum (or space between the Reign of two Kings) which had been formerly used, without any publick Assembly, without the Votes of the People, or the approbation of the Senate, but by the gift of a Woman, had been possessed of that Kingdom: and that he so born, and so made King, being a great Patron of the basest sort of men, among which, himself is one, had, out of envy to other Peoples prosperity, taken their Lands from all the best in the City, and divided it among a pack of sordid fellows: that he had laid all the Imposts and Taxes, which were formerly paid by the whole City in general, upon the Nobility only; and that, he made a Rate or Estimate of every mans Estate, to make the fortunes of rich men only more visible to the eye of Envy, and that he might have them ready to bestow upon Beggars whenever he pleased.

As he was making this Speech, Servius came in, who, being much concerned at the XLVIII. frightful News, immediately at his entrance into the Court, cryed out aloud, Tarquinius, What meanest thou? How dar'st thou Convene the Senate whilst I am alive, or sit in my Throne? To which, Tarquinius as briskly answered, That he was then in the Throne of his Father, and much fitter to be Heir of the Kingdom, being the Son of a King, than any Slave could be: that he had too long licentiously insulted over those, who were by right his Masters. Upon that, there was a great Shout made, by such as were favourers of both Parties, and the People thronged into the Court, where it appeared, that, he was most likely to Reign that was the stronger. Then, Tarquinius, who was now forced of meer necessity, to make his last effort, being much stronger, both for his Age and Constitution, caught Servius by the middle, and carrying him out of the Court, threw him down Stairs to the very bottom. Then he went back into the Court, to reduce the Senate; at whose return, the Kings Officers and Retinue fled all away, and the King himself, who was almost dead, going homeward, with his Attendants, who were themselves half dead, when he came to the upper end of the Street, call'd Vicus Cyprius, was overtaken and murdered by certain Persons whom Tarquinius had sent to pursue him. It is believed, that this was done by the advice of Tullia, because it is so like her other Villanous Actions: but, this is certain, and very well known, that she rode upon a Chariot into the Forum, and not at all fearing the Concourse of so many People, called her Husband out of the Court, being the first who saluted him by the Name of King. But he, desiring her to be gone out of that great Tumult, as she was going home, when she came to the upper end of the Street, call'd Vicus Cyprius, where the Image of Diana lately stood, as they were turning up the side of the Hill, call'd Clivus Virbius, to go into the Esquilie, the Charioteer stopt, as if he had been frightened, and check'd the Reins of his Horses, to shew his Lady the Body of Servius, who lay there slain in the Street. Whereupon (they tell you) of a Barbarous and Inhuman Action, which she then did, and the place it self is a Monument of it; for, they call that Street, Vicus Sceleratus [i.e. Villains Street] in which, Tullia, instigated by the fury of her Sister and her Husband, drove over the Body of her Father; and that, she carried part of his Blood upon her Chariot, being her self also, contaminated and besprinkled with it, to the Household-gods of her and her Husband, who being displeased at it, the latter end of her Husbands Reign was full as mischievous as the beginning. Servius Tullius Reigned four and forty years, with such prudence, that even a good and a moderate Successor would have found it an hard task to have been equal to him. But this also was an addition to his Glory; that, with him, all Just and Lawful Reigns came to an end: Yet, his so mild and moderate Government, because it was in the hands of one only (some Authors say) he had a mind to lay down, had not that Domestick Villany intervened and spoiled all his Designs of setting his Country at Liberty.

Then, Lucius Tarquinius began his Reign, whose Actions gave him the Name of Superbus, XLIX. because he denied his Father-in-law the Common Rites of Burial (saying,) That Romulus also was never Buried after his Death; and killed all the chief Men of the Senate, whom he thought favourers of Servius. Afterwards, being conscious that he got the Kingdom by ill means, means, and that he himself might afford an example of the like Injustice, even against himself, he got a Guard about him; for he had no pretension to the Kingdom, besides force; in that, he Reigned, neither by Order of the People, nor Approbation of the Senate. Wherefore, his only refuge, was, since he could repose no Trust in the love of the Citizens, to secure his Reign by Fear: with which, that he might possess the minds of most People, he himself, in Person, took cognizance of all Capital Causes, without any Advice or Assistance: and by that means could put to Death, Banish, or Fine People at his Pleasure; not only those whom he suspected, or hated, but even them also, from whom he could hope for nothing else but a Prey. He likewise contracted the number of the Senate especially, resolving, to choose none into that Dignity, that by their being the fewer, their Order might grow the more contemptible, and they might be the less concerned that nothing was transacted by them. For he was the first King that abrogated the old custom of consulting the Senate in all cases; and governing the Commonwealth by private Councils, he himself alone made War and Peace, Entered into and Dissolved all Leagues and Alliances with whomsoever he pleased, without the consent of the People and Senate. But, above all others, he made the Latins his Friends, that he might be the more secure at home, even in the strength of Foreign Allies: nor did he only engage the Chief of Hospitality and common Friendship, but in Affinity also. For he gave his Daughter in Marriage to Ottavius Mamilius Tusculanus, who was the greatest Man among all the Latins, descended (if we may believe common Fame) from Ulysses and the Goddess Circe; by which Marriage, he obliged a great many of his Friends and Kindred.

I. By this time, Tarquinius's Authority among the Latin Nobility, was very great; when, on a certain day, he ordered them to meet at a Place called, Lucus Ferentinae [i.e. the Grove of Ferentina] telling them, that he had something to say concerning publick Affairs. Accordingly, they met in a great Number, as soon as 'twas day, and Tarquinius himself indeed observed the day, but came a little before Sun-setting only, though, all day long, there were many and various Disputes in that Assembly. Turnus Herdonius, who came from Aricia, inveighed very severely against Tarquinius who was then absent; saying, It was no wonder, that the Romans called him Tarquinius Superbus, [i.e. Tarquinius the Proud] (for so, they, now, though privately, yet generally called him) for can any thing be a greater sign of pride, than thus to slight the whole Nobility of the Latins? For him, who appointed this Assembly of so many Nobles, that are come so far from home, not to be here himself: that he did it to try their patience, and to find out, how much he could impose on them, if they would submit to his yoke; For who did not plainly see, that he affected Dominion over the Latins; which, if his own Citizens had freely offered him, or had it been entrusted to him, and not extorted by Paricide, the Latins also ought to entrust him, (though it were very hard, even in that case, to trust a Stranger) but if his own Countrymen were weary of him (since they were Killed, Banished and undone in great Numbers,) What better things could the Latins expect? If they would take his Counsel, he would advise them to go home again and take no more of the Assembly-day, than he did, who appointed it. As this Seditious and Mutinous fellow was saying this and a great deal more to the same purpose, who had, by this means, made a great Party in his own Country, in the midst of his Discourse, in came Tarquinius, which put an end to his Speech. Immediately they all turned from him, to salute Tarquinius; who, when they were all silent, being advised by those that were next him to excuse himself for coming at that time of the day, he told them, That he was chosen Umpire in a difference between a Father and a Son, that he staid to reconcile them, and because that business had taken up that day, he would do what he designed, the day following. To which (they say) Turnus could not forbear to reply, but told him, There was no quicker determination of any difference, than between a Father and a Son, and that it might be composed in a few words; that is to say, unless he obeyed his Father, he should come to some misfortune.

LI. Turnus, having thus inveighed against the Roman King, went out of the Assembly. Which thing Tarquinius taking somewhat worse than he seemed to do, immediately contrived his Death; to the end, that he might put the Latins into the same terror, wherewith he had awed the minds of his own Citizens at home: but, because he could not conveniently be murdered in Publick, with any shew of Justice, he laid false Crimes to his charge, and took him off, though he were guiltless. He, by the help of certain of Aricia, who were of a contrary Faction, corrupted Turnus's Servant with Money, to let him privately put a great many Swords into his Lodging; which being done in one night, Tarquinius, a little before day, sent for the Latin Nobility, as if he were disturbed at some new thing, and told them, That his delay the day before fell out by a kind of Providence, to be both his, and their preservation: that he heard Turnus had design'd to kill him and all the chief of the People, that he might, himself, be King of the Latins: that he was to have gone about it yesterday at the Assembly, but the business was put off, because, he, who summoned them, and was the Person most aimed at, was absent. And, thence it was that he inveighed so much against him behind his back, because by his delay, that Villains hopes were disappointed: that he did not doubt, if all he heard were true, but that, in the morning when they came to Council, he would be there ready with a band of Conspirators all in Arms; for, 'twas reported, that a great number of Swords were conveyed into his Lodgings:

which, whether it were true, or no, might soon be known; and therefore he desired them, that they would go along with him to Turnus. The fierce disposition of Turnus, with the Speech that he made the day before, and Tarquinius's delay, made the thing very much suspected, for they thought, that the latter was the cause, why that Massacre was deferred; they therefore went along with him, inclined to believe what he said, but yet were resolved, to take all the rest for an idle Story, unless they found the Swords. When they came thither, the Officers waked Turnus, and stood round about him; and having laid hold of his Servants, who out of love to their Master, were going to make resistance; when the Swords, which were hid, were brought forth, out of every corner of the Room, the Fact seemed clear enough, and they Fettered Turnus: whereupon, the Assembly of the Latins was immediately called in great haste, who, when they saw the Swords, were so incensed at it, that, without hearing him speak for himself, they contrived him a new sort of Death; that he should be thrown into the head of a River, called, Aqua Ferentina, with an Hurdle upon him, on which, Stones should be piled, and he, by that means Drowned.

After that, the Latins being again summoned to Council, Tarquinius, having praised those LII. who had punished the Traitor Turnus for his manifest Paricide, according to his Deserts; made this Speech, That he could treat with them, upon the old account, because, seeing all the Latins came originally from Alba, they were obliged by that League, whereby, all the Alban State, from the time of Tullus, together with all its dependencies, was put under the Roman Jurisdiction: but, that he thought it more for the advantage of them all, to renew that League; and that the Latins should rather enjoy the prosperity of the Romans as Partners, than always either expect, or endure that Sacking of their Cities and Devastation of their Country, which, under Ancus first, and afterwards, in the Reign of his Father, they had suffered. The Latins were easily persuaded, though in that League the Romans had the advantage; for they say, not only that the Heads of their Nation were of the Kings Party and Opinion, but Turnus also was a fresh Example of the danger that each of them would be in, who opposed it. So, the League was renewed, and a summons sent to the Junior Latins, That, according to that League, they should appear upon a certain day, at the Grove called, Lucus Ferentinae, all in Arms. Who, when they came, according to the Edict of the Roman King, from all Quarters, and then, lest they should have a Leader of their own, a separate Command by themselves, or peculiar Signals, he mixed the several Bands of them, with Latins and Romans together, putting a Roman between every two Latins, and so, doubling their Companies, over which he set Centurions of his own choosing.

But, though he were an unjust King in Peace, yet he was not an ill General in War, LIII. but would have equalled the former Kings in that Art, his ill behaviour in other matters detracted from his perfection in that. He was the first that made War against the Volsci, for above two hundred years after his time; and took Suessa Pometia from them by Storm; where, when he had told the Booty, for four hundred Talents of Silver and Gold, he designed to large a Model for the Temple of Jupiter, as was fit for the King of gods and men, worthy of the Roman Empire, and equal to the Majesty of that place; and for the Building of that Temple, he set apart all the Money that he got in the War. After that, he was engaged in a War, much longer than he expected, against Gabii, a Neighbouring City, which he had in vain attempted to Storm, and which he at last, not like a Roman, by any means, but by Fraud and Stratagem, Attacked, since he was beaten from the Walls thereof, so far, as, that he had no hopes even to lay Siege to it; wherefore, whilst he pretended to set aside all thoughts of a War, that he might lay the Foundations of that Temple, and other Edifices in the City, his Son Sextus, who was the youngest of three, fled away, by compact, to Gabii, complaining of his Fathers intolerable cruelty to him; telling them, that, Now he had turned all his pride, from Strangers, upon his own Family; that he was now grown weary, even of his own Children, and resolved to cause the same solitude in his own House, as he had made in the Court, lest he should leave any off-spring behind him, or any one to Inherit his Kingdom: that he, indeed had escaped his Fathers Darts and Swords, but, thought himself safe in no place, unless it were among the Enemies of Lucius Tarquinius. Lest they should mistake in their measures, that War still continued, which he pretended to have given over, and, that he, upon occasion would surprize them. And that, if among them, poor men that Petitioned could find no admittance, he would wander over all Latium; whence, if he were expelled, he would go to the Volsci, the Equi and the Hernici, till he came to those, who know how to protect Children, from the Cruel and Impious Punishments of their Fathers: and besides that, too, he hoped, he might find some inclination, to War, and Arms against that proud King, and his Savage People. When he, if they regarded not what he said, seemed angry at them, and resolved to go forward from thence to some other place, he was kindly entertained by the Gabines; who told him, it was no wonder, if he at last proved to his own Children, what he had always been to his Countrymen and Allies: that, he would, in time, offer violence to himself, if he wanted another subject: but, that his coming was very grateful to them, and they believed, that in a short time, the War might be transferred from the Gates of Gabu, to the Walls of Rome.

After that, he was admitted into their publick Councils, where, though he said, that he, LIV. in other things, attended to the ancient Gabines, to whom such things were better known, yet, yet, he approved of continuing the War, and said, The greatest thing he pretended to, was, that he knew the strength of both People, and that the Kings pride was really hated by all his Subjects, seeing his very Children were not able to endure it. Thus, by degrees, inciting the Gabine Nobility, once more to renew the War, he went, with the most active of their Youth, to forage the Country; and upon other Expeditions, gaining Credit by all that he said or did, so well was his Cheat contrived; till, at last, he was chosen General of the War, in which, the Multitude, being ignorant what his Design was, when some small Skirmishes had passed, between Rome and Gabii, in which the Gabines, for the most part, had the better on it, the Gabines all, from the highest to the lowest, thought, Sextus Tarquinius was sent to them as a Blessing from the gods. And, among the Soldiers, by running upon danger and difficulties, as well as munificently distributing the Booty, he was so much beloved, that his Father Tarquinius was not more powerful at Rome, than he at Gabii. Wherefore, when he saw that he had gathered strength enough for all his Designs, he sent a Messenger to his Father at Rome, to know, What he would have him do: For, at Gabii, the Gods had so ordered it, that he alone could do what he pleased. This Messenger, (because, I suppose, he was suspected, had no express Answer; but the King, as if he were going to deliberate upon the matter, walked into his Garden, and his Sons Messenger followed him: where, walking without silently along, (they say) he, with his Staff, cut off the heads of the Poppies. The Messenger being wearied with asking for, and expecting his Answer, despaired of having what he came for, and therefore, returning to Gabii, told all that he himself said, and what he saw; saying, that whether out of anger, or hatred, or natural pride, the King said never a Word. Sextus, discovering what his Father meant, and what his Commands were, even by those dumb signs, he caused the chief men of the City to be put to Death, by Accusing some of them to the People, and instigating others, by their own mutual Envy. Many of them were slain publicly, though some, against whom his Accusation was not like to be so specious and plausible, were Murdered privately. Some, that were willing, fled their Country, and others were Banished, and the Goods of those that were absent, as well as of those that were put to Death, were divided. Whereupon, by the sweetness of that distribution, the share which each one received of the Booty, and upon the score of their private advantage, they lost the sense of publick misfortunes, till at last, the Gabine State, deprived both of Council and Power, ('tis said) was surrendered to the King of Rome, without any Bloodshed.

LV. Having gotten Gabii, Tarquinius made Peace with the Aequi, and renewed his League with the Tusci. After which, he applied his mind to the Affairs of the City; whereof the first was, a design that he had to leave the Temple of Jupiter upon the Tarpeian Mount, as a Monument of his Reign and Name, for two Kings of the Tarquinius Race were engaged in that business, the Father, who vowed to build it, and the Son who made an end of it. And, that the whole Body of that Temple, might be free from all other Religions, he resolved, to unhallow those Temples, and Chappels, which, in the War against Romulus, were designed, Consecrated, and afterwards with Auguries set apart by King Tatius. When he first began this Structure, ('tis said) that the gods were concerned at it, and gave some indications of the future growth of that Empire: for, though the Birds permitted the unhallowing of all other Temples, yet, in the Temple of the god Terminus, they did not allow it: which Omen and Augury was so interpreted, as if the god Terminus by not removing out of his Place, nor leaving his holy Bounds, portended, that all things should continue firm and stable. When they had received this Prediction of the perpetuity of their Empire, there was another Prodigy after that, which signified the greatness of it; and it was this: (they say) that, as they opened the Foundations of the Temple, there appeared a mans Head with an intire Face; which sight did plainly and directly portend, that that Castle should be the Head of all the World: and so likewise said the Diviners, not only such as lived in the City, but those also whom they had sent for, to that purpose, out of Etruria. The Kings Design encreased according to his expences, and therefore, the Plunder, taken at Pometia, which was designed for the perfecting of that Work, would scarce serve to lay the Foundation. Wherefore, I rather give credit to Fabius, who, besides that, he is the ancienter Author, says, there were forty Talents only, than to Piso, who says, there were forty thousands of Silver set apart to that use: for such a sum of Money was not to be expected out of the spoils of any one City, besides, that it exceeded the magnificence even of any, nay, even of that Foundation.

LVI. Being intent to perfect this Temple, he sent for Workmen from all parts of Etruria, and did not only make use of the publick Stock, to that end, but of the common People too, for Labourers; who, though they had great additional Impositions, in point of Military Affairs, yet they did not grudge to build the Temples of the gods, with their own hands. But they were afterwards drawn into other Tasks, which, though they seemed less, required greater pains; that is to say, to make Partitions in the Circus, [or place of Games and Exercise] and a great Common-sewer under Ground, to be a receptacle for all the filth in the City: to which two Works, this new Magnificence of his could hardly find any thing to compare. The common People being exercised by these Labours, he, thinking the Multitude, if they were were not employed, would be a burthen to the City, and being desirous to enlarge the Bounds of the Empire, by sending Colonies out of it, he sent one to Signia and Circeii, to be a future security to the City, both by Sea and Land. While he was thus employed, a terrible portent appeared to him, and that was, a Snake crawling out of a Wooden Pillar, which putting him into a fright, made him run into the Palace, but did not astonish him so much with sudden fear, as it filled his Breast with anxious thoughts. Therefore, though the Etrurian Diviners only were made use of, in case of publick Prodigies, he sent this, as being a private Wonder, to Delpbos, to the most famous Oracle upon the face of the whole Earth: nor daring to commit the trust of the answer to any other, he sent his two Sons, through Lands unknown at that time, and Seas much stranger, into Greece. Their Names that went, were Titus and Aruns, who had for their Companion, Lucius Junius Brutus, Son to Tarquinius, the Kings Sister, a young man of a quite different temper, from what he seemed. He having heard that the chief men of the City were murdered by his Uncle, and that his Brother was one, resolved to give the King no occasion of fear, from any designs of his, nor any reason to cover his fortune, but to be safe, by being contemned, since there was little security in Law and Justice. He therefore industriously feigned himself a Fool, and permitting the King to dispose of his Person and Estate as he thought fit, he did not refuse even the Surname of Brutus; [that is, foolish or sottish] to the end, that under the covert of that Surname, his latent Soul which, once, was like to be the deliverer of the Roman People, might in due time shew it self. He therefore, at that time, being taken to Delpbi, along with the Tarquinius, for a Laughing-stock, more than a Companion; ('tis said) he carried a Golden Staff, enclosed in one of Cornel-wood, which was hollowed for that purpose, as a present to Apollo, which was an Emblem of his own Ingenuity. Where, when they came, having executed their Fathers Commands, the young men were very desirous to know, To which of them the Roman Kingdom should fall: whereupon (they say) there came a Voice out of the bottom of the Cave, saying, He among you three shall have the chief Dominion at Rome, who gives his Mother the first kiss. The Tarquinius, to the end that Sextus, who was left at Rome, might not know the Answer, and so be deprived of the Empire, commanded it to be kept with all secrecy imaginable; and drew Lots among themselves, which of them, when they came to Rome, should first kiss his Mother. But Brutus imagining that the Oracle had some other meaning, pretended to fall down by chance, and kissed the Earth; for that, he considered, was the common Mother of all men living. Then they came back to Rome, where there were very great preparations making against the Rutuli.

The Rutuli were then possessed of Ardea, being a People, who, considering that LVII. Country and that Age were very rich, which was indeed the very cause of that War; for the King of Rome desired not only to enrich himself, being now Exhausted by his Magnificence in publick Works, but endeavoured likewise, with Spoils and Plunder, to engage the Affections of his Country-men, who, besides their insolence, were also very uneasie, and took it mighty ill, that their King should keep them so long in the servile Employments of Masons and Carpenters. They tried first to take Ardea, by a sudden Onset, but that not succeeding, Attacked the Enemies by Siege and Counter-works. In that Campaign (as it is more usual in a long than a sharp War) they had liberty enough of passing to and fro, but the Officers more than the common Soldiers. The Kings Sons and Kinsmen did often spend their time in Feasting and Treating one another, and as they were Drinking with Sextus Tarquinius, where Collatinus Tarquinius, the Son of Egerius, then also supped, there happened a Discourse concerning their Wives, upon which, each man most wonderfully praised his own, and thence a quarrel arising, Collatinus said, It was in vain to talk, since it might easily be known, and in a short time, how much his Lucretia excelled the rest; wherefore, if you have any vigour in you, let us mount our Horses, and go see with our own eyes, what kind of Women our Wives are; and that shall be the Test, which occurs to each man upon his sudden arrival. They were all heated with Wine, and therefore cried, *Come on, 'tis agreed; and so Galloped to Rome: whither when they came, about the edg of night, they went forward thence to Collatia; where they found Lucretia, not like the rest of the Kings Daughters-in-law, whom they saw spending their time with their Equals in Banqueting and Luxury, but sitting late at night in the middle of her House amongst her Maids a spinning. Whereupon, Lucretia was most commended, who received her Husband and the Tarquinius very kindly, and her Husband who was the Victor in that Controversie, very courteously invited the Royal Youths to Supper: at which time, Sextus Tarquinius was seized with a lustful desire to Ravish Lucretia, being incited both by her Beauty and known Chastity; and when they had ended their Juvenile Pastimes for that Night, they returned to the Camp.*

Some few days after, Sextus Tarquinius, without the privy of Collatinus, took one Com- LVIII. panion only with him, and came to Collatia; where being received very kindly by them who knew nothing of his Design, when, after Supper, he was conducted into his Lodging Chamber, being inflamed with Love, as soon as he thought all things secure enough, and every body fast asleep, he came, with his Sword drawn, to Lucretias Bed-side, and laying his left hand upon her Breast, Lucretia (said he) hold your tongue, I am Sextus Tarquinius, and I have have my Sword in my hand; if you speak one word you shall die. The Woman being frighted out of her sleep, and seeing Death so nigh, without any hopes of relief, Tarquinius began to tell her how he loved her, to intreat her, and to mix menaces with his intreaties, and endeavoured to persuade her by all manner of means. But when he saw her obstinate, and that she could not be prevailed upon, even by the fear of Death, he added disgrace to fear, and told her, He would stab a Slave, and lay him naked by her when she was dead, so that a report should be raised, how she was killed in the very Act of such sordid Adultery. By which terror, when his prevailing Lust had overcome her obstinate Chastity, and Tarquin having conquered the honour of a Woman, was gone to Rome, Lucretia being very sad upon such a dismal occasion, sent the same Messenger to Rome to her Father, and to Ardea to her Husband, to desire them, that they would come thither each of them with a trusty friend, and that with speed too, for a grievous accident had befallen her. Sp. Lucretius came with P. Valerius the Son of Volesus, and Collatinus with L. Junius Brutus, in whose Company, as he was accidentally coming back to Rome, he was met by his Wives Messenger. They found Lucretia sitting very pensive in her Chamber, and their coming made her break out into tears. Her Husband asked her, Art thou not well, my Dear? No, (said she) How can a Woman be well that has lost her Chastity? there are yet the signs of another man, Collatinus, in thy Bed: but my Body only is violated, and my mind guiltless, of which my Death shall be a witness: but give me your hands and your promises, that the Adulterer shall not escape unpunished. Sextus Tarquinius is the man, who like an Enemy, instead of a Guest, the last night came Armed to my Bed, and thence forced pleasures, which, if you are men, will prove as fatal to him as me. They all, one after another, gave her their words; comforting her grieved heart, and turning the guilt from her who was compelled, upon him who was the Author of the Crime; and telling her, That her Mind, not her Body could only commit the offence, and where there was no consent, there could be no fault. Do you (said she) consider what he deserves; though I absolve my self from the Crime, I will not be free from the Punishment; nor shall any unchaste Woman live to say, Lucretia was her Example. With that, she took a knife which she had got under her Garment, and stuck it into her heart, and falling forwards upon her Wound, dropt down Dead; at which her Husband and her Father set up a loud cry.

LIX.

Brutus, whilst they were full of grief, drew forth the bloody knife out of Lucretias Wound, and said, I swear, by this Blood, which was so chaste before the King stained it, and you, ye gods, I take to witness it, that I will cut off L. Tarquinius Superbus, his wicked Wife and all his Children, with Sword, Fire, or any other violent means that I can; nor will I suffer either them, or any other, from this time forward, to be King of Rome. Then he delivered the knife to Collatinus, and after that, to Lucretius and Valerius, who wondered to see that Brutus's disposition should be so suddenly altered: wherefore they swore, as he had done before them; and being wholly turned from Lamentation to Fury, immediately followed Brutus, who incited them to go and extirpate Kingly Government. They carried the Body of Lucretia out of the House into the Market-place; where they stirred up the People (as it usually happens) at the sight and indignity of such a strange Action, and every one complained of the Kings outrage and violence, nor did her Father's Lamentations only move them, but Brutus restraining their tears and vain complaints, persuaded them to do what became men and Romans, by taking up Arms against the common Enemy. Immediately each brisk young man came voluntarily in, ready Armed, whom the rest of the Youth soon after followed; and then, having left a sufficient Guard upon the Gates of Collatia, and planted Sentinels, so that no body could come out to tell the news of that Insurrection to the King, the rest went armed after Brutus to Rome, where when they arrived, they being in Arms, put the People into dread and tumult where-ever they went; for they seeing the chief of the City in the head of them, thought, that whatever the matter was, it was no rash Attempt. Nor did that heinous fact create less disturbance at Rome, than it had done at Collatia. Wherefore the People ran from all parts of the City into the Market-place, where they were no sooner come, but the Crier summoned the People to appear before the Tribune of the Celeres, [or Light Horsemen, who were the Kings Guard, which Office Brutus at that time happened to bear.] Then he made an Oration, which shewed much sense and ingenuity beyond what he to that time had pretended to, Concerning the Violence and Lust of Sextus Tarquinius, concerning the horrid Rape and miserable Death of Lucretia, concerning the loss of Tricipitinus [or Lucretius] who was more concerned and sorrowful for the cause of it, than for the Death of his Daughter. Then he inveighed against the pride of the King, together with the miseries and slavery of the People, who were even drowned, to cleanse Ditches and Common-sewers; and aggravated the matter, with this circumstance also, that the Romans, who were Conquerors of all the Nations round about them, should be made Artificers and Stone-cutters, instead of Warriors. After which, he remembered the base murder of King Servius Tullius, and his Daughters cursed act of driving over her Fathers dead Body, with an invocation of the gods, that used to revenge Impiety to Parents. Having said thus, and other things much worse (I suppose) which the present Barbarity made it difficult for Writers to relate, he induced the incensed Multitude to abrogate the Kings Power, and to Banish L. Tarquinius, with his Wife and Children; whilst he himself, with the younger men that he had chosen out and Armed, as Volunteers, went to Ardea to the Camp to raise the Army there there against the King; leaving the Government of the City to Lucretius, who was then Prefect of it by the Kings Commission. Amidst this tumult, Tullia left her House, on whom both Men and Women heaped Curses where-soever she went, invoking the Furies that punish Children for disrespect to Parents.

When the Camp had notice of these things, the King was much concerned, and went to Rome to repress those Insurrections there; and therefore Brutus (who was sensible of his coming) lest he should meet him, went another way about the same time, Brutus to Ardea, and Tarquinius to Rome. The Gates were shut against Tarquinius, and his Banishment proclaimed; whilst the rejoicing Camp received Brutus as the Deliverer of the City, expelling thence the Kings Children; of whom, two followed their Father, and went into Banishment to Cære, a Town in Etruria. Sextus Tarquinius going to Gabii as into his own Kingdom, was killed by certain men, who had a mind to revenge the ancient quarrels, which he himself, by Slaughter and Rapine had been the Author of. L. Tarquinius Superbus Reigned five and twenty years, and the Reign of Kings of Rome, from the time the City was built, to the deliverance of it, continued two hundred and forty four years: at which time, two Consuls were Created in the Assembly, called, Comitia Centuriata [or an Assembly wherein every man gave his suffrage viva voce in the Century that he belonged to,] by the Prefect of the City according to the method that Servius Tullius had prescribed, whose names were, L. Junius Brutus and L. Tarquinius Collatinus.

DECADE I. BOOK II.

E P I T O M E.

1. Brutus obliged the People by an Oath, not to suffer any of the Tarquins to Reign at Rome, 2. He suspected his Colleague Collatinus by reason of the Affinity that was between him and the Tarquins, and therefore compelled him, not only to lay down his Consulship, but quit the City too. 3. He ordered the Kings Family to be plundered, and consecrated that Field to Mars, which was called Campus Martius [or the Field of Mars.] He beheaded several Noble Youth, among which, were some even of his own and his Sisters Sons, for conspiring to bring in Kings again; giving his Slave, whose Name was Vindicius, his Liberty, for Discovering it: from whose Name, the word Vindicta (made use of in the manumission or freeing of a Slave) was derived. 4. Having led an Army against the Royal Party, who had raised the Veians and the Tarquinius to make a War, he died in the Field at the same time with Aruns, the Son of Superbus; and the Matrons mourned for him a whole year. 5. P. Valerius being Consul, he made a Law concerning an Appeal to the People. The Capital was Dedicated. 6. Porcena, King of Clusium, having undertaken a War in the Defence of the Tarquinius, and come as far as Janiculum [the Southward of Rome,] was hindered from passing the Tiber, by the Valour of Horatius Cocles; who, whilst others cut down the Wooden Bridge, alone endured the shock of the Etrurians: and when the Bridge was broken, throwing himself all Armed into the River, swam over to his Party. 7. There was another example of great constancy shewn by Mucius, who, having entered the Enemies Camp with a Design to kill Porcena, but murdering a Secretary, whom he mistook for the King, and being laid hold on, laid his hand upon an Altar, where they had just sacrificed, and beld it there 'till 'twas burnt off: saying, that there were three hundred Conspirators in a Design to murder the King, at which Porcena was so amazed, that his fear forced him to make conditions of Peace, to lay down his Arms and receive Hostages. 8. Amongst whom, one Cloelia, a Virgin, having stolen from her Keepers, swam over the Tiber to the Romans, and being brought back again to Porcena, was honourably sent home, and graced with a Statue of her self on Horseback. 9. Ap. Claudius fled from the Sabines to Rome; and thence came the Tribe called Tribus Claudia. The number of the Tribes was enlarged, so as to make them one and twenty. 10. A. Postumius, the Dictator, fought with success, near the Lake called Lacus Regillus, against Tarquinius Superbus, who made War with an Army of the Latins. 11. The Common People, who had separated themselves into the Mount, called Mons Sacer, for the sake of some who were in Prison for Debt, were recalled from their Sedition by the Counsel of Menenius Agrippa. The same Agrippa, when he died, was, by reason of his poverty, buried at the publick Charge. 12. Five Tribunes of the People were Created. A Town belonging to the Volci, called Corioli, was taken by the Valour and Conduct of C. Marcus, who, for that reason, was called Coriolanus. 13. Tib. Atinius, a mean man, having been admonished by an Apparition, to advise the Senate concerning certain Religious Duties, but neglected the same, lest his Son, and grew a Cripple; but being carried to the Senate in a Litter, and having told them what he had to say, recovered the use of his feet, and walked home. 14. When C. Marcus Coriolanus, who had been Banished, was made General of the Volci, and had brought an Army of the Enemies near to the City of Rome, there were Embassadors first sent to him; after whom, when the Priests had in vain desired of him not to retire. 15. The Law, called Lex Agraria [i.e. concerning the Division of Lands] was first made. Sp. Cassius, a Consuls fellow, was Condemned for Treason, and put to Death. 16. Oppia, a Vestal Virgin, was burnt alive for Incest. 17. When their Neighbouring Foes, the Veians, became more troublesome than intolerable, the Family of the Fabii desired to have the management of that War; and sent to it three hundred and six Soldiers, who were every one of them killed by the Enemy at Cremera, having left at home only one Lad who was not then of Age. 18. Ap. Claudius being Consul, and having, through the Contumacy of his Army, lost a Battel against Volci, knocked every tenth Man of his own Soldiers on the head with a Club. 19. Shows the Transactions against the Volci, the Aequi and the Veians; together with the Seditions between the Senate and the People.

I. I Come now to shew you what the Roman People, who from this time were at Liberty, did both in Peace and War, together with their Annual Magistrates, and the force of their Laws, which were more powerful than any strength of Men. Which Liberty of theirs grew the more pleasant by their reflection on the pride of their last King. For the former Kings governed so, that they deserved successively to be reckoned as Founders of the several parts of that new City, which they themselves added by way of augmentation to it, for their increasing Multitude to dwell in: nor is it to be doubted, but that same Brutus, who won so much Glory by expelling King Superbus, would have done the Publick the greatest mischief imaginable, if, through a too hasty desire of Liberty, he had extorted the Scepter from any of the former Kings. For what was like to come of it, if that crowd of Shepherds and Strangers that came thither from their own Countries, having gained either their Liberty, or, at least, impunity, under the refuge of an inviolable Sanctuary; and being freed from the fear of Kings, had then been moved and instigated by the Seditious Tribunes of the People? and in a strange City had begun to sow strife between the People and the Senate, before the endearments of Wives and Children and the love of that soil, to which, by Tract of time, Men grow accustomed, had united their affections. For the State of things, which was but in its infancy, would have been ruined by Discord; which yet the calm moderation of Government cherished, and by due nursing of it, brought to that pass, that they now come to their full strength, could well bear the stronger nutriment of Liberty. But you may reckon the original of that Liberty more from the Consulships being made, and Annual Government, than that any thing was diminished from Kingly Power. For the first Consuls retained all the Prerogatives and all the Badges of Royal State; only this one thing they were cautious of, not to have both of them Fasces [or bundles of Rods] carried before them, lest the terror of the People might be doubled. Brutus, by the consent of his Colleague, had first the Fasces; and did not with more earnestness regain, than he afterwards preserved their Liberty. In the first place, he made the People more covetous of their new Liberty (lest they should afterwards be persuaded by the entreaties, or corrupted by the gifts of the late King) to swear that they would never suffer any one to Reign as King of Rome. Whereupon, that he might make the Senate stronger, by making their order more numerous, which had been lessened by those many slaughters which the King had made amongst them, he chose all the chief of the Gradus Equestris [or Knightly Order] into them, which made their number up three hundred; and thence (they say) came the custom and form of calling them into the Senate by distinct appellations, of Patres and Conscripti [i. e. such as had been Senators before, as that were newly chosen in,] for such, as were then Elected into the Senate, were called, Conscripti, [i. e. whose Names were written in the same Catalogue with the former.] 'Tis very strange to tell how that conduced to the Concord of the City, and to unite the Peoples affections to the Senate.

II. After that, they regulated things Divine; and because some publick Holy Rites were used to be performed by the Kings themselves, lest the People should desire a King again, to satisfy them in the Name, they made a Religious Minister, called Rex Sacrificalis [or the Petit King of the Sacrifices,] but made him subject to the Pontifex, lest, his having Honour proportionable to his Name, might detract something from the publick Liberty, to which, they, at that time, had the greatest regard. And indeed, I cannot tell, whether by their extraordinary care to confirm it, even in the most inconsiderable respects, they did not exceed the bounds of prudence; for when nothing else offended them, the very Name of one of the Consuls was hateful to the whole City. For they said, That the Tarquins had been too long possessed of that Kingdom; of whom Priscus was the first, and that though after him, Servius Tullius was King, yet Tarquinius Superbus did not forget himself in the mean time, or lay down his pretensions to the Crown, as if it were the right of another; but by force and ill means sought to regain it, as being the inheritance of his Family. That now, since they had expelled Superbus, the Sovereign Power remained in Collatinus [who was also a Tarquin] That the Tarquins could not endure to live a private life. That they hated the very name, inasmuch as it was dangerous to their Liberty. This kind of Discourse was spread by degrees all over the City, to try how People stood affected; and Brutus seeing the People so full of suspicion, summoned them to an Assembly. In which, he first of all recited the Oath which the People had taken, that they would suffer no man to Reign, or be at Rome, who should endanger their Liberty. For that was to be their chiefest care, nor could any thing be contemptible that conduced thereunto. That he was unwilling to speak in the mans behalf, nor would he have spoken, unless his love to the Commonwealth had strongly induced him. That the Roman People did not believe they had intirely recovered their Liberty; because there was some of the Kings Family, and of the Kings name, not only in the City, but likewise, in supreme Authority; which they thought, was a diminution and an obstacle to their Liberty. L. Tarquinius (said he) do you voluntarily remove this fear from them. We remember, we must confess, you expelled the Kings: Now therefore to perfect your kindness to the City, take hence the very name of the King; your fellow Citizens will not only deliver you what is your own, and that by my persuasion, but if you lack any thing, will very munificently augment your Estate. Depart then as a friend, and ease the City of their jealousy, though (perchance) it be groundless; for they are verily persuaded, that with the Family of the Tarquins, the Government of Kings will leave this City. The Consul was at first so much surpris'd at that new and sudden Proposal, that he had no power to speak. But, soon after, when he began to utter himself, the Nobility of the City stood about him, and earnestly desired of him the same thing. But indeed all others did not much move him, and he earnestly desired of him the same thing: he owed a deference; and who, besides that, was his Father-in-law, began to treat with him after a different manner, sometimes desiring and sometimes persuading him, that he would suffer himself to be overcome by the consent of the whole City; the Consul, fearing lest afterwards, when he was a private Man, the same things might happen to him, with loss of Goods and other Ignominy to boot, he withdrew himself from the Consulship; and having removed all his Goods to Lavinium, left the City. Brutus, by Order of the Senate, prescribed a Law to the People, that all of the Tarquinian Family should be banished; and made P. Valerius Colleague, in the Comitia Centuriata, by whose assistance, he had expelled the Kings. When every body believed that the Tarquins were going to Levy War, it happened indeed somewhat later than any body expected, but (what they did not fear) their Liberty was almost lost; through fraud and treachery. There were, among the Roman Youth, some young Men, of good Families, whose manners had been more dissolute and debauched than ordinary, in the time of the King, they being of the same Age and Companions with the young Tarquins, and used to live like Princes; they therefore, at that time, when all People had the same privileges, expecting the same freedom, complained among themselves, that the Liberty of others became their Slavery, and said, That the King was a Man, of whom you might seek for redress, in a dispute concerning right and wrong; that in him there was room for favour and kindness; that he could be angry, or pleased to pardon, as knowing the difference between a friend and an Enemy. But that the Laws were deaf, inexorable and more for the advantage of a Beggar than a Gentleman, for there is no Latitude left in them, whereby to gain a pardon, if you transgress their bounds; that it was dangerous, amidst so many errors that men are obnoxious to, for a Man to think he could live prosecuted by his own innocence. Whilest they were thus disturbed in mind, there came Embassadors from the Kings, who made no mention of their return, but only demanded their Estate. Whose Message having been heard in the Senate, there was a Consultation held for some days concerning it; lest, if it were not returned, it might be the cause of a War, or on the other side, if it were, it might be a supply for the carrying of it on. In the mean time, the Embassadors endeavoured several ways to accomplish their Designs, demanding the Estate only, to open view, but privately Consulting how to regain the Kingdom; and as if that were the Design, they went about to engage the affections of the noble young men. By whom their Address was kindly received, and to whom they delivered Letters from the Tarquins, discoursing with them concerning the reception of the Royal Family into the City privately in the night time.

This affair was first committed to the Vitellii and Apulii, who were Brethren. The Sister of the Vitellii was married to Consul Brutus; who had by her, two Sons then of Age, called Titus and Tiberius, whom their Uncles likewise took for their Assistants in that Consult. But besides them, there were also some of the young Nobility who were conscious of the other Design, taken in, whose Names Antiquity hath obliterated. In the mean time, it having past the Vote of the Senate, that the Estate should be restored, and the Embassadors, having a just pretence for staying in the City all that time, which the Consuls had given them, to prepare Waggon for the carrying of the Kings Goods away, they spent all that interval in consulting with the Conspirators; and, by their importunity, at last, induced them to send Letters to the Tarquins: for how should they otherwise believe, that in such a weighty Affair, the Embassadors did not deceive them? The Letters which they sent, a confirmation of the Embassadors Fidelity, made the thing manifest. For when, the day before the Embassadors were to go to the Tarquins, they happened to sup with the Vitellii, where the Conspirators, being all alone, had much Discourse among themselves (as is usual in such cases) concerning their new Design; a Servant overheard them, who had formerly some inkling of it, but expected that occasion, when Letters should be given to the Embassadors, which being seized on, might evince the whole matter. When he knew that they had them, he went and told the Consuls. Whereupon the Consuls going to seize the Embassadors, hushed up the whole matter without any noise; but took the greatest care of the Letters, lest they should be dropt. And though they presently imprisoned the Traytors, yet they made some small doubt, in the case of the Embassadors; for though their fault was so great, that they might be looked upon as publick Enemies, yet the Law of Nations prevailed above that consideration.

But now, the whole matter concerning the Kings Goods which they had formerly ordered to be delivered up, was again debated in the Senate; who being incensed forbad the restoring of them, or that they should be brought out into publick view. Wherefore they were divided among the common People, that they, being, as it were, contaminated with the spoils of the Royal Family, might lose all hopes of ever having Peace with them. A piece of Land belonging to the Tarquins, which lay between the City and the River Tiber, was Consecrated to Mars, and afterwards called Campus Martius [i. e. Mars's Field.] It happened then (as the Report goes) that there was in that Field Wheat growing, which was ripe for the Sickle,

but because it was not lawful to consume the fruit of that Field, a great number of men, who were set to work there, having Reaped it down, threw it, by Baskets full, into the Tiber, which was at that time but very low, (as it usually is in the middle of Summer) and therefore the heaps of Corn, being stranded, stuck upon the mud. From whence, by degrees, with other things which the River accidentally brought down to the same place, there was an Island made: to which, I suppose, there were Moles added, and Humane Art used, to make that rising Plain so strong, as to bear even Temples and Porticoes. The Kings Goods being divided among the People, the Traytors were condemned and suffered Punishment; which was the more remarkable, because the Consuls enjoined each Father to inflict it upon his Children, and him who was to have been not so much as a Spectator, fortune now made the Executioner. The Noblest young Men stood bound to a Stake, but the Consuls Children turned the eyes of all People off from the rest, as People of no note, upon themselves, and men were no more sorry for their Punishment than for the Crime by which they deserved it; but lamented very much, that they should design in that year especially to betray their Country which was then delivered, their Father the Deliverer of it, the Consulship raised out of the Family of the Junii, the Senate, the People, with all the Gods and Men in Rome, Superbus, who though he was formerly their King, was at that time their Enemy, and in Banishment. The Consuls took their places, and the Lictors were sent to inflict the Punishment, who having stript the Offenders, and beaten them with their Rods, smote them with the Ax, whilst their Father all the while turned his face to the crowd, and shewed an eminent love to his Country, even amidst the Execution of that publick Punishment upon his own Children. When the Execution was over, (to make this a signal Example for the deterring People, on both sides, from either acting in or not discovering such wicked Practices) they gave the Informer a Reward in Money out of the publick Treasury, besides his Liberty and the Freedom of the City. He is said to be the first who was freed by the way of Vindicta, [i. e. laying a Rod upon the Head of the Party who was to be set at Liberty] and some think also, that the Word Vindicta was derived from him, because his name was Vindicinus: for after him, it was observed, that those who were so set at Liberty seemed to be received into the freedom of the City.

VI. 6. These things being related, just as they were Acted, Tarquin incensed, not only with grief to think that his great hopes were all frustrated, but with hatred and anger too, and seeing that his private Designs were obstructed; thought it the best way to make an open War; and therefore went about to the Cities of Etruria, to beg their assistance; but most of all, intreated the Veians and Tarquinians, That they would not suffer one, who was extracted from themselves, and of the same Blood, to be banished, Neccessitous, and from such great Pomp, which whilst a King he lived in, to Perish (both him and those Youths his Sons) before their eyes: telling them, that other Kings were sent for from strange Countries to Reign at Rome, but that he, who by his Wars augmented the Roman Empire, while he governed, was beaten out by the wicked Conspiracy of his own Kinsmen; that they divided the Kingdom amongst them, because no one of them seemed fit to Reign alone, and made his Goods a common prey to all the People, lest any one of them should be innocent, that he was now a going to regain his Country and his Kingdom; and that he would persecute his ungrateful Country-men. Wherefore, he desired them that they would aid and assist him, to revenge even their old Quarrels too, the killing of so many Legions, and the taking away of their Land from them. These things moved the Veians, who were all very eager, at least now they had a Roman for their General, to recover their lost Honour. and make reprisals of what had been taken from them in the Wars. Their Name and their Alliance incited those of Tarquinius, to whom it seemed a glorious thing, that Men descended from their City, should be Kings of Rome. Therefore two Armies out of those two Cities marched after Tarquin, to re-demand the Kingdom, and make War upon the Romans. When they came into the Roman Territories, the Consuls met the Enemy. Valerius led the Foot in a square Body, whilst Brutus went before to scout with the Horse. In like manner, the Enemies Horse marched first, Commanded by Aruns Tarquinius, the Kings Son, and the King himself came after with the Legions. Aruns, as soon as he found, by the Lictors, that the Consul was coming at a great distance, and then more nearly, and certainly knew Brutus by his face too, being inflamed with anger, That (cry'd he) is the fellow who drove us out of our Country: see how stately he moves, adorned with our Ensigns: assist, ye gods! who are the Revengers of Injuries done to Kings. With that, he spurred his Horse, and fiercely rode up to him. Brutus perceived it was at him that Aruns made; wherefore, he thought it fit, for them two, who were the Generals, to begin the Battel; and thereupon, made up with all speed to engage him. They met with such fury, that neither of them, so he did but wound his Enemy, had any regard to the preservation of his own Person; and both of them, being at the same time, by mutual thrusts through their Shields, run into their Body, so that they were fixed to each other by their two Javelins, fell down dead from their Horses. Then also began the Fight between the rest of the Horse; nor was it long before the Foot came up, and there they fought; but the Victory was doubtful, and inclined to neither side. The right Wings on both sides had the better, and the left the worst on it. The Veians, who had formerly been often Conquered by the Romans, were Routed and put to Flight; but the Tarquinians, a new new Enemy, did not only stand their Ground, but also drave the Romans off from their Party.

This being the success of that Battel, Tarquin and the Etrurians were seized with such a terror, that thinking it in vain to stay, both Armies, as well Veians as Tarquinians, marched in the night time to their several homes. They tell you, of Miracles that were done at the time of this Fight; such as was this, that in the dead of the next Night, there was a mighty voice heard out of the Wood, called, Sylva Arfia, and thought to be the voice of the God Sylvanus, which spake these Words; That in that Battel there were more Etrurians, by one, than Romans slain; and therefore upon the whole Account, the Romans in that Fight had the better. Thereupon, 'tis certain, the Romans marched off as Conquerors, and the Etrurians as an Army Defeated. For as soon as it was day, and none of the Enemies appeared in sight, P. Valerius the Consul collected the spoils, and returned from thence in Triumph to Rome; where he Celebrated the Funeral of his Colleague, with as much Ceremony as he then could. But the publick sorrow was a far greater Honour to Brutus, as being remarkable above all other things, in that the Matrons lamented him a whole year, as he had been their Father; because he was so severe a Revenger of Lucretias violated Chastity. After that, the other Consul who survived, instead of being favoured by the People, (whose minds are always mutable) was not only envied, but suspected and accused of a very heinous Crime; for the report went, that he was ambitious of being King, because he did not, in the first place, take another Colleague in the room of Brutus, and secondly, because he built him an House upon the top of the Mount Palatine, upon the highest part of it, called Velia; for there, upon that so well Fortified place, they were told, He would make a Castle which should be Impregnable. These Reports being generally believed by the People, gave the Consul great disturbance; and therefore having summoned the People to Council, he came into the Assembly with the Fasces down. That was a sight very grateful to the Multitude, to see the Ensigns of Government lowered in respect to them, and a confession thereby made, that the Majesty and the Power of the People was greater than that of the Consul. As soon as the People were warned to keep silence, the Consul, in a Speech to them, began to set forth the good fortune of his Colleague, that having freed his Country, he died in the bed of Honour, fighting for his Country, with full blown Glory, which had not yet degenerated into envy; whilst he himself survived his Glory, to be suspected and accused, and instead of the Deliverer of his Country, was reckoned as bad as the Aquilii or the Vitellii. Will you never think (said he) you know any mans vertue so well, as not to suspect it? Could I have believed that I should be thought guilty of a desire to be King, who was the most inveterate Enemy the Kings had? Could I have believed, that though I had lived even in the Castle, in the Capitol, I should have been feared by my fellow Citizens? Does my Credit with you depend upon so small a circumstance? Is your confidence in me so slightly grounded, that you are more concerned, where I am, than what I am? The House of P. Valerius (O you Romans!) shall never obstruct your Liberty; but you shall have Velia still secured. I will bring my House not only down into the Plain, but I will likewise set it under the Hill, that you may dwell above me, whom you so much suspect: Let those build Houses upon Velia, who may be better trusted with your Liberty, than P. Valerius is thought to be. With that, he immediately ordered all the Materials of his House to be carried down below Velia, and built a House at the bottom of the Hill, in that place where the Temple of Victory (called by the Ancients Vicapota) now stands.

Thereupon they made Laws, not only to acquit the Consul from the suspicion of his being ambitious to be King, that turned the Tide so much the other way, that they made him even Popular; from whence he came to be Surnamed Poplicola. But, before all others, they made the Law concerning the appealing to the People against Magistrates, and Out-lawing any Man, both in his Life and Goods, who should conspire to make himself King. These Laws were grateful to the People, which when he had made by himself, that he alone might gain the favour of the People, he afterwards called an Assembly, to chuse himself a Colleague; Sp. Lucretius was created Consul, who being very ancient, and wanting strength to perform all the Duties of a Consul, within a few days Deceased, and M. Horatius Pulvillus was put in his place. I do not find, in some ancient Authors, that Lucretius was ever Consul, but that Horatius immediately succeeded Brutus; which, I suppose, was occasioned for that he had signalized his Consulship with no remarkable Action, and therefore it was not taken notice of. The Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol was not as yet Dedicated; wherefore, Valerius and Horatius, being Consuls, cast Lots which of them should Dedicate it; it fell to Horatius's Lot, and in the mean time, Poplicola went to the War against the Veians. The Relations of Valerius were more concerned than they ought to have been, that the Dedication of so famous a Temple should be committed to Horatius; and therefore endeavouring, by all means they could, to hinder it, and having in vain tried other ways, they brought an ill Message to him, whilst he had his Hand upon the Post, and was Praying to the gods, that his Son was dead, wherefore, his Family being Contaminated with a dead Corps, he could not Dedicate that Temple. Whether he had so much strength of mind as not to believe it, it is neither certainly related, nor can I well tell; but this is certain, he did not desist from what he was about when the Messenger came, save only, that he ordered the Body to be buried; buried; but still held the Post, went on with his Prayers, and Dedicated the Temple. These were the Transactions, both at home and abroad, in the first year after the Kings were expelled.

IX. Then P. Valerius was a second time made Consul with Titus Lucretius; and now the Tarquinii had fled to Lar. Porfena King of Clusium; where, mixing advice with entreaties, they desired him, That he would not suffer them, who were Descended from the Etrurians, of the same Blood and Name, to be put upon such necessities, and Banished: and now especially they begged of him, not to let that growing custom of Deposing Kings, to go unrevenge; that Liberty it self was sweet enough, and that if Kings did not defend their Kingdoms, with as much vigour as Cities desired Liberty, all things would be levelled; the loftiest with the lowest; nor would any thing be high or eminent above others, in any City whatsoever; but Kingdoms would come to an end, which were the most glorious things, known either to the gods or men. Porfena thinking that at that time there was a King of Rome, and also that the King of Etruria was strong in his Forces, came to Rome with a dreadful Army. Nor were the Senate ever possessed with such a terror, before that time, so strong were the Clusians at that juncture, and the name of Porfena so great. Nor did they only fear their Enemies, but even their own Citizens too, lest the Roman Commonalty, astonished with fear, should re-admit the Royal Family into the City, and accept of Peace, even with slavery. The Senate therefore, upon that occasion, were very kind to the People, taking especial care for Provisions, and sending several Persons, some to the Volsci, and others to Cumæ, to buy Corn. The privileged also of selling Salt, because it was dear, should be put into publick hands, and taken from private Persons; besides that, they freed the People from paying of Freight and Tribute, which they made the rich pay, who were able to bear the burthen of it. For the poor (they said) paid enough to the State, if they bred up their Children; and this Indulgence of the Senate, when the City was afterwards streightened by Siege and Famine, kept it in such Concord, that the lowest, as well as the highest, abhorred the name of King, nor was there any one from that time, who grew so popular by ill Arts, as all the Senate then was, upon the count of their good management.

X. When the Enemy came up, all the Country People removed into the City, which they Fortified with strong Guards; while some part seemed sufficiently fenced with Walls, and others with the Tiber. But the Wooden Bridge did almost afford a passage to the Enemy, had it not been for one Man, whose name was Horatius Cocles; for the fortune of Rome prepared him, that day, as a Bulwark; who being by chance, then posted upon that Bridge, when he saw Janiculum taken at a sudden Attack, from whence, the Enemies ran down as fast as they could, and that the Romans left their Arms, as well as their Ranks, he stop'd them; and calling to witness both gods and men, told them, That 'twas in vain for them to fly, if their Garison were Deserted, for if they left the Bridge behind them, free for the Enemy to go over, there would soon be more of the Enemies in the Palace and the Capitol, than in Janiculum. Wherefore, he advised them, that they would break down the Bridge with fire or Sword, or any other violent means; and that he would receive the shock of the Enemy with as much vigour as one man could do. With that, he went to the end of the Bridge, and being remarkable amongst those that fled, for facing about to engage the Enemy, he astonished them to see such a Miracle of Audacity. But shame kept two Persons to be his Assistants, whose names were Sp. Lartius, and Titus Harminius, who were both descended from Noble Families, and renowned for their Achievements. With them, he, for some time, sustained the first storm of the danger, and the most tumultuous part of the Fight. But soon after, he made them also retire to a safe station, when there was but a small part of the Bridge remaining, and those who were cutting it down, recalled them. Then hurling round his baleful eyes upon the Etrurian Commanders, one while he Challenged single Persons, and anon inveighed against all of them together; telling them, That being the Slaves of proud Kings, and negligent of their own Liberty, they came to destroy that of others. Thereupon they staid for some time, while one looked upon the other, to begin the Battel. Then shame made the Etrurian Army move; who, setting up a great shout, threw all their Darts upon one single Enemy, which he receiving in his Shield, stood stoutly to it upon the Bridge, from which they endeavoured to force him. But at that instant, the crash of the falling Bridge, and the noise that the Romans made for joy that the work was done, struck such a sudden terror into the Enemies, that it restrained their violence. Then Cocles cried out, Great Father Tiberinus! I beseech thy Deity, propitiously to receive these Arms and this Soldier into thy River. With that, being all in Armour, he leaped into the Tiber, through which, though many Darts were thrown upon him, he swam very safe over to his Party; having done an Exploit, that will be more talked of than believed, by all Posterity. The City was very grateful to him for so great an Achievement; and therefore his Statue was set up near the Comitium [or place of publick Assembly,] and he had as much Land given him as he could mark round with a Plough in one day. The Affections also of private men were very eminent amidst his publick honours, for when he was in great necessity, there was no body but gave him something towards House-keeping, though they wanted it themselves.

Porfena

Porfena being repulsed in his first Attempt, and therefore changing all his measures, from a design of Storming, to besieging the City; when he had placed a Guard in Janiculum, himself pitched his Camp in the Plain, and upon the Banks of Tiber. He likewise sent for Ships from all parts, both as a Guard to hinder any Corn from being carried to Rome, and for the convenience of passing his Soldiers over the River in several places, to forage, as occasion should serve. By which means, in a short time, he so infested all the Country about Rome, that not only other things, but even all their Sheep too were driven out of the Fields into the City; neither durst any one drive them without the Gates. But this so great liberty was granted to the Etrurians, not so much of fear as policy. For Valerius the Consul, being intent on the opportunity of surprizing a great many straglers at once, seemed negligent to revenge small injuries, because he kept himself for some greater Action. He therefore, to draw in the Foragers, commands his Soldiers, that the next day they should drive out a great many Sheep, at the Gate called Porta Esquilina, which was most remote from the Enemy, supposing, that the Enemy would come to know of it, because in that time of Siege and Famine, several faithless Slaves had fled the City. And so indeed they did, by the Information of a Renegado: upon which, a great many more of them, in hopes to have all the Prey, pass'd the River. In the mean time P. Valerius ordered Herminius, with a small Party, to make an Ambuscade, at the second Stone [i. e. two Miles off,] in the way that leads to Gabii, and Sp. Lartius, to stand with the nimble young men, at the Gate called Porta Collina, till the Enemy came by; and then to block them up, that they might not return to the River. The other Consul, Titus Lucretius, marched out at the Gate, called Porta Nævina, with some few Companies; whilest Valerius himself led a choice Party down from the Mount, called Mons Caelius, who were the first that appeared to the Enemy. Herminius, when he heard the tumult, made haste from his Ambuscade, and fell upon the Etrurians Rere, whilest their Van was engaged with Valerius. There was a shout set up, and returned both from the right hand and the left; that is to say, from the Gate called Porta Collina on the one side, and that called Nævina on the other. So the Foragers were slain in the middle of the Romans; being neither strong enough to cope with them, nor having any way to escape: and that was the last time that the Etrurians stragled so disorderly into the Roman Territories.

But nevertheless the Siege continued; Corn being very scarce and very dear, and Porfena had some hopes, that by continuing there, he should at last take the City; till Caius Mucius, a Noble Youth, who thought it a disgrace that the Roman People, who though they were Slaves, while they lived under Kingly Government, yet were never Besieged in any War, nor by any Enemy; that the same People, now they were free, should be Besieged by those very Etrurians whose Armies they had so often Routed: he was incensed, and thinking that he ought to revenge that indignity, by some great and bold exploit; he first resolved, of his own accord, to force his way into the Enemies Camp: but fearing lest if he should go without the consent of the Consuls, or the knowledge of any body else, he might possibly be taken by the Roman Centinels, and be brought back as a Run-away, in which case, the present state of the City would make his Accusation the more probable; wherefore he went to the Senate: Fathers (said he) I have a mind to pass the Tiber, and get, if I can, into the Enemies Camp; not as a Robber, nor to revenge that havock which they have made amongst us; but, if the Gods will give me leave, I design to do a greater exploit. The Senators approved of his proposal, and therefore, with a Sword hidden under his Garment, he went upon his Enterprize. When he came thither, he stood in a great crowd, near to the Kings Tribunal; where, seeing the Souldiers came to receive their Pay, and that the Secretary who sat by the King in an habit very like him, was mighty busie, with the Soldiers thronging about him; he fearing to ask which was Porfena, lest, by not knowing the King, he might discover who he was; as fortune unluckily would have it, he stabbed the Secretary instead of the King. Then walking off, as far as he could make way through the affrighted Crowd, with his Bloody Weapon in his hand, the People flocked together, upon the noise of it, and the Kings Guards laying hold on him, brought him back. Then being placed before the Kings Tribunal, he, even at that time, amidst so many menaces of fortune, like one to be feared, rather than fearing any thing himself, cried out, I am a Roman Citizen, and they call me Caius Mucius, wherefore, as an Enemy, I had a mind to kill my Enemy, nor do I desire to avoid my own death, any more than I did to miss killing him. 'Tis like a Roman, both to do and to suffer great things. Nor was I the only Person that bore that spleen to thee; I have a long Train behind me, of such who desire to do the same glorious Act. Wherefore, prepare thy self, if thou pleasest, against this danger, that thou mayest be ready every hour to fight for thy life; and see thou have both Arms and Men continually at the entrance of thy Palace. We, the Roman Youth, declare this War against thee. Thou needest not fear any formed Army, nor any pitched Battel, for we shall engage with thee only, and that hand to hand. At which, the King being at once enraged and frighted at the danger, commanded, in his fury, that a Fire should be made round about him, unless he would declare presently what snares those were that he had been so tedious in threatening him with; but he cried out, Look here! to let thee see how little they value their Bodies, who have a prospect of eminent Glory, and with that, he put his right hand into the Fire, that was kindled for Sacrifice. Which the King seeing him burn, as if he had been

been distracted, was almost astonished at the sight, leaped from his Throne, and having commanded the young man to be removed from the Altar, cried out, Get thee gone, for thou hast shewn more enmity to thy self than to me. I would bid thee go on and prosper in thy Courage, if that Courage stood up for my Country. Now, by the right of War, I send thee hence free, untouched and unviolated. Then Mucius, to return his kindness, told him, Since you have such a value for Courage, that your Generosity makes me grant what your Menaces could not extort; I must tell you, That three hundred Noble young Romans of us have Conspired to attempt thy Death, in this manner. My turn was first; and the rest, as it shall fall out to be every particular man's Lot, will come one after another, 'till such time as fortune gives them a fair opportunity to destroy thee.

XIII. Thereupon Mucius was dismissed, who was afterwards Surnamed Scævola [or left-handed] from the loss of his right hand, and Embassadors followed him, from Porfena, to Rome. For that not only the accident of the first danger, in which case, nothing had saved him except the mistake of the Assassinate; but those several Combats which he was like to be engaged in, as long as any of the Conspirators were alive, had so far moved him, that he voluntarily offered Conditions of Peace to the Romans. Among which, it was in vain that he inserted any thing concerning the restoring of the Tarquinius, though he was forced to do so, more out of complaisance to them, than that he thought the Romans would grant his request. He obtained the restoration of that Land which the Romans had taken from the Veians; and the Romans lay under an absolute necessity of giving Hostages, if they would have the Garrison drawn off from Faniculum. Porfena having made a Peace upon these Conditions, led his Army from Faniculum, and Marched out of the Roman Dominions. The Senate gave Caius Mucius, upon the account of his Valour, a Field that lay beyond Tiber, which was afterwards called, Mucia prata [or Mucius's Meads.] Wherefore, seeing Valour so much esteemed, the Women too were excited to publick Acts of Courage. Clælia, a Virgin, being one of the Hostages, when the Etrurian Camp was happily pitched not far from the Banks of Tiber, got from her Keepers, and in the head of a whole Troop of Virgins, swam over the Tiber, amidst the Darts of the Enemy, returning all her Companions safe to their Friends at Rome. Which when Porfena heard of, he was at first incensed with anger, and sent certain Envoys to Rome, to demand his Hostage Clælia; for he did not greatly value any of the rest. Then, being wrapt with admiration, he said, Her Action out-did all the Cocle's and the Mucii; and pretended, how that if his Hostage were not delivered up, he would look upon the League as broken; but if she were, he would send her home again unviolated. They kept their words on both sides, for the Romans restored the Pledg of Peace, [i. e. Clælia and the other Virgins] according to the League; and in the Court of the Etrurian King, their Virtue was not only safe guarded, but honoured also. For the King said, he would give Clælia, whom he so highly commended, some part of the Hostages to dispose of, and that she should chuse out whom she would of them. When they were all brought forth ('tis said) she chose such as were not yet of Age; which was not only an Act most becoming her Virginity, but also commendable in the opinion of the Hostages themselves; who must needs agree, that those Persons were most fit to be freed from the Enemy, whose tender Age made them most liable to Injuries. When the Peace was renewed, the Romans rewarded that strange Courage in a Woman, with a strange and new sort of Honour; for they set up her Statue, which was a Maid on Horseback, at the top of the Street, called Via Sacra, [i. e. the Holy way.]

XIV. Now there is a Custom, very dissonant to the peaceful Retreat of that Etrurian King from the City, which was delivered down from our Ancestors, and remains amongst other Solennities, that when Goods are sold that were taken from an Enemy, they are proposed to Sale in the name of King Porfena. The Original of which custom must of necessity have been either derived from War, and not omitted in Peace; or have sprung from a milder source than this title pretends, of selling Goods in an Hostile manner. For the next thing that they say, is, that Porfena, when he Marched from Faniculum, left his Camp well furnished with all sorts of Provisions, which he brought from the Neighbouring fertile Fields of Etruria, and gave them freely to the Romans, the City being at that time in great want, by reason of the long Siege which they had laboured under. Wherefore (they likewise tell you) that all those Provisions were sold, (lest, if the People were admitted, they might make havock of them, as Enemies used to do) and were called the Goods of Porfena, though the title signifies rather their grateful remembrance of his kindness, than an Auction, or publick Sale of the Kings Fortune, which never was in the disposal of the Roman People. Porfena having laid down the War against Rome; left his Army should seem to have been brought into those parts to no purpose, sent his Son Aruns with part of the Forces to Attack Aricia [a City of Latium]; which sudden Invasion did at first surprisè the Aricians, but they, soon after, sending for Aid both from the Latins and from Cume, were so far encouraged, that they resolved to fight him in a pitched Battel. Which was no sooner begun, but the Etrurians charged so briskly, that at the first effort, they routed the Aricians. The Cuman Party, using Art against Force, for some small time declined the Fight; but when the Enemy was got a good way before them, and in their full Career, faced about and set upon them in the Rere. By which means, the Etrurians, who were now almost Conquerors, were slain in the middle, between the

Aricians in the Front, and the Cumans in the Rere: but some few of them having lost their Leader Aruns, and having no other nearer Refuge, went to Rome unarmed, both with the fortune and guise of suppliants. There they were kindly received and Quartered; and when their Wounds were cured, some of them went home, and told what kindness they had received, though many of them staid at Rome, because they found such Hospitality and Love among the Citizens, to whom there was a place assigned for them to dwell in, which they afterwards called Vicus Tuscus [or the Etrurian Street].

Then P. Lucretius and P. Valerius Poplicola were the third time made Consuls; and that Year, Embassadors came the last time from Porfena about restoring of Tarquinius into the Kingdom; to whom the Answer was, that the Senate would send Embassadors to the King, and thereupon immediately all the most Honourable Senators were dispatched away: Not but that they could have given their Answer in short, that the Royal Family should not be re-admitted; nor did they upon that account rather send chosen Senators to him, than give his Embassadors their Answer at Rome; but they did it to make a final end of that Proposal, and that since they had mutually received such Obligations from each other, they might not make themselves uneasy; he by desiring that which was against the Liberty of the Roman People, and the Romans, unless they would comply with their own Ruin, by denying his Request, to whom they were unwilling to refuse any thing. That the Roman People lived now, not under a King, but at Liberty, and were resolved to open their Gates rather to an Enemy than a King; for they all wished, that their Liberty and their City might be destroyed together. Wherefore, if he had a mind to preserve Rome, they desired him that he would suffer it to enjoy its freedom. The King, overcome with modesty, told them, Since it is so resolved and determined, I will not importune the Romans any more; nor will I frustrate the Tarquins hopes of Aid, which I cannot lend them. Let them seek another Country to spend their Exile in, whether they have occasion for War or Peace, and not break off my Alliance with you. To which words, he added deeds that were much kinder; for he restored all the Hostages that he had left, and that Land of the Veians which was taken from them, according to a League made at Faniculum; whilst, in the mean time, Tarquinius despairing to return, went into Banishment to Tusculum, to his Son-in-law Mamilius Octavius. And thus the Romans made a firm Peace with Porfena.

XVI. Then M. Valerius and P. Postumius were Consuls, in whose Year there was a successful Battel fought against the Sabines, for which the Consuls Triumphed. But after that, the Sabines made a War with greater Preparations; wherefore in opposition to them, and lest any sudden danger might also arise from Tusculum (when, though no open signs of War appeared, yet such a thing was suspected) P. Valerius was a fourth time, and Titus Lucretius a second time made Consuls. But a Sedition arising among the Sabines, between two Factions, who were one for Peace and the other for War, brought over some part of their Forces to the Romans. For Attius Clausus, who at Rome was afterwards called Appius Claudius, being a stickler for Peace, and upon that Account, molested by those that were for a War, he not being strong enough for the adverse Faction, fled from Regillum [a Town of the Sabines,] with a great Retinue of his Creatures to Rome: where they were made free of the City, and had a piece of Land given them beyond the River Anien. The old Tribe, formerly instituted by Servius Tullius, by the addition of those new People who came out of that place, was called Tribus Claudia: and Appius being chosen into the Senate, came not long after to have the esteem and honour of the best men among them. The Consuls having Marched with a powerful Army into the Country of the Sabines, where they wasted and so destroyed the Enemies strength, that they needed not to fear any War from thence in a long time, they returned with Triumph to Rome. P. Valerius, who, by the consent of all men, was best skilled in the Arts both of War and Peace, died the next year (when Menenius Agrippa and P. Postumius were Consuls) with great Glory, but an Estate so small, that it would not defray the Charge of his Funeral; wherefore he was Buried by the Contribution of the People, and the Matrons mourned for him as they did for Brutus. In the same Year, two Latin Colonies, Pometia and Cora, Revolted to the Aurunci; with whom they went to War, and having Defeated a vast Army, which fiercely opposed the Consuls, at their entrance into those Confines, the whole Auruncian War was reduced to Pometia. Nor did they abstain from Slaughter more after the Battel, than in it; but there were many more slain than taken, and most of those they did take they killed. Nor did the fury of War contain it self even from the Hostages, who were three hundred in number. And this Year they two Triumphed at Rome.

XVII. The next Consuls, who were Opiter Virginius and Sp. Cassius, Attacked Pometia, first, by main force, and then with Mining Galleries and other Works; against whom the Aurunci, being now instigated by an implacable hatred, more than any hopes or good opportunity they had, run forth more with Fire than Sword, filling all places with Slaughter and Flames; for having burnt the Galleries, and wounded and slain many of the Enemies, they almost killed one of the Consuls too, who, by reason of a grievous Wound that he received, fell from his Horse; but which of them it was, my Authors do not mention. Then having had such ill success, the Romans returned home and left the Consul amongst many other wounded men, with little hopes of life. But not long after, when their Wounds were Cured, and they had had time to recruit their Army, they made War against Pometia, not only with greater Animosity, but with augmented Forces too; and having mended their Vinea [or Galleries] and got the rest of their Preparations in such a readiness, that the Soldiers were ready to scale the Walls, the Town was surrendered. But because the surrender seemed dishonourable, as if it had been taken, the Auruncian Nobles were most of them Beheaded, and the meaner sort were sold for Slaves; the Town was demolished, and the Land belonging to it sold. The Consuls Triumphed more for the revenge which they had taken, than for the greatness of the War which they had ended.

XVIII. The next Year Postumus Cominius and Titus Lartius were Consuls; and that Year, at Rome, a Company of Sabine young men, having in sport and wantonness forced a company of Whores, there was a great Concourse and a Riot of People occasioned, insomuch that it almost came to a Battel, and from that small beginning, seemed very likely to run into Rebellion. But over and above the fear of a Latin War, there was this addition also of danger, that they were sure, thirty several People had Conspired against them by the instigation of Octavius Mamilius. Wherefore, the City being much concerned at the apprehension of these great things, they first discourse concerning the making of a Dictator, but it does not appear what Year he was made in, nor who were Consuls at that time, (for those of that Year, being of the Tarquian Faction, as the Story likewise goes, were not thought fit to be trusted) nor who was first made Dictator. But I find in the most ancient Authors, that Titus Lartius was first Created Dictator, and Sp. Cassius Master of the Horse. Men of Consular Dignity only were concerned in the choice, for so the Law, regulating the choice of a Dictator, ordained. I am more induced to believe, that Lartius, who was a Consuls fellow, was chosen into this Office, rather than Manius Valerius, the Son of Marcus and Grandson of Volesius, who never had been Consul, and therefore was unfit to be a Moderator or Guide to Consuls; who if they had had a mind that a Dictator should have been chosen out of that Family, would much rather have pitched upon the Father, Marcus Valerius, who was a man of known virtue, and had been Consul. When therefore the Dictator was first Created at Rome, and they saw the Axes carried before him, the People were much affrighted, and thereby grew very careful to obey him. For he had not, as the Consuls, whose Power was equal, the help of any other, nor was there any Appeal from him, or any redress in any case, save from their care of doing what he ordered. The Sabines also were in great fear, when they heard that a Dictator was chosen at Rome; and that, so much the more, because they believed him Created upon their Account. Wherefore they sent Embassadors for Peace; who desiring the Dictator and the Senate to pardon the error of a company of young men, had this answer returned them, that it was possible to pardon young men, but not old ones, who raised one War out of another; but nevertheless they had a Treaty concerning Peace, which had been granted, if the Sabines had been willing to pay what the War cost them. Thereupon they declared War, but a silent Truce kept all that Year in Peace.

XIX. Then Servius Sulpicius and Manius Tullus were Consuls, but did nothing worth the speaking of; being succeeded by T. Aebutius and Caius Viturius: in whose time, Fidenæ was besieged, Crustumia taken, and Præneste revolted from the Latins to the Romans. Nor was the Latin War, which had now raged for several years, any longer carried on. Aulus Postumius the Dictator, and T. Aebutius, who was Master of the Horse, going with a great Army of Horse and Foot, to the Lake called Lacus Regillus, in the Confines of Tusculum, met a Party of the Enemies: and because they heard that the Tarquins were in the Latin Army, they were so enraged, that they must needs fall to fighting without any farther delay. By which means, that Battel was something more fierce and bloody than any of the rest. For the chief Officers were there, not only to give Command, but they also Combated each other in their own Persons; nor did scarce any of the Nobility Retreat out of either Army without a Wound, except the Roman Dictator. Tarquinius Superbus, though he was now very ancient and weak, rode up very eagerly to charge Postumius, who was encouraging his men, and setting them in Rank and File at the Head of his Army. In which Engagement, Tarquinius was wounded in the side, but by the help of his own men, who came in to his Assistance, was carried safe off. In the mean time, Aebutius, Master of the Horse, Charged Octavius Mamilius in the other Wing; who was aware of his coming, and rode up briskly to him, meeting with such force, that Mamilius with his Spear ran Aebutius through the Arm, and Aebutius him into the Breast. The Latins took Mamilius into the main Body of the Army; and Aebutius, not being able to hold any Weapon with his lame Arm, went out of the Field. The Latin General being no way dismayed at his Wound, encouraged his men to fight; but because he saw them dejected, he sent for a Party of Banished Romans, Commanded by Lucius Tarquinius's Son; and they, because they fought with greater fury, upon the account of their Goods which had been taken from them, and their Country, out of which they were expelled; did for some time renew the fight.

XX. When the Romans began now to Retreat from that side, M. Valerius the Brother of Poplicola, seeing young Tarquin very brisk, and vaunting himself in the head of his Exiled Troop, was fired with Domestick Glory, and thought to make those Kings, who by their being expelled, were the honour of the Valerian Family, to add a new Ornament thereto by their their Death; wherefore, setting spurs to his Horse, he threw a sharp Dart at Tarquinius, who retired from his furious Enemy into the midst of his men. But as Valerius was rashly Charging this Party of Banished Persons, some Soldier or other came on one side of him and ran him through: whereupon, his Horse not staying, though his Rider was wounded, the Roman fell down to the ground, with his Shield and Spear upon his Body. Postumius, the Dictator, observing that such a Person was fallen, that the Banished People Charged very fiercely, and that his own men, being dismayed, gave way; commanded his own Troop, which he had about him as the Guard of his Body, that whomsoever of his Soldiers they should see running away, they should reckon as an Enemy: by which means, the Romans being through doubtful fear turned back from flight, and facing the Enemy, the Army Rallied. Then the Dictator's Troop first entered the Battel; who being fresh men, and of good Courage, set upon the Banished Persons, who were now tired, and slew them. Then there arose another Conflict between the Commanders; the Latin General, when he saw the Party of the Banished Persons almost surrounded by the Roman Dictator, immediately drew forth certain Companies out of the Reserve, which lay in the Rere, into the Front of the Army, whom T. Herminius, the Lieutenant, espying as they came, Ranged in good Order, and knowing Mamilius amongst them, who was remarkable for his Garment and his Arms, he Charged up to him, with so much greater force than the Master of the Horse, who had a little before Engaged the General of the Enemies, that he not only killed Mamilius, with a Wound that he made in his side at one blow, but was himself also, whilst he Riffled the Enemies Body, run through with a Javelin; and, when he was carried as Victor into the Camp, expired upon the first dressing of his Wound. Then the Dictator made haste up to the Horse, beseeching them, that, now the Foot were tired, they would alight and take their places. They complied with his Request, and Dismounting, made all the speed they could into the Head of the Army, where they stood with their Shields in the room of the Antesignani [or such Soldiers as stood before the Colours.] Upon that, the Foot immediately recovered their Courage, when they saw the young Nobility in the same manner with themselves sustaining part of the danger: and then, the Latins being Shocked, their Army was dismayed, and began to Retreat. Which when the Romans saw, the Horsemen mounted again the better to pursue the Enemy, and the Foot followed them. At that time, the Dictator omitting nothing, either Divine or Humane, that might be for their Assistance, and therefore, is said, to have resolved to Dedicate a Temple to Castor, and to have proposed rewards to such of his Soldiers, as should be the first or second that entered the Enemies Camp. Which so much animated them, that at the same instant in which they Routed the Enemy, the Romans possessed themselves of their Camp. This was the success of the Battel at the Lake called Lacus Regillus; from whence, the Dictator and the Master of the Horse returned with Triumph into the City.

For three Years after that, they had not either certain Peace or War. XXI. T. Lartius were Consuls; and after them A. Sempronius and M. Minucius; in whose time, a Temple was Dedicated to Saturn, and an Holy-day, called Saturnalia [or the Feast of Saturn] was then instituted. After that, A. Postumius and T. Virginus were made Consuls; and I find some Authors say, the Battel of the Lake Regillus was fought in this Year; as also, that A. Postumius, because his Colleague was a man not to be trusted, withdrew himself from the Consulship, being afterwards made Dictator. There are such errors in the account of time, and such difference in the series of their Magistrates, which several Authors have made, that a man cannot tell what Consuls were then in Office, nor what was done in each Year, it is so long ago; and things, as well as Authors, are so confounded. Then Appius Claudius and Publius Servilius were made Consuls; whose Year was very remarkable, for the news of Tarquinius's Death. He died at Cume, whither, after the Latins were Defeated, he fled to King Aristodemus. At that News, the Senate were very much pleased, and so were the People; but the joy of the Senate was too immoderate, and began to insult over the People, whom, till that time, they had endeavoured by all manner of means to oblige. The same Year, Signia, a Colony which King Tarquinius had Planted, was again supplied with a fresh number of Inhabitants; Rome was divided into one and twenty Tribes, and the Temple of Mercury was Dedicated upon the Ides of May, [i. e. the fifteenth.]

XXII. In the Latin War, the Romans had neither Peace nor War with the Volsci: for the Volsci raised Forces to send to the Latins, lest the Roman Dictator should make too much haste, and the Romans on the other side, made what haste they could, lest they should be forced to fight with the Latins and the Volsci at the same time. At which, the Consuls being enraged, led their Legions into the Country of the Volsci; who not fearing that they should be punished for their Designs, were put into a Consternation, by a War which they did not foresee. Wherefore, neglecting their Military Preparations, they gave three hundred Hostages, which were Noble mens Sons of Cora and Pometia; by which means, the Legions were drawn off without fighting. But not long after, the Volsci being eased of their fears, resumed their former Alliance. They also sent Ambassadors all about, to sollicite the Latins: but the Defeat which they had lately received at the Lake Regillus, possessed the Latins with such anger and hatred against any one that should persuade them to take up Arms, that they could not forbear forbear laying violent hands, even upon the Embassadors themselves. Wherefore they seized upon them, and carrying them to Rome, delivered them to the Consuls; by whom it was declared, that the Volsi and the Hernici were preparing for a War against the Romans. The matters being brought before the Senate, it pleased them so much, that they not only sent back to the Latins, six thousand Captives, but also referred the Debate concerning a League, which had been almost always denied to new Magistrates. At which, the Latins mightily rejoiced, as being proud to be the Authors of Peace; and upon that account, they afterwards sent a Crown of Gold into the Capitol, for an Offering to Jupiter; with which, and the Embassadors that brought it, there came a great Multitude of those Captives that had been sent home: who, going to the Houses of them whom they had formerly served, gave them thanks for their Liberality and Kindness to them in their Calamity, making perpetual Agreements of mutual Friendship and Hospitality among them. For, before this time, the Latins were never, both publickly and privately, more nearly Allied to the Roman Empire.

XXIII.

But now not only the Volsian War was coming on, but the City it self also, being at variance, was all inflamed with an Intestine hatred between the Senate and the People, which happened mostly upon the account of those who were obliged to work out their Debts. For they murmured, that they who fought abroad for Liberty and Empire, should be Captivated and Oppressed by their own Citizens at home; and said, that the Liberty of the People was more secure in War than in Peace, among their Enemies more than among their fellow Citizens. But that which kindled their Envy, though it increased fast enough of it self, was the signal Calamity of one single Person. That was an ancient man who came into the Forum, with all the marks of hardship that he had suffered under the restraint of his Creditor. His Garments were all squalid and nasty, but his Body in a much worse plight, being pale, and looking as if he were almost starved to Death. Besides which, his Beard and his Hair were grown so long, that they made him look like a Savage: yet he was known with all that Deformity, and the People said, he had been a Commander, commending him also for other Military Achievements, and commiserating him before the Rabble. He also shewed them the Scars in his Body, which were his witnesses of what honourable Fights he had engaged in. And when they asked him how he came to look so ill (a Crowd standing round about him, in manner of an Assembly) he told them, That being a Soldier in the Sabine War, the Country so pillaged, that he not only wanted the Fruits of his Land, but his House was burnt, all his Goods Plundered from him, his Cattel driven away; and at that very Calamitous juncture, a Tribute was imposed, that made him borrow Money: which by Usury rising to a great sum, deprived him first of his Fathers and his Grand-fathers Estate, and then of his other fortunes; till at last, like a Consumption, it seized his very Body, and he was bled by his Creditor, not only into Slavery, but a severe Work-house and a Gail. With that, he shewed them his Back, which was all raw with the fresh marks of those stripes he had received. Which, when they saw and heard, there arose a great Clamor among them; nor did the Tumult now contain it self within the Forum [or Market-place,] but ran immediately through all the City. Whereupon, not only those that were Bound, but such as were free too, came forth from all parts into the Streets, imploring the Assistance of the Romans their fellow Citizens. Nor was there any place that wanted a Volunteer for Sedition; but they ran in whole Troops through all the Streets, with Clamors into the Market-place; where some of the Senators that happened to be there, were in great danger of the Multitude. Nor had they escaped, if the Consuls, P. Servilius and Ap. Claudius had not come speedily in to repress the Tumult. But the Multitude turned even upon them also, and shewing their Bonds, with their other Deformities, said, Those were all that they had deserved, upbraiding them with the several services which they had done in the Wars. Which having done, they required them, with Menaces, rather than like Petitioners, to call a Senate; and they themselves, who were resolved to be Judges and Moderators of that publick Council, stood round about the Court. Some very few of the Senators, that came that way by chance, were got about the Consuls, but the rest, fear kept not only from the Court, but from the Forum also; so that nothing could be done, because the number of the Senators was so small. With that, the Multitude thought they were derided, and put off with idle delays; and that the Senators who were absent, did not stay away by chance, or for fear, but to obstruct the present affair, yea, the Consuls themselves prævaricated; nor did they question, but their miseries pleased them. And now, the very Majesty of the Consuls could hardly restrain the fury of the People; when being uncertain, whether by staying or coming, they should incur most danger: at length, they came into the Senate, and in a full Assembly, had a long Debate, not only between the Senators, but even the Consuls themselves. Appius, a man of a violent Spirit, thought the matter might be best composed by the Absolute Authority of the Consuls, and that if one or two of them were laid hold on, the rest would be quiet. But Servilius, who was more inclined to use gentle Remedies, supposed it more secure, as well as more easie, to bend, than to break their stubborn mind.

XXIV.

Amidst this Tumult, another far greater terror surprized them; for the Latin Horse came with a frightful Message, that the Volsi were a coming with a great Army to Attack the City. Which News (so far had Discord divided the City into two instead of one) made an impression upon the Senators, to what it did upon the People. For the People leaped for joy, and and said, That the gods were come to revenge the pride of the Senators. In which, one of them confirmed another, with persuasions, Not to lift themselves for the War; but to die with the whole City, rather than perish alone: to let the Senators fight and take up Arms, that they might undergo the dangers of War, who had the reward of it. In the mean time, the Senate being much concerned, and trembling for fear, as well of their own Citizens as of the Enemy, desired Servilius the Consul, who was of a more popular disposition, to free the Commonwealth from those Terrors with which it was now circumvented. Then, the Consul, having dismissed the Senate, came forth into the Assembly of the People; where he shewed them, What care the Senate had taken of the Peoples welfare; but that amidst their deliberation concerning that, which was indeed the greatest part, though but a part of the City, they were surprized with fear, upon the account of the whole Commonwealth; nor could they, when the Enemy was so near their Gates, think of any thing before a War: nor, if they should give the People any relief, would it either become them to refuse the taking up Arms for their Country, because they did not first receive their reward, or would it agree with the honour of the Senate, to be forced by fear, to remedy the Calamities of their fellow Citizens, so much as afterwards it would, upon their own free will. Then, by an Edict, he put an end to the Assembly, by which Edict, he commanded, That no man should keep a Roman Citizen in Bonds or Restraint, so as to hinder him from giving his Name to the Consul. That no one should take or sell the Goods of any Soldier, so long as he was in the Camp, or detain his Children or Grand-children. This Edict being Proclaimed, not only those Debtors who were present, immediately gave their Names, but they flocked from all private corners of the City (now that their Creditors had now Power to detain them) into the Forum, to take the Military Oath. And indeed they made a great Party; nor was the Valour and Industry of any other, besides these, more eminent, in the War against the Volsi. Wherefore the Consul drew forth his Forces, and pitched his Camp at a small distance from them.

The next night, the Volsi relying upon the Roman Discord, attacked the Camp, to try if any of them would come over, or betray it to them in the night time. The Sentinels perceived them coming, and gave notice to the Army, who were presently Alarmed, so that the Attempt of the Volsi was to no purpose. The rest of the night both sides lay still; but the next morning, as soon as 'twas morning, the Volsi having filled the Trenches, Invaded the Rampier. And now they were pulling down the Fortifications on every side, when the Consul (though all the Army, and the Debtors especially, called out upon him to give the Signal) delayed for some small time, to try the Soldiers Inclinations; but when he saw they were mighty eager upon it, at last, having made a sign for them to Sally forth, he sent them out with violent appetites to the Battel. The Enemies were Defeated upon the first Attack; and as they ran away, their Rere was cut in pieces as far as the Foot could follow them; but the Horse drove the frightened Creatures even to their Camp. Thereupon, the Camp it self, being surrounded with the Legions, (now that the fear had driven the Volsi from thence also) was taken and Plundered. The next day, the Legions were drawn to Suessa Pometia, whither the Enemies were fled, which Town, within a few days, was taken and given to the Soldiers as free Plunder. By that means, the needy Soldiers were in some measure recruited; and the Consul, to his great Honour, led his Victorious Army back to Rome. In his March home, the Embassadors of the Ecetrani, a People dwelling in a famous City of the Volsi, fearing their own circumstances, now that Pometia was taken, made application to him, and had a Peace granted them, by order of the Senate; but part of their Land was taken from them.

Immediately after that, the Sabines put the Romans into some small fear, for that was a Tumult more properly than a War. News came by night into the City, that the Sabine Army was come, and had pillaged the Country as far as the River Anien, and that all the Villages thereabouts were Plundered and Burnt. Upon which, A. Postumius, who had been Dictator in the Latin War, was presently sent thither with all the Horse, and Consul Servilius followed him with a choice Party of Foot. The Horse enclosed a great many of them as they were stragling about the Fields; nor did the Sabine Legions withstand the Body of Foot when they came up. For a great part of them being tired, not only with Marching, but with the Plunder which they had been employed in, and having filled themselves in the Villages, with good Chear and Wine, had scarce ability enough to run away. The Sabine War, therefore, being first heard of and ended in one and the same night, the next day, in great hopes of Peace with all Nations, Embassadors came to the Senate from the Aurunci, and told them, That if they did not depart out of the Dominions of the Volsi, they came to declare War against them. With those Embassadors, there came likewise an Army of the Aurunci; who, having been seen not far from Aricia, put the Romans into such a tumult, that neither the Senators could give a fitting Answer to the Consul in due order, nor could the Consuls to the Embassadors, who came to make War; since they themselves were ready to take up Arms. Wherefore they went with a strong Army to Aricia, and not far from thence, Engaging with the Aurunci, overcame them in that one Battel.

The Auruncians being Defeated, the Roman Army, which within a few days had gotten so many Victories, expected the promise of the Consul should be performed by the Senate; but Appius, both out of his Native pride, and to falsifie his Colleagues word, was as severe as possibly he could be, in giving Judgment concerning Debts; and thereupon, not only they who had before been in Prison, were delivered to their Creditors, but others also were put into the same condition. Which, as fast as any Soldier had suffered, he Appealed to Servilius, to whom they all flocked; Telling him of his promise, and upbraiding him with what each one of them had deserved in the Wars, and the Scars which they had received. They desired him to let the Senate know of it, and that he would not only assist his fellow Citizens, as Consul, but his Soldiers, as their General. This moved the Consul, but he was forced by the necessity of the present Juncture, not to prosecute their Desires, because not only his Colleague was engaged on the other side, but all the Faction of the Nobility too; so that he, by standing Neuter, neither escaped the hatred of the People, nor won the love of the Senate, the later thinking him effeminate and ambitious, and the former, deceitful; whereby it shortly appeared, that he was hated as much as Appius. There was a Controversie between the Consuls, which of them should Dedicate the Temple of Mercury; for the Senate had left it to the People, and Ordered, that he whom they appointed to Dedicate that Temple, should be Præfectus Annonæ [or Steward of the Provisions,] regulate the Company of Merchants, and determine of such and such Solemnity for the Pontifex [or High Priest.] But the People committed the Dedication of that Temple to M. Lætorius, the eldest Captain of their Army, not so much out of respect to him (for it was a thing very much above him) as out of disrespect to the Consuls. Thereupon Appius Claudius and the Senate grew very severe: but the People were the more encouraged, and went to work a far different way from what they first designed. For despairing of any relief from the Consuls and the Senate, when they saw a Debtor haled into Court, they immediately flocked together from all parts; nor could the Decree of the Consul be heard, for noise and clamour, nor when he had made his Decree, did any body obey it, but by reason of the violence which the People used, all the fear and danger was turned from Debtors upon Creditors, since, in the Consuls sight, each one of the latter was set upon by many of the former. Besides this, they were possessed with the fear of a Sabine War; in order whereunto, though there were a Levy Decreed, yet no body gave in their Names. At which, Appius was enraged and inveighed against the ambition of his Colleague, who, by his popular silence, Betrayed the Commonwealth, and said, that besides his refusing to do Justice to the Creditors, he was unwilling to raise men, though the Senate had so Decreed; yet that the Commonwealth was not totally deserted, nor the Power of the Consuls so little, but that he alone would uphold the Authority and Majesty, not only of his own Place, but of the Senate too. Thereupon, as the Multitude, who behaved themselves very licentious, stood round about the Tribunal, which they daily used to do, he ordered one notorious Ring-leader of the Sedition to be laid hold on: who, as he was haled along by the Lictors, Appealed from the Consul to the People; but the Consul would not have yielded to his Appeal, (because the Judgment of the People was certain to go on his side) had not he been, with much ado, persuaded to it, more by the Counsel and Authority of the Nobility, than by the Clamor of the People: such a high spirit he had to bear and contemn the envy of the People. From that time, the mischief grew greater every day than other; not only with open Clamors, but, which was much worse, by Caballing and secret Conspiracies, till, at last, these Consuls, whom the People hated, went out of their Office; Servilius beloved by neither Party, but Appius much admired by the Senate.

XXVIII.

Then A. Virginius and T. Veturius were made Consuls; in whose time, the People being uncertain what kind of men they would prove, had mighty Meetings; some in the Esquilæ and some in the Aventine, left, when they came into the Forum, at any publick Assembly, they might be put to a plunge, and do things hand over head. The Consuls supposing that to be, as it really was, a very pernicious way of proceeding, acquainted the Senate with it; but when it came before them, they could not proceed in their deliberations concerning it, so regularly as they used to do, there was such a tumult and a noise in the House, when the Bill was brought in; for the Senate was very angry, that the Consuls should cast the envy of that which they ought to have executed by their own Authority, upon their House, and told them, That if there were Magistrates in the Commonwealth, there would be no Meetings at Rome, but what were publick; though now the People were dispersed and divided into a thousand Conventicles and Assemblies, some in the Esquilæ and some in the Aventine; and that one man of resolution (for that was more than a Consul) such as was Ap. Claudius, would dissolve those Meetings in a moment. The Consuls being thus chid by the Senate, desired to know what they would have them do, (for they would be as diligent and as Courageous as the Senate would have them) to which the Senate answered, That they should make a strict Levy of Soldiers among the People, for that they grew petulant and unruly, for want of employment. Having adjourned the Senate, the Consuls went up to the Tribunal, where they called over all the younger men by their Names, but no body answered, for the Multitude standing round, in the nature of an Assembly, cried out, They could no longer be deceived; nor should the Consuls ever have one Soldier, unless they performed their publick promise. They must give every man his Liberty, before they should force any Arms upon him, that they might fight for their Country and their fellow Citizens, not for their Lords and Masters. The Consuls saw what the Senate had enjoyed them, but discovered never a one of those who were so brisk within the Walls of the

the Court, to stand by them there, and partake of the envy which they lay under; wherefore they were like to have a cruel tug with the People. For that reason, before they tried the extremity, they resolved once more to consult the Senate: upon which, all the younger part of the Senators ran up to the Consuls Seats, commanding them to lay down their Office, and quit their Authority which they wanted Courage to maintain.

The Consuls having tried both the Senate and the People, at last they told them, Fathers, XXIX. that you may not deny our proposals, we must inform you, that there is a great tumult; and therefore, we desire, that those who blame us most of all for our slothfulness, would be our Assistants while we make the Levy: then, since you will have it so, we will be very industrious to please each one of you. With that, they returned to the Tribunal, and ordered a certain Person, that stood there in view, to be Cited by his Name on purpose: who standing silent, with a crowd of men about him (to keep him from being seized on) the Consuls sent an Officer to him; who being repulsed, the Senators that were there assisting the Consuls, cried out, it was a shame, and immediately ran down, from the Tribunal, to help the Officer: who being only kept off from laying hold upon the fellow who was Cited, and did not answer, the Peoples fury was all turned upon the Senators, but by the interposition of the Consuls, the Tumult was appeased; in which, there being no Weapons used, there was more noise and wrangling than there was hurt done. Upon that, the Senate was tumultuously summoned, whose Consultations were much more tumultuous; for those who were affronted by the People, desired satisfaction, and being each of them, in a very great heat, gave their Voices, not quietly, as wise men should have done, but with Noise and Clamor. At length, when their heat was abated, the Consuls upbraided them, saying, There was as little Prudence and Sobriety in the Senate-house as in the Forum, and then they began to give their Opinions, regularly and in order, of which, there were three. P. Virginius did not think fit that they should be all dealt with in the same manner, but that they ought to consider such only as laid claim to the promise, which the Consul P. Servilius had made, upon the account of their having been Soldiers in the Volscian, Auruncian and Sabine Wars. T. Largius said, That was not a fit time to reward those only who had deserved well, since all the People in general were in Debt, nor could the Sedition be remedied, unless they consulted the good of all; for if the circumstances of some were better than those of others, their Discord was like rather to be heightened than allayed. Ap. Claudius who was naturally of a violent and fierce disposition, fomented on the one hand, by his hatred to the People, and on the other hand, by the commendations of the Senate, told them, That great disturbance arose, not from their miseries, but licentiousness; and that the People were rather too much indulged than inclined to mutiny. That the present mischief sprang from the Liberty of Appealing; for if all those who had offended might Appeal, the Consuls, instead of Authority, would have nothing but Menaces. Come then (said he) let us create a Dictator, from whom there is no Appeal; then this fury, that now puts all things into a flame, will certainly abate. Then let him, who knows that the power over his Body and Life is in one man, abuse my Officer, and violate that one mans Authority.

The Opinion of Appius was dreadful and severe, as many thought; while those again of XXX. Virginius and Largius were of ill consequence, especially that of Largius, which destroyed the credit of the whole City, so that Virginius's Counsel seemed to be most moderate, and to proceed in a middle way betwixt both. But through Faction and Respect to private ends, which always have done, and always will obstruct publick Councils, Appius prevailed, and had like to have been made Dictator himself. Which, if he had, it had certainly disobliterated the People, even at the most dangerous juncture, when the Volsi, the Æqui and the Sabines happened to be at the same time in Arms. But the Consuls and the graver Senators took care, that that Office which carried such absolute Authority, in its own style, should be bestowed upon a Person of a more gentle disposition; and therefore they chose Manius Valerius, the Son of Volefius. The Common People, though they saw a Dictator made in opposition to them, yet because they had their Appeal granted, by a Law which his Brother made, they feared no mischief nor tyranny from that Family. In which Opinion, an Edict set forth by him, after he was Dictator, confirmed them, it being almost of the same tenour with that which Consul Servilius had formerly made: wherefore, supposing that they might trust, not only the man, but his Authority too, they ceased to Mutiny, and gave in their Names. By which means, there were ten Legions raised, (such an Army as they had never had before) of which, the Consuls had three apiece, and the Dictator four. Nor could the War be now deferred; for the Æqui had invaded the Latin Dominions, and Envoys sent from the Latins, desired of the Senate, That they would either send them aid, or permit them to defend themselves. Upon which, the Senate thought it more secure for them to defend the Latins, who were now naked, than to suffer them any more to take up Arms. So they sent Consul Veturius who put an end to that Ravage which the Enemy had made; while the Æqui, leaving the Plains, and relying more upon the circumstance of place, than the strength of their Arms, secured themselves upon the tops of the Mountains. In the mean time, the other Consul Marching against the Volsi, and designing to save time, provoked the Enemy to bring their Camp nearer and fight him, by Pillaging their Country as much as he could. Each Army stood in the Plain between their Camps, and before their out-works all in Battalia, but the Volsi somewhat somewhat out-did them in number. Wherefore they joyned Battel without any Order, and with Contempt. The Roman Consul, neither permitted his Army to stir, nor suffered them to hollow, but commanded them to stand to their Arms which they had fixed in the ground; but when the Enemy came up to Engage them, that then they should fall on with all their might, and Engage hand to hand with their Swords. The Volsci being tired with running and the Clamor they had made, came up to the Romans, who seemed astonished with fear, but when they perceived them to make opposition, and their Swords glittered before their eyes, being dismayed, they turned their backs, as if they had fallen into an Ambuscade; nor had they strength enough to run away, because they were tired with the speed they made into the Fight. The Romans, on the other hand, having stood still before, were very vigorous, and easily commanded their tired Enemies, possessed themselves of their Camp, and having pursued them as far as Velitrae [a City of the Volsci] pressed into the Town, both Conquerors and Conquered at the same time, where by the promiscuous slaughter of all sorts of People, there was more Blood spilt than in the Battel it self, save only, that to some few they gave Quarter, because they came unarmed and surrendered themselves.

XXXI. Whilest these things were transacted in the Country of the Volsci, the Dictator Defeated, Routed and Seized the Camp of the Sabines, against whom, they had much more to do. For he, by sending in his Horse, had confounded the main Body of the Enemies Army, which they, by extending their Wings, had very irregularly Fortified by the Files within. He therefore set upon them in this Confusion, on foot; by which means, he not only, at the first Onset, took their Camp, but totally overcame them. Since the Fight at the Lake Regillus, there was never another, in those years, that was more famous than this. The Dictator was carried in Triumph into the City, where, over and above the usual Honours, there was a place assigned in the Circus, for him and his Posterity, to see the Exercises and Games in; besides that, a Sella Curulis [i.e. a Chair of State] was set for him in the same place. The Volsci being Conquered, the Land belonging to Velitrae was taken from them, and a Colony sent thither from Rome. Not long after, they had a Battel with the Aequi, but against the Consul's will, because the place, in which he was to Attack the Enemy, was much to his disadvantage; yet, seeing the Soldiers accused him of delaying the time, as if he had a mind the Dictator should go out of his Office before they came home, and so his promises, like those of Consul Servilius's before, should signifie nothing, they forced him to lead the Army at a venture up into the opposite Mountains. Which unadvised Action, through the slothfulness of the Enemies, proved very successful; for they, before the two Armies came within a Darts cast of each other, being amazed at the audacity of the Romans, forsook their Camp, which they had pitched in the strongest parts of the Hills, and ran down into the Valleys on the other side: by which means, the Romans got not only Plunder enough, but a Victory without Bloodshed. Thus having succeeded well in their Wars against three Nations, the Senate and the People too were not unmindful of the state of affairs at home; though the Bankers had made such preparations by Bribery and other Arts, as might not only disappoint the common People, but even the Dictator himself. For Valerius, after the return of Consul Veturius, made it the first Debate that was in the Senate, to consider the victorious People; and desired to know, what they would please to do with the Debtors: which Proposal of his being rejected, he told them, I do not like your proceedings, I am for Peace; and take my word for it, you will wish ere long, that the Roman People had more such Advocates as I am. For my part, I will no longer disappoint my fellow Citizens, nor be my self Dictator to no purpose. Our Intestine Broils and our Foreign Wars put the Commonwealth upon the necessity of having such a Magistrate as I am; and now we have made Peace abroad, we obstruct it at home: I therefore will live rather like a private man than a Dictator, whilest this Sedition continues; and with that, going out of the Court, he quitted his Dictatorship. The People knew, the reason why he laid down his Authority, was, the indignation which he conceived upon their account: wherefore, as if he had discharged his promise, (because it was not his fault that he could not perform it) they followed him to his House with Praises and Acclamations.

XXXII. Thereupon the Senate were afraid, lest, if they Disbanded the Army, there might be Caballing and private Conspiracies as there were before; wherefore, although the Levy of them had been made by the Dictator, yet, because they had given their Oaths to the Consuls, they supposed them to be obliged by it, and therefore, under pretence of the Wars being renewed by the Aequi, they commanded the Legions to be drawn out of the City. By which the Sedition was augmented; and (as they say) the first thing they consulted of, was, how they should kill the Consuls, that they might be discharged from their Oath: but being taught afterwards, that no Religious Vow can be discharged by a wicked Act, they, by the advice of one Sicinius, but without the consent of the Consuls, withdrew themselves into the Mount called Mons Sacer, on the other side the River Anien, three thousand paces from the City (for that is more commonly reported, than what Piso tells us, that they retired into the Mount Aventine) where, without any Captain, having Fortified their Camp with a Rampier and a Trench, they lay still for some days without taking any thing, except what was necessary for Food, neither molested themselves, nor disturbing any body else. The City, in the mean while, was filled with great dread, and all People were in suspense, through through mutual fear of each other; for the common People being deserted by the Soldiers of their Rank, were afraid of the Senate, and the Senate, on the other hand, were as apprehensive of the Commonalty, which yet remained in the City, not knowing whether it were better to let them stay or go; but how long (said they) will the Multitude be quiet that have withdrawn themselves? what will become of us, if any Foreign War should happen in the mean time? There was no hope, they thought, but in the mutual Concord of the Citizens; and that must be purchased at any rate. They therefore agreed, to send an Agent to the People, whose name was, Menenius Agrippa, an Eloquent man, and one that the People loved, because he was Descended from a Family of Plebeians. Who, being admitted into their Camp, is reported, in that old uncouth manner of speaking, to have said nothing to them but this, Upon a time, when all the parts of man, not disagreeing, as men do now, consented in the main, but every member had its particular Opinion, and a peculiar way of Discourse, the other parts were vexed that they must take care and pains to provide all necessaries for the Belly, whilest that lay idle in the middle of the Body, and did nothing but enjoy its pleasure. Wherefore, they conspired that the hands should not lift the meat to the mouth, nor the mouth receive it when offered, nor the teeth chew it. By which envious method, whilest they endeavoured to famish the Belly, the members themselves, at the same time, and the whole Body were starved. Whence it appeared, that the Belly was instrumental in the service of the whole, nor did it receive more nourishment than it supplied, in that it distributed and equally divided into the Veins that Blood made out of well digested food, whereby we live and enjoy our health. Then comparing the Intestine Sedition of the Body to the Animosity of the People against the Senate, he thereby reconciled them.

Thereupon they began to Treat of Peace, and agreed upon Terms, That the People should have certain peculiar and inviolable Magistrates to assist them against the Consuls, and that no Senator should be capable of that Office. So there were two Officers Created by the Title of Tribuni Plebis [or the Tribunes of the People] whose Names were Caius Licinius and L. Albius: and they chose themselves three Collegues, of which Sicinius the Author of the Sedition was one, but who the other two were is uncertain. Some Authors say, that there were only two Tribunes Created, in the Mons Sacer [i.e. the Holy Mount,] and that there also those Laws were made, called Leges Sacrae [i.e. Sacred Laws.] During this Seccession of the People, Sp. Cassius and Postumus Cominius began their Consulship; in whose time there was a League made with the Latins, for the Ratifying whereof, one Consul stayed at Rome, and the other was sent to the War against the Volsci, in which, he Defeated and Routed those of Antium [a City of the Volsci,] and driving them into a Town called Lenglula, he made himself Master of it. Then he took Polusca, another Town of the Volsci; from whence he marched and Stormed Corioli. There was at that time in the Camp, among the rest of the young Nobility, one Caius Marcins, a young man, very witty and active, who was afterwards Surnamed Coriolanus. When therefore the Volscian Legions, coming from Antium, had set upon the Roman Army, which then fate down before Corioli, being intent upon the Townsmen which they had blocked up, and free from any fear of a War without, and at the same time, the Enemies had made a Sally out of the Town, this Marcins was by chance upon the Guard; and he, with a choice Party of men, did not only repel the violence of those that Sallied forth, but bravely forced his way through the open Gate, and having killed all he met in the adjacent parts of the City, he took the next Fore that came to his hands, and threw it into the Houles next the Wall. Thereupon, the noise of the Townsmen, mixed with the cries of Women and Children, (which was at first designed, as it usually is for terror) encouraged the Romans, and disheartened the Volsci, to hear that their City was taken which they came to Relieve. Thus the Volsci of Antium were Routed, and the Town of Corioli taken; in which Actions, Marcins so much obscured the Consuls Fame, by his Honourable Achievements, that unless the League made with the Latins, (by Sp. Cassius alone, in the absence of his Colleague) and graven upon a Pillar of Brass, had been a Monument of it, Posterity would never have known that Postumus Cominius ever waged War with the Volsci. The same Year Agrippa Menenius died, a man all his life-time, beloved both by the Senate and the People: but after his death, became more dear to the People. yet he, who was the Mediator and the Umpire for Concord between his fellow Citizens, as being Embassador from the Senate to the People, and the man who brought back the Roman Commonalty into the City, wanted Mony to defray his Funeral Charges, wherefore the People buried him at their expence, Contributing every one three Farthings.

Then T. Geganius and P. Minucius were made Consuls; in whose time, though all things were quiet abroad, and the Discord composd at home, another misfortune, much worse than all the rest, befell the City; and that was, first a Dearth of Provisions, for want of having had their Land Manured, at the time of the Peoples Seccession: after which, succeeded a Famine, like that which Towns besieged are wont to suffer. In which Calamity, the Slaves especially, and the meaner sort of People had all died, if the Consuls had not taken care to send into all parts to buy Corn; not only into Etruria, all along the Coasts, on the right hand of Ostia, but on the left hand too, through the Country of the Volsci, and down by Sea as far as Cumae: yea, they went even into Sicily also, so far did the hatred which their Neighbours bore to them, compel them to go for supplies. When they had bought Corn at Cuma, their Ships had an Embargo laid upon them by Aristodemus the King of that place, to make amends for the Goods of the Tarquins, to whom he was Heir. In the Country of the Volsci, and about Pometia there was none to be bought; nor only so, but the Merchants themselves were also in danger of their lives; they had Corn out of Etruria, by way of the Tiber, wherewith the People were sustained. Amidst this scarcity, they had been harrassed with very unseasonable War, had it not been for a raging Pestilence which seized upon the Volsci, whilst they were now taking up Arms. At that destructive calamity the minds of their Enemies were so dismayed, that even when that was abated, they were possessed with some terror; while the Romans augmented their Colony at Vilatra, and sent a new one into the Mountains to Norba, which is a Castle near Pometia. After that, when M. Minucius and A. Sempronius were Consuls, there was a great quantity of Corn brought out of Sicily; and 'twas Debated in the Senate at what rate the People should have it. Amongst whom, many were of Opinion, that then the time was come to make the People submit, and to recover those Privileges, which by their Secession and Violence, had been extorted from the Senate; but M. Coriolanus, more than any other, being an Enemy to the Tribunes Power. If they (said he) will have their old allowance, and at the same rate that they had it before the Sedition, let them give back to the Senate their ancient Privileges. Why should I see Magistrates made out of the People, or Sicinius so great and powerful, whilst I my self am a Slave and redeemed, as it were, out of the hands of Robbers? Shall I endure these indignities any longer than I am forced to it? Shall we endure Sicinius that could not brook King Tarquin? Let him withdraw now and call the People after him, the way is open to the Sacred Mount, as well as the other Hills. Let them steal the Corn out of our Fields, as they did three years ago. Let them enjoy and make use of such Provisions, as by their fury they have made. I dare be bold to say, that they themselves will be so tamed by this Calamity, that they will rather chase to Till the Ground than take up Arms, and separating themselves, prohibit the Manuring of it. It could scarce be so easily said, whether they ought to have done it or no, as it might, I suppose, have been in the power of the Senate, by making Provisions cheap, not only to remove the Power of the Tribunes, but all those new inconveniences which were imposed upon them.

XXXV. This Opinion seemed not only very severe to the Senate, but fury likewise almost armed the People, who said, That they were now treated with famine, like Enemies, being defrauded of their very food, and that the Corn which came from foreign Countries by meer fortune, to be their only sustenance, must now be snatched from their mouths, unless the Tribunes were delivered up in Bonds to C. Marcius; unless he wreaked his revenge upon the Bodies of the Roman People. That he was risen up to be a new Executioner to them, and to force them either to be Slaves or die. As he was going out of the Court, they had set upon him, if the Tribune had not very seasonably given him notice to appear before them such a day; for by that means their fury was suppressed, since every one of them saw himself made Judge and Master of the life and death of his Enemy. Marcius, at first, heard the Tribunes Menaces with contempt, and told them, that their Office was to assist the People, not to punish their betters, in that they were the Tribunes of the People not of the Senate. But the People rose with that violence, that the Senate were forced to allow of one mans punishment, in order to avoid the present imminent danger. Nevertheless they made resistance, whatever the Tribunes could do; and used, not only each man his own, but the Authority even of the whole Order. And first, they tried by disposing of their Clients, into such and such parts of the City, whether they could Defeat the Designs by deterring and keeping single Persons from Cabals and Consults. After which, they went all together (in which case, you may well say, all the Senators there were Guilty) beseeching the People, to deliver up to them one of their fellow Citizens, one Senator, if they would not acquit him as Innocent, under the Notion of an Offender. He not appearing at the day appointed, they persevered in their fury; whereupon, he was Condemned, though absent, and went as a Banished Person into the Country of the Volsci, with Menaces to his Country, and a mind now filled with Hostility. The Volsci received him very kindly; and their kindness encreased more and more every day; which made the hatred of the Romans the more conspicuous; from whom there were sent very frequently, one while complaints, and other-whiles Menaces. He lived with one Attius Tullus, who was at that time the greatest man of all the Volsci, and a perpetual Enemy to the Romans. They two therefore, the one upon the account of an old grudge, and the other for a late indignity, consulted together, how they should make a War against the Romans. But they did not think it an easie matter to persuade that People to take up Arms, since they so often had such ill success. For having lost most of their young men, very lately, by Pestilence, and in many Wars before; they supposed, that now their Spirits being broken, they must use some Art, and find out a new occasion of instigating their fury, seeing the old quarrel was now, by Tract of time, quite worn out and forgot.

XXXVI. The Games called Ludi Magni were then a going to be Celebrated a new; and the reason of it was this, On the day that the Games were to be Celebrated, in the Morning, before they began, a certain Householder had driven his Slave through the middle of the Circus, and caused him to carry a small Gallows upon his neck, whilst, all the way, he was whipped along. Which notwithstanding, the Games were begun, as if that Action did not at all concern Religion.

ligion. But not long after, one Tib. Atinius, a mean Person, dreamed, that Jupiter came to him, and told him, The man that led the Dance in the Games that day, did not please him; and that if they were not magnificently renewed, the City would be in great danger, bidding him go and tell the Consuls the same. Now, though the man was not altogether void of Religion, yet his modesty and the Reverence he had for the Majesty of those great Officers, overpowered his fear of the Deity; besides that, he was afraid the People would jeer him for it. But his delay cost him dear, for in a few days he lost his Son; of which sudden misfortune, to make the cause plain, as he lay discontented, but asleep, the same Vision appeared to him, and seemed to ask him, Whether he had Reward enough for his Contempt of a Deity. And told him, That there was a greater now at hand, unless he made haste and told the Consuls. This made a greater Impression upon him; yet still he delayed and protracted the time, till a grievous Disease, and a sudden feebleness seized upon him. Then the anger of the gods had sufficiently admonished him: wherefore, being tired with his past and present Calamities, he advised with his Neighbours, to whom, having related what he had seen and heard, and how Jupiter appeared to him so often in his sleep, together with the Menaces and the Misfortunes which he had afflicted him with; they all consented immediately that he should be carried in a Litter into the Forum, to the Consuls. By whose Order, being carried thence into the Senate-house, and having, to their great admiration, told the same Story there, behold another Miracle: for he, who being Lame of all his Limbs, was carried thither, (they say) having done his Duty, returned home a foot. Whereupon, the Senate Decreed, that the Games should be Celebrated with all the Magnificence imaginable.

Now, to those Games, there came, by the advice of Attius Tullus, a great number of the Volsci; and before they began, Tullus, according to a compact which he had made at home with Marcius, came to the Consuls, and told them, that he had something to say to them in private, which concerned the Commonwealth. The Company being removed; said he, I am unwilling to say any thing that is ill of my Country-men; nor do I come to accuse them of any thing which they have done, but to take care that they be not guilty of any Misdemeanour. I must confess, our People are much more sickle than I could wish they were. That we have found, by frequent blood-shed, who owe our safety, not to our own merit, but your patience. There are here now a great number of the Volsci; your Games are beginning, and the whole City will be intent upon the Show. I remember what the young Sabines did in this City upon the like occasion. I am in great fear, lest they should do any thing that were rash or unadvised; but this I thought good (Consuls) to tell you before-hand, upon my own, as well as your account. For my part, I am resolved immediately to go home, lest, staying here, I be infected with the Contagion of any mans deeds or words. Having so said, he went his way. The Consuls having related the matter to the Senate, which, though it were doubtful in it self, came from a certain Author, the Person (as it is usual) moved them more than the thing, to an unnecessary Caution: they therefore made an Order, that the Volsci should depart the City; and sent their Officers to bid them all be gone before night. Whereupon, the Volsci were at first possessed with great terror, and ran to their Lodgings to pack up their Goods; but, as they went away, they were very much incensed, that they should be forced to quit the City at that Festival time when the Games were Celebrated, and amidst a Concourse, as if it were, both of men and gods, like so many Villains.

As they were going, almost all in a Body, Tullus, who was got before them to the head of the Ferentine River, as each of them came up to him, applied himself to the chief of them, enquiring what the matter was, and seeming very angry; by which means, they listening diligently to what he said, which was enough (be sure) to move their spleen, he drew, not only them, but the rest of the Multitude into the Plain near the way: where, ranging them into the form of an Assembly, he made this Speech, said he, Though you have forget the former Injuries and Massacres which the Roman People have been guilty of, with all their other abuses offered to the Nation of the Volsci, yet how can you bear this days affront from them who have begun their pastimes so much to our dishonour? Are you not sensible that they have Triumphed over you this day? and that you, by coming away, are made the scorn of all their Citizens, all strangers and neighbouring People? What do you imagine they thought, who saw you come away? or they that met you coming in such an ignominious Troop, but that our Nation is guilty of some great crime, whereby, if we were present at the Shows, we should pollute their Games? and need an expiation; for which reason, we were forced away from the Society and Convention of all good men. What then? Can we be satisfied that we live, because we made haste to come away? But indeed this is not coming, but running away. And, can you think, this City is not your Enemies, where if you had stayed but one day, you must all have died for it. In short, by this they have proclaimed a War against you, but much to the disadvantage of those that did it, if you are men. With that, they being themselves before enraged, but farther incited by what he said, went to their several homes, where each of them instigating their Neighbours, they caused the whole Nation of Volsci to Revolt.

The Generals that were chosen for that War by universal consent, were Attius Tullus and C. Marcius, a Banished Roman, in whom they reposed more hope than ordinary. Nor did he any ways frustrate that hope, to make it easily appear, that the Roman State was strengthened more by their Contumacious than their Army. He therefore went to Circæi, from whence he first first drove out the Roman Colony, and delivered that City free into the hands of the Volsci; and thence, crossing over into the Road called Via Latina, took from the Romans Satricum, Longula, Rolusca and Corioli, their new Conquests. From thence he went and took Lavinium, Corbio, Vitellia, Trebia, Labici and Pedum; lastly, from Pedum he marched toward the City, and at the Ditches called Fossæ Cluiliæ, which are five thousand paces from it; having pitched his Camp, fell a pillaging the Roman Dominions. But he sent, amongst the Pillagers, a Party of Soldiers to save the Lands of the Patricii [or such as were of the Senatorian Order] from being Ravaged; either, because he hated the common People most, or thereby to create a Discord between the Senate and them. And so indeed it had certainly been, (the Tribunes did so much incense the People, who were themselves enraged, by accusing the Nobility) had not the fear of a foreign Enemy united them in the strictest bonds of Concord; yea, though they suspected and hated one another. But this one thing only they did not like, that the Senate and the Consuls placed all their hopes in Arms; for the People desired any thing rather than War. Sp. Nautius and Sext. Furius were now Consuls; who, whilst they were calling over the Legions, and distributing their men upon the Walls, and in other places where they thought fit to set Guards and Sentinels, they were startled with the Seditious Clamor of a great Multitude, who cried out for Peace, and then forced them to call a Senate, and to propose the sending of Embassadors to C. Marcins. The Senate accepted the Proposal, when they saw the People were discouraged, and sent several Agents to Marcins to Treat for Peace; but they brought back a sharp Answer, which was this, If the Volsci had their Land again, they might possibly hear of Peace; but if the Romans would enjoy the spoil of War, whilst they themselves lived at ease, he remembred what injuries his Countrymen had done him, as well as what kindness he had received from the Volsci, and therefore would endeavour to make it appear, that Banishment did but provoke, much less subdue his Spirit. Soon after, the same Persons were sent a second time, but were not admitted into the Camp: whereupon (they say that) the Priests also went in their Robes, as Petitioners, to the Enemies Camp, but prevailed no more than the Embassadors had done before them.

XL. Then the Matrons flocked in great numbers to Veturia, Coriolanus his Mother, and Volumnia his Wife; though I do not find, whether that were done by publick advice, or were the effect of female fear; but this is certain, they so far prevailed, that not only Veturia, who was an ancient Woman, but Volumnia also, carrying along with her two little Boys whom she had by Marcins, went into the Enemies Camp, and defended that City by their Prayers and Tears, as Women, which they could not protect with Arms, as Men. When they came to the Camp, and Coriolanus was told, that there was a great Troop of Women come from Rome, he, who had not been concerned either at publick Majesty, in the Embassadors, or at the sight or thoughts of any Religious thing, when the Priests came, was at first much more obstinate to the Womens tears; till one of his Familiars, who discovered Veturia standing between her Daughter-in-law and her Grand-children, with greater shew of sorrow than any of the rest, told him, if my eyes do not deceive me, yonder's your Mother, your Wife and your Children. At which, Coriolanus was so surprized, and almost distracted, that he leaped from his Seat, and going to embrace his Mother, who was then coming toward him, she changed her Prayers into Expostulations, and said, Before I admit of your embrace, let me know whether I am come to a Son, or to an Enemy: whether I am your Mother or your Captive in your Camp. Was my long life and my unhappy Age protracted only for this end, that I might see thee Banished, and after that, an Enemy? Couldst thou pillage this Country which brought thee forth and fed thee? Did not thy anger abate when thou camest into these Confiners; though thou wert never so revengeful and resolute before? Did it not come into thy mind, when thou wast in sight of Rome, to say with thy self, within those Walls is my Family and Household-gods? My Mother, my Wife and my Children? So then, if I had never born thee, had not Rome been Attacked? If I had never had a Son, might I have died free, and in a free Country? but now I can suffer nothing that is either more dishonourable to thee, or more afflicting to me; though, let me be as miserable as I can be, I shall not long be so; all that I beg of you, is, to take care of these poor Creatures, who, if you go on, must needs expect either an untimely death, or tedious Captivity. Then his Wife and Children embraced him, whilst the whole Crowd of Women, by their Tears and Lamentations, both for themselves and their Country, with much ado, at last prevailed upon him. With that, embracing his Children, he dismissed them, and streight removed his Camp back from the City. Having led the Legions out of the Roman Territories, (some say) he died by the malicious contrivance of those that hated him for what he had done; though, others say, he died by other means; and Fabius, who is the most ancient Author of them all, tells us, that he lived till he was very old; with this remark upon him, that he often used to say, when he grew Aged, 'Tis a miserable thing for an old man to be Banished. The men of Rome did not envy the Women their due commendations, so far they were from diminishing that glory, which others had won; but besides that, Built a Temple, which was Dedicated to Fortuna Muliebris [or the Fortune of Women,] to be a Monument of what they had done. After that, the Volsci and the Æqui together came again into the Roman Dominions; but the Æqui could no longer endure to have Attius Tullus for their General; wherefore, upon the Debate, whether the Volsci or the Æqui should find a General, for that Confederate Army, there happened, first, a Mutiny, and then a sharp Engagement: in which, the fortune of the Roman People destroyed two Armies of their Enemies, in a Conflict which was as fatal as it was resolute. T. Sicinius and C. Aquilius were then Consuls, to the former of which, fell the Province of the Volsci, and to the latter, that of the Hernici, who were then also in Arms; for the Hernici were that Year quite subdued, though the Volscians came off at first upon equal terms.

Then Sp. Cassius and Proculus Virginius were made Consuls, in whose time there was a League made with the Hernici, and two parts of their Possessions taken from them; of which, Consul Cassius resolved to give the one half to the Latins, and the other to the common People; to which Present, he added some part of that Land which, being publick, he found fault should be in the possession of private men. That put many of the Senators who were themselves in possession of such Lands, into a fear, upon their own account; but besides that, they were likewise solicitous, lest, by his Bounty, the Consul should make the People so rich as to endanger the publick Liberty. That therefore was the first time the Lex Agraria was promulgated; concerning which, there never was afterwards any Debate, from that time to this, without great Tumults. In the mean time, the other Consul resisted the largesse, by the consent of the Senate, and not against the mind of all the People, who, at first, began to take it ill that the present should be made common to their Allies as well as themselves; and then they often heard the Consul Virginius also at publick Assemblies, as if he had prophesied, say, His Colleagues bounty would be of very ill consequence; that those Lands would bring them into Slavery who received them: for by that means, he made way for Kingly Government; to what other end were their Associates and all the Latins taken in? What was the reason that the third part of the Land which was taken should be given to the Hernici who were so lately their Enemies? unless it were, that those People might take Cassius for their General instead of Coriolanus. He therefore dissuaded the People against the Lex Agraria [i.e. the Law for Division of Lands.] From that time, both the Consuls strove who should most indulge the People. Virginius said, he would agree that the Lands should be assigned, so they were assigned to none but Romans; and Cassius, because he had been extravagant in distribution of the Lands to their Allies, whereby, he became the cheaper to the Citizens, endeavouring to reconcile them to him, another way, proposed, That the Money which had been received for the Corn sent out of Sicily, should be repayed to the People. But that the People refused, as if it had been an earnest to make him King; for they had a natural suspicion, that every great man was ambitious of Reigning alone, and therefore, as if they had enough of every thing, they all refused his offers; who, as soon as he went out of his Office was Condemned and put to Death. Some say, that his Father was the cause of his Punishment, and that he, having examined the cause in his own House, first beat him, and then killed him; nor only so, but Consecrated his Sons Estate to Ceres, of which he set up a Monument, with this Inscription, Ex Cassiâ Familiâ Datum [i.e. Given By The Family Of The Cassii] I find, in some Authors, and that more credible, that he was tried for Treason by the Quæstors, Cæso Fabius and L. Valerius; and being Condemned by the Judgment of the People, that his House was publickly Demolished, which stood in the Court which now is before the Temple of Tellus. But whether it were a private or a publick Judgment, Condemned he was, when Ser. Cornelius and Q. Fabius were Consuls.

The fury of the People did not continue long against Cassius: the very sweetness of the Agrarian Law did naturally insinuate it self into their minds, now that the Author of it was taken off. And their desire was the more inflamed by the severity of the Senate, who, when they had Conquered the Volsci and the Æqui, that Year, defrauded the Soldiers of the Plunder: for whatsoever was taken from the Enemies, the Consul Fabius sold, and put into the publick stock. Wherefore the Fabian Name was hateful to the People, for the last Consuls sake; yet the Senate so far prevailed, that they made Cæso Fabius Consul at the same time with L. Æmilius. By which, the People were so provoked, that through a Domestick Sedition, they raised a foreign War; whereupon, their Intestine Discords were intermitted, whilst the Senate and the People, with one consent, overcame the Rebellious Volsci and the Æqui under the Conduct of Æmilius. But in that War more of the Enemies were slain in their Flight than in the Battel; so eagerly did the Horse pursue them. The Temple of Castor was Dedicated that Year upon the Ides of July, which was resolved upon in the Latin War, when Postumius was Dictator, whose Son Dedicated it, as being Created Duumvir for that purpose. The Peoples minds were tempted that Year also, with the sweetness of the Agrarian Law, and the Tribunes of the People signalized their popular Authority, with a popular Law. The Senate thinking the People were inclined sufficiently, of themselves, to Sedition, abhorred all largesses and encouragements that might invite them to go on in their rash Actions; to which end, the Consuls were a great assistance to the Senate, in resisting the torrent of the People; by which means, that part of the Commonwealth got the upper-hand; and that, not only at present, but the next Year also they made M. Fabius, Cæso's Brother, and another Consul, (more hateful to the People than he, as being accused by Sp. Cassius) whose Name was L. Valerius. That Year also, they had a Contest with the Tribunes; the Law was vilified, and the Authors of it, as much, who made a Present to the People to so little purpose; thereby the the Fabian Name grew great, after three continued Consulships, which had been all spent in perpetual Contests with Tribunes: wherefore that honour remained for some time, as being well placed in that Family. Then they entered upon the War against the Veians, and the Volscians also Rebelled; but the Romans, though they had almost strength enough to make foreign Wars, abused it, by contending among themselves. In the mean time, to encrease their solicitude, there appeared Coelestial Prodigies, which threatened both the City and Country almost every day; and the Southsayers, concerned to see the gods so angry, declared there was no other cause of it (though they were consulted both publicly and privately, sometimes by Intrails, and otherwhiles by Birds) than that the Religious Rites were not duly performed: but notwithstanding, their fears grew to that height, that Oppia, a Vestal Virgin, was Condemned, and suffered for her Unchastity.

XLIII. Then Q. Fabius and C. Julius were made Consuls; in whose Year, the Discord continued as fierce at home, and the War was more fatal abroad. For the Aequi took up Arms, and the Veians also came in and Pillaged the Roman Dominions: which War, encreasing their solicitude, C. Fabius and Sp. Furius, were made Consuls. The Aequi Attacked Ortona, a City of the Latins; and the Veians, being now loaded with spoils, threatened to take even Rome it self. Which terrors, though they ought to have restrained them, the more encreased the Peoples Animosity; and they, though not on their own accord, refused to go to War, as they had formerly done; for Sp. Licinius, the Tribune of the People, supposing that to be the time when the Senate must, of meer necessity, submit to the Agrarian Law, had undertaken to stop their Preparations for War. But all the envy of the Tribunes Power was thrown upon the Author of that advice; nor did the Consuls Animadvert more severely upon him, than did his own Collegues; by whose assistance, the Consuls made a Levy. By that means, there was an Army raised for two Wars at the same time; to be Commanded by Fabius against the Veians, and by Furius against the Aequi; in whose Country there was nothing done worth taking notice of. But Fabius had somewhat more to do with his own Countrymen, than with the Enemies; for he himself, being Consul, in his own single Person, supported the Commonwealth, which the Army, through their hatred to him, as much as in them lay, endeavoured to betray him. For, when the Consul, besides his other Military Acts, of which he had shewn very frequent Examples, both in preparing for, and managing the War, had so drawn up his Army, that, by sending out the Horse only, he Routed the whole Forces of the Enemies; the Foot would not Pursue them as they fled; nor would they be prevailed upon, (not to say, by their Captains persuasions, whom they hated, but) even to avoid the present publick Dishonour, or the danger which might ensue, if the Enemy should take Courage and Rally, to mend their pace. No, not so much as to pursue the Enemy in a full Body; but, without Command, they Marched back very melancholy, (you would have thought they had been Conquered) into their Camp, cursing one while their General, and another while the Horse, for the Service they had done. Nor did their General endeavour to find out any Remedy for such a pestilent Example: such excellent Persons as he was, stand in more need of Policy to Rule their Citizens, than Skill to Conquer their Enemies. The Consul therefore returned to Rome; without having advanced his Glory upon the account of the War, so much as he had provoked and exasperated the hatred of the Soldiers against him. Yet notwithstanding, the Senate so far prevailed, that the Consulship remained in the Fabian Family; for M. Fabius was chosen Consul, and his Colleague was Cn. U. C. 271. Manlius.

XLIV. And this Year also, there was a Tribune who stood up very much for the Agrarian Law. His Name was Tib. Pontificius; who, as though Sp. Licinius had had good success, trod in the same steps, and, for some small time, obstructed the Levy. Whereupon, the Senate being again disturbed, Ap. Claudius told them, That the Tribunes Power, which was overcome the Year before, was then also, by good fortune, subdued; and by example, was for ever like so to be: for they found, that it fell even by its own weight. For there would never be wanting (some one or other, who would be ambitious to baffle his Colleague, and oblige the Nobility to promote the publick good. That several of the Tribunes, if several were necessary, would be ready to assist the Consuls, though only one were sufficient, in opposition even to all the rest; only, he would have the Consuls, and all the chief Senators to do their utmost endeavour, to oblige and reconcile, if not all, at least, some part of the Tribunes, to the Commonwealth and themselves. The Senate being thus advised by Appius, spoke very courteously to the Tribunes; and all the Consular Party, according to the private relation they had to each of them, obtained so far, partly by Kindness, and partly by Authority, to make the Tribunes Power conduce to the publick welfare; and, by that means, the Consuls, by the help of four Tribunes, in opposition to one, who was an obstructor of Publick good, made their Levy. When they had so done, they Marched to the Veian War, to which, there came Auxiliaries from all parts of Etruria, not so much out of Love to the Veians, as that they were in hopes the Roman State would be Dissolved by Intestine Discords. For the chief men in all Councils, through all the Nations of Etruria, were mightily concerned, That the Power of Rome was like to be everlasting, unless they fell out among themselves; for that was the only Poison, that the only Bane to Opulent Cities, which made great Empires mortal. That the Romans had long endured that mischief, partly by the mis-dom of the Senate, and partly by the patience of the People; but that they were now reduced to an extremity; for they were become two Cities out of one; of which, each Party had their peculiar Magistrates, and peculiar Laws. That they used first of all to quarrel at their Levies of Soldiers, and yet obeyed their Generals in the War; for, in whatsoever state the City was, while the Military Discipline continued, they might be restrained: but now, their ill custom of not obeying their Magistrates, had followed the Roman Soldiers even into their Camp: and that in the very last War, when the Army was in Battalia, at the very time of the Fight, the Victory was, even by their own consent, delivered up to the Conquered Aequi: their Ensigns were Deserted, their General left in the Field, and they returned to the Camp without his Order. And now, they might be sure, if they would make good use of that opportunity, Rome might be Conquered, even with its own Soldiers: they had nothing more to do, than to declare and make a shew of War; for the fates and the gods would do the rest for them. These hopes armed the Etrurians, who had been Conquered and Conquerors at several times, in many Battels.

The Roman Consuls, on the other hand, were afraid of nothing else, save their own XLV. Strength and their own Arms; for they were deterred by the memory of that ill Example in the late War, from joyning Battel upon such circumstances, where two Armies were to be feared at the same time. Wherefore, they kept themselves within their Camp, not willing to run such an hazard, and considering, That time, perchance, might soften their furious temper, and heal their minds. In the mean time, the Veians and the Etrurians made so much the more speed, provoking them to fight, first, by riding up to their Camp, and Challenging them forth; and last of all, since that would do no good, Inveighing one while against the Consuls, and another while against the Army; and telling them, That their pretence of Intestine Discord, was but a cloak which they had found out for their fear; and that the Consuls did not so much distrust the good Will of their Soldiers, as they did their Courage: that it was a new kind of Sedition, which could be carried on with silence and sitting still, amongst a Camp of Armed Men: besides which, they upbraided them, by saying what they could, either true or false, concerning the Novelty of their Nation, and its Original. As they made this noise, just under the Rampire and the Gates of the Camp, the Consuls indeed were well enough able to bear it, but the rude Multitude, whose Breasts were filled, sometimes with indignation, and anon with shame, were now also grown averse to their Intestine feuds. They were unwilling their Enemies should go unrevenge, yet at the same time they wished no good success either to the Senate or the Consuls, but their minds were divided between Domestic and Foreign Animosity; till at last the Foreign heats prevailed, for that the Enemy did so proudly and insolently Inveigh against them; wherefore, thronging to the Generals Tent, they desired they might begin the Fight, and beg of him to give the Signal. The Consuls, as if they would deliberate of it, laid their heads together, and had a great deal of Discourse with one another. They had a mind to fight, but yet thought fit to conceal and stifle their inclinations for some time, that by their seeming averlion and delays, the Soldiers, who were already incited, might grow the more eager. For that reason, they made this answer, That what the Soldiers desired was unseasonable; nor was it yet convenient to fight: that they would continue in their Camp; besides which, they made an Order, That no man should stir; and if any one did, they would look upon him as an Enemy. Being thus dismissed, they believed the Consuls had no intentions to fight, but were themselves thereby the more enflamed to be at it. And then the Enemies also came with much more insolence than before, as soon as they understood that the Consuls would not fight; for they supposed they might insult with all the freedom imaginable; that the Soldiers were not trusted with their own Arms; that the business would break out into the extremity of Sedition, and that they should see an end of the Roman Government. In confidence whereof, they ran to the Gates of the Camp, through which, they threw in their taunts and reproaches upon the Romans, and could hardly forbear to Attack it. In the mean time, the Romans, who could no longer endure the Contumely, ran from all parts of the Camp to the Consuls, whom they applied themselves to, not sneakingly, as before, by their Captains, but with loud Clamours, and in a full Body. The matter was now ripe for Action, yet they still made delays; whilst Fabius, seeing the Tumult increase, and having his Collegues consent, who was afraid of a Mutiny, commanded silence, and said, I know, Cn. Manlius! these men can get the Victory, but they themselves have kept me from knowing whether they will or no: wherefore I am resolved, not to give the signal, unless they swear they will return Conquerors from the Battel. The Army have deceived a Roman Consul once already, when they were in the Field, but they will never disappoint the gods. There was one M. Flavoleius, a Centurion [or Captain] who among the rest of the superior Officers was very importunate, and told him, M. Fabius! I will come a Conqueror from this Fight; desiring, if he did not, that Jupiter, Mars, and all the other gods, might show the effects of their wrath upon him. After whom, the whole Army took the same Oath; which when they had done, the signal being given, they armed themselves, and marched into the Field, full both of indignation and hopes, bidding the Etrurians now revile them, or let them see the man that durst say such a word as they had lately done. Indeed the Courage of them all in general, both Senate and People, was very conspicuous that day. But the Fabian Name, and the Fabian Family, was most remarkable: who proposed in that Fight to reconcile the People, who were by many Civil Broils so much exasperated: and thereupon they set the Army in Array.

XLVI. Nor did the Veians and the Etrurians refuse the offer; for they were pretty confident, that the Romans would not fight with them, any more than they had done with the Aequi: yea, that they ought not to despair (now that the Enemy was so incensed, and in such doubtful circumstances) of accomplishing some greater end. But it fell out quite contrary; for the Romans never came into the Field with greater Resolution, than at that time; so far had the reproaches of their Foes, and the delay of the Consuls exasperated their Spirits. The Etrurians had hardly time enough to Marshal their men, before the Romans, upon the first effort, threw down their Javelins in haste, rather than Darted them at the Enemy, and the Fight came to handy-strokes with their Swords, wherein Mars is most destructive. Among the Nobility, the Fabian Family made an eminent show, and gave a very good example for the rest to follow: one of whom, called Quint. Fabius (who had been Consul three years before) being in the Front of the Army, Attacked the Body of the Veians; but being unwary and amidst a crowd of his Enemies, was run through the Breast by a Tuscan, who was no less vigorous than skilful: so that when the Weapon was drawn out of his Body, he sunk down and died of that Wound. Both the Armies were sensible of the fall of that great man, and that caused the Roman Army to retire: 'till M. Fabius, the Consul, leapt over the Corps as it lay along, and holding his Shield against them, cried out, Was this what you swore, fellow-soldiers? That you would return with flight to your Camp? Are you more afraid of such contemptible Foes, than you are of Jupiter and Mars, by whom you swear? I am resolved, though I took no Oath, either to return a Conqueror, or fighting to fall by you, dear Q. Fabius. With that Cæso Fabius, who had been Consul the year before, replied, Do you think, Brother, to prevail upon them to fight by using such words as those? The gods, by whom they have sworn, will make them do it: but let us inflame their minds, as it becomes men of Honour, as befits the Fabian Name, rather by fighting our selves, than by exhorting them thereunto. Which he had no sooner said, but the two Fabii fell furiously upon the Enemies Van, and with them drew on the whole Army.

XLVII. By this means, the Battel being renewed on one side, the Consul, Cn. Manlius, was as industrious in the other Wing to encourage his men: who were almost in the same condition. For as in the other Wing the Soldiers cheerfully followed Q. Fabius, so they did in this the Consul Cn. Manlius, who was now as it were in pursuit of the routed Enemy. But when being grievously wounded he retired out of the Fight, they supposing him to be slain, gave way, and had quitted the Field, if the other Consul (coming briskly up to them with some Troops of Horse, and crying out, His Collegue was yet alive, and that he had routed the other Wing,) had not kept up their drooping spirits. Manlius also to reinforce the Battel appeared before them: and then the Soldiers, seeing both the Consuls present, were mightily encouraged; whilst at the same time the Enemy was very indiscreet, in that, relying upon their Multitudes, they drew off their Reserves and sent them to Attack the Roman Camp. Into which having made an irruption without much ado, they spent more time in looking after the Plunder, than in opposing the Enemy; so that the Roman Triarii [old, and stout Soldiers that were placed in the Rere] who could not withstand their first Shock, sending Messengers to the Consuls with advice how the case stood, returned in a full Body to the Prætorium [or Generals Tent] and on their own accord themselves renewed the Fight: besides that Consul Manlius also returning to the Camp, set a Guard upon each Gate thereof to block the Enemy up. Which desperate circumstance enflamed the Tuscans more with rage, than audacity: for having ran to all places, where-ever they had hopes of getting out, but still to no purpose; a Party of young men among them made up to the Consul himself, who was at that time remarkable for his Armour, which he wore: and though their first Darts were received by those that stood about him, yet afterward their force became insupportable; the Consul had a mortal Wound, of which he presently died, and all the men about him were defeated. Whereupon the Tuscans grew much bolder, whilst the Romans were in a consternation over all the Camp; nor had they ever recovered themselves, had not some of the Officers, who took away the Consul's Body, opened a Gate and made way for the Foe; who thereby breaking out, and going in confusion away, fell into the hands of the other Consul, who was Victorious, and were a second time by him not only many of them killed, but the rest put to flight. By this means the Romans got a glorious Victory, though it was obscured and clouded with the death of two such great men. For which reason, the Consul, when the Senate ordered him to Triumph; and said, That if an Army could Triumph without their General, they would readily suffer it for the extraordinary service done in that Battel, made answer, That he (seeing his Family was all in tears for the death of Q. Fabius his Brother, and the Commonwealth partly destitute, as having lost one of her Consuls) now that he was forced to Mourn both upon a publick and a private account too, would not accept of the Laurels. Which refusal of his was more honourable than any Triumph that ever was made; so much is glory sometimes advanced by being seasonably contemned. Then he led the two Funeral Poms of his Brother and the Consul, one after another; and made both the Funeral Orations, in which, by giving them their due commendations, he gained a very great share of Elogy himself; remembering well, what he had resolved on in the beginning of his Consulship, which was, to reconcile the People; and distributing the maimed Soldiers among the Senators for their Cure. The Fabii had a great many allotted to them; nor had any more care taken of them: from whence the Fabii grew popular, but that by no other Arts than what were consistent with publick good.

Then Cæso Fabius being made Consul with T. Virginus, as well by the consent of the People as of the Senate, concerned himself neither in Wars nor Levies of Men, or any other Affair, before he had done his endeavour (now that there was some hopes of an accommodation) as soon as possible to unite the People with the Senate. For which reason, in the beginning of his Year, before there was any Tribune to stand up for the Agrarian Law, he thought fit that the Senate should make their present, and give the People the Land taken from their Enemies, in equal portions; for it was reason and justice that they should enjoy it, by whose blood and sweat it was purchased. The Senate slighted the proposal; and some of them complained, That through too much glory that once vivid Soul of Cæso was grown luxuriant and effeminate: but after that time there were no more factions in the City. In the mean while the Latins were teased with the Incursions of the Aequi; against whom Cæso was sent with an Army and plundered all their Country; whilst they themselves fled into their Towns, and were secured within the Walls; nor was there any memorable Battel then fought. But the Veians slew a great many Romans through the inadvertency of the other Consul; and the whole Army had perished, if Cæso Fabius had not come in time to relieve them. From that time they had neither Peace nor War with the Veians; but were to one another like so many Robbers. The Veians one while gave ground before the Roman Legions, and removed into their City; but then again, when they saw the Legions drawn off, made incursions into the Roman Territories; by which means, War and Quietness did interchangeably succeed each other: nor could the dispute be either omitted or made an end of. Besides, other Wars either at the present lay upon them (as from the Aequi and the Volsci, who were never quiet any longer than they smarted for some late Conflict) or it was manifest, that the Sabines, who were always their Enemies, would shortly rise against them, together with the whole Country of Etruria. But the Veians, who were their more constant, than vexatious Foes, disturbed them more by contumely than any danger, which they apprehended; because they could not be either at any time neglected, nor would they give them leave to turn their Arms upon any other People. Whereupon the Fabian Family went to the Senate; before whom the Consul spake in behalf of the rest: The War, said he, (grave Fathers!) against the Veians, lacks a constant rather than a great supply, as you your selves can tell. Do you therefore take care of other Wars, and commit this against them to the Conduct of the Fabii: we'll promise you, the Roman honour shall be secure, being resolved to carry on that War at the peculiar cost and expence of our own Family. Nor shall the Commonwealth be concerned either in raising or paying the Soldiers. The Senate gave them hearty thanks; and the Consul going out of the Court with a company of Fabii following him (who stood at the door to hear what the Senate determined) returned home: and then the Soldiers, being first ordered to come the next day to the Consuls House, went to their several Houses.

This news ran through the whole City, who extolled the Fabii up to the skies; That one Family should undertake the burden of the whole City; that the Veian War was become a private concern, and managed by private Arms; that if there were two more Families in the City of the same strength, let the Volsci and the Aequi demand what they would, all the neighbouring Nations might be subdued, whilst the Roman People were at ease. The next day the Fabii armed themselves and met where they were ordered. The Consul coming forth into his Portal in a Military habit, saw all his Family in Battalia: and being received into the midst of them, commanded the Ensigns to move: nor did there ever any Army either less in number, or more renowned and admired, march through the City. For they were three hundred and six of them, all Patricians, and of the same Family, each one of which was fit to make a General upon any occasion, even in the opinion of the grave Senate; and these men went with the united forces of their Family, protesting, they would be a plague to the Veians; but after them there followed a great number, which was made up partly of their friends and acquaintance, (who proposed to themselves no ordinary matters; no hopes, nor cares, but the most glorious things imaginable) and partly of such as were concerned for the publick good, standing amazed to see them, and bidding them go on with courage; go on with success; and make the issue of it equal to their enterprize; then they might hope for Consulships and Triumphs with all other rewards and honours that were in their disposal. As they passed by the Capitol, the Castle, and other Temples, they made their supplications to all the gods, that they either saw or thought of; to prosper that Army with good success, and bring them back to their Parents as well as to their Country, with speed and safety. But they prayed to no purpose; for going out at that unlucky Gate, called Porta Carmentalis, near the Temple of Janus (which stands on the right hand of it) they came to the River Cremera, where they thought fit to make a Garrison. At that time L. Æmilius and C. Servilius were made Consuls. And as long as the Plunder lasted, the Fabii were not only strong enough to defend their Garrison, but also secured the whole Country that borders upon Etruria, with ease to themselves, but annoyance to the Enemy, having free ingress into both Confines. After that there was some respite between their Ravages; in which time, the Veians, with an Army that they got out of Etruria, attacked the Garrison of Cremera; and the Roman Legions led by the Consul L. Aemilius fought hand to hand with the Etrurians in a pitched Battel: though the Veians had scarce time enough to marshal their men; by reason that, upon the first motion, whilst the Army advanced after the Ensigns, and were setting their Body of Reserves, a wing of Roman Horse came suddenly upon them, and deprived them not only of conveniency to begin the Fight, but even of ranging their Forces. Whereupon, being routed and driven back as far as the Saxa Rubra [or, red Rocks] where their Camp was, they humbly petitioned for Peace; but repented of it, through their innate levity, before the Garrison of the Romans marched from Cremera.

L. The Veians had another Conflict with the Fabii, without any greater preparations than before: nor did they only make Incurfions into the Country, with sudden Inroads, but several times fought in the Plains, and at a small distance from each other: in which Battels, one Family of Romans won many Victories from the richest City in Etruria, as things then stood. That seemed at first very severe and dishonourable in the opinion of the Veians; and thence arose their design of laying an Ambuscade for their proud Foes: besides that, they were very glad to see the Fabii grow so audacious and insolent by their success. For which reason also they drove Sheep into their way sometimes, as if it had been by chance, when they were plundering the Country; nor only so, but the Country People ran away and let the Land lie waste, whilst the supplies that were sent to hinder such Devastations, fled back again more out of a pretended than any real fear. By this time, the Fabii so far contemned the Enemy, that they thought themselves not only invincible, but irresistible at any time or in any place. Which hopes of theirs was such an encouragement to them, that when they saw a flock of Sheep at a great distance from Cremera, they ran towards them (though the Enemy appeared here and there in many places) and having, through inadvertency, passed the place where the Ambuscade was planted, they straggled from each other to catch the Sheep, that being frightened (as in such a case they use to be) were dispersed over all the Fields; till on the sudden, the Enemy rose up and opposed them on every side. Whereupon the noise set up quite round the Plains, at first surprized them, and then the Darts, which flew upon them from all parts; and the Etrurians gathering into a Body, they were so hedged in with, that as the Enemy came on, they were forced to draw themselves into a narrower compass: which made them appear very few, and the Etrurians, very many, now that their Ranks were reduced to their close Order. Then quitting their design of engaging the whole Army, they made toward one place only, and forced their way by putting themselves into a posture called Cuneus [i. e. the form of a Wedg.] The way that they took led gradually up an Hill; where they at first stooped; but soon after, having taken breath there, and recovered themselves from the fright they were put into, they drove back the pursuers. By which means, though they were few, they might, with the advantage of the place, have gotten the Victory, had not the Veians gone round the Hill and come up to the very top: for by that contrivance the Enemy became a second time too hard for them. Whereupon the Fabii were every man of them slain, and their Garrison taken. It is certain, that three hundred and six of them then died; nor was there any more of the Fabian Family left, save one young Lad, to be a strong support to the Roman People (who were or might be in dubious circumstances) upon many future occasions as well at home as in the Wars.

II. When this slaughter happened among the Fabii, C. Horatius and T. Menenius were Consuls. Of which two, Menenius was presently sent against the Tuscan, who were now proud of their Victory: but he also had bad success, and the Enemies possessed themselves of Janiculum: nor had the City escaped a Siege (for the Etrurians having passed the Tiber had made all provisions scarce, as well as brought a War upon them) if the Consul Horatius had not been recalled out of the Country of the Volsi. Yea, so near did that War approach their very Walls, that they fought first upon equal terms near the Temple of Hope, and a second time by the Gate called Porta Collina. Where though the Romans had but little the better of it, yet that Contest made the Soldiers more fit for future Action, because they thereby recovered their former Courage. Then A. Virginus and Sp. Servilius were created Consuls: and the Veians after their late Defeat came no more to a pitched Battel, though they ravaged the Country, and made havock of the Roman Territories even from Janiculum it self; nor were either the Cattel or the Country People secure from their violence. But they were taken by the same Stratagem, whereby they had taken the Fabii; for following the flocks of Sheep, which were driven forth on purpose to invite them that way, they ran headlong into a great Ambuscade, who made a greater slaughter of them. Yea, that was such a provocation to them, as caused a farther destruction among them; for passing the Tiber in the night time, they attacked the Camp of Consul Servilius, from whence being repelled with great loss of men, they with much ado retired into Janiculum. With that the Consul also immediately passed the Tiber, and pitching his Camp under Janiculum, the next day, early in the morning, being flushed with the success of the day before, but more because he wanted Provisions (which made him too precipitate in his Designs) he hastily led his Men up Janiculum to the Enemies Camp; from whence being beaten with more dishonour, than he the day before had routed the Enemy, himself and his men were preserved by the interposition position of his Collegue; whilst the Etrurians were all slain between the two Armies, as they were running away from both of them. Thus was the Veian War made an end of by a successful piece of rashness.

Now therefore when the City was at peace, the provisions grew again more plentiful, not only upon the account of Corn that was brought out of Campania, but inasmuch as every one, being now no longer in fear of a Famine, produced the stock that they had formerly concealed. Whereupon they enjoyed such store and ease, that they began again to grow wanton, and for lack of mischief at home, to seek it abroad. The Tribunes began to infect the People with their poison, which was, the Agrarian Law, inciting them against the Senate who opposed it; and not only against them all in general, but against single Persons too. Q. Considius and Genucius were the promoters of the Agrarian Law and gave T. Menenius warning to appear and make his defence on such a day; whose crime was, that he had lost the Garrison of Cremera, though his Post, when Consul, was not far from thence. Him therefore they ruined, though the Senate stood up in his behalf as much as they had done for Coriolanus; yea, though his Father Agrippa's name was not yet forgotten. But the Tribunes were pretty moderate in the mulct they laid upon him; for when he was convicted, they imposed no greater fine upon him than 34 pounds. Yet even that proved his death; for they say, he could not bear the disgrace and dissatisfaction of it, but died with grief. After whose death there was another accused, and that was Sp. Servilius (as soon as he quitted the Consulship) when C. Nautius and P. Valerius were Consuls; being summoned to his Tryal in the beginning of their Year by C. Caticus and T. Statius, who were then Tribunes: but he did not (like Menenius) oppose the Tribunes fury, either with intreaties of his own or the Senate, but with great confidence in his own innocence and integrity: whose crime was the Battel he fought with the Tuscan at Janiculum. But he being a man of a stout spirit, behaved himself at that time, in his own case, as he had done formerly in publick danger; and battling not only the Tribunes, but the People also by an Oration that he made, wherein he upbraided them with the Condemnation and Death of Menenius, (whose Father was formerly the restorer of the People, who by his means obtained those very Laws and Magistrates, which made them then so insolent) by his courage escaped the danger. Virginus also his Collegue, being brought as a Witness against him, did him some service by speaking in his commendation; but the Judgment against Menenius was most to his advantage; so much were the minds of the People changed.

By this time their Domestic feuds were over; but there arose another Veian War, in which the Sabines also joyned their Forces. Whereupon P. Valerius, being then Consul, and having mustered up the Auxiliaries of the Latins and the Hernici, was sent with an Army against the Veii, and straightway attacked the Sabine Camp, which lay before the Walls of their Allies: by which he put them into such a fright, that whilst they ran confusedly in several small Companies to repel the Enemy, he took that Gate where he first made the Assault. After which there happened, within the Bulwark, rather a Massacre than a Battel. From whence the noise got even into the City, as if Veii had been taken; and the Veians who took up their Arms in great consternation of mind, went, part of them to relieve the Sabines, whilst the rest with all their might attacked the Romans, as they were endeavouring to possess themselves of the Camp. By which means the Romans were for some small time diverted and disturbed from their attempt; but soon after facing about to both Enemies they made resistance, and the Horse being sent in by the Consul utterly routed the Tuscan; so that in the same hour two Armies, consisting of two most powerful and very great Nations, were overcome. In the mean time, while these things passed at Veii, the Volsi and the Aequi had pitched their Camp in the Latin Territories, where they ravaged all the Country: whom though the Latins of themselves, with the sole assistance of the Hernici, and without any Commander, or aid from the Romans, had forced to Decamp, and had got a vast Booty, besides their own Goods again, yet C. Nautius the Consul was sent from Rome to fight against the Volsi. They were not pleased, I suppose, that their Allies should wage War upon their own strength and their own head, without a Roman General or Roman Auxiliaries: wherefore they omitted no kind either of calamity or contumely against the Volsi; but all would not provoke them to fight a set Battel.

Then L. Furius and C. Manlius were Consuls: the latter whereof had the Veians for his Province: but he did not fight them, because, upon their Petition, they had a Truce granted for forty years, with an order for Corn and Money. But their Peace abroad was straight attended with discord at home; for the people were mad through the instigation of the Tribunes, who stood up for the Agrarian Law. In opposition whereunto, the Consuls not at all dismayed either at the condemnation of Menenius, or the danger which Servilius was in, made great resistance; for which Genucius the Tribune accused them when they went out of their office. After them, L. Aemilius and Opiter Virginus were Consuls; though I find in some Annals, Popilius Julius named as Consul, instead of Virginus. But this year (whoever were the Consuls) Furius and Manlius went about to the people in sordid habits like guilty persons (though not to the People more than to the younger part of the Senators) persuading and advising them, To abstain from Honours and the administration or management of publick affairs; nor to think the Falces, the Pretexta, and the Sella Curialis any other than the pomp of a Funeral: that men who were clothed with the badges of Authority were like Beasts crowned for Sacrifice: but if the Consulship were so inviting a Dignity, let them consider that at that very time it was enslaved and oppressed by the power of the Tribunes; to whose command a Consul must pay as much obedience as if he were their Servant: and if he stirred, gave any respect to the Senate, or believed there was any thing but the People in the whole Commonwealth, he must propose to himself the banishment of C. Marcius, or the Condemnation and Death of Menenius. The Senate being incensed with this Discourse of his, consulted, not publicly, but in private, where few could know their Designs: and having resolved whether the Parties accused should be rescued by fair or violent means, they agreed upon the most severe methods; nor did they lack such as would join with them in their bold attempt. Wherefore upon the day appointed for Judgment, when the People stood in the Forum in full expectation of it, they wondered at first why the Tribune did not come into the Assembly; and after that, growing more jealous by his delay, believed he was deterred by the Nobility, and complained that the publick Interest was deserted and betrayed: till at last, those that attended at the Tribunes House Door, brought word that he was found dead at home. Which when the whole Assembly had notice of, they were dispersed several ways, like an Army when their General's slain. But the Tribunes were most affrighted, as being admonished by the death of their Collegue, that the sacred Laws had now no force at all. Nor did the Senate behave themselves with due moderation in their joy, but were all of them so far from repenting of what was done, that they would fain have been thought altogether guiltless, and publickly declared, That the power of the Tribunes ought to be retrenched by any ill means.

LV.

Upon this Victory, which was of very bad example, the Tribunes being in a fright, the Consuls ordered a Levy, and made it without any intercession at all. At which the People grew very angry, though more upon the account of the Tribunes silence, than the Consuls Commands; saying, Their Liberty was quite lost, that they were now in their former condition, and that the Tribunes power was now dead and buried at the same time with Genucius: that they must contrive some other way to oppose the Senate; and that could not be done by any likelier method than for the People, since they had no other help left to defend themselves: that the Consuls had four and twenty Lictors [or Serjeants] and those all Commoners: that nothing could be more contemptible or weak, if any one would condemn them; and that each man made such things great and terrible by his own apprehension of them. When they had instigated each other on this wise, there was a Lictor sent from the Consuls to one Volero Publilius a Commoner, for that having been a Captain, he said, he ought not to be made a private Sentinel. Volero therefore appearing to the Tribunes; but having no body to take his part, the Consuls ordered him to be stripped, and the Rods made ready. To whom Volero cried out, I appeal to the People: seeing the Tribunes had rather see a Roman Citizen whipt before their faces, than be themselves murdered by you in their beds. But the louder he bawled, so much the more severe was the Lictor to him. Whereupon Volero, being himself very strong, and with the assistance of some friends that he called to aid him, having repelled the Lictor, whilst the enraged multitude that were concerned upon their own score made a great noise, got into the thickest of the crowd, still crying out, I appeal to, and implore the patronage of the People! aid me, my fellow-citizens! aid me, my fellow-soldiers! 'tis in vain to expect the Tribunes, who themselves lack your assistance. With which the People were so much incited, that they prepared as for a Battel; for they thought themselves in great danger, and that nothing, in which they had either a publick or private Interest, would from that time be secure from violence. The Consuls having exposed themselves to this mighty Tempest, were quickly persuaded, that Majesty and Authority can never be safe without strength: for their Lictors were abused, the Fasces [or Rods] broken, and they driven out of the Forum into the Senate-house, being uncertain how far Volero would pursue his Victory. But when the tumult was allayed, and they had ordered the Senate to be called, they complained of the injuries they had received, the violence of the Commons, and Volero's audacity. Upon which occasion having said many sharp things, at last the Seniors carried it, who did not think fit to oppose the Senats anger against the temerity of the Common People.

For this reason, the People had so great a love for Volero, that they chose him Tribune for the next Year, in which L. P. Marius and P. Furius were Consuls. But, contrary to all mens expectations, who believed he would permit the Tribunes to teaze the Consuls of the last Year, he preferred the publick good before his own private injury, and saying not one word against the Consuls, brought in a Bill before the People, for the choosing of Plebeian Magistrates in the Assembly, called, Comitia Tributa [i.e. an Assembly of the several Tribes of Rome.] Which though it was a matter of great moment, because it lookt very well at first view, was passed; whereby the Senate were deprived of all the power which formerly they had of making who they pleased Tribunes by the Votes of their Clients. Which action, though it were very grateful to the People, the Senate opposed with all their might; but the Consuls and the Nobility being not able to persuade any one of the Tribunes (which was their only way to make resistance) to interpose in the affair; yet notwithstanding, the case being very important in it self, was protracted with great debates for a whole Year together. Then the People chose Volero Tribune again: upon which, the Senate, supposing that they must fight for it, made made Ap. Claudius, the Son of Appius (whom for his Fathers sake the People so much hated) Consul; and T. Quintius was his Collegue. In the very beginning of whose Year they treated first of all concerning Volero's Law: of which as he was the Inventor, so also was Lactorius, his Collegue, not only a later but a more earnest asserter of it. For his great glory that he had got in the Wars made him undaunted and bold, for that there was scarce one man of that age who was more active than he. He therefore, whilst Volero talked of nothing but his Law, refraining from Invectives against both the Consuls, began to accuse Appius, who came of a proud Generation, that were extremely cruel to the Roman People; but striving to prove that the Senate had chosen, not a Consul, but an Executioner to vex and butcher the People, his tongue could not utter what he had in his heart; wherefore for want of more words, he told them, Romans! because I cannot tell any thing so easily, as I can perform what I say, come hither to morrow; and I will either die in your sight, or have the Law passed. The next day the Tribunes took possession of the Temple; whilst the Consuls and the Nobility assembled to obstruct the Law. Lactorius ordered all those to be put out who had no Voices; though the young Noble-men stood still, and would not stir though the Officer spoke to them: for which reason, Lactorius commanded some of them to be laid hold on. But the Consul Appius said, a Tribune had nothing to do with any one but a Commoner; for he was not a Magistrate in respect to the People in general, but only to the common People; nor could he lawfully command any one to depart, according to the ancient usage; because the form and method was, to say; Romans! if you think fit, depart hence. It was calie for him by talking of Law, with contempt, to put Lactorius into a great huff: and so he did; whereupon the Tribune, enflamed with anger, sent a Messenger to the Consul, and the Consul a Lictor to him, saying, that he was a private Person, without any Authority, without any Office: at which time, the Tribune had been very roughly dealt withal, had not the whole Assembly risen up in his defence against the Consul, and a concourse happened of the affrighted multitude, who ran into the Forum from all parts of the City. Yet Appius by his resolution endured the Storm: though they had certainly engaged in a bloody Battel, if the other Consul, Quintius, who had employed several Consular men to get his Collegue by force (if they could not by any other means) out of the Forum, had not mollified the tumultuous People with fair and gentle words; if he had not desired the Tribunes to dismiss the Assembly; to give them time to cool; and told him, that time would not diminish their strength, but would add policy to their strength; for the Senate would in time be at the disposal of the People, and the Consuls in the power of the Senate.

With much ado Quintius appeased the People, but the Senate had more trouble with the other Consul: till at last, when the assembly of the People was dismissed, the Consuls called a Senate; in which, now that fear and anger had mutually changed their minds, the longer time they had to deliberate, the farther they were from quarrelling; so that they gave Quintius thanks, for that by his means the discord was composed: desiring of Appius, that he would not wish the Consular Authority to be any greater than it might well be in a peaceful City: for whilst the Tribunes and the Consuls each of them would draw all things to themselves, there was no strength left between them; that the Commonwealth was distracted and torn apieces by its Magistrates, it being inquired more in whose hands it was, than whether it were secure. Appius, on the other hand, protested before God and man, that the Commonwealth was betrayed and deserted through fear: that the Consuls were not wanting to the Senate, but the Senate to the Consuls: and that they submitted to Laws more grievous, than those that were made in the Sacred Mount. But being overcome by the consent of the Senate he said no more; so that the Law was passed whilst he and his Party held their tongues.

LVII.

That was the first time that the Tribunes were Created in an Assembly called Comitia Tributa: and had three added to their number, being but two before, as Piso tells us; who also sets down their names, which were Cn. Sicinius, L. Numitorius, M. Duilius, Sp. Fufius, and L. Mecilius. In the time of this Sedition at Rome, a War broke out from the Volsci and the Aequi, who had ravaged all the Country; to the end, that if the People should separate themselves, they might come to them for refuge; and then having composed their affairs return back again. Whereupon Ap. Claudius was sent against the Volsci and Quintius against the Aequi. In which expedition, Appius was as fierce as ever he used to be at home; nay, so much the freer, because he was delivered from the controul of the Tribunes; and hated the People more than his Father ever did, because he saw himself out-done by them; and that the Law was passed, which other former Consuls had obstructed with less endeavour, though the Senate never had so great hopes of it from them as from him, who was the only man that stemmed the Tide of the Tribunes power. This rage and indignation that he was now possessed with, incited his furious mind to vex the Army with severe Commands; who had imbibed such an animosity, that it was utterly impossible to tame them. They did all things lazily, idly, negligently, and doggedly; nor did either shame or fear restrain them. For if he had a mind to have the Army march faster, they would go as slow as they could; if he stood by and encouraged them to take pains in any thing, they would all presently abate of their former industry; hang down their heads before him, and curse him to themselves as he walked by; insomuch that his soul, which had formerly always been an unconquered Enemy to the

the People, was sometimes moved. For having tried all ways of severity to no purpose, as being unable to do any good of the Soldiers, he said, The Centurions had corrupted the Army, calling the Tribunes, many times (as a jeer to them) Plebeians and Voleiros.

LIX.

The Volsi had intelligence of all they did; and were so much the eagerer to fight, because they hoped the Roman Army would have the same quarrel against Appius, as they had against Consul Fabius. But they were much more violent against Appius than they had been against Fabius: for they did not only refuse to Conquer, as the Fabian Army did, but chose to be Conquerors. For being led forth into the Field, they shamefully ran away toward their Camp, nor did they stand still, before they saw the Volsians within their Out-works and a dreadful slaughter of their Rere. Then they were forced to fight, in order to remove their victorious Foe from their Rampire: but it appeared plain enough, that the Roman Soldiers had a mind not only to have their Camp taken, but some of them rejoiced in the slaughter and ignominy of their Countrymen. At which notwithstanding Appius was so stout as not to be any way discouraged, but, more than that, having a mind to be somewhat sharp upon them, he called an Assembly: at which the Military Officers and Tribunes came about him, and advised him, not to make trial of such a kind of power, as consisted wholly in the consent of those that should obey it; that the Soldiers in general said, they would not go to the Assembly; and that they were heard very frequently to desire, that the Camp were removed out of the Volsian Territories: that their Victorious Enemy was very lately almost at their Gates and within their Bulwark; and that at this time they did not only suspect a great mischief to hang over them, but had a manifest prospect of it before their eyes. At last being overcome (seeing the Soldiers got nothing there but only the delay of their punishment) dismissing the Assembly and having given order for their March the day following, he gave the signal for it by break of day. As soon as the Army was drawn out of the Camp, the Volsi, who were excited by the same signal, fell upon the hindmost; from whom the tumult being propagated even to the Van, put the Ensigns and the Ranks into such a fear and disorder, that they could neither hear what was commanded, nor be put into any convenient posture: nor were any of them mindful of ought, except flight; wherefore they ran away over the dead Bodies and Arms that lay in their way in such confusion and so far, that the Enemy desisted from following them, before the Romans stood still. At length having mustered up the Soldiers which were left, after that disorderly escape, the Consul, who had followed and recalled them, but all in vain, pitched his Camp in a quiet Country, and having called an Assembly, inveighed very justly against the Army who betrayed all the rules of Military Discipline, and deserted their Colours, asking each of them, where the Ensigns were, and where their Armies were? because the Soldiers were disarmed and the Standard-bearers had lost the Colours. Besides which he likewise whipt and beheaded several Centurions and others that had left their stations: and the rest of the Multitude were every tenth man of them chosen out by lot for Punishment.

IX.

On the contrary, in the Country of the Aequi, the Consul and the Soldiers strove who should oblige each other most; for Quintius was not only of a milder disposition, but the unhappy severity of his Collegue made him the more pleased with himself. Whereupon the Aequi, seeing this Army and their General agreed so well together, durst not engage them, but suffered the Enemy to Ravage and Plunder all their Country: nor was there a greater booty taken thence in any former War: which was all given to the Soldiers; together with commendations, which please them well as rewards. The Army therefore came home, not only better satisfied with their General, but, for his sake, with the Senate too, and said, The Senate had given them a Father, but to the other Army a Master. But this Year, which was spent in the various fortune of War, and fatal discord both at home and abroad, was most remarkable for the Comitia Tributa: though that business was more valuable for the Victory that they got when they had once engaged in the quarrel, than for the use they made of it: for there was more of the Assemblies dignity taken off by removing the Senators out of it, than there was strength added to the People or diminished from the Senate.

The next was a more turbulent Year, in which L. Valerius and Tib. Amilius were Consuls, not only upon the account of the difference between the several Ranks of Romans concerning the Agrarian Law, but also by reason of the Trial of Appius Claudius; who being a resolute Enemy to that Law, and undertaking to vindicate the possessors of publick Lands, as if he had been a third Consul, was summoned to appear upon such a day before M. Duilius and Cn. Sicinius. Nor was there ever any man accused before the People, whom the Vulgar so much hated, not only upon his own, but also upon his Fathers account. The Senate on the other hand were scarce ever before so much concerned, that the defender of the Senate, and the asserter of their Honour, who was always an Enemy to the tumults caused by the Tribunes and the Commonalty, and had exceeded his bounds only in one contest, should be exposed to the fury of the rabble. But Appius himself, who was one of those Senators, valued not either the Tribunes, the People, or his Accusation: nor could the menaces of the populace, or the intreaties of the Senate ever induce him, not only to change his Cloaths, and go about to beg the favour of the People, but he would not soften or remit so much even as his usual manner of speaking, when he was to make his defence before them. No, he look'd just as before, with the same resolution, and the same spirit in discourse; insomuch, that most part of the People

People feared Appius as much when he was upon his Trial, as they had done when he was Consul. He therefore at that time pleaded for himself with the same vehemence as he was always used to do when he accused another; astonishing both the Tribunes and the People so much by his constancy, that they themselves of their own accord gave him a farther day of Trial, and even then put it off again too. To which time though it were not very long, yet before the day came, he died of a Distemper: whose praises whilst the Tribunes of the People endeavoured to hinder, the People would not endure that the death of such a great Man should be unattended with that solemnity: wherefore they heard his Funeral Commendations when he was dead, with as much satisfaction, as they had his Accusation when he was alive, and waited upon his Corps in great numbers.

The same Year Valerius the Consul going with an Army into the Country of the Aequi, since he could not tempt the Enemy to fight, was going to attack their Camp; but was hindered by a mighty Tempest of Hail and Thunder: though that which afterward increased his admiration, was, that when they were going to Retreat, the Heavens were all calm and serene as before; so that it seemed an heinous crime again to attempt the taking of that Camp which was, as it were, defended by some God. By this means, all the fury of the War turned into Plundering of the Country; whilst the other Consul Amilius made War in the Sabine Dominions, whose Country was all laid waste, because the Enemy kept within their Walls. But after that, the Sabines being provoked, by seeing, not only their Villages, but even the Towns, where there were a great many Inhabitants, burnt down, went out to meet the Ravagers, but going off with no great success, the next day pitched their Camp at a more secure Post: which was enough to make the Consul think, he might give the Enemy over for Conquered, and therefore he Marched off though the War was not yet made an end of.

Whilst these Wars continued, there being still animosities at home, T. Numitius Priscus, and A. Verginius were made Consuls. And now the People seemed no longer able to endure the delay of the Agrarian Law, but prepared all the force they possibly could; yet having notice that the Volsi were near at hand, by the smoke which arose from the burnt Villages, and the flight of the Country People, the Sedition, which was now just ripe and ready to break forth, was thereby repressed. The Consuls were forced out of the Temple from the People the more quiet. And the Enemies did nothing else, but, having put the Romans into a vain fright, made haste away. Numitius went toward Antium against the Volsi, and Verginius against the Aequi: where having like to have received a great slaughter by an Ambuscade, the Courage of the Soldiers recovered what the negligence of the Consul had lost. But they used better Conduct against the Volsi; who were defeated in the first Battel, and driven into Antium, a very rich City (as things then stood;) which the Consul, not daring to Attack, he took from the Antians another Town called Ceno, not near so rich as Antium. In the mean time, whilst the Aequi and the Volsi employed the Roman Armies, the Sabines came and Plundered their Country even as far as the Gates of the City: though in a few days after they received from the two Armies (who were led into their Confines by both the engaged Consuls together) more damage than they had done.

In the end of this Year, they had some Peace, but it was, as it always used to be, disturbed by a Contest between the Senate and the People. For the People being disgusted would not come to the Consular Assembly; wherefore the Consuls, whose Names were T. Quintius and Q. Servilius, were chosen by the Senate and their Clients: whose Year was very like the precedent, Seditious in the beginning, but quieted by a Foreign War. For the Sabines marching over the Crustumine Plains with all speed, and having made a great slaughter, as well as burnt several places about the River Anien, were beaten back almost from the Gate, called, Porta Collina, and the very Walls, but notwithstanding drove away before them great numbers of Men and Cattel. Whom Servilius the Consul pursuing with a powerful Army, could not indeed come to engage their Forces in a convenient place, but plundered their Country to that degree, that he left nothing untouched by his Arms, and having taken a great Booty, marched back again. Among the Volsi too they behaved themselves very well, not only through the Conduct of their Leader, but the industry of the Soldiers too. For there at first they fought upon a Plain, receiving great hurt on both sides, with much blood-shed; and the Romans, whose small number made them the more sensible of their loss, had given way, had not the Consul with a seasonable lie (crying out, That the Enemy fled on one side) animated the Men; who from thence took Courage, and by thinking themselves Victorious, gained the Victory. The Consul fearing, lest he, by pressing too hard upon the Enemy, might renew the Fight, retreated: and for some days after there was a tacit kind of Truce on both sides. In which time, there came a vast multitude of People from all quarters of the Volsi and the Aequi into the Camp, not doubting, but that the Romans, if they knew of it, would march off in the night time: wherefore about the third Watch they came to attack the Camp. Quintius having appeased the tumult that their sudden fear had caused, and commanded the rest of the Soldiers to lie still in their Tents, drew forth a Party of the Hernici for a Guard before the Camp, giving orders to the Cornicines [such as blew a Military Horn or Cornet] and the Trumpeters

Trumpeters to mount themselves upon Horses and sound before the Rampire, so as to keep the Enemy in suspense till Morning: by which means, the remaining part of the night, all things were quiet in the Camp, inasmuch that the Romans had also sleep enough to refresh them. This shew of armed Foot, whom they thought not only more than they really were, but Romans too, together with the neighing of the Horses, which having strange Riders, and being hared by the great noise about their Ears, grew very skittish, kept the Volsci in expectation, when the Army would set upon them.

LXV.

As soon as it was day, the Romans, being refreshed with sleep, were drawn out into the Field, where upon the first effort they defeated the Volsci, who were tired with watching and standing all night in their Arms: though the Enemy indeed rather gave way, than was beaten off: because upon their backs there were Hills, to which all but their Front might very safely retreat. The Consul when he came to that disadvantageous place, made his Army stand, though the Soldiers could hardly be stopt, but cried out, and begged of him, That he would let them pursue their defeated Foes; whilst the Horse came about him, and being more resolute, cried out, That they would go before the Ensigns. So that whilst the Consul delayed the time, relying indeed upon his Soldiers Courage, but being very diffident as to the place, they all cried out, they would go, and so they did; for fixing their Javelins in the ground, to make themselves the lighter to climb the Hills, they ran up. The Volsci at their first approach threw Darts and kicked Stones that lay in their way, down upon them as they came up, whereby they forced them downward. Inasmuch that the Romans left Wing had given out, if the Consul, by chiding their rashness, and their sloth at the same time had not dispelled their fear, and made them ashamed to retire. Wherefore they stopt, but were at first very obstinate, though afterwards (as much as their strength would permit them to do against an Enemy that stood upon higher ground) they began to move of their own accord, and renewing the clamour, marched up toward the Enemy: against whom they made another extraordinary effort, and overcame the difficulty of the place, so that they were got well nigh to the top of the Hill, when the Enemy turned their Backs; who running away as fast as they could, both they that fled and they that pursued arrived at the Camp in almost one and the same Body: and in that confusion the Camp was taken. Those of the Volsci, that could escape, went to Antium; whither the Roman Army was likewise led; and that City within a few days surrendered, without any new violence from the besiegers, but because the Volsci since that late unhappy Fight, and the loss of their Camp, had lost their Courage too.

DECADE I. BOOK III.

EPITOME.

1, 19. Seditions raised about the Agrarian Laws. 18. The Capitol taken by banished Persons and Slaves, was retaken and they slain. 3. A double Tax or Rate made: in the former whereof the Pole came to one hundred twenty four thousand two hundred and fourteen Sesterces, without taking any thing of such as were Fatherless and Motherless, and such like Persons: and in the later, to one hundred thirty two thousand four hundred and nine. 26. When they had had ill success against the Aequi, L. Quintius Cincinnatus was made Dictator, being sent for from the Plow, to carry on that War. 28. He defeated the Enemy and sold them for slaves. 29. The number of the Tribunes of the People was enlarged, so as to make them ten; in the 36th Year from the time that such Tribunes were first made. 31, 32, 33. They sent Embassadors into Attica, who desired and brought from thence a Scheme of their Laws; for the constituting and propounding whereof there were a sort of Officers, called Decemviri, instead of Consuls, created, without any other Magistrate to assist them: which was in the three hundredth and first year after the building of Rome: and as the Government was transferred from Kings to Consuls, so it was from Consuls to the Decemviri. 34, &c. They having set up ten Tables of Laws, and behaved themselves modestly in that honourable station, for which reason it was agreed that the same men should continue in that dignity the Year following, they afterward having done several enormous things, would not lay down their Authority, but kept it even a third Year also: till such time as the lust of Ap. Claudius put an end to their Tyranny. 44, &c. Who falling in Love with a certain Damsel, suborned a Person privately to demand her as his slave; whereby he laid a necessity upon her Father Virginius to take a knife out of the next Shop he came to, and kill his Daughter (since he had no other way to save her) lest she should fall into the hands of one that would certainly destroy her. 50, &c. The People being provoked by this great example of his extravagance, possessed themselves of the Mount Aventine; and forced the Decemviri to quit their Office; among whom Appius and one other of his Collegues, that had been more guilty than the rest, were thrown into Prison; the rest being banished. 60, &c. Contains what was afterward acted against the Sabines, the Volsci, and the Aequi, with good success. 72. And the dishonest Arbitration of the Romans, who being chosen to decide a Controversie between the Ardeans and the Aricians, adjudged that Land to themselves which was the occasion of the Dispute.

When

WHEN Antium was taken, Tib. Emilius and Q. Fabius were made Consuls; that same Fabius, who was the only Person remaining of all that Family who were slain at Cremora. Emilius already in his former Consulship had been the occasion of dividing the Land among the People: wherefore in this his second Consulate also, the Agrarians were in Goods of that Law: and the Tribunes, who had often attempted to carry it in opposition to the Consuls, were now very ready to do so again, especially seeing they had one Consul on their side toward the obtaining of their ends. The Consul likewise continued of the same opinion; whilst the Possessors, and a great part of the Senate, complaining, That one of the heads of the City concerned himself in matters belonging to the Tribunes, and made himself popular by giving what belonged to other men, cast all the envy of the thing off from the Tribunes upon the Consuls: whereupon there had arisen a great commotion, had not Fabius reconciled them by advice which was not disliked of either side; and that was this, he told them, That by the Conduct and good management of T. Quintius there was a pretty quantity of Land the last Year taken from the Volsci. That Antium was near at hand, being an opportune City, and near the Sea, to which they might send a Colony; and the People by that means go into the Country without any complaints from the possessors of such Lands as had been formerly taken from the Enemies; so that then the City would be at Peace. This advice of his pleased them: and with that they made a sort of Officers called Triumviri, whose names were T. Quintius, A. Virginus, and P. Furius, to divide the Lands; all People, that would have any share, being ordered to give in their Names. But plenty (as it always does) soon made them loath what they before so much desired; wherefore so few of them gave in their Names, that to fill up the number, there were some of the Volsci added to them; whilst the remaining Multitude chose rather to demand the Land at Rome, than take Possession of it in another place. The Aequi Petitioned Q. Fabius (who was come into their Country with an Army) for Peace, but made it void themselves by a sudden Incurfion into the Latin Dominions.

Q. Servilius the Year following, being Consul with Sp. Posthumus, was sent against the Aequi and pitched his Camp in the Latin Territories; where he was forced to stay because his Army was sick. This War was protracted to the third Year, whilst Q. Fabius and T. Quintius were Consuls: and that Province was allotted to Fabius out of course, because he when he was Victorious against them, had granted the Aequi a Peace. He therefore going with great assurance, that the very fame of his Name would make the Aequi submit, sent Embassadors to the Council of that Nation, to tell them, That Q. Fabius the Consul said, that he brought Peace from the Aequi to Rome, but that he now came from Rome with a War against them, the same right hand being now armed, that he had formerly given them as a confirmation of friendship; whose perfidiousness and perjury was the cause of it, the gods were now witnesses, and would be by and by revengers: yet he, be it how it would be, could still wish, that the Aequi would rather comply of their own accord, than undergo the hardships of War: if they repented, they should have free access to his experienced clemency; but if they went on in their perjury, they were like to make War in opposition to the gods more than their Enemies. Which Message was so far from having any effect upon them, that the Embassadors had like to have been abused; and an Army was sent into Algidum [a Town of the Aequi] against the Romans. Of which when News was brought to Rome, the indignity of the thing more than the danger brought the other Consul out of the City: so that two Consular Armies came to meet the Enemy in such order, as that they could join Battel at the same instant. But it being almost night, one of the Enemies cried out; This, Romans! is more out of ostentation than any design you have to fight; you set your Army in Battalia, when night is coming on; but we shall need more day-light to make an end of the dispute which we are like to have: to-morrow, at Sun-rising, come again into the Field, and you shall have your fill of fighting, ne'er fear it. At which words, the Soldiers being incensed (whilst they were led back into their Camp till the next day) thought the night would be very long, ere they should come to fight, and therefore refreshed themselves with meat and sleep. The next day, as soon as it was light, the Roman Army was ready somewhat sooner than the Enemy; but at last the Aequi too marched forth. The Battel was vehement on both sides, for that the Romans fought out of anger and hatred, whilst the Aequi being conscious of the danger they were in by what they had done, and despairing of any future favour, were thereby induced to attempt and try the utmost that they could. Yet the Aequi were not able to withstand the Roman Forces: and therefore being defeated, they fled into their own Confines, where being still averse to Peace, the bold Multitude began to blame their Leaders, for running the hazard of a pitched Battel, wherein the Romans so far out-did them. Saying, That the Aequi were better skilled in Devastations and Incurfions; and that many stragling Parties did more execution with them, than a vast Body of one formed Army.

They therefore leaving a Garrison in their Camp, went out with such a tumult into the Roman Dominions, that they created a terror even in the very City. And that which put them into a greater fright, was, that they could imagin nothing less, than that the Enemy whom they had Conquered, and besieged almost in their very Camp, would remember to Plunder the Country: wherefore the fearful Country folks ran into the Gates, and magni-

ying not only the ravage or the small Bands of those who committed it, but even all things else by their vain fear, cried out, That the Armies and Legions of the Enemies were come upon them, and were advancing in a full Career toward the City. From these the next took the uncertain Story, and made a worse of it to others; insomuch that the tumult and clamour of this Alarm was very little different from the consternation that a City is usually in upon its being taken. It happened then that Consul Quintius was come back from Algidum to Rome: which was a remedy for their fear. For he having appeased the uproar, and bid them for fearing a Conquered Foe, set a Guard upon the Gates: and then calling a Senate, after he had by their Authority ordered a Cessation of all Judicial proceedings, he went to defend their Confines, leaving Q. Servilius Prefect of the City; but found not the Enemy in the Country. The matter was very well managed by the other Consul, who setting upon the Enemy (in the way, which he knew they would come) whilst they were loaded with the Booty, and consequently more uneasy in their March, he made their prey their ruin. For there were but few of the Enemies who escaped the Ambuscade, besides that all the spoils were re-taken by the Romans. By which means Q. returning to the City put an end to the Jusitium [or Intermision of Justice] which lasted but four days. After that there was a Tax made, and a Lustrum [or time to take a view of the Citizens] appointed by Quintius. In which the Poll-Bill came to an hundred twenty four thousand, two hundred and fifteen Sesterces, without reckoning Orphans, and the like. From that time there was nothing which was memorable done in the Country of the Aequi, but they retire into their Towns, permitting all they had to be burned and laid waste; and the Consul, when he had gone over all their Country several times with an Army that Pillaged each part of it, returned to Rome with great applause, and equal spoils.

IV. U. C. 288. Then A. Posthumus Albus and Sp. Furius Fusus were Consuls: the latter of whose Names, some write, Furius Fusus; which I take notice of to you, that Readers may not think there is any difference in the man, though there be in the name. There was no doubt of it, but one of these Consuls would make War against the Aequi: wherefore the Aequi desired aid of the Volsi of Ecetra: which they being ready to afford (so much did these Cities always strive to shew their hatred to the Romans) there were mighty Preparations made for the War. This the Hernici perceived, and told the Romans before-hand, that the Ecetrans had Revolted to the Aequi. The Colony of Antium was also suspected; for that a vast number of men, when that City was taken, fled thence to the Aequi; who, as long as the Aequian War lasted, were the keenest Soldiers. But afterward when the Aequi were driven into their Towns, that Multitude getting away came back to Antium, where of their own accord they persuaded the Inhabitants of that place, who were already disaffected, to Revolt from the Romans. But before the thing was brought to an head, the Senate having information, that such a defection was intended, gave order to the Consuls, to send for the chief men of that Colony to Rome, and ask them, What the matter was? Who coming thither very cheerfully, and being introduced by the Consuls to the Senate, made such replies to what was asked of them, that they were dismissed more suspected than they came. Whereupon there was no doubt of a War: and in order thereunto, Sp. Furius, one of the Consuls (to whom that Province fell) going into the Country of the Aequi, found the Enemy Pillaging the Hernici: and being ignorant what Multitudes they had (for he never saw them all together) he rashly engaged with them though his Army was too weak. For which reason, upon the first onset being Defeated, he retired into his Camp; though that was not the end of his danger; for all the next night and the day after his Camp was so beset and attacked, that they could not so much as send a Messenger thence to Rome. In the mean while the Hernici sent word, That they had very ill fortune, and that the Consul together with the whole Army was besieged; which strook such a terror into the Senate, that (in an order of Senate, the form of which always shews an absolute necessity for it) they ordered Postumius the other Consul, To take care, that the Commonwealth received no detriment. For they thought best for him to stay at Rome, in order to raise what men he could for the War; but to send T. Quintius in the nature of a Proconsul to relieve the Camp with an Army of Allies; for the filling up whereof they had commanded the Hernici, the Latins, and the Colony of Antium to supply Quintius with some sudden Auxiliaries, which in those days they called Milites Subitarii, i. e. Soldiers levied at short warning.

V. In those days they made many motions, and many attempts to and fro, because the Enemy being more in number, began in many respects to disable the Roman Forces, who were not strong enough for all occasions. Wherefore they attacked the Camp, and at the same time sent part of their Army to spoil the Roman Territories; yea, if fortune favoured them, to make an Attempt upon the very City it self. For which reason, L. Valerius was left to Guard the City, and Consul Postumius sent to repress the Devastations of the Country. Nor was there any care or pains omitted in any case: for there were Watches in the City, Guards at the Gates, and Sentinels upon the Walls, besides that all process of Justice (which in so great an hurry was but necessary) was for some days intermitted. In the mean time, Furius the Consul, who was in his Camp, having at first lain still and endured the Siege, sallied out upon the Enemy at the Gate called Porta Decumana, before they were aware of him; but though he could have pursued them, yet he stopt for fear, lest any Attempt might be made upon the other other side of the Camp. Yet Furius, the Lieutenant (who was the Consul's Brother) went after them something too far; nor did he observe (so eager he was in the pursuit) that either the Romans retreated, or that the Enemies came upon him in the Rear: by which means being intercepted by the Foe, though he made many attempts to force his way back to the Camp, he was slain, but behaved himself very bravely before he fell. The Consul also, hearing that his Brother was so circumvented faced about to the Fight, but whilst he engaged in the midst of the Enemies more rashly than wisely, receiving a wound, was very hardly saved by some that stood about him; which accident not only much discouraged his men, but made the Enemy more eager; for being animated by the death of the Lieutenant, and the wound that the Consul had received, they could not be by any means withstood; so that the Romans, being forced back into their Camp, were again Besieged, as being inferior to the Enemy both in hope and strength. At which time their Empire it self had been in danger, if T. Quintius had not come up with the foreign Forces, the Hernican and the Latin Army. For he, whilst the Aequi were intent upon the Roman Camp, and shewing the Lieutenants Head with insolence and ostentation, set upon their Rear; whilst those in the Camp, upon a signal by him given at a great distance, sallied out at the same time, and with him circumvented a great number of the Enemies. In the mean time there was a less slaughter, but the flight was more tumultuous of the Aequi in the Roman Territories; upon whom, as they straggled about to Pillage those parts, Postumius made an Attack in several places, where he had planted Garrisons: whereupon those wanderers running away in a confusion, fell into the hands of Quintius who was Victorious, and coming home with the wounded Consul. Then the Consul's Army revenged the Consul's wound, with the death of the Lieutenant and the rest of their fellow Soldiers in a remarkable Battel: for there were great losses on both sides at that time; insomuch that it is hard to say exactly, how many fought, or fell, it is so long ago since the thing was done. Yet Antias Valerius pretends to give us a true account, that there fell in the Hernican Fields, of Romans five thousand and three hundred; that of the Pillagers, belonging to the Aequi, that ravaged the Roman Confines, there were two thousand four hundred slain by A. Postumius; but that the rest of the Plunderers, who fell into the hands of Quintius were not taken off in numbers near so great. After that, says he, there were cut off four thousand, and (to shew how exactly he could tell you) two hundred and thirty. Then they returned to Rome, and the Jusitium was remitted. At which time the Heavens seemed to be all on a flame, with several Comets, and other strange sights appeared either to the eyes or the apprehensions of the affrighted People. For the averting of which terrors, there were three Feriae [or Holy days] appointed together; during which, all the Temples were filled with crowds of Men and Women, imploring the mercy of the gods. Then the Hernican and Latin Forces were sent home again by the Senate, after they had received thanks for their industrious service in the War. But the thousand men of Antium, because they came too late, when the Battel was over, were dismissed with little less than ignominy.

After that they called a publick Assembly, and made L. Aebutius with P. Servilius Consuls; who entered upon their Office the first day of August, as the beginning of the Year at that time was computed. That was a grievous season, and it chanced to be a Pestilent Year both to City and Country; nor to the Men more than their Cattel. But the fear of being Plundered increased the violence of the Disease, by their taking of Sheep and the like, as well as Country People into the City. For the mixture and conflux of all sorts of Animals, did not only annoy the Citizens with unusual smells, but the Country folks too were crowded up into little huts, where the heat and watching was very offensive to them; yea, the friendly Offices that they were fain to do each other, together with the Contagion it self, promoted the Distemper all over the Town. When they were in this condition, and hardly able to endure their present calamities, the Hernici sent Embassadors in haste to tell them, That the Aequi and the Volsi, having united their Forces, had encamped in their Country, and by that means had pillaged all their Confines. But besides that the thinness of the Senate was an argument to their Allies that the City was afflicted with a Plague, they went away with a very sad answer, That the Hernici might joyn with the Latins and defend themselves; for that the City of Rome was, through the sudden anger of the gods, depopulated by a Disease: not but that, if that calamity should by any means be removed, they would assist their Allies, as they had done the Year before and at all other times. The Embassadors thereupon departed, carrying back a sadder Message than they brought, in that they were to carry on that War by themselves only, which when they were supported even with the strength of Rome, they were hardly able to sustain. But the Enemy made no great stay in the Hernican Territories; for they Marched on thence into the Roman Dominions, which lay deserted even without the injuries of War [now that the Inhabitants were all fled into the City.] Where seeing they met with no body, no, not so much as untill too, without any interruption, they came to the third Stone [i. e. three Miles from Rome] in the Road called Via Gabina. In the mean time Consul Aebutius was dead, nor had his Colleague Servilius any great hopes of recovering: besides that many of the Nobility, the greater part of the Senate, and almost all that were of a fit age to make Soldiers, were now infected; share the management of the War between them: the one to have the Volsi, and the other the Aequi, for his Province. With that the Tribunes cried out in the Forum, That the Volscian War was a story of their own contriving; that the Hernici were always ready to assist them in such lies; and that now the Liberty of Rome was not so much endangered by any foreign force, as eluded by art; for the Aequi and the Volsi, who were almost utterly ruined and destroyed, could not possibly be thought at that time of day to make a voluntary War: that they sought for new Enemies: that a faithful neighbouring Colony was scandalized: that the Antians who were innocent, had the War proclaimed against them, though it were really intended against the People of Rome, whom they would load with Arms, and turn them headlong, in that posture, out of the City; revenging themselves of the Tribunes by the exile and expulsion of the Citizens. By this means (that they might see the design of it) the Law would be evacuated; unless they took great care, whilst they had power enough, whilst they were at home and continued Romans, not to be put out of possession of the City, lest they should be made slaves. If they had courage, they could not want assistance: for that the Tribunes were all of opinion, there was no cause of fear from without, nor any danger at all; and that the gods took care, the Year before, that they might safely defend their Liberty. Thus the Tribunes.

XI. On the other side the Consuls, sitting at some little distance, made the Levy in their sight. Wherefore the Tribunes ran to them, with all the Assembly at their heels; and upon that, after some few were cited or called (for an experiment, as it were, what they would do) a Tumult presently arose: in which, whomsoever the Licitor, by order of the Consul, laid hold of, the Tribune commanded him to let go. Nor was there any equity or reason in what they did, but each of them strove to gain their ends by force, upon the confidence they had in their own strength. As therefore the Tribunes behaved themselves in obstructing the Levy, so did the Senators in impeding their Law, which was proposed every Conitium or Assembly day. The beginning of the quarrel was, when the Tribunes had ordered the People to depart, that the Senators would not stir. But indeed there were scarce any of the Seniors there: because in that case there was not so much occasion for advice and management, as for temerity and boldness. The Consuls also were very cautious, lest in such a confusion they might bring any dishonour upon their dignity. Among the rest there was one Cæso Quintius, a brisk young Man, not only upon the account of his Birth, but his bulk and strength of Body: to which endowments from the gods, he himself had also added many warlike Ornaments, together with Eloquence upon civil occasions; inasmuch that no Man was reckoned more nimble either of his tongue or hands through the whole City. He therefore standing amidst the throng of Senators, much higher than the rest, as if he had born all Consulates and Dictatorships in his sole voice and strength, alone sustained the shock of the Tribunes, and all the popular Storms. For by his Conduct the Tribunes were often beaten out of the Forum, and the People routed. Whomsoever he met, he sent away with some punishment and strip: inasmuch, that if that were the way of proceeding, all the World might see the Law was at an end. Mean time, though all the other Tribunes were much affrighted, A. Virginius, one of the Collegues, gave Cæso warning to appear on such a day to be tried for his Life: by which he rather enflamed than terrified that furious Man: for he upon that account was the more industrious to hinder the Law, to vex the People, and persecute the Tribunes, as it were, with a just War. The Accuser let him run on, that by his Crimes he might increase the flame and fuel of envy; preferring the Law in the mean time, not so much out of any hopes he had to carry it, as to provoke Cæso's rashness. Thereupon many things that were said and done by the young men unadvisedly, were laid to the charge of Cæso only: yet notwithstanding the Law was put off. Then A. Virginius oft-times asked the People; Are you satisfied now, Romans! that you cannot have Cæso to continue one of your fellow Citizens, and at the same time obtain the Law that you desire? But what do I talk of a Law? He withstands their Liberty, out-doing all the Tarquins in Pride and Tyranny: stay till you see him made Dictator or Consul, whom now you see, though he be a private Person, already reigning in his own strength and audacity. Many of the hearers assented to him, and, complaining that they were abused, incited the Tribune to go through with what he had undertaken.

XII. And now the Day of Tryal was come; when all men generally believed their Liberty depended upon the Condemnation of Cæso; who being at last forced to it went about to desire the Peoples favour, though with much regret of mind, attended by his Relations and the best men in the City. T. Quintius Capitolinus, who had been three times Consul, relating many honourable things of himself and his Family, affirmed, That there never was either in the Quintian Family, or the whole City of Rome so great a Wit or a Person of such early Courage. That he was his Soldier first of all, and that he saw him oftentimes engage the Enemy. Sp. Furius said, That Quintius Capitolinus sent Cæso to him to relieve and assist him when he was in great danger (which he did) and that there never was any man before, by whose means the Commonwealth was more supported. L. Lucretius, who had been Consul the Year before, shining with fresh glory, was pleased to let Cæso partake in his praises, by remembering the Fights, recounting the noble exploits which they had done sometimes in Skirmishes, and other-whiles in pitched Battels: persuading and telling them, He was a brave Youth, full fraught with with all the gifts both of nature and fortune, and would be the greatest support of any City, wherever he came, though he wished to be a Citizen of Rome rather than of any other place. As to what was offensive in him (his heat and audacity) age daily took off that; and what was lacking in him (prudence) was every day increasing; his wits growing old, and his virtues coming to maturity: wherefore they ought to let such a great Man live in their City till he was an old Man. Among the rest, his Father L. Quintius, Surnamed Cincinatus, though he did not think fit to repeat his Commendations, lest that might heap more envy upon him, begging Pardon for his error, and youthful carriage, desired them, that they would pardon his Son for his sake, who had never offended any Man living either by word or action. But some of them would not hear his intreaties, either out of modesty or fear, whilst others complaining, that they and theirs were mulcted and abused by him, gave him a cross answer, and resolved to go on with the Tryal.

But there was one crime, besides the common envy of the People, that lay very hard upon him: and that was, that M. Volscius Fictor, who some years before had been Tribune of the People, came in as a Witness against him; That he, not long after the Plague was in the City, came and caught the young Men playing their mad pranks in the street, called Subura: [where the Whores dwell] that there a Quarrel arose, and his elder Brother, who was not yet very well recovered of his Distemper, was knocked down by Cæso, who hit him such a blow with his fist, that he lay for dead: whereupon they carried him home, and thought he thereby got his bane. But he could not prosecute Cæso for the Fact, because of the Consuls that had been for some years last past. When Volscius declared this, the People were so nettled, that they had like to have murdered Cæso upon the place: but Virginius ordered him to be laid hold on and put in Prison; whilst in the mean time the Patricians opposed force with force. T. Quintius cried out, Whereas they had given warning of a Capital Tryal, the Man they designed so soon to pass Sentence upon, ought not to be so roughly used, before he was convicted, or had spoken for himself. The Tribune on the other hand said, He would not punish a Person uncondemned, but yet he would keep him in Bonds till the day of Tryal, that the Roman People might fairly revenge themselves of him for killing one of their fellow Citizens. Nevertheless the Tribunes being appealed to all together thought fit to mitigate the rigour of their Authority by a moderate Decree between the two extremes; so they ordered him not to be put in Prison: yet that he should appear at the day appointed, and if he did not, should engage to pay so much money to the People: though they had some dispute what the sum should be, and therefore referred it to the Senate: he remaining in Custody whilst they were consulted. They therefore ordered him to give Bail (one of whom they bound in a Recognizance of 3000 l.) but how many should be bound for him was left to the Tribunes; who pitching upon ten, the Accuser let him go upon their security. He was the first that ever gave publick Bail. When by this means he was dismissed out of the Forum, the next night, without the knowledge of the Consuls, he banished himself into Tuscany. Wherefore upon the day of Tryal, when they excused or effaigned him, by saying, he had fled his Country and was gone into Banishment, the rest of the Tribunes being Appealed to, though Virginius called it, dismissed the Council. But the Money was cruelly exacted from his Father; inasmuch, that when all he had was sold to raise it, he was fain to live beyond the Tiber for some time, like one Exiled, in a pitiful little Cottage.

XIV. This Tryal and the Law being promulged, found the City something to do; for they were not engaged in any Foreign War. When therefore the Tribunes, like Conquerors (now that the Senate was so terrified by the Banishment of Cæso) supposed the Law was as good as passed, and that all the Seniors of the Senate had withdrawn themselves from publick business; the Juniors (especially all that were Cæso's friends) were more incensed against the People, so far they were from abating in their animosities: but that which proved their greatest advantage was, that they kept their passion within bounds. For when, after Cæso's Banishment, the Law was first proposed, though they were ready prepared with an Army of Clients, yet they attacked the Tribunes (alsoon as, by offering any violence to them, they gave them cause) in such a manner, that never an one of them gained more credit or envy by it: but the People complained, They had got a thousand Cæsos instead of one. Though upon other days, when the Tribunes did not stickle for their Law, there were no Men more civil and quiet than those Juniors were; for they would speak kindly and familiarly to the Commonalty, invite them to their Houses, be in the Forum, and permit the Tribunes to hold other Assemblies without any disturbance; nor ever look stern or be rough with any Man either in publick or private, save when they talked of that Law: for in other cases those young Men were popular enough. Nor did the Tribunes manage other matters only without any disturbance, but being also continued for the Year following, had not so much as an ill word given them, so far were the young Senators from offering any violence to them. For their main design was to soothe and win upon the People so much as to reconcile them: and by those Arts the Law was eluded for a whole Year.

XV. Then C. Claudius, the Son of Appius, and P. Valerius Poplicola being made Consuls, found the City much quieter than it had been: nor had the new Year brought forth any new accident; for the City was wholly taken up with the thoughts of preferring and the fear of passing that Law. But the more the Junior Senators insinuated themselves into the People, so much the more industrious the Tribunes were to make the People suspect them, saying, There was a Conspiracy among them; for Cæso was at Rome; and that they designed to kill the Tribunes and murder the People: that the Senior Senators employed the Juniors to extirpate the Power of the Tribunes out of the Commonwealth; and to reduce the City into the same firm as it was of before they possessed themselves of the Holy Mount. Besides this, they were afraid of that constant and almost annual War from the Æqui and the Volsci; though in the mean time another new mischief, more near at hand, surprized them. Four thousand five hundred banished Men and Slaves, possessed themselves of the Castle and Capitol in the night time, under the Command of Ap. Herdonius, a Sabine: who caused all those in the Castle, that would not enter into the Conspiracy and take up Arms, as they had done, to be immediately slain: whilst the rest being scared, ran headlong amidst the tumult down into the Forum: from whom you could hear no words but these, To your Arms, and, There are Enemies come into the City. Thereupon the Consuls were afraid as much to Arm the People, as to let them continue without Arms; being uncertain what sudden misfortune, whether Foreign or Domestick, from the Peoples animosities, or villany of their Slaves, had invaded the City. They strove indeed to appease the tumults, but by so doing sometimes the more increased them: for the fearful consternated Multitude would not be ruled by reason. However they distributed Arms; though not to every body, but to such a number only, as that they might have (since it was not known how strong the Enemy were) a sufficient reserve if occasion were. Which having done, they spent the rest of the night in setting of Guards and Sentinels at all convenient places in the City, not knowing either what Country-men or what number the Enemy were. But the next morning discovered both the Foe, and the General of them: and Ap. Herdonius tempted all the Slaves out of the Capitol to take their freedom; saying, He undertook the cause of every poor Man that was in misery; to restore such as had been injuriously Banished, to their own Country again, and take off the heavy yoke of Slavery: that he would rather the People of Rome would do it for him; but if there were no hopes from them, he would try and instigate the Volsci and the Æqui with all extremity.

XVI.

The thing appeared much plainer to the Senate and the Consuls than to any body else: but besides what was related to them, they were afraid lest that might be a design of the Veians or the Sabines, with an intention, that now they had got so many Men into the City, the Sabine and Etrurian Legions should straight come up: and likewise, that their eternal Enemies, the Volsci and Æqui, might now come, not as before, to ravage their Country, but even to the City, which was now in part taken. Mean while there were many and various fears among them; but among others, the apprehensions they had of their Slaves was the greatest; lest they should each of them have an Enemy in his own House, whom it was neither safe to trust, nor by shewing their diffidence to put him upon doing what he saw they suspected. At this juncture it was scarce possible to make them agree: for at that time, when so many mischiefs spring up so much exceeding any former ones, no one feared the Tribunes or the People. But that seemed a small inconvenience, which always proceeded from a cessation of other evils, and then to be removed by Foreign fears; but indeed, that thing alone was a great addition to their miseries; for the Tribunes were in such a fury, that they said, It was not a War, but the vain fanstie of a War, that was pretended to have taken up its Quarters in the Capitol, to avert the Peoples minds from any thoughts of their Law: that the Friends and Clients of the Patricians, if they should find by the passing of that Law, that they had rioted to no purpose, would go away more silent than they came: Whereupon they called a Council to prefer the Law, having persuaded the People from taking up of Arms. In the mean time the Consuls also summoned a Senate, from whence the Tribunes discovered greater terror, than that which the Enemy by coming in the night time had strook into them.

XVII.

When the news was brought, that the Men had laid down their Arms and were departed from their stations, P. Valerius (whilst his Colleague held the Senate) ran out of the Court, and into the Temple to the Tribunes, saying, Tribunes! What's the meaning of this? Do you intend to overturn the Commonwealth by the Conduct and encouragement of Ap. Herdonius? Has he been so happy in corrupting you, who could not prevail upon your Slaves? When your Enemies are over your heads, would you lay down your Arms and make Laws? Then turning to the Multitude; If you, Romans! said he, have no care either of the City or your selves; yet you fear the gods of your Country, who are now taken by your Enemies. Jupiter, the Good and Great, Juno, the Queen of Heaven, Minerva, and other gods and goddesses are besieged: and a Camp of Slaves are now in possession of your publick Deities. Does this look like a well regulated City in your eyes? There are a vast number of Enemies, not only within the Walls, but also in the Castle above the Forum, and the Senate House: yet at the same time there is an Assembly in the Forum, and another in the Senate House; where each one gives his opinion as gravely and as deliberately as if this was a time of the greatest leisure; whilst other Citizens are giving their Votes in other cases. Instead whereof, is it not more fitting that all the Senate and the People, the Consuls, the Tribunes, together with all the gods and men should take up Arms, and run into the Capitol, to deliver and rescue that most august House of the Good and Great Jupiter from violence? Father Romulus! do thou infuse that Courage into thy Race, whereby thou formerly recoveredst this Castle from these same People, when they had taken it with Gold: bid them go that way which then, their Captain, and thy thy Army went. Lo I, the Consul, (as far as a mortal Man can go in the steps of a God) will first follow thee. Then the end of his Speech was; That he intended to take up Arms, and expected all the People of Rome to do the same. If any one obstructed the doing of it, whoever he was, or whereforever (whether in the Capitol, or the Forum) he should take him at that time for an Enemy of the Consuls Power, of the privileges of the Tribunes, and one that had forgotten the sacred Laws. If therefore the Tribunes, who had forbidden People to take up Arms against Ap. Herdonius, should command them to do the same against P. Valerius the Consul, he should make bold to do the same by them, as the first of his Family did by the Kings. Thereupon they seemed to be reduced to the last extremity, and the Enemy was like to have the satisfaction of seeing Rome in an uproar, for the Law could not be passed, nor the Consul go into the Capitol; though the night put an end to their contentions, and the Tribunes for that reason gave out, as fearing the Consuls strength. When therefore the heads of the Sedition were removed, the Senators went about to the People, and mixing with their Assemblies, talked to them in such language as was at that time most seasonable, admonishing them, To take care what danger they brought the Commonwealth into: and telling them, the Controversie was not between the Senate and the People, but that the Senate, the People, the Castle, the Temples of their gods, with all religious things, both publick and private, were betrayed and given up at once into the hands of the Enemy. Whilst these things passed in the Forum, in order to appease the Sedition, the Consuls, in the mean time, lest the Sabine, or the Veian Army should stir, went and Posted themselves about the Gates and the Walls of the City.

The same night also there was news brought to Tusculum, that the Castle was taken, the Capitol seized, and the City in a tumult, L. Mamilius being then Dictator of that place. He therefore calling a Senate, and bringing in the Messengers, was strongly of opinion, That they ought not to stay till Embassadors came from Rome to desire assistance; for that the danger it self, the jeopardy that they were in, who worshiped the same gods, and the Religious Obligation of their Leagues required that from them: nor would the gods ever give them the like opportunity of obliging so puissant, and so near and dear a City. Whereupon they agreed to send Auxiliaries, and forthwith put all their young Men in Arms; who coming to Rome at break of day, appeared a far off like Enemies, as if the Æqui and the Volsci had been coming. But when the vain sight was over, they were received into the City in a full Body, and marched down into the Forum: where P. Valerius, having left his Colleague to Guard the Gates, was now a Marshalling his Army. For the Authority of that Man had won the Commonalty, forasmuch as he assured them. When he had recovered the Capitol, and quieted the City, if they would let him learn, what treachery the Tribunes palliated under the pretence of passing their Law; that he should remember his forefathers, his Surname, whereby it appeared, that he had the care of serving the People committed and derived down to him from his Ancestors, and would not obstruct the Peoples designs. Wherefore they following him as their Captain, (though the Tribunes were much against it, but all in vain) drew up upon the side of the Capitol Hill. To them also was added the Tusculan Legion: and there, between the Allies and the Citizens, was a contest who should have the honour of regaining the Castle, both Generals encouraging their Men as much as they could. Then the Enemy began to tremble, nor could they trust in any thing, besides the strength of the place: amidst whose fears the Romans fell upon them, as the Allies also did. And they had forced their way into the Porch of the Temple, when P. Valerius standing in the Van, and animating his Men to the Battel, was slain. P. Volturnius, a Consul fellow, saw him fall; and therefore, commanding some of his Soldiers to cover the Body, ran up to supply the Consuls place. But the Army did not know (so hot and intent they were upon the fight) what great misfortune had befallen them; yea, they got the Victory before they were sensible that they fought without their General. Many of the Banished Persons defiled the Temple with their Blood, and many were taken alive; but Herdonius was killed: and so the Capitol was recovered. The Captives were punished according to their quality; as every one was either a Freeman or a Slave; the Tusculans had thanks for their pains; the Capitol was purged and lustrated [or Consecrated by Sacrifices] and the People, 'tis said, threw Money into the Consuls House in order to bury him with the greater Pomp and Solemnity.

They having by this means appeased the City, the Tribunes being very urgent with the Senate, to perform what P. Valerius had promised, importuned Claudius to discharge the Ghost of his Colleague of all imputations of fraud, and to suffer them to treat about their Law. To which the Consul replied, He would not permit them to debate concerning the Law, before he had chosen himself a new Colleague. Wherefore these contentions continued till the very time of that Assembly in which the new Consul was to be elected. So in the Month December, by the great endeavours of the Senate, L. Quintus Cincinnatus, the Father of Cæso, was created Consul, and to begin his Office immediately from that time. At which the People were much disheartened, being to have a Consul who was an angry Man, very powerful in the favour of the Senate, in his own Courage, and three Sons that he had; who were each one of them as stout as Cæso, but far beyond him in Prudence and Conduct, whenever the case required it. He therefore, when he entered upon the Office, was as vehement in his reproofs to the Senate, as in his Invectives against the People, saying, That their sloth was the occasion why the Tribunes reigned so perpetually in their calumnies, and other crimes, not as in a Commonwealth of the Romans, but as it sometimes happens in a dissolute Family. That with his Son Cæso, all virtue, constancy, and other glories that usually adorn young Men either in Peace or War, were Banished and Expelled out of Rome: whilst the Tribunes, those prating seditious fellows, who were the Seminaries of all Discord, being twice or thrice together put into the same Office, through their ill Acts lived with all the licentiousness of Kings. Aulus Virginius, said he, for not being in the Capitol, deserved as much punishment as Ap. Herdonius: nay, more indeed, if we consider the thing aright. For Herdonius, if he did nothing else, by confessing himself an Enemy, did as good as give you notice and advice to Arm your selves: but this Man, by denying that there was any Enemy to fight withall, deprived you of those Arms, exposed you naked to your Slaves and Banished Persons: and could you draw your Men up the Capitol Hill (which deference I speak to C. Claudius, and the memory of P. Valerius, who is dead) before you had removed that Enemy out of the Forum? I am ashamed to appear before either gods or men; when I consider, that at the same time that the Foe was in the Castle, and the Capitol; so that the Leader of Slaves and Banditti, having prophaned all things and places took up his Quarters in great Joves Temples, the People of Tusculum should be Armed before those of Rome; it being a question, whether L. Manlius the Tusculan General, or P. Valerius and C. Claudius the Consuls delivered this City. For we, who heretofore would not suffer the Latins so much as to touch any Arms even in their own cause, and when the Enemy was in your Country, had now our selves (if the Latins had not prevented it) been taken and utterly destroyed. Is this, ye Tribunes! to aid the People? To expose them naked to the Enemies cruelty? I'll warrant you, if any Man, though the meanest of the People (whom you have made your peculiar Province, apart, as it were, from the rest of the Commonwealth) if any Man, I say, of that Quality should tell you his House was attacked by his Servants all in Arms, you would think fit to assist him. Was Jupiter then, that good and great God, when hedged about with Armed Slaves and Banditti, worth no Mans help? Or do those men desire to be accounted sacred, to whom the gods themselves are neither sacred nor holy? Do you, who have broken all Laws both Divine and Humane, pretend to say, you'll make a Law this Year? No, if you do, that day on which I was created Consul, the Commonwealth was put into a much worse condition than when Consul P. Valerius died. But, Romans, said he, at present, my Colleague and I design, the first thing we do, to lead the Legions against the Æqui and the Volsci; for I cannot tell by what Decree of Fate, we find the gods more propitious to us in War than Peace: and what danger we should be in from those People, if they knew the Capitol was besieged 'tis better for us to guess by what's past, than make an experiment of it.

XX. The Consuls Speech excited the People, and the Senate were thereby so incouraged, that they thought the Commonwealth restored to its former state. The other Consul was a warmer assistant to him than he was an author of the whole enterprize; and though he freely suffered his Colleague to be the first actor in such a weighty affair, yet he also did what became him as a Consul. Then the Tribunes jeering him, as though he had spoken very foolishly, went on, and asked, How the Consuls would draw forth their Army, when no Man would suffer them to make a Levy? We, said Quintius, have no need to make a Levy; for when P. Valerius put the People in Arms to retake the Capitol, they all swore they would rendezvous at the Consuls command, and would not depart without his Order: wherefore we require you all, that took such an Oath, to come to morrow Armed to the Lake Regillus. Then the Tribunes began to cavil; and would fain have discharged the People from their Religious Obligation; saying, that Quintius was but a private Person at that time when they were bound by that Oath. But People did not then slight the gods so much, as now adays they do: nor did every Man make his Oath and the Laws comply with his Inclinations by a Sophistical Interpretation of them, but rather accommodated his own actions to them. The Tribunes therefore, having no hopes to hinder the expedition, began to consult how they might defer it: and that so much the more, because it was reported, That the Augurs were ordered to attend at the Lake Regillus; and that a certain place was hallowed, where they might treat with the People in a solemn and a Religious manner: that whatsoever at Rome had been preferred as a Law, by the Power of the Tribunes, should be abrogated in the Assembly there: that all People would comply with the Consuls; there being no Appeal to be brought above a thousand paces from the City: and that the Tribunes, if they came thither, must be subject to the Command of the Consuls, like other Romans. These things frightened them; but that which terrified them most, was, that Quintius often said, He would not hold a Consular Assembly; the City was not troubled with such a Distemper, as that the usual Remedies would heal it: the Commonwealth had need of a Dictator, that whatsoever gave any disturbance to the City, might know a Dictatorship admitted of no Appeal.

XXI. The Senate was in the Capitol; and thither the Tribunes came with the dissatisfied Commonalty; who, with great clamors implored sometimes the Patronage of the Consuls, and otherwhiles that of the Senate. But they prevailed not upon the Consuls, before the Tribunes promised that they would be ruled by the Senate. Whereupon the Consul declaring the desires of the Tribunes and the People, there was a Decree made to this purpose: That the Tribunes should not propose the making of any Law that Year, nor should the Consuls lead the Army out of

of the City: and for the rest, the Senate thought, it was against the Interest of the Commonwealth for those Magistrates to be continued, or the same Tribunes chosen again for the next Year. The Consuls withstood it. Wherefore the Senate also, being unwilling to be outdone by the People, made L. Quintius Consul for the next Year again. Nor was there any thing that whole Year which the Consul said more vehement than this: Can I wonder, grave Fathers! if your Authority be slighted by the People? You your selves make light of it; for you, because the People have broken a Decree of Senate by continuing of Magistrates, your selves do the same thing, lest you should come behind them in folly and imprudence: as though it were an argument of more Power in a City, to be guilty of more levity, and take a greater freedom than ordinary: for indeed it is a more light and foolish action to abrogate our own Decrees than those of others. You, Fathers! imitate the unthinking rabble; and you who should give others good example, will rather offend by your pattern than make them do well by yours; whilst I am resolved, for fear of imitating the Tribunes, I will not be declared Consul contrary to a Decree of Senate. I likewise advise you, Caius Claudius! that you also restrain the People of Rome in this particular; and as for me, assure your self, I will take it so kindly, that I will not think my Honour impaired by you, but my Glory for refusing Honour augmented; besides, that the envy, which by the continuation of it would accrue, will be the less. Thereupon they both put forth an Edict; That no Man should chuse L. Quintius Consul; if any did, they would not give any heed to such a Vote.

Then Q. Fabius Vibulanus and L. Cornelius Maluginensis (the former a third time) were made Consuls. In whose Year there was a Poll: but it was repugnant to their Religion, seeing that the Capitol was taken, and the Consul slain, to make a Lustration. When therefore Q. Fabius and L. Cornelius were Consuls, there were Commotions in the very beginning of their Year, for the Tribunes incited the People; the Latins and the Hernici brought news of a great War from the Volsci and the Æqui: that the Volscian Legions were already at Antium: which Colony they were in great fear would Revolt: upon which score the Tribunes with much ado consented to the War. Then the Consuls divided the Provinces between them: Fabius being ordered to lead the Legions to Antium, and Cornelius to stay as a Guard to Rome, lest any part of the Enemies (according to the custom of the Æqui) should come to pillage the Country. The Hernici and the Latins were ordered to supply their Quota of Men by virtue of a League; and the Army was two parts of it Allies, and the third Romans. The Allies therefore being come at the day appointed, the Consul pitched his Camp without the Gate called Porta Capena: where having purged the Army, he went to Antium, near which he late down not far from the Enemy. There seeing the Volsci, because the Army was not yet come from the Æqui durst not fight, but were making Provisions to secure themselves within their Bulwark, the next day Fabius formed, not one mixt Army of Romans and Allies together, but three separate ones of the several People, of which he commanded the middlemost consisting of the Roman Legions. Then he ordered them all to observe the common signal, that the Allies too might fall on, and come off again at the same time, if a Retreat were sounded; placing the Flotte to the Rearward of each Body. Thus having put himself into this triple posture he surrounded the Camp, and being very sharp upon them on all sides, the Volsci were not able to sustain the shock, and therefore were forced down from their Bulwark. By which means getting over the Fortifications, he drave the fearful crowd, who were bent all one way, out of the Camp: and so, as they were making all speed to get away, the Horse, who could not well climb over the Mounds, but were spectators only of what was done, having gotten them in a spacious Plain, enjoyed a share of the Victory by killing the affrighted Enemies. For there was a great slaughter of those that fled both in the Camp and without the Works too: but the Plunder was more, because the Enemy could hardly take away with them so much as their Arms, and the whole Army had been utterly destroyed, if the Woods had not proved a refuge to them in their flight.

XXIII. Whilst these things passed at Antium, the Æqui in the mean while, having sent the flower of their Youth before them, surprized the Castle of Tusculum in the night time; sitting down with the rest of their Army not far from the Walls of the Town, with design to breadthen and dissipate the Enemies Forces. Which news being told at Rome, and coming from thence to the Camp at Antium, made the Romans as much concerned as if the Capitol had been laid to have been taken; not only because the Tusculans had deserved well of them so lately, but also for the very resemblance of the danger which seemed to challenge their assistance. Fabius therefore omitting all things else, conveyed the Booty as fast as possible out of the Camp to Antium: where having left a small Guard, he made all the haste he could with his Army to Tusculum; who were permitted to carry nothing along with them, save only their Arms, and what Bread or Meat they had ready dressed; though in the mean time Consul Cornelius sent them Provisions from Rome. So for some Months they were engaged at Tusculum; before which Place the Consul with part of his Army attacked the Camp of the Æqui, but gave the other part to the Tusculans to regain their Castle withall; for he could never get into that by force. But at length Famin made the Enemy remove from thence: whereby being reduced to extreme necessity, they were all sold by the Tusculans for Slaves, disarmed, and naked: whom, as they were ignominiously flying home, the Roman Consul overtook overtook in Algidum, and killed every Man. Being now Victorious, he pitched his Camp at Columen (a Towns name) where he received his Men again: and the other Consul when the Enemy was now beaten from the Walls of Rome, and the danger over, went himself also from Rome. So the Consuls going two several ways into the Enemies Confines, did the Volsci on the one hand, and the Æqui on the other, a great deal of mischief. The same Year also, I find in many Authors, that the Antians Revolted; but that L. Cornelius managed that War, and took the Town, I dare not affirm, because there is no mention of it among the more ancient Authors.

XXIV. When this War was ended, another at home with the Tribunes put the Senate in a fright; for they cried out, It was a cheat to keep the Army abroad so, and nothing but a trick to hinder their Law from passing: yet for all that they would go through with what they had undertaken. But notwithstanding, P. Lucretius, Prefect of the City, prevailed so far, that the Tribunes complaints were deferred till the coming of the Consuls: about which time, there arose also a new cause of Commotion. A. Cornelius and Q. Servilius being Questors, had appointed a day to try Volscius, for that, without doubt, he was a false Witness against Cæso; there being very good evidence to prove not only, that Volscius's Brother was never seen abroad after he once fell sick, but also, that he never recovered of his Distemper, but having languished under it for many Months, at last died of the same: nor was Cæso ever seen at Rome all that time, in which Volscius had sworn he was there: for several of his fellow Soldiers came in and testified, He was with them all the while in the Wars without any furlow: which if Volscius denied, there were a great many who privately offered him to name an impartial Judge. When therefore he refused to go to his Tryal, all those circumstances agreeing together, made Volscius's Condemnation as certain as that of Cæso against whom he had been a Witness. But the Tribunes put off the Tryal, by saying, They would not suffer the Questors to call an Assembly for the Trying of a Criminal, unless they had another first about their Law: so both Causes were deferred till the arrival of the Consuls. Who when they came in Triumph with their Victorious Army into the City, many People believed, because there was no talk of the Law, that the Tribunes were disheartened. But they (it being now the latter end of their Year) desiring to be a fourth time chosen Tribunes, turned the dispute concerning the Law into a debate about Assemblies. In which though the Consuls were as hot against the continuation of the Tribuneship, as if the Law to diminish their Power had been preferred, yet the Tribunes carried it. The same Year the Æqui had a Peace granted them upon their Petition: and the Poll, which began the Year before, was now made an end of, that Lustrum [or surveying of the People] being the tenth from the time that the City was first Built. The Rate laid upon the Citizens came to one hundred thirty two thousand four hundred and nine Sesterces. In that Year the Consuls gained great honour both at home and abroad, in that they not only made Peace with their Enemies, and reduced the City, though not to a perfect Concord, yet into such a state, that it was less mutinous than before.

XXV. Then L. Minutius and C. Nautius, being made Consuls, undertook the two omitted Causes of the precedent Year. In which the Consuls strove as much to obstruct the Law, as the Tribunes to hinder the Tryal of Volscius: but the Power and Authority of the new Questors was now greater. For that Year M. Valerius, the Son of Valerius, and Grandson of Voleius, was Questor with T. Quintius Capitolinus, who had been thrice Consul: and he, because he saw Cæso, a Noble Youth, was utterly lost both to the Quintian Family, and the Commonwealth, was justly very zealous to persecute the false Witness, who had not suffered the innocent Man so much as to make his own defence. When Virginius on the other side was most importunate of all the Tribunes to pass the Law; the Consuls had two Months given them to consider of it, that when they had shewn the People the Cheat which was designed in it, they might then safely permit them to Vote: and this interval, which was allowed, made all things quiet in the City. But the Æqui did not suffer them to be long at rest; for they broke the League which they made the Year before with the Romans, and chose Gracchus Cluilus, who was the greatest Man at that time among them, their General. Under whose Command they came into the Lavican and then into the Tusculan Fields in an Hostile manner, and having loaded themselves with Plunder, pitched their Camp in Algidum. To which Camp Q. Fabius, P. Volturnus, and A. Posthumus came as Embassadors from Rome, to complain of the injuries they had done, and to demand their Goods back again according to the League: but the General of the Æqui bid them tell their Message from the Roman Senate to the Oak, and he would mind something else in the mean time (Now that was a great Oak that grew over his Tent, and made it very shady.) Then one of the Embassadors, as he was going away, cried out, Let this sacred Oak, and all the gods take notice that you have broken the League; for which reason, I beseech them not only to bear our present complaints, but to assist our Arms also, when we shall revenge the violation of Laws at once both Divine and Humane. When the Embassadors came back to Rome, the Senate ordered one of the Consuls to lead their Army against Gracchus into Algidum; in-joining the other to Pillage the Confines of the Æqui. In the mean time the Tribunes, as they used to do, endeavoured to hinder the Levy; and it may be they totally obstructed it, had not a fresh terror surprized them.

There

XXVI. There came a vast number of Sabines, who Plundered all the Country even almost to the very Walls of the City; the Fields being all Ravaged, and the City put into a fright. Then the common People were glad to take up Arms, though the Tribunes were never so much against it; and two great Armies were raised; whereof Nautius led the one against the Sabines; and having pitched his Camp at Ercutum, with small Parties, and inroads made for the most part in the night time, did so much damage to the Sabines Country, that compared to that the Roman Territories seemed as it were untouched. In the mean time Minucius had neither the same Fortune, nor Courage to carry on the War; for having pitched his Camp not far from the Enemy, he kept within it for fear, though he had received no very great loss of Men. Which Mans fear; and therefore having attacked his Camp in the night time, against which they found that open force did little good, the next day they enclosed it quite round with Counterworks: which before they had blocked up all the Passes, five Troopers, sent out through the Enemies Guards, carried news to Rome, That the Consul and his Army were Besieged. Than which nothing could have happened so surprizing or unlooked for: wherefore they were in such a fear and trembling condition, as if the Enemy had Besieged the City, not the Camp; They therefore sent for Consul Nautius, who being little able to help them, they had a mind to make a Dictator, who might recover them out of their present evil circumstances: and so by general consent L. Quintius Cincinnatus was pitched upon to be the Man. 'Tis pleasant to hear some Men talk, who contemn all things belonging to Mankind in comparison to riches, nor think any Man deserves honour, or can be brave, who has not a great deal of Money; when at the same time, L. Quintius, the sole hope of the Roman Government, himself manured a Field of four Acres (called Prata Quinia) beyond the Tiber, over against that place, where now the Dock is. Where being found by the Embassadors either making a Ditch with a Spade in his hand, or a Plowing, or about some other Country work; after they had saluted him, and he returned their Complement, being desired by them (for his own good, they hoped, as well as that of the Commonwealth) to put on his Gown and hear what the Senates Message to him was, he stared upon them, and asking, Whether all things were well? had his Wife Racilia fetch his Gown with all speed out of their Cottage; with which being Cloathed, he wiped off the dust and sweat from his face and went forth to them. Whereupon they saluted him as Dictator, wishing him Joy of the Office; told him he was sent for into the City, and what a fright the Army was in. There was a Boat prepared for him at the publick charge; and when he came over the River, his three Sons met him, together with other Relations and Friends of his, and the major part of the Senate; with which Retinue being attended, and with the Lictors before him, he was carried to his House, where there was a great concourse of the People. But they were not at all pleased to see Quintius, because he had born too many great Offices, and was a very vehement Man in his Place. That night therefore they sat up till morning.

XXVII. The next day the Dictator coming into the Forum before it was light, made L. Tarquinius, a Man of Patrician Birth, Magister Equitum [Master of the Horse] who though he had been a Foot Soldier because he was poor, yet was accounted the best Warriour of all the young Men in Rome. Then coming to the Assembly with the Master of the Horse, he ordered an intermission of Judicial proceedings, commanded all the Shops in the whole City to be shut up, and forbid the doing of any private business. After which, He required all that were fit for Military Service to come with Arms, Provisions for five days, and twelve Pallisadoes a Man before Sun-setting, into the Campus Martius: and those who were not fit for War be ordered to Prepare and Cook the Meat for the neighbouring Soldiers, whilst he got himself ready and looked out for his Pallisadoes. This made the young men run about to look for Stakes, which they took where-ever they found them: for no Man was to hinder, but immediately they were all ready according to the Dictators Order. Then having put the Army into such a posture, that it was as ready for fighting as marching (if occasion had been) the Dictator himself led the Legions, and the Master of the Horse his Horse. Both Armies were encouraged according to the nature of their circumstances; being desired, to make haste, for the affair required their speed, that they might come to the Enemy in the night: and being told that the Roman Consul and Army was Besieged, having been so for these three days; and that it was uncertain what each day or night might produce: that the greatest and most momentous affairs depended many times upon a minute: wherewithal they cried out, Make haste Ensign, and march on Soldiers! which words the Army also, in complaisance to their Commanders, repeated. So at midnight they came to Algidum, and there perceiving the Enemy was pretty near, set up their Standard.

XXVIII. Then the Dictator (as well as he could see in the night time) riding round to view the Situation and form of their Camp, Commanded the Tribunes of the Soldiers, To order all the Baggage to be carried into one place, and then that the Soldiers should return with their Arms and Pallisadoes into their Ranks; which was accordingly done. And then, in the same posture as he Travelled, he drew all his Army in a long Train round the Enemies Camp, commanding them all to hollow when he gave the signal: which when they had done, that each Man should make a Trench before himself, and set up his Pallisado. Whereupon when the Dictator ator gave the word, the signal was given; the Soldiers did as they were bidden, and a great noise rung all round the Enemies; nay, going beyond the Enemies Camp, it went as far as the Consuls, in which it created not only great fear but as much joy also. For the Romans thought it was the clamour of their Countrymen, and congratulating each other that they had aid so near, straight scared the Enemy from their Guards and Watches. The Consul therefore told them, They must not delay time; for that noise signified not only the approach of their friends, but that they had begun the attack, and that it would be very strange if they were not then attempting the outside of the Enemies Camp: wherefore he had his Men stand to their Arms and follow him. The Battle began in the night, the Dictators Legions giving notice by their clamour, that they on that side also put the Foe in great jeopardy. By this time the Aequi endeavoured to hinder the Romans from making of works quite round them, but the Enemy within having made an effort, they were forced to turn their Arms from those who were raising Works without, to those that were fighting on the inside, lest they should make an eruption through the middle of their Camp; by which means, the Dictator had time all night to perfect his Design. They fought therefore with the Consul till day; but as soon as it was light, being blocked up round by the Dictator, could hardly sustain the shock of one Army. Then the Quintian Forces, who immediately after they had done their Work, took up their Arms again, invaded the Bulwark, and began a new Fight, whilst the former continued as hot as before. Whereupon the Aequi being sore pressed on both sides, betook them, instead of fighting, to praying, and begged of the Dictator on the one side, and of the Consul on the other, That they would not place the Victory in the slaughter of their men, but let them go thence without their Arms. But they were ordered to go from the Consul to the Dictator, who being enraged, imposed this ignominy upon them, *That he would have Gracchus, and all their chief Officers brought to him bound; and that they should quit the Town of Corbio: for he did not stand in need of Aequian blood; but they might depart; though they should be publicly sold, to let the World see, their Nation was utterly subdued and vanquished.* The manner of selling their Prisoners of War, was by setting up three Spears, two of them erected, and the third across, like a Gallows, under which [which was called fugum] the Dictator made the Aequi pass.

XXIX. Having taken the Enemies Camp, which was full of all sorts of Provisions (for he sent them forth naked) he gave all the Booty to his own Soldiers only, and blamed the Consuls Army as well as himself, saying, You shall go without the spoils of that Enemy, to whom you had like to have been your selves a prey: and thou, L. Minucius! till thou hast the Soul and Courage of a Consul, shalt be only a Lieutenant in these Legions. So Lucius quitted his Consulship, and stayed with the Army according to the Dictators Order. But nevertheless the excellent Conduct of the Dictator so far obliged them to obedience, that the Army being more mindful of his kindness, than of the ignominy which he laid upon them, not only agreed to give him a Golden Crown of a pound weight, but when he Marched away, saluted him by the name of Patron. When he came to Rome, Q. Fabius, then Prefect of the City, having called a Senate, gave order that Quintius, with his Army, should enter the City with Triumph: the chief Officers of the Enemies being led before his Chariot, their Military Ensigns carried before him; and the Army following laden with spoils. At which time, they say, there were Feasts prepared before every House, and those that partook thereof followed his Chariot with Songs of Triumph and solemn Sports, like Men that are at merry makings. The same day also, L. Mamilius Tusculanus was made free of the City by general consent and approbation: and the Dictator had then laid down his Office, if it had not been for the Assembly in which M. Volscius the false Witness was to be Tried, which the Tribunes were not able to hinder, for fear of the Dictator. Volscius being condemned, went and lived in Banishment at Lanuvium; and Quintius the sixteenth day after he was made Dictator, for six Months withdrew himself from that Dignity. In which time Consul Nautius fought very bravely against the Sabines at Eretum; where besides the pillaging of their Country, the Sabines received a great loss of Men. Q. Fabius was made Successor to Minucius and sent into Algidum; and in the end of that Year the Tribunes began to talk of their Law: but because the two Armies were absent, though the Senate so far prevailed, that no Law should be proposed before the People, yet the Commons were so powerful as to Create the same Tribunes again the fifth time. They say, there were Wolves seen in the Capitol chased by Dogs; for which Prodigy, the Capitol was lustrated [i. e. purged by Sacrifice:] and these are the transactions of that Year.

XXX. The next Consuls were Q. Minucius and C. Horatius Pulvillus: in the beginning of whose Year, though they had Peace abroad, yet at home Seditions sprung from the same Tribunes and the same Law: which had proceeded much farther (so hot their fury was) had not the news come, as it were designedly, that the Garrison at Corbi was lost by an Assault of the Aequi, made in the night time. Thereupon the Consuls called a Senate, in which they were ordered to raise an Army with all speed, and lead it into Algidum. By which means they laid aside their Debate concerning the Law, and raised a new contest touching the Levy: in which the Power of the Consuls was out-done by the assistance of the Tribunes, besides another fear which then also came upon them: For it was reported, That an Army of Sabines was come down into the Roman Territories for Plunder, and were advancing from thence toward the City.

City. Which dreadful Message so scared them, that the Tribunes permitted the Soldiers to be raised, though not without this condition; That seeing they themselves had been fooled for five years together, and that would be but a small security to the People, there should be ten Tribunes made for the time to come. To which, necessity compelled the Senate to agree: only with this exception, or proviso, That they should never chuse the same Tribunes twice together. Wherefore the Tribunes (lest that, as well as other things, should be made void after the War was over) immediately called an Assembly; and in the thirty sixth Year from the time, that the first Tribunes of the People were made, chose ten Tribunes: two out of each Class; and so they ordained them to be afterward elected. Then having made their Levy, Minucius went against the Sabines, but found not the Enemy; whilst Horatius engaged the Aequi in Algidum, who, having slain all the Garrison at Corbio, had now taken Ortona also: There he killed a great many Men, and drove the Enemy not only out of Algidum, but from Corbio and Ortona also, the former of which places he likewise demolished for betraying the Garrison.

Then M. Valerius and Sp. Virginus were made Consuls: in whose time there was Peace both at home and abroad, but they wanted Provisions by reason of the illness of their Waters. There was a Law made for dividing the Aventine Mount among the People; and the same Tribunes were chosen again; who, the Year following, when T. Romilius and C. Veturius were Consuls, extolled their Law in all their Assemblies, and said, They were ashamed of their number, which was augmented to no purpose, if that affair must lye in their two years continuance, as it had done all the five years before. But whilst they were so busie in these matters, there came sad news from Tusculum, That the Aequi were in the Country about that place. Whereupon the late merit of that People made the Romans ashamed to defer their assistance; and therefore both the Consuls being sent with the Army found the Enemy posted in Algidum. There then they fell on fighting, and having killed above 7000 of the Enemies, put the rest to flight, and got a great Booty; which, because the Treasury was exhausted, the Consuls sold. But that made the Army hate them, and gave the Tribunes an occasion to accuse them before the People. Wherefore, when they went out of their Office, in the time that Sp. Tarpeius, and A. Haterius were Consuls, were summoned to their Tryal, Romilius by C. Claudius Cicero, Tribune of the People, and Veturius by L. Alienus, Aedile of the People, and both of them condemned, to the great grief of the Senate, Romilius in 6750, and Veturius in 1125 pounds. But this Calamity of these former Consuls did not make the following Consuls any thing slacker in their Duty: but they said, They might indeed be condemned as those two had been, yet the People and the Tribunes could not pass their Law. Then throwing aside the Law, which had been so long talked of, the Tribunes applied themselves to the Senate with more civility, and told them, That they would at last put an end to all their Debates; and if the Plebeian Laws displeased them, desired they would suffer such Law-makers to be chosen out of the People and the Senate too, as might equally study the benefit and liberty of both sides. The Senate did not condemn the Proposal, but said, No Man should propose a Law, unless he were a Senator. So then, having agreed of Laws, their only difference was about a Law-giver. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to Athens, whose names were Sp. Posthumius Albus, A. Manlius, and P. Sulpitius Camerinus, commanding them to Transcribe the famous Laws of Solon, and to observe the Institutions, Customs and Manners of other Grecian Cities.

This Year was quiet from all foreign Wars, but the next, in which P. Horatius and Sext. Quintilius were Consuls, was much more peaceable in that the Tribunes were all the time silent. But that was occasioned first by their expectation of the Embassadors that were gone to Athens, and of the Foreign Laws which they should bring back; and afterward by two extraordinary Calamities which befell them, that is to say, a Famine and a Pestilence, which was fatal both to Man and Beast, the Fields being laid waste, the City exhausted with daily Funerals, and many great Families in Mourning. To which you may add, that the Flamen Quirinalis [i. e. the chief Priest concerned in Sacrifices to Romulus] whose name was Ser. Cornelius, was dead, and the Augur C. Horatius Pulvillus too, into whose place the other Augurs chose C. Veturius, so much the rather, for that he had been Condemned by the People: At which time Consul Quintilius was also dead, and four Tribunes of the People; for that Year was defiled by a great Mortality, though they were free from disturbance by any Enemy. Then C. Menenius, and P. Sestius Capitolinus were Consuls; in whose time though there was not any Foreign War, yet there were stirs at home. And now the Embassadors were come back with the Athick Laws; which made the Tribunes the more urgent to have Laws drawn up. In order whereunto, they thought fit to make a sort of Officers called Decemviri without any Appeal, and so, as there should be no other Magistrate that Year. In that the doing of which, whether the Commons should be permitted to have any share was for some time disputed; but at last it was wholly referred to the Senate, provided they should not abrogate the Italic Law concerning the Mount Aventine, or any of the sacred Laws, touching the Authority of the Tribunes.

In the three hundred and first Year therefore after the Building of Rome, the form of their Government was again altered, the Sovereign Power being translated from Consuls to Decemviri, as it had been formerly from Kings to Consuls. But this change was less signal, because cause not lasting. For the joyful beginning of that Magistracy was too luxuriant, and therefore it fell the sooner to decay; inasmuch that the People desired, The Name and Authority of Consuls might be given to two persons again. But then the Decemviri were Created, whose names were Ap. Claudius, T. Genutius, P. Sestius, S. Petorius, C. Julius, A. Manlius, Serv. Sulpicius, P. Horatius, T. Romilius, and Sp. Postumius. Of whom Claudius and Genutius were made amends for the Honour of Consulship, which that Year they were designed to have had by this other honourable Office, and so likewise was Sestius, one of the Consuls the Year before, for having referred that matter to the Senate against his Collegues consent. Next to whom were the three Embassadors that went to Athens, but that, not only to reward them with Honour for their long Embassy, but because the Romans believed, they being well skilled in Foreign Laws would be Men very useful in making of new ones. As for the rest, they only filled up the number: of whom they say, That they were very old Men, and chosen last, that they might not too perty thwart the Orders or Proposals of the others. But the command of the whole Magistracy was in Appius only, through the favour of the People: for he had so changed his disposition, that he was grown a very Poplicola [i. e. a Courter of the People] all on the sudden, and mighty ambitious of popular applause, instead of being (what he once was) a violent and severe Persecutor of them. Every tenth day they each of them in their turns administered Justice to the People: on which day he who was the chief Justice for that time had twelve Lictors [or Serjeants] and the other nine of his Collegues had each of them one under Officer, called Accensus, to attend him. But there was an exact agreement between themselves (which might sometimes prove disadvantageous to private Persons) though the highest equity in respect of others at the same time. To shew their moderation, 'twill be enough if I give you but this one example of it. Though they were Created without Appeal; yet when a dead Corps, that was buried in the House of one P. Sestius, a Patrician, was found out, and brought forth into the publick Assembly, C. Julius, being the Decemvir in that case, which was as manifest as heinous, appointed Sestius a day for Tryal, and was his Accuser before the People, though he himself was the lawful Judge of it; foregoing his own right, and making an addition to the Peoples Liberty, by what he diminished from the Authority of his own Office.

XXXIV. This way of administering Justice so incorruptly, as from an Oracle, both rich and poor took great notice of; and then they applied themselves to making of Laws: in which affair having raised the Peoples expectation to a pitch, by shewing them the ten Tables, they summoned the Commons to an Assembly; where wishing all happiness and prosperity to the Commonwealth, themselves, and their Children, they bad them go and read the Laws proposed; for they (as much as ten Men were capable to do) had made such Laws as were equitable and agreeable both to the highest and the lowest rank of Men: but they knew the understanding and advice of the People might make some addition to them. Wherefore they desired them to weigh every part of them, and to discourse with one another about it, producing their Reasons for what was too much or too little in any case. For the Roman People should have such Laws, as the general consent of all the People might not seem to have passed, when they were preferred so much, as to have preferred them. When therefore the People had conferred concerning each Article of those Laws, and found them correct enough, they were confirmed in the Assembly, called Comitia Centuriata, by the Name of the Laws of the ten Tables; being to this day even amidst such an heap of other Laws, which have been made one upon another, the fountain of all publick and private Justice. But then there was a rumour spread abroad, That there were two Tables wanting; which if they were added, the Body, as it were, of the whole Roman Law would be compleat. Which expectation, when the day of the Assembly drew nigh, made them have a mind to make the same Decemviri again. For the People, besides that they hated the name of Consuls as much as that of Kings, did not so much as seek after the Tribunes assistance, because the Decemviri allowed one another to hear any great Cause over again, as if they had granted an Appeal.

XXXV. But when the Assembly for choosing of the Decemviri was appointed to be holden 27 days after, there arose such a general ambition among Men, that the very Heads of the City (for fear, I suppose, lest if they should not take it, some mean unworthy fellows would get the possession of that great Honour and Authority) went about to beg Votes, and humbly sued for Honour, which they themselves with all their industry impugned, from that People, with whom they had before contended. Now therefore his dignity being in danger, his being at that Age, and having enjoyed such Honours, so nettled Ap. Claudius, that you could not tell whether you ought to have reckoned him among the Decemviri or the Candidates; for he sometimes look'd more like to one that stood for, than one that bore an Office: being used to accuse the Nobility, but extoll even the slightest and meanest of the Candidates, and running into the Forum through the midst of the Duilians and Jeilians, to recommend himself by them to the People: till such time as his Collegues, who at that time extremely devoted to him, turning their eyes upon him, admired what his design was, and thought there was no sincerity in him; for they said, His courtesie could not be without some end, in him especially who was a person of so much pride: that he submitted and debased himself too much, and that to converse so much with private Persons was not the part of a Man who was hastening to quit an Office, as of one that sought out means to continue it. But yet not daring to withstand his ambition with open force, they endeavoured to defeat him by a seeming compliance and respect: for they consented to put him, though he was the youngest of them, upon holding the Assembly. But their design was, to hinder him from choosing himself, which besides the Tribunes of the People (who in that shewed a very ill example) no man had ever done. Whereupon he, in good time, he hoped, declaring, that he was to hold the Assembly, made that his opportunity which they intended as an obstruction: and having at the meeting degraded the two Quintii (Capitolinus and Cincinnatus) with his Uncle C. Claudius, a most constant defender of the Nobility, besides some others of the best Citizens, created Decemviri much inferior to them, of which himself was the first: which action all good Men so disapproved, that they did not believe he would have dared to do it. With him were chosen M. Cornelius Maluginensis, M. Sergius, L. Minucius, Q. Fabius Vibulanus, Q. Patilius, T. Antonius Merenda, Cæso Duilius, Sp. Oppius Cornicen, and Man. Rabuleius. U. C. 302.

That was the last time that Appius took upon him the guise of another Man; beginning from thence forward to live like himself, and to make his new Collegues even before they were got into their places, conform to his own manners. In order whereunto they met every day where no body was by to hear them; and there being inspired with tyrannical designs, which they in secret hatched, they now began to shew their pride, being very seldom accessible, and difficult to be spoken withall, till they brought the matter to bearing upon the Ides of May, which at that time was the solemn time for Magistrates to enter upon their Offices. They therefore at the beginning of that Magistracy made the first day of their Honour very signal by the denunciation of great terror to the People: for whereas the former Decemviri had always used to have the Fasces singly, and that Ensign of Sovereignty went round to them all in their turns, they presently appeared each one with twelve Fasces [i. e. bundles of Rods with Axes in the middle of them] an hundred and twenty Lictors filling the Forum, with Rods and Axes bound up in them. Nor would they keep their Axes at home [but shew them publicly] since they were chosen without Appeal. Inasmuch that they look'd like so many Kings; which multiplied the fears not only of the meanest sort of Men, but even the best of the Senate, who thought they had a mind to find some pretence and occasion for slaughter; so that if any one either of the Senators or the People spoke but a word concerning Liberty, the Rods and Axes might be made ready for a terror to others. For besides that the People had no security, now that their Appeal was taken away, they had by consent abolished that practice also of referring matters, for a second hearing, to one another: though the former Decemviri had permitted the Judgments by them given to be corrected by their Collegues: yea, had referred some things to the People, of which they themselves were the proper Judges. Wherefore for some time all People were possessed with equal fears; which by degrees were all concentrated in the Commons. For they meddled not with the Senators, but were very extravagant and cruel in their designs against the meaner sort of Men. Nor did they at all consider the cause, but the Man; but such Magistrates, as set up favour in the room of equity. For they contrived their determinations at home, and only pronounced them in the Forum. If any one appealed to a Collegue, he went away from him, that he came to, repenting that he had not stood to the Decree of the former. There was also a report (though no body knew the Author of it) that they had not only conspired to do great mischief at the present, but had made a private agreement and sworn to it among themselves, that they would not hold any publick Assemblies; but would make themselves a perpetual Decemvirate by keeping that power in their hands which they were then possessed of.

Thereupon the Commons began to look into the Senators faces, to see if they could find any hopes of Liberty from them, whom they had so much feared would be the Authors of their Slavery, as to reduce the Commonwealth into its present state. But the chief of the Senate all hated both the Decemviri and the People; and though they did not approve of what was done, yet they thought the Commons deserved it; nor would they assist such Men, as running headlong after Liberty had met with slavery instead on't. Yea, they did heap upon them all the injuries they could, to the end, that through the uneasiness of their present condition, they might be brought at length to desire two Consuls and the former state of things again. By this time the great part of the Year was gone, and two Tables of Laws were added to the ten, set up the Year before: nor was there any thing now remaining, if those Laws were once confirmed, to make that Magistracy necessary in the Commonwealth, and People expected, that an Assembly should be suddenly held for the creating of two Consuls. But the Commons chief care was, how they should restore the Power of the Tribunes, that fence of Liberty, which had been so long broken down; whilst in the mean time there was no talk of any Assembly, and the Decemviri, who at first were attended by none but such as favoured the Tribunes (because that was popular and grateful to the Commons) had gotten a Retinue of Patrician Youths about them, who stood in Troops all round the Tribunals. These Men committed what violence they pleased upon the Persons and Estates of the Commons; since fortune (whatsoever they desired) was of the stronger side. Now therefore they abstained not even from corporal punishments; some being beaten with the Rods, and others beheaded with the Ax; which cruelty left it should seem undeserving, the Estates of them that suffered were made to follow their possessors punishment. By which reward the young Nobility being corrupted, would not only not resist the Tyranny of the Decemviri, but also publicly shewed, that they desired to enjoy their own licentious humour, more than the Liberty of the People.

XXXVIII.

The Ides of May were now come, but no new Magistrates being chosen, those same Persons (though private Men, and not Decemviri) usurping as much authority as ever they did, came forth into the publick with all the Ensigns of Honour. That look'd so like a Kingly Government, that the People lamented the loss of their Liberty which they were never like to regain; for they neither had any present view or future prospect of one to vindicate them. Nor did they only despond among themselves, but began to be contemned by their Neighbours also, who could not endure to see those People Govern, who themselves had lost their Liberty. Wherefore the Sabines made an incursion into the Roman Territories with a great Army; and having pillaged the Country far and near (from whence they had driven great numbers of Men and Beasts without any molestation) they mustered up their stragling Forces, and pitched their Camp at Eretum: placing all their hopes in the discord at Rome, which they supposed would be a stop to any new Levies. Whereupon not only Messengers, but the Country folks themselves running about the City possessed the People with fear: the Decemviri consulted what they had best do, whilst Fortune also added new terror to their dubious circumstances, who between the hatred of the Senate and the People were already destitute of any means to help themselves. For the Aequi pitched their Camp on the other side in Algidum; from whence, Embassadors out of Tusculum came, and brought news, that they made excursions and plundered the Tusculan Fields, desiring the Romans to assist them. But such a fear seized upon the Decemviri, that seeing two Enemies lay round the City, they were forced to consult the Senate. Wherefore they ordered the Senators to be summoned, though they were not ignorant what a storm of envy was coming upon them; supposing, That the Senate would lay all the guilt of the Countries being pillaged, and the imminent dangers in which the City was, at their door; and that then the Senate would attempt to abolish their Magistracy, if they did not unanimously resist it, and by being severe upon some few bold men prevent the endeavours of others. When the Cryers voice was heard in the Forum, calling the Senate into the Court to the Decemviri, it was so strange a thing (for they had long intermitted the custom of consulting the Senate) that the People wondered, what the matter was, or how they came to resume a thing which they had so long left off; saying, they might thank their Enemies, and even War it self, that any old custom was restored which had been usual in that once free City. Wherefore they began to look all about the Forum for Senators, but finding very few, they look'd toward the Senate-house, in which they saw none but the Decemviri (for the Decemviri themselves knew that their Authority was generally hated, and the People thought the Senators did not meet, because no private Persons (as the Decemviri then were) had Power to summon them;) wherefore they took this for a good opportunity to attempt the recovering of their Liberty, if the People should accompany the Senate, and as the Senators, though summoned, did not appear, so the People should withstand the Levy. Thus the People muttered: whilst there was hardly e're a Senator in the Forum, and but very few in the City; for they were so disgusted at the management of affairs that they were gone into the Country; minding their own business only, but neglecting the publick; and thinking themselves so far out of harms way, as they could get from the conversation or sight of such Tyrannical Masters. They therefore not coming according to the Summons, the Decemviri sent their Officers all about to their several Houses, not only to distrain upon their Goods, but to enquire, Whether they staid away on purpose? But they brought answer back, That the Senators were in the Country. With which the Decemviri were better pleased, than if they had been at home, and refused to obey their Authority. Wherefore they ordered, that they should be all sent for, and appointed a Senate the day following: which being more numerous than was expected, the People thought their Liberty was betrayed by the Senators, for that they appeared at the Summons of such Persons (who being out of Office, were no more, nor had no more Power than private Men, unless they used violence) as though they had called them thither by Legal Authority.

XXXIX.

But though they came pretty readily into the Court, we hear they did not so easily submit in giving their opinions there. For 'tis reported that L. Valerius Potitus, after Ap. Claudius had spoken, and before their opinions were desired, asking leave to say somewhat of the Commonwealth, the Decemviri with menaces forbid him; whereupon protesting he would go forth to the People, he went and raised a Tumult. M. Horatius Barbatus too was as fierce, they say, as he; calling them ten Tarquins, and putting them in mind that the Kings were banished by the Valerii and Horatii. Not that Men were then weary of the Name of King (for it was a Title fit for Jove himself, and a stile given not only to Romulus the founder of their City, but to all the succeeding Kings, being yet also solemnly retained among the Priests) but it was the pride and violence of a King which they hated. If then such voices were not tolerable either in their present King, or the Son of that King, who can brook them in so many private Men? Let them take heed, lest by forbidding Men to speak freely in the Senate-house they provoked them to make a noise when they were out of it. Nor could he see any reason, why he, though a private Man, might not as well assemble the People, as they the Senate. Whenever they pleased they might try how much harder it was to vindicate their Liberty, than for them to desire a continuation of their unjust Dominion. They talk of a Sabine War, as if there could be any War more fatal to the Roman People, than what they waged with them; who though they were made on purpose to establish Laws, had left no Law in the City: having abolished all Assemblies, annual Magistrates, and the turns of Governing, which was the only means to make all People equally free, yea, though they were private Men, had the Ensigns and Authority of Kings. There had been formerly, after the Kings were expelled, Magistrates made out of the Patricians, and after that (when the People separated themselves into the sacred Mount) out of the People too; desiring to know, which Order they were of. Of the People? What did they do with the Peoples advice or consent? Of the Nobility? Why had they not had a Senate then almost this whole Year; and now they had one, forbid any Man to speak in behalf of the Commonwealth? He therefore admonished them not to place too much hopes in other folks fears; for Men now thought they suffered more than they feared.

Horatius having made this bold Speech, the Decemviri could not tell whether they should be angry or pleased, nor what would become of the business, till at last C. Claudius, who was Uncle to Appius the Decemvir, made a Speech more like a Petition, than an invective, or reprimand, desiring him, for his Brothers and Appius's Fathers sake, to remember that civil Society in which he was born, rather than that cursed League which he had made with his Collegues: that he desired he would so do much more upon his own account than that of the publick. For the Commonwealth would have right done it, if not by Men of violence, at least by some body even against their wills: but that great quarrels commonly arise from great disputes, of which he dreaded the event. Now though the Decemviri forbid any Man to speak of any thing but what they had proposed, yet they could not in modesty interrupt Claudius; wherefore he made an end of his Speech, and told them he was of opinion, That no Decree of Senate ought then to be made. Which saying of his, all Men interpreted, as if he had look'd upon the Decemviri as private persons: for upon that score many Consular Men subscribed to what he declared. But there was another opinion amongst them, which though it seemed somewhat harsher, had less force in it; by which it was advised, that the Senators should meet and make an Interrex. For those that were of that opinion, by applying themselves to the Court in such a manner, acknowledged some kind of authority in those that called that Senate, whereas the other party, who would have no Decree made at that time, had made them only private persons. By this means the Cause of the Decemviri growing weak, L. Cornelius Maluginensis, Brother to M. Cornelius the Decemvir, being reserved, of all the Consular Men, on purpose to speak last, pretended a great concernment for the War, and took occasion thereby to defend his Brother and all his Collegues; saying, He wondered how it should happen, that they who had fought after the Decemvirate so earnestly themselves, should either alone, or more than any others, oppose the Decemviri? Or how it came to pass, that though for so many months when the City was at quiet, no Man made any question, whether they were legal Magistrates that had the sovereign Power in their hands, they should now engage in Civil Quarrels, when their Enemies were almost at their Gates; unless perhaps they thought, amidst such disturbances, it might not so well be discerned what they did. But he thought it not fair or just for any Man, now when their minds should be employed with greater matters, to make any other thing the ground of delay to such a weighty affair. For his part he would agree, that whereas Valerius and Horatius pretended the Decemviri were out of their Office before the Ides of May, the Senate, when the Wars were over, and the Commonwealth at rest, should debate of it: and that even now Appius Claudius should so prepare himself as to give an account of that Assembly, which he, being a Decemvir himself, held for the creating of the Decemviri; and should put it to the question, whether they were created for one year only, or for so long time till what Laws were lacking should be passed. But he thought best at present to omit all other things except the War: concerning which, if common fame was false, and not only other Messengers, but even the Tusculan Embassadors also brought them wrong intelligence, they should send out Scouts, to find the certainty, and bring a true relation of it. But if they believed the Messengers and the Embassadors, they ought to make a Levy as soon as they could: and the Decemviri to lead the Armies wherever they pleased, without any other cause to obstruct them.

The Junior Senators so over-voted the rest of the House as to make them comply with this advice. Therefore Valerius and Horatius rising up again more vehement than before, cried out, They would have leave to speak touching the Commonwealth; that they would speak to the People, if the Faction would not let them do so there: for no private persons could hinder them either in the Senate-house, or any other Assembly; nor would they yield to such imaginary Authority. Then Appius, supposing that their Power was like to be ruined, if they did not resist the violence of those Men with equal audacity, cried out, It had been better for you to have spoken to the business in hand; and to Valerius, who said, He would not hold his tongue for any private person, he commanded a Lictor to go and seize him. Upon which Valerius, at the door of the Senate-house, calling the Romans to witness of what he had done, L. Cornelius took Appius in his Arms, and though he did not consult the good of him which he seemed to save, decided the contest: so that Valerius, by Cornelius's means, had leave to say what he would. But his Liberty reaching no farther than words, the Decemviri had their ends. The Consular Men also and the Seniors, by reason of that remaining grudge they had to the Tribunes

XLI.

XLI.

Power, which they thought the People were more in love with than the Authority of the Consuls, were even better pleased afterward that the Decemviri should go out of their Office voluntarily, than that the People should rise again through hatred to them. For if the matter were gently managed, so as to put the Consuls into their former state without popular noise and tumult, the People might possibly (either by the interposition of Wars, or moderation of the Consuls in their Office) be brought to forget the Tribunes. So then the Senate agreed to make a Levy; and the Juniors, seeing the Power of the Decemviri was without Appeal, answered to their Names. When therefore the Legions were raised, the Decemviri chose among themselves fit Persons to go into the War, and to Command the Army. The chief of the Decemviri were Q. Fabius and Ap. Claudius: but the War seemed greater at home than abroad. They therefore thought that Appius's violence was more fit to appease the City Tumults; and that Fabius, though a Person of no great constancy in good Actions, was very skillful in Military Affairs. For the Decemviri and his Colleague had so altered this Man, who had been formerly very famous for his Conduct both in Peace and War, that he chose rather to be like Appius than himself. To him therefore they committed the management of the War against the Sabines, making Man. Rabuleius, and Q. Petilius his Colleagues; whilst M. Cornelius, with L. Minucius, T. Antonius, Cæso Dullius and M. Sergius, was sent into Algidum; Sp. Oppius being, by general consent, left assistant to Ap. Claudius in the Government and Defence of the City.

XLII. But the Commonwealth was managed no better in the Wars than it was at home: though the Commanders only fault was, that they had made themselves odious to their fellow Citizens; but the rest of the blame lay all upon the Soldiers: who to hinder any thing from being ever done prosperously under the Conduct of the Decemviri, permitted them to be overcome, though to their own as well as their Leaders dishonour. So they were routed not only by the Sabines at Eretum, but by the Æqui in Algidum. Whereupon making haft from Eretum in the night time they pitched their Camp on a rising ground more near the City, between Fidenæ and Crustumena: to which place seeing the Enemies pursued them, they never engaged in a fair Battel, but defended themselves by the Situation of the place, and with a Bullwark, not by their Courage or Arms. But their offence in Algidum was far greater, and so was their slaughter too: besides that, they lost their Camp also, with all their Baggage, and ran away to Tusculum, where they hoped (nor failed they then of their expectation) to live by the kindness and mercy of those old friends they had there. In the mean time such dreadful news was brought to Rome, that laying aside their hatred to the Decemviri, the Senate thought fit to set Watches all about the City: commanding all that could bear Arms to secure the Walls, and stand in Garisons before the Gates. Nor only so, but they ordered Arms and supplies to be sent to Tusculum; and that the Decemviri should go from the Castle of Tusculum into a Camp: that the other Camp should be transferred from Fidenæ into the Sabine Territories; and that, by a voluntary Attack upon them, the Enemies should be deterred from making any attempt upon the City.

XLIII. To the slaughter received from the Enemy, the Decemviri added two horrid Exploits, the one in the Wars, and the other at home. The first of which was this: There was one L. Siccus in the Country of the Sabines, who, through the hatred which he bore to the Decemviri, having talked privately with the common Soldiers about creating Tribunes, and of a secession or departure of the People, was sent before as a Scout to view the place where they should incamp; the Soldiers that were sent along with him, being commanded, when they came to a convenient place, to murder him. But they did not do it without some kind of retaliation: for many of the Ruffians fell before him as he made resistance; for he defended himself, though surrounded by them, with a Courage proportionable to the mighty strength of his Body. The rest came and brought news to the Camp, that Siccus was surprized, but lost his life very manfully, and that some of the other Soldiers died with him. They believed the Messengers, and sent a Party to bury those who were slain, by permission of the Decemviri: who when they saw ne'r a Body there rifled, but Siccus lying in the middle, Armed, with all their Bodies turned toward him, and no body or footsteps of any Enemy that either was there or gone away, they concluded he was certainly killed by their own Soldiers, and so brought back the Corps. Whereupon the Camp was filled with envy, and would have had the Body of Siccus straight carried to Rome, had not the Decemviri made haste to prepare a Military Funeral for him at the publick expence. So he was buried with great lamentations among the Soldiers, and the Decemviri were very ill spoken of among the vulgar People.

XLIV. This was attended with another crime in the City which was occasioned by lust: being no less fatal in the event, than that, which for the Rape and death of Lucretia, had expelled the Tarquins out of the City and Kingdom: so that the Decemviri did not only come to the same end, as the Kings had done, but the cause also of their losing their Authority was the very same. Ap. Claudius was instigated by Lust to ravish an ordinary Plebeian Damself; whose Father, L. Virginus, was a Captain in Algidum; being a Man of a good life both at home and in the War, nor were his Wife and Children less vertuous. This Virginus had espoused his Daughter to one L. Icilius, a favourer of the Tribunes, who was a keen Man, and very well known to be a great stickler for the People's Interest. Appius therefore being inflamed with Love, endeavoured to win this Maid (who was at Womans estate, and very Beautiful) by morny and fair promises; but when he saw her every way guarded with modesty and chastity, applied his mind to cruel and outrageous violence. He employed and suborned M. Claudius, a Client of his, to challenge her for his Slave, and not to yield to any who should require she might be free 'till the Tryal of her Liberty was over: for he thought; that now her Father was absent, he had the better opportunity to do her wrong. Whereupon, as the Maid was coming into the Forum (where in Shops were petit Schools) the Decemvirs servant laid his lustful hands upon her, saying, She was the Daughter of his Bondswoman, and herself a Slave; and commanding her to follow him, or he'd drag her away by force. The poor Girl being amazed at the surprize, her Nurse cried out, and desired the People to assist her, which made a great concourse about them. By which means the crowd, who knew her Father Virginus and her Lover Icilius to be very popular Men, were upon their account, and the indignity offered to her, ready to help the Virgin. So she was rescued from his violence; but he told them, They need not make a tumult; he would take a more legal course, and not use force. He therefore warned her to appear before the Magistrate, whilst those that were present, advised her to follow him. When they came before Appius, the Plaintiff tells the story to the Judge (who knew it all before, as being himself the contriver of it,) That she was born in his House, and thence by stealth conveyed to the House of Virginus, whose Wife brought her up as her own Child: that he could prove, and would prove it by Virginus's own Confession, who was most concerned in that injury: but that, in the mean time, it was but just a Servant, as she was, should go along with her Master. To which the Girls Advocates made answer, and said, That Virginus was absent in the service of the Commonwealth, but would be there in two days, if he had notice of the affair: that it was unreasonable there should be any dispute concerning his Children in his absence; wherefore they desired the whole matter might be put off 'till his return: that he would suffer her to have her freedom (according to a Law, which he himself had made) 'till the Tryal were over, and not let a Maid of her Age undergo the hazard of her good Name, before that of her Liberty.

Then Appius told them in a Preface to his Decree, That very Law, which Virginus's friends brought to back their request, declared how much he favoured Liberty: but that would not be a sure guard for Liberty, where the cause was altered and varied by difference of cases and persons. For to those persons, who were to be made free, because any Man may sue, what they said was Law; but in the case of that Maid, who was in her Father's custody, there was no body else, to whom the Master of her could resign his possession: wherefore he thought fit that her Father should be sent for, though in the mean time he that challenged her should not lose his right, but should take the Girl home with him, upon security, to bring her again into Court, when he came, who was her pretended Father. Against this unjust Decree there were many who murmured, but ne'r an one of them durst say a word; 'till P. Numitorius the Girls Uncle, and her Lover Icilius came in: for whom the crowd made way; but just as the Multitude were thinking that by the Interposition of Icilius they might be able to thwart Appius, the Licitor cried out, He has Deceed it, and with that put by Icilius, who was very loud upon the point. Whereupon, though his nature was very mild, he was inflamed by that indignity, and said, Appius! You should remove me hence with a Dagger, that you may have that kept private which you would fain conceal. Know, I am to marry this Maid, who is to be my chaste Wife. Wherefore call all your own Licitors, and those of your Colleagues too, about you, and bid them make ready your Rods and Axes, yet Icilius's Sweetheart shall not tarry any where without her Father's Doors. No, though you have taken away the Tribunes aid, and their Appeal from the People of Rome (which were the two forts, whereby to defend our Liberty) it does not follow that your Lust must tyrannize over our Children, and our Wives too. Exert your malice upon our backs and necks, but let our Chastity at least be secure. If she suffer any violence, I will conjure the Romans, as she is my Spouse, Virginus the Soldiers, as she is his Daughter, and all of us implore both Gods and Men to vindicate her quarrel; nor shalt thou ever repeat that Decree without first killing of me. I desire thee, Appius, to consider well what thou art going to do: And let Virginus, when he comes, take care what he does concerning his Daughter: only let him know this, that if he does not vindicate her, he must get her another Husband. But in the mean time I'll lose my life in asserting my Mistress's Liberty, rather than my honour by deserting her.

With that the Multitude was much incensed, and a tumult like to arise; but the Licitors stood about Icilius, and so it proceeded no farther than hard words: upon which Appius began and said, Virginus was not defended by Icilius, but a turbulent Man, who even at that time had a great desire to be a Tribune, sought an occasion to move Sedition: though he'd give him no reason at that time. Yet, that he might know, he did not refrain upon the score of his petulance, but for the sake of Virginus (who was absent) out of respect to the name of a Father, and the care he had to preserve every ones Liberty, though he would not pass sentence that day, nor make any Decree, but would desire of M. Claudius, to quit his right in some measure, and let the Girl be vindicated next day, yet if her Father did not then appear, he assured Icilius, and others like him, that his Law should not want an asserter, nor a Decemvirs constancy. Not that he would call together his Colleagues Licitors to correct the Authors of sedition, but would be content with his own. Wherefore

the time of Tryal being put off, and the Girls Advocates being gone away, they thought good first of all, that Icilius's Brother, and Numitorius's Son, two active young Lads, should go immediately and fetch Virginius with all speed out of the Camp: for thereupon depended the Girls Life, that the vindicator of the injury done to her, should be present in Court next day, at the time appointed. They therefore went as they were ordered, and being on Horseback Galloped the sooner to carry Virginius the news. In the mean time, he that challenged the Girl, being very urgent to have Security for her appearance (which Icilius said he was seeking as fast as he could, as being mighty industrious to delay the time till the Messengers were got to the Camp) the Multitude all round him held up their hands, and thereby shewed, they were ready each man of them to be security for Icilius. To whom he replied, I thank you; to morrow I'll make use of you, at present I have Security enough. So Virginia was vindicated by the Security which her Relations gave. Appius having staid there some little time, lest he should seem to have fate upon that account only, and seeing that all the People neglected their own affairs out of the care and concern they had upon them for that single Damsel, (so that no Body applied themselves to him) he went home, and wrote to his Collegues in the Camp, That they should not give Virginius any furlow [or leave to come away from his Colours] but, more than that, to keep him in safe Custody. Which wicked advice was, as it ought to have been, too late: for Virginius having got leave, was come away at the first Watch [about the edg of night] and the Letter for his detainment came to no purpose the next morning.

XLVII. As soon as it was day, the whole City stood in the Forum, full of expectation, till Virginius, clad in sordid Apparel, [as Mourners use to be] led his Daughter (who was in the like attire) down into the Forum, being accompanied with several Matrons, and a great number of Advocates. There going about to get the Peoples favour, he did not beg of them, but challenged their assistance as his due: saying, That he stood every day in the Army for their Wives and Children; nor was there any other Man that had more strenuous and brisk actions to brag of. What good did it do him, though the City were safe, if his Children must suffer all the extremities of captivity? Thus he went about talking to the People, as if he had been, in a manner, at a publick Assembly. Icilius also said the like; but the Women that went along with them moved the People much more with their silent tears than they did with all they said. Against all which Appius was very obstinate (so great is the force of madness rather than love) and went up into the Tribunal: where the Plaintiff beginning to complain, that he was hindered by popular ambition from having justice done him the day before; before either he could make an end of his request, or Virginius be admitted to speak, Appius prevented and interrupted them. What he said before his Decree (though perchance old Authors have told us true enough, yet) because I find nothing probable to be said in the case of such an unworthy Decree, I think fit to give you that which is certain just barely as it lies, That he Decreed she should be a slave. Whereupon all People were at first amazed with admiration to see so heinous a thing done: but then were for some time silent. After which, as M. Claudius amidst all the Matrons went to seize the Maid, being received with a lamentable moan which they made, Virginius offering to strike Appius, told him, I have betrothed my Daughter to Icilius, not to thee; and have bred her up to make a Wife, not a Whore on. Wouldst thou, like Beasts, make use promiscuously of any bedfellow? I cannot tell, whether these People can endure it, but I hope they will not that have Arms about them. With that he that challenged the Maid being repelled by the crowd of Women and Advocates that stood about her, the Cryer commanded silence.

XLVIII. Then the Decemvir, having his mind abandoned to lust, said, He could prove, not only by Icilius's railing, and Virginius's violence, whereof the Roman People were his witness, but by certain evidence also, that there were Cabals in the City all night long for raising of Sedition. For which reason he, who knew their Design, came thither attended with Men in Arms; not to hurt any Man, that was quiet, but by his Authority to restrain such as disturbed the Peace of the City: therefore it had been better for them to have been quiet. Go, Licor! said he, put by the crowd, and make way for the Master to seize his Slave. As soon as he had so said (with a thundering voice and full of rage) the Multitude removed of their own accord, and the deserted Maid stood there as a prey to injustice. Then Virginius seeing he had no manner of assistance by him, said, I beseech you, Appius! first to pardon a Fathers grief, if I have said any thing too severe against thee: and then, suffer the nurse, here in the presence of the Maid, to inquire what the matter really is: to the end, that if I am falsely called her Father, I may go hence the better satisfied. Having obtained leave, he led his Daughter and the Nurse near to the Temple of Cloacina by the Shops, which are now called, The new ones, and there snatching a knife from a Butcher, cried out, Thus, Daughter! (since I can do it no other way) do I vindicate thy Liberty: and with that he stabbed her; looking back toward the Tribunal, and saying, Appius! with this blood I destine thee to Death. Thereupon a great uproar being made at the sight of such an horrid act, Appius was moved, and commanded Virginius to be laid hold on; but he with his Sword made way wherever he went, till he, and the Multitude also that followed him, came to the Camp. In the mean time Icilius and Numitorius taking up the dead Body, shewed it to the People, deploring Appius's Injustice, the Girls unhappy Beauty, and the necessity of her Fathers doing what he did: Whilst the Matrons that followed cried out, Was that the consequence of getting Children? Was that the reward of Chastity? With other expostulations, which in such a case female sorrow the more it drowns their weak reason, with the greater aggravation suggests. But the Men, and especially Icilius, were wholly taken up in exclaiming, that the Tribunes Power, and the Appeal to the People, were taken away, besides other publick abuses.

The Multitude was stirred up, partly by the heinousness of the Fact, and partly through hopes of having then an opportunity to recover their Liberty. Appius gave order one while that Icilius should be called, another while, that if he would not come willingly, he should be dragged thither; and at last, seeing the Serjeants could not get to him, he himself, with a company of Patrician young Men, going through the crowd, commanded him to be carried to Prison. But at this time there were about Icilius, not only the Multitude, but the Leaders of the Multitude also, L. Valerius, and M. Horatius; who, repelling the Licor, told him, If he were come to take him upon a legal account, they would vindicate Icilius from any private person: and if he endeavoured to take him by force, there were those, that would be hard enough for him. Hence arose a great squabble, the Licor setting upon Valerius and Horatius, whilst the Multitude broke his Fasces [i. e. Rods] all to pieces. Appius therefore went up into the Assembly; Horatius and Valerius followed him, and then the Assembly would hearken to, though they bawled when Appius spoke. And now Valerius with Authority commanded the Licors to depart from that private Man; inasmuch that Appius, whose heart was broken, being in fear of his life, got into an House near the Forum, unknown to his Adversaries, with his head covered. Then Sp. Oppius, to assist his Collegue, came furiously into the Forum on the other side; but saw the Government overcome by strength. Whereupon advising with several People, and agreeing to every thing they said, he was afraid, though he had many to back him, when he ordered a Senate to be called. Which Action, because great part of the Senators seemed to dislike the Acts of the Decemviri, appeased the Multitude out of hopes which they had that in that Senate their Power would come to an end. The Senate also thought fit not only to avoid provoking the Multitude, but much more to provide, lest Virginius's arrival should cause any commotion in the Army. Wherefore some of the Junior Senators were sent to the Camp, which was at that time on the Mountain Velitius, to tell the Decemviri, That they must do their utmost to keep the Soldiers from mutinying; among whom Virginius caused a greater disturbance than he had left behind him in the City. For besides, that he was seen to come with a Party of almost four hundred Men, who, moved by the indignity of his misfortune, had made themselves his Companions, the knife was also naked in his hand, and himself all sprinkled with Blood, which made the whole Camp stare upon him; and the sight of so many Roman Gowns in the Camp made the Multitude of Citizens seem somewhat more than they were. When they asked him, What the matter was? he cried, and for a good while said never a word, but after the crowd of those that flocked about him stood still, and silence was commanded, he told them all things in order as they were transacted. Which having done, he held up his hands, and begged of his fellow Soldiers, That they would not impute that to him which was Ap. Claudius's crime, nor hate him as a Murderer of his own Children. That his Daughter was more dear to him than his life; if she could have lived to enjoy her Liberty and preserve her Chastity: But when he saw her dragged like a Slave to be made a Whore on, he thought it better for him to lose his Child by death than by disgrace. That he through his mercy to her was fallen into a show of cruelty; nor would he have survived his Daughter, unless he had been in hopes, by the help of his fellow Soldiers to revenge her Death. They also he knew, had Daughters and Wives; nor was the lust of Ap. Claudius extinguished by his Daughters death, but that the more he escaped punishment, the more extravagant he would be. That by another Mans calamity they were taught to provide against the like injury. As for his part, his Wife was dead; his Daughter, because she could live no longer in Chastity, died a miserable, but an honest death: wherefore Appius's lust had now no temptation in his house. That he would vindicate his own Body from any other violence which he could offer, with the same Courage that he did that of his Daughter. Let other men look to themselves and their Children. As Virginius raved out to this purpose, the Multitude answered him with shouts, and said, They would not be wanting either to revenge his grief, or vindicate their own Liberty. Upon which the Citizens that were mixt in the crowd of Soldiers, complaining to the same effect, and telling them how much worse things would have look'd if they had seen them, than they were represented; affirming also, that Rome was in a tumult, and that there was news brought of Appius's being almost killed and gone into Banishment, they persuaded them to make an Alarm, to take up the Ensigns, and march toward Rome. The Decemviri being startled at what they saw, as well as that which they had done at Rome, ran to the several parts of the Camp, to appease the tumults. Where though they proceeded with all mildness, they had no answer but this, that if any of them pretended to Government, they [i. e. the Soldiers] were Men and in Arms. So they went into the City with a full body, and sat down upon the Aventine; from whence, as the People came that way, they exhorted them to retrieve their Liberty, and make new Tribunes of the People: nor was there any other angry word heard. Sp. Oppius called a Senate; in which they did not think fit to proceed roughly, for that they themselves had given the occasion for that Sedition: but they sent three Embassadors, who were Consullar Men, viz. Sp. Tarpeius, C. Julius and P. Sulpicius, to ask them in the name of the Senate, By whose Order they left their Camp? or what they meant by posting themselves upon the Aventine? and turning the War from their Enemies, to invade their own Country? To which they wanted not an answer, but only some body to give it; as having yet no certain Leader, nor daring singly to expose themselves to envy. Only this the Multitude said all together, if they would lend L. Valerius and M. Horatius to them, they would give them their answer.

LI. The Embassadors being dismissed, Virginis told the Soldiers, They had wavered in a business of some consequence just before, because the Multitude was without an Head: for their answer was made, though not to their disadvantage, yet more by chance than any unanimous design of theirs. Wherefore he would have them make ten Officers, who should govern in Chief, and in a Military stile, be called the Tribunes of the Soldiers. Whereupon that Honour being first offered to him, he replied, Reserve this your good opinion of me 'till I and you are in better circumstances. My Daughter will not let any Honour be agreeable to me as long as I live, nor is it convenient, whilst the Commonwealth is thus disturbed, for them to govern you, who are themselves most obnoxious to envy. If you have any occasion for me, I'll serve you nevertheless though I am a private person. So they made ten Tribunes Military. Nor did the Army in the Sabine Country lie still: for there also Isilius and Numitorius had persuaded them to a Revolt from the Decemviri; the death of Siccinius being remembred with as much abhorrence, as the late news of Virginis being so basely attempted, was heard. Isilius, when he heard that there were Tribunes of the Soldiers made in the Aventine, lest the Assemblies in the City should follow the example of the Soldiers, and chuse the same Men Tribunes of the People, he (who was well versed in popular affairs, and had a mind to that Dignity) himself also, before he went to the City, took care to have the like number chosen among his Soldiers, with the same Authority. After that, they enter the City at the Gate Collina with their Colours Displayed, and marched in a full Body through the middle of the City up to the Aventine. Where joining the other Army, they imployed the twenty Tribunes of the Soldiers, to chuse two out of themselves, who should have sovereign Authority. They therefore chose M. Oppius and Sex. Manilius. In the mean time the Senate being concerned for the publick, though they fate every day, spent more time in wrangling, than sober consultations. The Murder of Siccinius, Appius's lust, and the dishonours of the War were laid upon the Decemviri; though 'twas at last resolved, that Valerius and Horatius should go into the Aventine. But that they refused to do, unless the Decemviri would lay down the Ensigns of that Magistracy, which they should have quitted an Year before. At which the Decemviri complaining, that they were affronted, said, They would lay down that Authority, 'till they had established those Laws, upon the account of which they were first made.

LII. The People having notice by M. Duilius, who had been Tribune of the People, that by reason of their daily contentions, there was nothing done, they removed out of the Aventine into the sacred Mount; Duilius affirming to them, That no care would sink into the Senators hearts, before they saw the City deserted: that the sacred Mount would put them in mind of the Peoples constancy; and then they would know, that unless their Power were restored, there could be no hopes of Peace. Thereupon they marched along the Way called Via Mœniana (but at that time Piculiensis) and pitched their Camp in the sacred Mount, following the example of their Fathers modesty, and doing no hurt. The People too all followed the Army, nor did any stay behind whose age would give them leave to go. Yea, the Wives and Children also went along, demanding of their Husbands and Fathers in a most miserable accent, Who they would leave with them in that City; in which neither Chastity nor Liberty was secure, and free from violence. Now therefore since at Rome an uncouth solitude had made the City look like a Desert, and that in the Forum there was no body but a few old Men (for even that too appeared like a forsaken place, now that the Senators were all summoned into their House) a great many more besides Horatius and Valerius cried out, What is it, Grave Fathers! that you stay for? Will you let all things decay and come to ruin, because the Decemviri will not comply? Pray tell me, you Decemviri! what is that Authority, that you are so obstinate in asserting? You will ere long talk Law to the Houses and Walls. Are not you ashamed that there should be as many Licitors of yours seen in the Forum as of Citizens and others? What will you do if an Enemy come to the City? What if the Commons, when they see us unconcerned at their departure, should come all in Arms? Will you not lay down your Authority upon the account of the City? I am sure we must have Tribunes of the People, or have no People at all. We shall sooner want Patrician Magistrates, than they Plebeians. They forced our Fathers to make that new sort of Magistrates which they had never had any experience of, much less will they now endure the lack of them, since they are pleased with the sweetness of their administration: especially seeing that we our selves give them cause even from our management of things to think they want assistance. These kind of Speeches being cast forth from all parts of the House, and the Decemviri out-voted, they declared, They would be, since the Senate would have it so, at the disposal of that Court; desiring and admonishing them only this, that they would have a care they did not expose them to envy; nor would cause the People by tasting their blood to long for that of the Senators.

LIII. Then Valerius and Horatius being sent to recall the People by what means they thought fit, and to compose all differences, were likewise ordered to take care that the Decemviri might be be secure from the rage and violence of the Multitude. They therefore going were received by the People with great joy into the Camp; as being their undoubted Deliverers both in the beginning of the Commotion and in the issue of it: upon which account they had thanks given them. Then Isilius made a Speech before the Multitude, and again, when they came to treat of the Conditions, (the Embassadors asking what the Peoples demands were) he having contrived the matter before the arrival of the Embassadors, said, they desired that they might have reason to put more trust in the equitable management of affairs, than in their Arms: For they demanded the Tribuneship and the Appeal again, which had been the great aids of the People before the Decemviri were created; and to let the World know the truth of it, had stirred up the Soldiers or the People to regain their Liberty by a secession. Only their Demands touching the punishment of the Decemviri was very cruel: For they desired to have them surrendered up into their own hands, and threatened, they would burn them alive. To which the Embassadors answered: That which you demanded like sober Men, was so reasonable that we could have granted it on our own accords; for those things were only guards for their own Liberty, not a License to offend others. But we must rather pardon than indulge your passion; because, out of hatred to cruelty you run into it; and even before your selves are well free, would be lording it over your Adversaries. Will our City never be quiet from punishments, which either the Senate inflict upon the People, or the People upon them? You want a Shield more than a Sword: he is a good Citizen enough, that lives without doing or suffering any wrong. If ever you grow dreadful, 'twill be when you have recovered your Magistrates, and your Laws, so that the power is all in your hands; then you may determine of our lives and fortunes according to the nature of each case; but at present I think it sufficient for you to redemand your Liberty.

Whereupon the Multitude all cried out, they might do what they pleased, the Embassadors replying, They would return very speedily with all things perfected. So when they came and told the Senate what the People said; the other Decemviri, seeing there was mention of their punishment (as they expected there should have been) did not at all refuse to comply. But Appius, a Man of a cruel disposition, and extraordinary envious, measuring the hatred of others toward him by his toward them, said, Fortune favours no sluggard. Now I see the contest against us was deferred 'till our Adversaries were Armed: our Blood must be sacrificed to envy. Were it not for that, I should not care how soon I quitted the Decemvirate. Then there was a Decree of Senate made; That the Decemviri should quit their Office as soon as possible; that Q. Furius the High-Priest should create Tribunes of the People; and that the secession of the Soldiers and the Commons should not turn to any Mans disadvantage. These Orders of Senate being passed, and the Senate dismissed, the Decemviri came forth into the Assembly, and publicly laid down their Office to the great joy of all the People. This news was carried to the Commons, all the Men that were left in the City attending upon the Embassadors, who were met by another glad Multitude out of the Camp; both of then congratulating each other for the Liberty and Concord which was restored to their City. Then the Embassadors in an Assembly made this Speech. For the good, happiness and prosperity of your selves and the Commonwealth, return into your Country, to your Household-gods, your Wives and Children: and since you have lived here with that modesty, as not to injure any Mans estate to supply even the necessities of such a Multitude, carry the modesty with you into the City: go into the Aventine, from whence you came: in that happy place, where you laid the first foundations of your Liberty, you shall make Tribunes of the People: the High-Priest will be ready to hold the Assembly. To which they lowdly and cheerfully gave their assent, approving all that he said. With that they faced about with their Ensigns, and marching toward Rome, vied in joy with all they met. But though they were in Arms, they went silent through the City into the Aventine, where the High Priest immediately calling an Assembly, they created Tribunes; of which the first of all was A. Virginis, then L. Isilius, and P. Numitorius, the Uncle of Virginia, who were the cause of the secession. Then C. Sicinius descended from him, who is reported to have been the first Tribune of the People made in the sacred Mount: and M. Duilius, who had been an honourable Tribuneship before the Decemviri were created, nor had been wanting to the People in their Conflicts with the Decemviri. Then out of hope more than for any desert, they elected M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, P. Villius, and C. Oppius. At his entrance into the Office, L. Isilius immediately preferred a Bill to the People, and they agreed to it, That the secession from the Decemviri should turn to no Mans disadvantage. And then M. Duilius got another passed for creating of Consuls with Liberty of Appeal; all this being done by a Council of the People in the Prata Flaminia, now called Circus Flaminius [i. e. a place for Exercises.]

Then L. Valerius and M. Horatius were created Consuls by an Interrex [one that Governed when there was no chief Magistrate] who immediately from that time began their Office: whole Consulate, though it were managed without any injury to the Senate, yet, being popular, gave offence. For whatsoever was done in favour of the Peoples Liberty they thought diminished their Power. First of all; when it was as it were a Moot point, Whether the Senate should be obliged by any order of the People, they made a Law in the Comitia Centuriata, That what the Commons established in their Tribes, should bind all the People: by which Law they gave a keen Weapon to the Tribunes. After which they not only restored, but also

also for the future fortified another Consular Law about Appeals (which was the sole guard to their Liberty, but had been overthrown and evacuated by the Power of the Decemviri) by passing a new Act; That no Man should make any Magistrate without Appeal; or if he did, it should be lawful to kill him; nor should the killing of him be counted a Capital Crime. When they had thus fortified the Commons, on the one hand with Liberty of Appeal, and on the other with the aid of the Tribunes, they made the Tribunes also Holy or Inviolable (which was a thing almost quite forgotten) by renewing of some very ancient Ceremonies. Nor did they make them so only in a Religious sense only, but in point of Law too; ordaining, That whoever should offer any injury to the Tribunes, Aediles, Judges, or Decemviri [for so the Tribunes here are called from their number] should be reckoned a publick Enemy, whom any one might kill, and his Goods be sold at the Temple of Ceres, Liber, and Libera. By which Law the Learned say no Man is made Holy or Inviolable; but that he who hurts any of them, is ordained to be lookt upon as * cursed. Therefore an Aedile may be seized, and carried away by a Superior Magistrate; which though it be not legally done (for it is hurting him, who by this Law is not to be injured) yet it is an argument, that an Aedile is not reckoned Holy or Inviolable: but, they say, that the Tribunes are Inviolable by an old Oath and Obligation that the Commons were under, when they first created that Authority. There have been some, who have said, that by this same Horatian Law provision was made for the Judges and Prators also, because they were created with the same Ceremonies as the Consuls: for they called a Consul, Judex, i. e. a Judge. Which Interpretation is easily confuted, because in those days it was not yet the custom to call a Consul, Judge, but Prator. These then were the Consular Laws. But it was ordained also by the same Consuls; That the Acts of the Senate should be carried to the Temple of Ceres, to be kept by the Aedile of the People: they being formerly suppressed and vitiated at the pleasure of the Consuls. Then M. Duilius, a Tribune of the People, preferred a Bill, and the Commons passed it, That, whoever left the People without Tribunes, or created a Magistrate without Appeal, should be whipt with the Rods, and then beheaded with the Axes. All these things, though they were done against the Patricians minds, yet they did not oppose them; because there was no severity yet used against any one particular Man.

LVI.

By this means, having laid the foundation both of the Tribunes Power and the Peoples Liberty, the Tribunes supposing it to be now both safe and seasonable to set upon single Persons, made Virginius the first Accuser, and Appius the Party accused. When therefore Virginius had summoned Appius, and Appius was come amidst a throng of Patrician young Blades into the Forum, all People presently called to mind his Tyrannical Authority, seeing him with his Myrmidons about him. Then Virginius, Oratory, said he, was invented in matters doubtful: wherefore I will neither spend time in accusing him, from whose cruelty you were slain by your Arms to vindicate your selves; nor will I suffer him to add impudence to his other crimes, by making any defence. Now therefore, Appius Claudius! for all that thou hast so maliciously and impiously done these two years following, I give thee thanks. Only for one crime, when thou wert Judge, and wouldst not let my Daughter vindicate her Liberty, I cannot pardon but command thee to be carried to Goal, unless thou clear thy self. Appius had no hopes to rely upon either in the aid of the Tribunes, or in the judgment of the People; yet he appealed to the Tribunes, and, though no body cared for it, being seized by an Officer, cried out, Provoco, i. e. I Appeal: so that the same voice being heard to vindicate Liberty, which had refused all legal proceedings in order to it before, caused a deep silence. But soon after, when every one muttered to himself, That there were gods at last come into the World, who did not neglect Mankind; that Pride and Cruelty at length suffered, though late, not slight penalties; that he appealed, who had taken away all Appeals; that he implored the Peoples aid, who had disannulled all the rights of the People; and that he was dragged into fetters, wanting the privileges of Liberty, who had adjudged a free-born Maid to Slavery; they over-heard Appius's voice amidst the murmur of the Assembly, begging the assistance and favour of the Roman People, and commemorating the deserts of his Ancestors upon the Commonwealths account both in Peace and War; saying, That his was an unhappy zeal for the Commons of Rome, in that he quitted the Consulate to the great displeasure of the Senate to make righteous Laws; Laws, which though they were still in force, the maker of them must be dragged to Goal. But he hoped to shew what good or hurt he had done, when he had leave to speak for himself. At present, he desired that, according to the common usage of the City, and as he was a Roman, he might have a day given him to make his defence, and see what the People of Rome would please to determine of it. For he did not fear the malice of any body so much, as to have no hopes in the equity and mercy of his fellow Citizens. But if he must be dragged to Prison without being heard, he would again Appeal to the Tribunes, and admonish them not to imitate those they hate. And if the Tribunes owned themselves under the same obligation to evacuate all Appeals, as they said the Decemviri conspired to do, he said, he appealed to the People, begging the benefit of those Laws concerning Appeals, that were made by the Consuls and Tribunes too that very year. For who should Appeal, if he might not, who was uncondemned, nor had yet pleaded for himself? What ordinary Plebeian fellow could have any security from the Laws, if Appius Claudius had none? He therefore was like to be an argument, whether Dominion or Liberty were asserted by their new Laws; as also, whether the privilege of an an Appeal in opposition to the injustice of Magistrates were only written for vain shew and ostentation, or really passed into a Law and allowed.

On the other side Virginius said, that Ap. Claudius, above all others, was unacquainted with all Laws, and a stranger to all civil, human obligations: Let the People look back to his Tribunal, which was the Fort and Castle of all wickedness: where that perpetual Decemvir, who was an Enemy to the fortunes, Bodies and Blood of his fellow Citizens, threatening all People with Rods and Axes; a contemner of Gods as well as Men, and guarded with a company of Executioners instead of Lictors, having now turned his mind from rapine and slaughter to Lust, gave an ingenious Virgin (in sight of all the Romans, as if she had been a Captive of War) out of her Fathers embraces, into the hands of a Client of his, who was his Valet de Chambre: where by his cruel Decree, and denying of common Justice, he had armed the hand of a Father against his Daughter: where he ordered the Lover and Uncle of the Maid, who took away the dead Body, to be dragged to Prison, being more concerned that his base design was interrupted, than that the Damsel was killed. That he built a Prison, and was wont to call it, The common People of Romes dwelling House. Wherefore, as often as he Appealed, he would as often refer it to any competent Judge. Whether he did not deny his Daughter the ordinary process for asserting her Liberty; and if he would not accept of that proffer, he ordered him to be carried to Goal as a condemned person. Now as no body disapproved of what Virginius said or did, so there was a strange commotion in Peoples minds, when he was cast into the Prison, the Commons themselves being of opinion, that seeing they could punish so great a Man, their Liberty was grown too excessive. But the Tribune gave him a longer day of hearing. At this juncture there came to Rome Embassadors from the Latins and the Hernici, to congratulate the concord between the Senate and the Commons, bringing an Offering to great Jupiter in the Capitol, which was a Golden Crown of a small weight; according to their ability in those days, when Religious Duties were performed with Piety more than Magnificence. They likewise informed the Romans, that the Aequi and the Volsci were preparing for War as fast as they could. Wherefore the Consuls being ordered to divide the Provinces between them, the Sabines fell to Horatius's, and the Aequi and Volsci to Valerius's lot. When therefore they had given notice of a Levy to be made for those old Soldiers came in and gave their names as Volunteers: so that the Army was much the stronger, not only in numbers, but also in the sort of Soldiers, since the Veterans were mingled among them. But before they marched out of the City, they set up in publick the Decemviral Laws, called the Laws of the twelve Tables, all cut in Brass: though some say the Aediles did this by order of the Tribunes.

C. Claudius, who hated the Villany of the Decemviri, and was above all an Enemy to the pride of his Brothers Son, had retired to Regillum the ancient Country of his Family; but now, though very old, came back to deprecate his dangers, whose vices he had shunn'd; and going through the Forum in a sordid habit, with his Kinsfolks and Clients about him, begged the favour of the People; intreating them, That they would not lay such a blot upon the Claudian Family, as to think any of them deserved a Goal and Fetters: nor let a Man, whose Image would be honourable to all posterity; a contriver and maker of the Roman Laws, lie bound among Thieves and Robbers. That they would turn away their minds a little while from wrath, and consider the case; and rather pardon one Claudius, when so many begged for it, than out of hatred to one, slight the prayers of so many. He himself did the very same thing out of respect to the name and family; for he was not friends with the person, whose misfortunes he notwithstanding would fain relieve. That by their courage they had regained their Liberty, and that by their clemency the concord of all orders among them might be established. Hereupon there were some whom he moved more by his piety and regard to the honour of his Family, than upon the score of him for whom he pleaded. But Virginius desired them, That they would rather pity him and his Daughter; and would not hear the Petitions of the Claudian Family, who were Tyrants to the Commons, but those of three Tribunes, nearly allied to Virginia; who, as they were created to aid the People, so now on the other hand implored that Peoples favour and assistance. The tears seem the most just; and therefore Appius, having no hopes left him, before the day of his Tryal came, killed himself. Then Sp. Oppius, being the next object of envy, was seized by P. Numitorius, because he was in the City when his Colleague gave that unjust Judgment in the case of Virginia. But the injury done by Oppius brought upon him more envy, than what he did not hinder: for there was a witness produced, who, though he had been extraordinarily in seven and twenty several Campaigns, and eight times extraordinarily rewarded with gifts that he had then about him, shewed his back all torn with the Rods, and desired nothing, but that if Oppius could say he was in any fault, he should, though a private Man, inflict all the cruelty upon him that he had done before. So Oppius also was carried to Prison, and before the day of Tryal put an end to his days. The Tribunes confiscated the Goods both of Claudius and Oppius too; whose Collegues went into Banishment, their Estates being disposed of in the same manner. Then Claudius, who challenged Virginia as his Slave, being condemned on the day appointed, had the extremity of his Sentence taken off even by Virginius himself, and went to Tibur, where he lived in Banishment. So that the Soul of Virginia (more happy when she was dead than being yet alive) having wandered through so many Families for revenge, at length, when no criminal was left, enjoyed its rest.

Upon

LIX. Upon this the Senate was possessed with great fears; for the Tribunes look'd very like the Decemviri, till M. Duilius, a Tribune of the People, giving a gentle and wholesome check to their extravagant power, said, We have had enough of Liberty, and taken sufficient revenge of our Enemies: wherefore, this Year, I will not hereafter suffer any Man either to be summoned to Justice, nor put in Prison: for besides that I am not willing to repeat old faults, that have been long obliterated, since even new ones have been expiated by the punishment of the Decemviri; the perpetual care of both the Consuls also in the defence of your Liberty, engages there shall be nothing done that may require the Tribunes aid. At first this moderation of the Tribunes removed the Senates fears, though it increased the Consuls envy; that they should be so much the Peoples creatures, that a Plebeian Magistrate should sooner take care of the Senates life and liberty, than a Patrician: and that their Enemies should sooner be weary of punishing them, than they should obviate such licentious proceedings: besides that there were many Men who said the Senate were very Cowards in agreeing to such Laws as they made, nor did any body question, but, in that troublesome state of the Commonwealth, they did it merely to comply with the times.

LX. The Consuls having composed all affairs in the City, and laid a foundation for the Government of the Commons, went into their several Provinces. Of whom Valerius design'dly kept off the War in Algidum against the united Forces of both the Aequi and the Volsci; whereas, if he had committed the event to fortune immediately, I question, whether that Battel (considering what thoughts the Romans as well as their Enemies had of the Decemvirates unhappy Conduct) might not have been much to their disadvantage. He therefore kept his Army in a Camp a thousand paces from the Enemy; whilst they stood ready in Battalia between their two Camps. From whence though they challenged the Romans to fight, there was no one that made them any answer. At last the Aequi and the Volsci being tired with standing, and vain expectation of the fight; believing that the Romans did as good as yield the Victory, went part of them into the Country of the Hernici, and part among the Latins to forage; leaving in their Camp a Garrison only rather than Men enough to engage the Enemy. Which when the Consul perceived, he returned the terror which they before had infused into his Men, and setting his Army in Battalia attacked the Foe. Who being conscious what numbers of their Forces were absent, and therefore declining the Fight, made the Romans presently far more brisk than before, insomuch that they look'd upon the Enemies (now that they trembled and lay within their Bulwark) to be already Conquered. But when they had stood ready for the Battel all day, in the night they retreated; and the Romans being full of hopes made much of themselves; whilst the Enemy, who were not half so merry, sent Messengers all about with speed to recall the foragers. Accordingly the Messengers went, and came straightway back with the Soldiers from all adjacent places; but the more remote straglers could not be found. As soon as it was day, the Romans marched out of their Camp, designing to invade the Enemies Bulwark, if they would not give them an opportunity to fight. So therefore, when the day was pretty far spent, seeing the Enemy did not stir, the Consul gave command to begin the Attack. But when the Army began to move, the Aequi and the Volsci being filled with indignation, that two Victorious Armies should defend themselves with a Rampire, rather than their own Courage and Arms, petitioned their Leaders also, and had the signal of Battel given them. And now some part of them were got out at the Gates; whilst others followed in Rank and File, when the Roman Consul, before the Enemies Army was all in Array, began the fight. So that attacking them before they were all come forth, or those that were, well ranged, he set upon a floating crowd of fearful Men, that look'd to and fro upon one another (like People amazed) being yet more scared and disturbed with the clamour and violence of the congress. At first therefore the Enemy retired; but afterward, when they had recovered their Courage, and their Commanders asked them, What? would they yield to those they had conquered? they renewed the fight.

LXI. The Consul on the other side, bad the Romans remember, that they were then engaged as freemen, in their first Battel for the free City of Rome; being like to Conquer for themselves, and not to be, when Conquerors, a prey to the Decemviri. That they did fight now under the Conduct of Appius, but Consul Valerius, who was descended from those that freed the Roman People, he himself also being their deliverer, desiring them, that they would make it appear, it was the Generals not the Soldiers faults they did not get the Victory in former Battels. And telling them, that it was degenerate to shew more Courage against their fellow Citizens than against their Enemies, or to fear servitude more at home than abroad. That Virginia was the only Person whose Chastity was in danger in times of Peace; and that Appius was the only Citizen whose lust was then dangerous; but if the fortune of War should then incline to the Enemy, all their Children were in danger from so many thousand foes. That he would not forebode what Jupiter, and their great Father Mars would never suffer to befall a City built by such a Heavenly Commission. Then he admonished them of the Aventine and the sacred Mount, with exhortations, that, where they some few months past procured their Liberty, thither they would carry back their Government inviolate; and shew, that the Romans had the same inclinations now since the Decemviri were expelled, as they had before the creation of them; nor was the Roman Courage diminished, though their Laws were pruned. Having said thus among the Foot, he ran to the Horse, and said, Con-

rage, brave Youths! do you endeavour to out-do the Foot as much as you excel them in honour and quality. The Foot at the first onset removed the Foe; do you ride in and drive them out of the Field. They cannot sustain the shock; for even now they tarry here for a show, rather than make any resistance. With that they spurred on their Horses, and riding up with a full career to the Enemy, whom the Foot had already put into disorder, broke through their Ranks quite to the Rear; where part of them wheeling about in the plain Field, kept a great many of the Enemies, who were flying away, from getting into their Camp, and deterred those that would have rode by them. In the mean time the Foot, the Consul himself, and all the stress of the War was turned upon the Enemies Camp; which being taken with great slaughter, the Romans had a far greater booty. The fame of this Battel was carried not only into the City, but also into the Sabines Country to the other Army. Whereupon there was indeed great joy in the City, but glory in the Camp inflamed the Soldiers minds with mutual emulation. For Horatius by exercising them with excursions and light skirmishes, had made them so expert, that they trusted in their own Courage and Conduct more than they remembered the disgrace had advanced them to the highest pitch of hopes. Yet the Sabines did not stick, as being fleshed with success the Year before, to provoke and urge them with these questions; Why they ran forward and backward in such small numbers, to spend time, like so many Robbers? dividing the glory of one pitched Battel into so many little velitations and bickerings? Would they set to it with all the Forces they had, and hazard all at once?

LXII. Which when the Romans heard, though they had armed themselves with sufficient resolution before-hand, were all inflamed with the indignity: that the other Army was like just then to return into the City with Victory, but that the Enemy insulted over them with contumelies, and disdainful language: yet when should they be, if they then were not, fit to engage the Enemy? When the Consul perceived that the Soldiers murmured thus in the Camp, he called an Assembly, and told them, I suppose, fellow Soldiers, you have heard how the business was carried in Algidum; where the Army was such as the Army of a free People ought to be, and the Victory was gained by the Conduct of my Colleague, and the Courage of his Soldiers. As for my part, fellow Soldiers, I am resolved to take such measures as you shall think good. The War may be very well protracted, and yet, at the same time, soon made an end of. If you will have it protracted, I'll do (what I have done hitherto) my daily endeavour by good Discipline to augment your hopes, and raise your Courage; but if you have enough of that already, and be minded to fight it out presently, come on, give a shout like what you use to make when you are going to Battel, as a testimony of your willingness and Courage. Thereupon they having set up a mighty shout with great alacrity, he told them, He would comply with their desires (to good purpose he hoped) and would lead them next day into the Field: the remainder of the day being spent in preparing their Arms. The next day, as soon as the Sabines saw that the Romans were setting their Men in Array, they also, greedy of coming to it, marched forth: and the Fight was as between two Armies that were very confident in themselves, the one upon account of the standing and perpetual honour that they had won, and the other, as being proud of a late Victory. But the Sabines added policy also to their strength; for though they had evened the Front of their Army, and so adjusted it that all their Forces seemed to be therein comprised, they reserved two thousand over and above, to make an impression upon the left Wing of the Romans in the time of the fight. Which supernumerary forces whilst they flanked that Wing, and almost surrounded it, about six hundred Horse out of two Legions dismounted, and running into the head of their own Men, as they were giving back, at the same time charged the Enemy. By which means the danger being first made pretty equal, they put the Foot to the blush; who were ashamed to see the Horse fight in their own and another capacity too, and that the Foot was not comparable to the Horse even when they fought upon the ground.

LXIII. Then they went to their post again from whence they came; and in an instant the fight was not only renewed, but the Sabines Wing also gave way. The Horse that were mixt among the Foot, betook themselves to their Horses; and then riding over to the other side, to tell their Party how they had got the day, at the same time briskly attacked the Foe, who was now very much dismayed, seeing their strongest Wing was routed: nor was there any party in that Battel whose Courage was more signal than that of these Horsemen. Mean while the Consul was very careful and active, praising the Valiant, and chiding any that he saw backward in the Fight: and the Soldiers when corrected, did the part of brave fellows. For some were as much excited by shame, as others by commendations. Then giving another shout, they all fell on with might and main from every side, and force the Enemy to give ground; nor could the Roman force be from that time sustained. Whereupon the Sabines being routed, and made to fly all over the Fields, left their Camp a prey to the Enemy. There the Romans recovered not their Allies Goods, as they had done in Algidum, but their own, which they had lost by the Devastation of their Country. Now though in this case two Victories were supplications for the Consuls upon one day only. But the People met in great numbers and went to Prayers a second day, though without any order; and this accidental popular supplication drew full as much company together, as that which was publicly enjoined. The Consuls Consuls out of design came the same two days to the City, and called forth the Senate into the Campus Martius; where talking of things that they had done, the chief of the Senators complained, That they called a Senate among the Soldiers on purpose to scare them. Wherefore the Consuls, to avoid all objections, called them thence into the prata Flaminia [Meadows so called] where now stands the Temple of Apollo (they then called it Circus Apollinaris) where when they were denied a Triumph by the almost unanimous consent of the House, L. Icilius, Tribune of the People, preferred a Bill to the People touching the Consuls Triumphant. Many as they came forth were dissuaded, especially when C. Claudius cried out, The Consuls would Triumph over the Senate not their Enemies: and that they desired thanks for their private desert toward the Tribune, not honour upon the account of their Courage. That the People never meddled before in the business of Triumphs; but that the Senate were always the proper Judges when and why that Honour was to be granted. That even the Kings themselves did not diminish the Authority of that highest Order. That it was not fit the Tribunes should arrogate so much to their Authority, as not to suffer any publick Determinations. For the only way to make the City truly free, and the Laws just and equal, was for every Order to observe and stick to their own Privileges and their own Authority. But notwithstanding what he said, and all that the rest of the Senior Senators added to the same purpose all the Tribes accepted of L. Icilius's proposal; and that was the first time that ever any one Triumphed by order of the People without the approbation of the Senate.

LXIV. This Victory of the Tribunes and the People turned to an almost fatal Luxury; there being a Conspiracy among the Tribunes to chuse the same Tribunes again; and to make their own ambition the less conspicuous, they would continue the Consuls also in their Office. But they blamed the Senate's unanimity, in that they generally consented in what would wrong the People and disparage the Consuls: What, said they, would have become of us, since the Laws are not yet confirmed, if the Consuls had set upon the new Tribunes by your Factions? For they would not always have Valerius's and Horatius's for Consuls, who would prefer the Peoples liberty before their own welfare. It fell out very opportunely at that time, that M. Duilius, a prudent Man, who saw envy hanging over their heads if they continued in their Office, was President of the Assembly: who denying that he would have respect to any of the old Tribunes, (so that his Collegues were very urgent with him to put the Tribes upon voting for it, or let them manage the Assembly, and that he would hold Assemblies rather according to Law, than the pleasure of the Senate) and having raised a Debate, sent for the Consuls, and asked them, what they designed to do in that Consular Assembly; to which they answered, They would create new Consuls. Whereupon he, finding he had those to back his popular opinion, who themselves were no popular Men, he walked along with them to the Assembly. Where the Consuls appearing before the People, and being asked, If the Roman People remembering the Liberty which by their means they recovered at home, and in respect to their Military performance abroad, should make them Consuls again, what they would do? were still of the same opinion: Duilius therefore commending the Consuls for persevering to the last in sentiments different from those of the Decemviri, proceeded to hold the Assembly. In which having made five Tribunes of the People, and seeing that there were more Candidates that stood for the Office, than could be regularly Voted for by the Tribes, he dismissed the Council. Nor did he call them any more upon that score, because, he said, he had satisfied the Law, which ordained that the Tribunes should not be limited to any certain number, but that those, who were first created, might take in what Collegues they pleased; and repeated the Bill that was preferred in that case, where-in it was said, If I design to make ten Tribunes of the People, and there are fewer this day chosen; these shall have power to take in their own Collegues, who shall be as legal Tribunes of the People, as those whom you the Commonalty shall this day create. Duilius having persevered, even to the last, in denying, that the Commonwealth could have 15 Tribunes, (inasmuch that he frustrated the ambition of his Collegues) was equally caressed both by the Senate and the Commons, and laid down his Office.

LXV. The new Tribunes in the choice of their Collegues submitted to the will of the Senate, and chose two Patricians of Consular rank; to wit, Sp. Tarpeius and A. Haterius. The Consuls that were created were Lar. Herminius and T. Virginus Caelimontanus, who being no greater favourers of either the Senate or the People, enjoyed their ease both at home and abroad. L. Trebonius a Tribune of the People, who was no friend to the Senate, because, he said, he was deceived by them, and betrayed by his Collegues in the choice of the Tribunes, preferred a Bill, that whoever went about to Petition the Roman People for the making of Tribunes, should not exceed the number of ten; and bore his Tribuneship so, as that he continually inveighed against the Senate, for which reason he was Surnamed Asper [Rough.] Then M. Geganius Macerinus and C. Julius were made Consuls, who appeased the differences between the Tribunes and the young Nobility, without diminishing either the Power of the one, or the Honour of the other, and keeping the People in fear of a Levy for a War against the Volsci and the Aequi cleared the City from all Seditions. They said, that if the City were quiet all things else would be so abroad, for that by their civil Discords they increased the insolence of Foreigners; by which means, their care of Peace in general became the cause of intestine Unity at home. But the one order of Men was always vexatious to the others modesty; for the young Noble Senators Senators began to molest the quiet Commons. Whereupon though the Tribunes were assiduous to the meaner sort, it did at first but little good. Yea, they themselves were soon after abused, especially in their last Months, by the Nobility, when all their strength began to languish; and the Commons thought they might repose some hopes in the Tribuneship, if they had Tribunes like Icilius; for they had only Titular Tribunes the last ten Years. On the other hand, the Senior Senators, as they were of opinion that their young Men were too fierce, so they desired, that if any excess were to be made, it might rather appear in the Courage of their Party than their Adversaries: so hard it is to preserve a moderation in the defence of Liberty; whilst every Man, pretending to wish that all things were adjusted, extols himself so far as to depress another; and by taking too great care that others may not live in fear, makes himself dreadful; so that we throw an injury which we keep off from our selves upon another, as if it were necessary either to do or suffer it.

Then T. Quintius Capitolinus (the fourth time) and Agrippa Furius being made Consuls, LXVI. had no Sedition at home or War abroad; though both were like to befall them. For now no longer could the Discord of the People be repressed, the Tribunes and the Commons too being incited against the Senate, and new heats every day arising in their Assemblies upon the account of a certain Nobleman being summoned to his Tryal. At the first noise of which, as it were by a signal, the Aequi and the Volsci were Alarmed, besides that their Leaders, who were desirous of a Plunder, persuaded them that the Levy which was ordered to be made two years before could not be had, now that the Commons resisted the Authority of the Senate; for that reason there were no Armies sent against them; that the manner of making War was dissolved by their licentiousness, nor did they look upon Rome as their common Country: that whatsoever quarrels or feuds they had with Foreigners, were all turned upon themselves, and that these Wolves of Rome being blinded with intestine rage gave them a good occasion to destroy them. They therefore joining their Forces together, first ravaged the Latin Territories; where, since they met with no opposition, they followed their exulting Leaders even to the Walls of Rome, pillaging all the Country till they came near the Gate called Porta Esquilina, to shew the City what havoc they made in despite of them. From whence when they were returned without molestation, but with a vast Booty, in a Body back to Corbio. Quintius the Consul called the People to an Assembly, where, I am told, he spoke to this purpose.

"Romans! though I am not conscious of any crime, yet I came into this Assembly with LXVII. the greatest shame that could be; that you should know, and that Posterity should one day hear, that the Aequi and the Volsci, who were of late scarce equal to the Hernici, should come to the Walls of Rome, when T. Quintius was in his fourth Consulship, all in Arms, without any resistance made against them. This ignominy (though we have lived so long this great while, and such is the present state of Affairs, that I foresee no good that can befall us) if I had known it had been destined for this Year above any other, I would have avoided either with Exile or Death, if there had been no other way to escape being Consul. Is it so then, that if Men had been Masters of those Arms, which were at our Gates, Rome might have been taken when I was Consul? Then I had enjoyed my Estate and lived long enough; nay, should have died when I was in my third Consulship. Whom, I pray, did the most Slothful and Cowardly of the Enemies contemn? Us Consuls? or you Romans? If the fault be on our side, take away the Authority from Men that are so undeserving of it; yea, if that be too little, inflict what punishment you will upon us: but if it be on your side, Romans! I wish no God or Man may punish you for your offences, though I would have you repent of them. They did not contemn your Sloth, nor were they confident of their own Courage; for having been so often Routed and Defeated, forced out of their Camp, deprived of their Country, and sold for Slaves, they knew both themselves and you. The Discord of the several Orders of Men is the bane of this City. The differences between the Senate and the Commons, whilst we have no certain bounds set to our Authority, nor you to your Liberty; whilst you are awary of the Patrician, and we of the Plebeian Magistrates, have raised your Spirits. For Gods sake, what would you have? You desired Tribunes of the People, and we for quietness sake granted your request; you desired Decemviri, and we suffered them too to be created; you were awary of the Decemviri, we made them lay down their Office: yea, whilst your animosity continued against them, as private persons, we permitted the noblest and most honourable Men (some of them) in the whole City to undergo Death and Banishment for your satisfaction. You would create Tribunes of the People again; you did so. You would have the Consuls be of your Party; though we saw it was quite contrary to the inclinations of the Senate, we saw the Patrician Magistracy made an offering and a Sacrifice to the People. You had the assistance of the Tribunes, the Appeal to the People, and the Determinations of the Commons imposed as Laws upon the Senate: under the pretence of making the Laws just and equal, we then did and still do suffer all our rights to be invaded. What will be the end of these Discords? When shall we have the City at Unity? When will this be the common Country? Are we more content to be Conquered than Conquerors? Is it enough that you are dreadful to us? You took the Arventine Hill against us, as you did the sacred "Mount in like manner. But none of you removed the Volscian Enemy, when they were like to take the Esquiline, and climbing up the Rampire: it is against us that you are Men, and take up Arms.

LXVIII. "But let me persuade you all, who have besieged the Senate here, made the Forum a dangerous place, and filled the Prison with Noblemen, to march forth beyond the Esquiline Gate with the same resolutions: or if you dare not do this, look from your Walls into the Fields, how they are laid waste by Fire and Sword, the Cattel driven away, and the burnt Houses smoking. For the Government in general is now in a sad condition; the Country is burnt, the City besieged, and the Glory of War is with the Enemies. What matter is it in what state your private affairs are? You'll every one shortly hear of your losses in the Fields. What have you at home to make them up again? Will the Tribunes restore and give you back what you have lost? They'll give you as much talk and words as you can desire, with crimes laid to the charge of the Nobility and Laws one after another made in a great many Assemblies; but none of you ever returned home from those Assemblies a penny the richer. Did any Man carry any thing back to his Wife and Children except hatred, feuds, and quarrels both publick and private? from which you have always been defended, not by your own virtue and innocence, but by the assistance of others. But (oh! Hercules) when you were Soldiers under me, not under the Tribunes, and in the Camp, not in the Forum; when in the Field the Enemy, not the Roman Senators in an Assembly, heard and were afraid of your shouts; when you took your Country from the Enemy, and returned home in Triumph to your household gods, loaded with riches, and crowned with Glory both publick and private; can you now suffer the Foe to go away laden with your Fortunes? Stay here, if you please, fixt to your Assemblies, and live in the Forum; but the necessity of a War which you so industriously avoid, will still pursue you. Was it hard for you to go against the Aequi and the Volsci? The War is even at your Gates: if it be not driven thence, it will be shortly within your Walls; it will scale the Castle and the Capitol, and persecute you into your very Houses. 'Tis two years ago since the Senate ordered a Levy to be made, and an Army to march into Algidum: yet we sit lazily at home, like Women, scolding at one another, content with our present Peace, and not foreseeing that from our ease there will shortly arise a manifold War. I know I might say many other things that would please you better than this: but necessity compells me to tell you truth instead of what may be grateful, though my own genius did not prompt me to it. I must confess, I should be glad to please you, Romans! but I desire much more to preserve you, whatever you may hereafter think of me. Is it natural for him, who speaks before the Multitude in his own behalf, to be more accepted than a Person whose mind aims at nothing but publick good? unless perchance you think, those publick Flatterers, those Courtiers of the People, who will not let you be either in Arms or at rest, incite and spur you on for your own sakes. No, when they have raised you to an animosity, be sure they gain either honour or riches by it: and since they see they are never like to thrive if the several Orders of Romans are at unity, they chuse to be the ring-leaders of an ill thing, rather than nothing at all, that is, of troubles and seditions. Of which, if you can at last be awary, and will assume the antient manners of your fore-fathers and your selves, instead of these new ones, I will submit to any punishment, if I do not force these Ravagers of our Country in a few days out of their Camp, and transfer the terror of this War, with which you are now so astonished, from our Walls and Gates to their Cities.

LXIX. There hardly ever was any popular Speech of a Tribune more welcome to the People, than this of that grave Consul at that time. The young Men also, who amidst such fears, used to make the refusal of a War the sharpest Weapon against the Senators, were inclined to take up Arms; for the Country People running into Town, out of the Fields, where they were spoiled and wounded, and relating things more barbarous than what appeared to the Citizens eyes, put all the City in a rage. When he came into the Senate, all Peoples eyes were turned upon Quintius, whom they look'd upon as the only preserver of the Roman Honour, the Senior Senators saying, That his Oration became the dignity of a Consul, and was worthy of his so many former Consulates, as of all his whole life, that had been full of Honours often received, but oftner deserved. That other Consuls either betrayed the Dignity of the Senate to please the Commons, or by being too rough in the defence of their rights, provoked the People to be more obstinate by endeavouring to subdue at that rate. That T. Quintius's Oration had a special regard not only to the Majesty of the Senate, but to the concord of the several ranks and the present juncture of affairs. Wherefore they desired him and his Colleague to undertake the management of the Commonwealth: and that the Tribunes would join unanimously with the Consuls to remove the War from their City Walls, and make the People in those doubtful circumstances obedient to the Senate: yea, they said their common Country called on the Tribunes and implored their aid, now that the Fields were all laid waste, and the City almost besieged. Whereupon by general consent they ordered and made a Levy: and the Consuls having declared in the Assembly, That that was not a time to try Causes, but that all the younger sort of Men must be the next day as soon as 'twas light in the Campus Martius: that they would find a time when the War was over to hear their excuses who did not give in their names, and that he should be punished as a Deserter of the publick Interest whose reason they did not approve of; all the Youth came thither next day; the Cohorts or Regiments chose their Centurions; two Senators being set to command in chief over every Regiment. And all this I am informed was done so soon, that the Ensigns which were brought out of the Treasury by the Questors that very day into the Field, were carried thence as they marched away, by ten of the Clock: and the new Army who had only some few Regiments of old Volunteers among them, lay the same day ten miles from the City. The next day brought them within sight of the Foe; near to whose Camp they pitched theirs, at a place called Corbio. The third day, the Romans being enraged, and the Enemy, who had so often rebelled, being conscious of a fault for which they despaired of being pardoned, they made no more ado, but engaged each other.

Now in the Roman Army, though the two Consuls had equal Commissions, Agrippa resigned all his Power (which is the best course in the management of great affairs) to his Colleague. For which condescension of his, Quintius was very kind to him, and advising with him as well as commending of him, made him equal with himself. In the Field Quintius commanded the right Wing and Agrippa the left, whilst Sp. Postumius Albus the Lieutenant led the main Body, the other Lieutenant called Serv. Sulpicius, being made Captain of the Horse. The Foot in the right Wing fought bravely, and the Volsci made a very brisk resistance. But Serv. Sulpicius broke through the middle of the Enemies with his Horse; from whence though he could have retreated to his own Party, before the Enemy could compose their disordered Ranks, yet he thought it better for him to fall upon the Rear of them, by which means he had in a moment dissipated the whole Body, had not the Volscian and Aequian Horse given him a diversion for some time with the same sort of fighting that he used. Whereupon Sulpicius cried out, It was no time for his Men to dally, for that they were circumvented, and divided from the rest of the Army, and in great danger to be lost, unless they charged with all the violence and resolution imaginable. It was not enough for them to rout the Foe, but they must kill both them and their Horses, for fear they should return into the Battel, and renew the fight: nor could they resist that force, which had made the main Body of their Army give way. They heard very well and minded what he said; insomuch that at one charge they defeated the whole Body of Horse, and killed a great many, whom and their Horses they ran through with their Javelins: and that was the end of the Horse engagement. Then setting upon the Foot, they sent the news of what they had done to the Consuls, who by this time had got the better of it; which when they heard, it put new Courage into the Conquering Romans as much as it dejected and disheartened the retiring Aequi. They were first overpowered in the main Body, where the Horse that had been sent that way before had disordered their Ranks: and then the left Wing began to yield to Consul Quintius; but they had much ado with the right. Agrippa being in that Post, who was a very strong and stout Man, and seeing they had better success in all parts of the Battel, than where he stood, took the Ensigns from the Bearers of them, and carrying them up toward the Foe, threw some into the middle of them: the fear of which ignominy so incited his Soldiers that they ran upon the Enemy, and the Victory was by that means equal on all hands. Then there came a Messenger from Quintius, to tell them, That he was victorious and just entering into the Enemies Camp; but that he would not break in, before he knew that they in the left Wing had gotten the better: that if Agrippa had routed the Enemy there, he would have him march up and join him, so that the whole Army might enjoy the Booty all together. Agrippa being also Victorious, came with mutual congratulations to his Conquering Colleague and the Enemies Camp; which there being but few to defend, and those too in a moment overcome, they broke into the Works without any trouble; and led their Army back again, not only laden with vast spoils, but having also recovered the things which they had lost by the Plunder of their Country. I do not find that they either desired, or that the Senate offered them any Triumph. Nor is there any cause assigned why they neglected, or did not hope for such honour, but as far as I can guess at such a distance of time, seeing that Senate had denied a Triumph to the Consuls Valerius and Horatius, who besides the Aequi and the Volsci had the honour of making an end of the Sabine War, these Consuls were ashamed to desire a Triumph for doing only half so much as those: for fear lest if they had obtained their request, the Senate might have seemed to have had more respect for persons than to their deserts.

But this honourable Victory gained over their Enemies, was attended by a very unjust and unworthy Judgment, which the People of Rome gave concerning the Confines of their Allies. Those of Aricia and Ardea having fought several times for a piece of Ground that was in dispute between them, and being tired with so much slaughter on both sides, made the Roman People Umpire in the Controvercie. When they came to plead the Cause, and the Magistrates had assigned a Council of the People to hear, it was argued with great eagerness: but when the Witnesses were produced, the Tribes called over, and the People just going to give their Votes, one P. Scaptius an old Commoner stood up, and said, If I may speak, Consuls! touching the Commonwealth, I will not suffer the People to err in this affair. But when the Consuls said he ought not to be heard, as being an idle fellow, and ordered him to be taken away (whilst he cried out all the while that the publick Cause was betrayed) he appealed to the Tribunes. The Tribunes, as they are for the most part more ruled by the Multitude than they rule them, permitted Scaptius, for the sake of the Commons, who were greedy of hearing him, to say what he would. Then he began, That he was 84 years of Age, and had been a Soldier in that very place, which was then under dispute, not only when he was a young fellow, but in twenty several Battels, of which the last was when they engaged at Corioli: by which means he could tell them of a thing, which though obliterated by tract of time, was still fixed in his memory; to wit, that the ground in question did belong formerly to Corioli, which being taken, it became the publick possession of the Roman People by right of War. That he admired how the Aricians and the Ardeans should hope to hinder the Roman People (whom, instead of Lords, they had made Judges of it) from enjoying that tract of Ground, which they had never any right to whilst Corioli was in prosperity. That he had but a little time longer to live; yet could not forbear, even now he was so old, to vindicate with his tongue (the only weapon he had left) that Land, which, when a Soldier, he had done his best with his Arms to take: and therefore that he advised the People by all means, not to desert their own Cause through any disadvantageous modesty.

LXXII. The Consuls observing that Scaptius was heard, not only with silence, but assent also, took both the Gods and Men to witness, that he had put the People upon doing a very great piece of injustice. Wherefore they sent for the chief of the Senate; with whom they went about to the Tribunes, and desired them, "That they would not do a thing which was so very evil in it self, and would be of far worse example; for Judges to make themselves parties in the Cause, especially since, though it were lawful in them so to do, they ought to have a care of their Interest in this case; for they were not like to gain half so much by seizing the Land, as they would lose by alienating the minds of their Allies from them by the injury; the loss of their reputation and credit being above any value. Would they suffer the Embassadors to carry that news back with them to Aricia and Ardea? Would they let the World know it? their Allies hear of it? their Enemies be acquainted with it? With what grief would the former, and with what joy the latter, receive such tidings? Could they think that the neighbouring Nations would lay the fault upon Scaptius an old talkative Assembly Man? That the Scaptian Family would be honoured with an Image upon this score: that the Roman People ought to bear the Name and Character of an Informer, or one that intercepts anothers right: for who, that were Judges even in a private case, would adjudg the thing in controversy to himself. No, Scaptius himself, though he had out-lived all shame, would not do it. Thus did the Consuls and the Senators cry out; but covetousness and Scaptius the Author of it were more prevailing: so the Tribes being called, adjudged the Land to be the publick possession of the Roman People. And doubtless so it had been very justly determined to be, if others had been Judges of the Case: but now the dishonour of their Judgment is not at all lessened by the goodness of their Cause, or justice of their Pretensions: nor did it appear worse, or more severe to the Aricians and Ardeans than to the Roman Senate. The remaining part of that Year was free from all disturbances either at home or abroad.

DECADE I. BOOK IV.

EPITOME.

I. &c. The Law concerning the Marriage of the Senators and the Commons was pass'd by the Tribunes with great earnestness, though the Senate was against it. 6. Tribunes of the Soldiers. The publick affairs of Rome were managed for some Years by this kind of Magistrates, both at home and abroad. 8. Censors also were then first made. 11. The Ardean Land which was taken from them by the Judgment of the Roman People, after a Colony had been sent thither was restored to them again. 12, 13, &c. When there was a Famine at Rome, Sp. Maelius, a Roman Knight, gave the People Corn at his own charge: by which having gained the love of the People, so far as that it made him affect being a King, he was killed by C. Servilius Ahala, Master of the Horse, at the command of Quintius Cincinnatus the Dictator. 16. L. Minutius was honoured with a Monument in form of a Golden Bull. 17. The Roman Embassadors being murdered by the Fidenates, because they died upon the account of the Commonwealth, had Statues set up for them before the Rostra [a place where Orations were made.] 19. Cornelius Cossus, Tribune of the Soldiers, having killed Tolumnius King of the Veians, got rich spoils a second time. Manerius Aemilius the Dictator having reduced the Censorship, which used to be held five Years together, to an Year and half, was for that reason taken notice of and punished by the Censors. 31, 34. Fidenæ was taken, and a Colony sent thither: who being all slain, the Fidenates revolted from the Romans, but were Conquered by Manerius Aemilius the Dictator, and Fidenæ retaken. 45. The Conspiracy of the Slaves detected. 50. Posthumius, a Tribune of the Soldiers, was killed by the Army for his cruelty. 59. That was the first time that the Soldiers had their pay cut of the Treasury. 60, 61. Many exploits against the Volsci, the Veians, the Fidenates and the Falisci.

I. AFTER them succeeded M. Genutius and P. Curtius, whose Consulship was full of disturbances both at home and abroad. For in the beginning of that Year C. Canuleius a Tribune of the People, promulgated a Bill touching the Marriage of the Senate and of the Commons: by which the Senators thought their blood would be stained, and the privileges of their their Families confounded. Besides which, the mention that was first made cautiously and privately by the Tribunes, about having one of the Consuls chosen out of the Commons, proceeded at last so far, that nine of the Tribunes promulgated a Bill, That the People should have Power to make Consuls either out of the Senators, or the Commons, as they pleased. Which if it passed, they supposed, that the Sovereign Power would not only be communicated to Men of the meanest quality, but rather quite removed from the Nobility to the Populace. The Senators therefore were glad to hear, that the Ardeans revolted upon the score of their Land which was taken away by the late Judgment; as also that the Veians had wasted the Roman Borders, and that the Aequi and the Volsci were offended that Verrugo was fortified: so much did they prefer even an unhappy War before ignominious Peace. Wherefore making more of these things than they really were, to the end that the Tribunes mouths might be stopped amidst the noise of so many Wars, they ordered a Levy to be made, and other preparations for the War, with all speed; yea, with more expedition, if it were possible, than when T. Quintius was Consul. Then C. Canuleius declaring briefly in the Senate, That the Consuls endeavoured to little purpose to divert the People by fears from the thoughts of new Laws; for they should never make any Levy as long as he lived, before the Commons had established what he and his Collegues had promulgated, immediately called an Assembly.

At the same time the Consuls incited the Senate against the Tribune, and the Tribune the People against the Consuls. The Consuls said, The fury of the Tribunes was now no longer sufferable: it was come to the extremity; that there was more of a War at home than abroad; nor did that come to pass, more by default of the People than the Senate, or of the Tribunes than the Consuls. That whatsoever was attended with a reward in the City, that still increased most: that by that means Men were made good both in Peace and War: that at Rome the reward of Sedition was the greatest; for that brought a general and a particular Honour to every Man concerned in it. That they would remember what Dignity they had received, as Senators, from their Fathers, and then consider, what they were they were like to leave to their posterity; whether they should be able to boast, as the Commons could, that they had increased and amplified their Authority. He therefore told them, there would be no end on't, as long as the Authors of Sedition were made as honourable as their designs successful. What great alterations did C. Canuleius attempt? a confusion in Families, and in all auspices both publick and private; lest there should any thing remain that were free from mixture or corruption: that all discriminations being removed, no man may know either himself or his relations: for what other end could promiscuous Marriages have, but to make the Senate and the Commons mix with each other almost as Beasts do? so that he that is born shall not know of what blood he is, or what holy Rites he ought to perform, but be half Senator and half Plebeian, divided, as it were, in his very nature. They did not see, that all things both Divine and Human were like to be put into disorder: That now the disturbers of the People were aiming at the Consulate; and first of all had attempted, in words at least, to make one of the Consuls be chosen out of the Commons: but now desired, that the People might chuse the Consuls out of the Senate or the Commons, as they thought fit: and every seditious person would be sure to make them out of the Populace. That then they should have Canuleius and Icilius made Consuls; but Jupiter forbid, that the Sovereign Power should fall into such hands: and that he would die a thousand deaths rather than they should permit so dishonourable a thing to be done. He was sure, that if their Ancestors had foreseen, that by granting what they did, they should have made the People not more tractable toward them, but so much the rougher, and still craving one thing after another without any reason or equity, they would have undergone any hazard whatsoever, rather than have suffered those Laws to be imposed upon them. Because they then granted the People a power to chuse Tribunes, must it be granted a second time? That there could be no end of their disturbances, till either the Senators or the People were removed out of that City; either this Order or that Magistracy must away, and it were better late than never to obviate their boldness and temerity. Are such Men to be endured who first of all sowing discord cause a War with our Neighbour Nations, and then hinder the City from taking up Arms, and defending it self against those Enemies whom they have raised? yea, when they themselves have as good as sent for an Enemy, that they should not suffer an Army to be Levied against him? But that Canuleius should dare to declare in the Senate, that unless that House would receive his Laws, as if he were a Conqueror, he would obstruct the Levy; What is this else but to threaten that he would betray his Country? that he would suffer it to be attacked and taken? What courage will such a declaration put (not into the Roman People, but) into the Volsci, the Aequi, and the Veians? Will not they hope, that under the Conduct of Canuleius, they shall scale the Castle and the Capitol, if the Tribunes who have bereft the Senate of all its rights and authority, take from them their Courage and Resolution too? But nevertheless that the Consuls were ready to engage against the enormities of their fellow Citizens, sooner than against the Arms of their Enemies.

Whilst these things were hotly debated in the Senate, Canuleius spoke for his own Laws, and against the Consuls, to this effect: "Romans! I have often told you heretofore how the Senate contemn you, and how unworthy they thought you to live within the same Walls with them: but now they seem to do so more than ever, in being so mightily offended at my Proposals; in which what do I do other than put them in mind that we are their fellow Citizens, and though we have not the same quantity of riches, yet live in the same Country?" By the

"one of my Bills, I desire an Intermarriage; which is usually granted to Neighbouring and Foreign Nations: nay, we gave the freedom of the City (which is more than an Intermarriage) even to Enemies that we had Conquered. By the other I propose no new thing, but only demand back and would vindicate that which is the Peoples Right; to wit, that the Roman People may confer honours upon whom they will. Why must the Laws needs put all things into confusion? Why had I like just now to have been set upon in the Senate? Why don't they tell us plainly they will not forbear any longer, but will violate the sacred Power of the Tribunes? Cannot this City stand, though the Roman People have their Votes free, to give the Consulship to whom they please; or, unless a Plebeian, though he be worthy of the greatest honour, be cut off from all hopes of ever enjoying it? Is the Government ruined? Why then to say, Can a Plebeian be Consul, is as much as if a Man should say, Can a Slave or one made free, that was a Slave, be in that Office. Are you sensible in what contempt you live? If they could they would deprive you of half the Sun's light: they are mad that you breath, that you speak, or that you have the shapes of Men: and then (good Gentlemen!) they say 'tis an horrid thing for a Plebeian to be made a Consul. I pray you, Gentlemen! consider: though we are not admitted to the Registers and Commentaries of the High-priests, yet we know what even all Foreigners are not unacquainted with, That Consuls succeeded in the room of Kings: and that they have no right or authority, but what was in the Kings before. Do you believe that Numa Pompilius, who was not only no Patrician, but not so much as a Roman Citizen, was sent for out of the Sabine Territories and Reigned at Rome, by the Order of the People, and consent of the Senate? That after him, L. Tarquinius, who came not only not of a Roman, but not so much as of any Italian Race (being the Son of Demaratus a Corinthian, and an inhabitant of Tarquinius) was made King, whilst Ancus's Children were alive? That Servius Tullius after him, born of a Cornuculan Captive, having no Father, and a Slave to his Mother, gained and kept the Kingdom by his Policy and Courage? What should I speak of Titus Tatius the Sabine, whom Romulus himself, the Father of this City, made his Co-partner in the Kingdom? By which means, whilst no stock of Men was despised, in whom there appeared any eminent virtue, the Roman Empire grew. Now see if you can think so ill of Plebeian Consuls, when our Forefathers did not refuse even Foreign Kings: nor was the City shut even when the Kings were expelled, against the virtue of strangers. We received the Claudian Family, after the Kings were banished out of the Sabine Country, not only into the City, but also into the number of the Patricians. Now shall a stranger be made a Patrician, and then a Consul? yet a Roman Citizen, if he be a Plebeian, be cut off from all hopes of ever coming to that honour? Do we not think it possible, that a stout brave Man, who has behaved himself well both in Peace and War, though he be a Plebeian, may be like Numa, L. Tarquinius, or Serv. Tullius? Or, if he be, shall not we suffer him to rise to the honour of managing the Commonwealth? and rather choose to have Consuls like those Villains, the Decemviri, who were all made out of the Senate, than like the best of Kings, who were strangers?

"But no Consul, say they, was ever chosen out of the Commons since the Kings were expelled. What then? May no new thing be ever done? or ought what has never yet been done (as many things there are, that among us, who are but a new People, were never yet done) not to be now done, if it be for publick good? There were no Pontifices [or High-Priests] and Augurs in Romulus's time: but they were created by Numa Pompilius. There was no Pole or Rate in the City, nor any division made of it into Centuries and Clashes: but it was made by Servius Tullius. There had never been any Consuls; but when the Kings were banished, they were created. There never had been any such thing known as either the Authority or the Name of a Dictator: but the Senate were the Authors of both. There were once no Tribunes of the People, no Aediles, or Questors: but they were thought fit to be made. We created a sort of Officers called Decemviri to make Laws, and abolished their Authority again within these ten Years. Who questions, but in this City, which was built for an everlasting Duration, and shall grow up to an infinite extent of Empire, new Honours, Priesthoods, with rites of Families, and Men may be invented and ordeined? Did not the Decemviri make that Law, that the Senators should not intermarry with the Plebeians, some few years ago, to the disadvantage of the Commonwealth in general, and the great damage of the Populace in particular? Can there be any greater, or more signal disgrace, than for one part of the City, as though it were polluted, to be held unworthy of intermarrying with the other? What is this but being banished within the same Walls? left we should be mingled among them by way of affinity or relation. They are afraid to be allied in blood: What? If this pollutes your Nobility, which most of you, who are descended from the Albines and the Sabines, have not by birth or blood but by being chosen into the Senate, either by the Kings, or after their expulsion, by the Order of the People; could not you keep it clear by your own private resolutions, neither to marry any Plebeian, nor to let your Daughters or Sisters marry out of the rank of Senators? No Plebeian would offer violence to any Patrician Virgin: the Patricians are the lustful Persons. No Plebeian would have compelled any Man to make a Marriage compact against his will. Oh! but there's a Law against the Marriage of Senators with Plebeians. And that is a great "great disparagement to the People: For why don't you make another Law, that rich Men shall not marry into poor Families? For that which was always at the choice of private Persons; that a Woman might be married, wherever she got a good Husband, and a Man take any Woman that he liked, out of any Family, for his Wife; you have restrained by the obligations of a tyrannical Law, whereby you divide all civil Society, and make this City two instead of one. Why don't you make a Law, that no Plebeian shall live near a Patrician? that he shall not Travel the same Road? that he shall not go to the same Feast? that he shall not stand in the same Forum? For what is there else in the case, if a Plebeian marries a Patrician? or a Patrician a Plebeian? What Priviledge, I pray, is changed? The Children follow their Father; nor is it any thing that we desire by marrying with you, save that we may be reckoned among the number of Men, and their fellow Citizens: nor do you (unless you take delight to promote our disgrace and ignominy) contend for any thing at all.

"In fine, is the sovereign Power in the Roman People or in you? When the Kings were expelled, did you only gain Dominion, or the whole Commonwealth an equal Liberty? 'Tis fit the Roman, if they please, should make a Law. Shall you, as soon as any Bill is proposed, straight order a Levy as a penalty for so doing? And when I, as Tribune, begin to call the Tribes to Vote, will you, as Consul, give the young Men a Military Oath, and lead them forth into a Camp? Will you threaten the People and the Tribunes? What have you found by experiment, if not this (twice over) how much your menaces prevailed against the consent of the Commons? Good Men! you kept from mutinying, because you consulted our good. Or rather, did you not therefore abstain from quarreling, because that Party which was the stronger was also the more moderate? But you are not like, even now, neither, Romans! to see any violence offered by the People: they will try what your inclinations are; they will not try your strength. Wherefore the People, Consuls! is ready to follow you to those Wars, whether false or real, if by admitting them to make intermarriages you do unite this City; if they be joyned, allied, and mixed among you by private Relations: if stout and brave Men may hope to have the way to Honours open: to be Sharers and Partners in the Commonwealth: if (which is but the effect of equal Liberty) they may mutually Obey and Command in regard to annual Offices. If any one shall obstruct these things; make Speeches, and prate of as many Wars as you will, no Man will give in his Name, or take up Arms, to fight for Tyrants, with whom they have no share, either in the Commonwealth, of Honours, or in their private capacities of Matrimonial Alliance.

"Then the Consuls also coming into the Assembly, the business was altered from long harangues to wrangling; so that when the Tribune asked, Why a Plebeian might not be made a Consul? the Consul replied, though truly, perhaps, yet not so seasonably for the present purpose; Because no Plebeian had any thing to do with the auspices: and that therefore the Decemviri took away the priviledge of marrying where the People pleased, lest the auspices should be confounded by an uncertain breed of Men. At that the People were much enraged, that they should be denied the use of auspices, as if they had been hated by the gods: nor was there any end of their contentions (the Commons having got a vehement Tribune on their side, whom they themselves also endeavoured to out-vie in resolution) till the Senators were over-powered, and fain to submit to the making of the Law touching intermarriages: for by that means they thought the Tribunes would either totally lay down the Controversie concerning Plebeian Consuls, or defer it till the War was over, and that the People, being content in the meantime with marrying into Patrician Families, would be ready for the Levy. But now since Canuleius was grown so great by having overcome the Senate, and in the favour of the People, the other Tribunes were as eager to engage in the same quarrel, and contended very stiffly for the passing of their Bill: insomuch that though the noise of a War increased every day, they obstructed the Levy. The Consuls therefore, seeing they could do nothing in the Senate, now that the Tribunes interposed, had Cabals of the Nobility at home: wherein it was evident, that they must give up their Victory either to the Enemy or the People. Valerius and Horatius were the only two, who were not at those Consults. C. Claudius's opinion armed the Consuls against the Tribunes: but the several judgments of the Quintii, Cincinnatus and Capitolinus were mighty avers from slaughter, or violating those Officers whom by a League made with the People they had accepted of as sacred. By these consultations the business was brought to that pass, that they would suffer Tribunes Military with Consular Authority to be promiscuously made out of the Senators and the Commons: though nothing should be altered in the choice of Consuls: with which the Tribunes and the People too were all content. Thereupon an Assembly was appointed for the chusing of three Tribunes, who should be of Consular Authority: which was no sooner done, but all those Persons, who had either said or done any thing tending to Sedition, (especially such as were of the Tribunes Party) began to run about the Forum and beg Peoples Votes, as Candidates for the new Office. In which affair, though the Patricians first despaired, seeing the People were so provoked, of gaining that Honour, and secondly thought it below them to bear any Office in Partnership with the Commons, yet at length being forced to it they did apply themselves to the Nobility; lest they might seem to quit the possession of the Commonwealth. But the Result of that Assembly demonstrated, that Mens minds are very different,

when they contend for Liberty or Honour, from what they are when they have laid aside all animosities and freed themselves from prejudice: for the People chose all the Tribunes out of the Patricians, being content with that respect which had before been shewn to Plebeians. Where can you find, at this day, that moderation, equity and height of mind in one single Man, that then was in all the People together?

VII. In the Year 310. after the Building of Rome, the Tribunes of the Soldiers first entered upon their Office in the room of Consuls, their names being A. Sempronius, L. Atilius, and T. Cecilius, in whose time Concord at home procured Peace abroad also. There are some that say, these three Tribunes were created upon necessity; for that the Veians as well as the Æqui and the Volsci made War against the Romans, at the same time that the Ardeans Revolted from them; and so two Consuls were not able to manage so many Wars (without any mention of a Law being promulgated for the chusing of Consuls out of the Commons) and likewise that they had both the Authority and Ensigns of Consuls. But yet the Power of that Magistracy was not of long continuance; for the third Month after they entered upon their Office, they, by the Augurs Decree, as if they had been irregularly made, laid down their Honour; and the reason was, because C. Curiatius, who was President of the Assembly, had not taken the Tent as he ought to have done. Then Embassadors came from the Ardeans to Rome, making such a complaint concerning the injury done them, that if they had redress in that point, it was manifest they would, upon the restoration of their Land, stand to their League, and continue in friendship with the Romans. But the Senate told them, The judgment of the People could not be rescinded by the Senate, not only because they had no right or example so to do, but also upon the score of preserving that Concord which now was between the several ranks of Men. If the Ardeans would stay 'till they had an opportunity, and would leave the method of redressing that injury to the Senate, they should not, in time, repent that they had checked their passion; but should also be convinced, that the Senate took as much care to prevent any injury that might be done to them, as to repair it when it was offered. So the Embassadors, telling the Senate they would relate the whole matter to their Masters at Ardea, were kindly dismissed. Then the Patricians, seeing the Commonwealth was without a chief Magistrate, met, and created an Interrex: before whom the Debate, whether they should chuse Consuls or Tribunes Military, lasted for several days. The Interrex and the Senate contended for a Consular Assembly; but the Tribunes of the People, and the People, would needs have an Assembly for the chusing of Tribunes Military. At last the Senate carried it, because not only the People, who were resolved to confer either one or the other Honour upon Patricians, would strive no longer to no purpose; but the heads also of the Commons were most desirous of such an Assembly, in which they should not be at all regarded, thn where they might be pass'd by as unworthy: yea, the Tribunes of the People too would stickle no more in compliance to the Nobility. Thereupon T. Quintius Barbatus the Interrex created two Consuls, whose names were L. Papirius Mugilanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus. In whose time the League was renewed with the Ardeans: and upon them there is this remark, that their names who were Consuls that Year, are not found either in the ancient Annals or in the Books of the Magistrates: of which I suppose the reason to be, because the Tribunes Military governed at the beginning of the Year, and therefore the names of these Consuls, who were made in their room, were omitted, as if those Tribunes had continued the whole Year round. But Licinius Macer tells us that they were to be found in the Ardean League, and in the Linnen Books which lay in the Temple of Juno Moneta. In their time also, though so many terrors appeared from the neighbouring Countries, there was Peace both abroad and at home.

VIII. This Year (whether it had Tribunes only or Consuls also put in the room of those Tribunes) was attended by another, in which the Consuls names were well known, being M. Geganius Macerinus a second time, and T. Quintius Capitolinus a fifth time. This Year was likewise the beginning of the Censorship; a thing, which though it sprang from a small original, yet afterward increased to such a degree, that the regulation of Manners and Discipline among the Romans was subject to it; the Senate and the Centuries of Knights, the Power distinguishing between decency and undecency was within the jurisdiction of that Magistrate; yea, the ordering of all places both publick and private, and the Customs or Tribute of the Roman People were at the disposal and in the hands of that Officer. Now the first reason, why Censors were made, was, because the People having been Unpolled, or Rated for so many Years, that business could neither be deferred, nor had the Consuls leisure to mind it, they had so many Wars to provide against. Thereupon the Senate said, It being a troublesome business, and unbefitting the Dignity of a Consul, it ought to have a Magistrate peculiar to it; who should have Clerks under him, together with the keeping and making the Tables of Rates, as well as power to prescribe the form of every particular Mans Pele. The Senators gladly received the proposal, though it was a small matter, because it increased the number of Patrician Magistrates in the Commonwealth: supposing also, I suppose, (what afterward came to pass) that in a short time the riches of those that should bear that Office, would make an addition of State and Majesty to the honour it self. The Tribunes also (considering the present circumstances) look'd upon it to be necessary rather than a specious specious piece of service, and therefore, lest they should seem to thwart the Senate in such small things, were willing to comply. Since therefore this dignity was slighted by the chief of the City, the People Voted, that Papirius and Sempronius, whose Consulship occasioned some dispute, should make up their Year in that Office of Censorship; being called Censores, à censendo [i. e. from Taxing the People, &c.]

IX. Whilst these things were transacted at Rome, Embassadors came from Ardea, desiring the Romans for old Alliance sake, and the late League renewed between them, to send aid to their City which was almost ruined: for they could not enjoy that Peace which they had wisely preserved with the Roman People, for their intestine broils, the original of which, is said to be the difference between several Factions, which always have been, and still will prove more fatal to many People than Foreign Wars, than Famine or Diseases, or any other thing, that men ascribe to the wrath of Heaven, as the most deplorable of all publick calamities. Two young Men made love to a Damsel of the Plebeian rank, who was very beautiful: the one of them being of the same quality with her, and relying upon his Guardians, who themselves also were of the same condition: the other, being a Nobleman, was taken with nothing but her beauty only. Him therefore the Nobility assisted so far, that both the Rivals came a Wooing to her at the same time. But the Noble Youth prevailed upon the judgment of her Mother, who had a mind to have her Daughter married into a great Family: whilst the Guardians stickled all they could for their Pupil; being in that also mindful of their privileges, as Plebeians. At length, seeing the matter could not be determined within those Walls, they went to Law about it: where when the Mother and the Guardians had been heard, the Magistrates gave it as their opinions, that the Mother might dispose of her Daughter in Marriage as she pleased. But force was above Law; for the Guardians complaining openly in the Market place, among People of their own Quality and Party, of the injustice of the Decree, got a Band together, and forced the Maid out of her Mothers House: against whom a stronger company of Noble Youths rising up in Arms followed the young Man, who was much concerned at the indignity, and occasioned a fierce encounter. In which the populace having the worst on it, went, nothing like the Roman Commonalty, out of the City Armed, and having possessed themselves of a certain Hill, made excursions into the Lands belonging to the Nobility with Fire and Sword: yea, they prepared to Besiege the City also, and the rich Citizens that had been concerned on neither side, calling out all the Mechanicks, in hopes of Plunder, to assist them. And now the face of War and Slaughter appeared in all its shapes, the City being as it were infected with the madness of two young fellows, that contended for a fatal Marriage through the ruin of their Country. Each Party had but a small force either at home or abroad; wherefore the Noble Men sent to the Romans to come and relieve their Besieged City, whilst the Commonalty instigated the Volsci to help them in the taking of Ardea. The Volsci came first under the Conduct of Cluilius, and made a Rampire against the Enemies Walls. Which being told at Rome, immediately M. Geganius, the Consul marching forth with an Army, pitched his Camp three thousand paces from the Enemy, and being it was late in the day, bid his Soldiers refresh themselves. After which, about the fourth Watch he marched forth; and the Work which he began was carried on with such speed, that at Sun-rising the Volsci saw themselves enclosed by the Romans with a stronger Bulwark than that which they had made against the City: the Consul having also made a Line of Communication up to the Wall of Ardea, whereby his friends might come to him out of the Town.

X. The Volscian General who had to that day maintained his Men not with Provisions prepared before-hand, but with Forage and Plunder that he took out of the Country for his present occasion; seeing himself encompassed on a sudden with such a Mound, and being unprovided of all necessities, desired the Consul to let him speak with him, and told him, That if the Romans came to raise that Siege, he would draw the Volscians off from thence; to which the Consul answered, That those who were Conquered ought to take, not to make Conditions of Peace; nor should the Volscians go away as they came to oppose the Allies of Rome, at their own pleasure: but he commanded them to surrender their General, lay down their Arms, confess themselves Conquered, and obey his Commands: otherwise both those that went away, and those that stayed there too should find him such an Enemy as would rather carry back to Rome a Victory over the Volsci, than an unfaithful Peace. The Volscians therefore put little trust in their Armies, and having found that all other means were quite cut off, engaged, besides other inconveniences, in a place which was very incommodious to fight in, and worse to run away from: by which means, being killed on every side, they turned from fighting to praying; and having delivered up their General, together with their Arms, underwent the disgraceful ceremony of being made Captives of War by going under a Gallows made of three Javelins, and then with one Garment on their backs were dismissed, after they had suffered so much ignominy, and lost so many of their Men. And soon after, as they sat down together not far from the City Tusculum, being unarmed, they were set upon and suffered for an old grudge between them and the Tusculans, insomuch that there were hardly two Men left to carry the news of their slaughter. The Roman Consul in the mean time composed the Ardean Sedition, Beheading the Ringleaders of it, and Confiscating their Goods into the publick Treasury.

jury of that City. Then the Ardeans were of opinion that the Romans had made them full satisfaction for the injury which was done them in the judgment concerning the Land; but the Senate thought they ought to do something more still to obliterate the remembrance of such a publick piece of avarice. The Consul therefore came back with Triumph into the City, Cluilius the Volsian General being led before his Chariot, and the spoils too carried before, of which he had disarmed the Enemies Forces, when he made them pass under the Jutum or Gallows. Mean while Quintius in his Gown (which is not easie) equalled the Glory of his Collegues in Arms. For he took such care at home to preserve Concord, by moderating the Laws in respect both to the highest and the lowest, that the Senate thought him a severe Consul, and the Commons believed him mild enough. He likewise gained more upon the Tribunes by his Gravity and Authority, than by contending with them. In fine, five Consulships managed all after the same rate, and all his life having been spent in the affairs belonging to the Consuls made him full as venerable as the Dignity he bore: for which reason there was no talk of the Tribunes Military in the time of these Consuls.

XI. U. C. 312. The next Year they chose for Consuls M. Fabius Vibulanus, and Postumus Æbutius Cornicen; who considering they succeeded two such Men that had gained so much honour by their Conduct both at home and abroad (but especially, that their Year was very memorable among their Neighbours, whether Allies or Enemies, for the great care that they had taken to relieve the Ardeans in their necessity) they endeavoured so much the more studiously to raze the memory of that infamous Judgment out of the minds of Men, by making an Order of Senate. That seeing the City of Ardea was reduced by their intestine tumults to a small number, there should a Colony be sent thither as a Guard against the Volsians. This was set up in Tables publicly, to conceal the design they had of rescinding the Judgment from the People and the Tribunes. For they had agreed, that a far greater number of the old Rutilian Colony, than of the Romans, should be taken in, and that no Lands should be divided among them, but what had been taken away by that infamous Judgment, of which no one Clod should be assigned to any Roman, before all the Rutulians were served. Thus their Land came again into the hands of the Ardeans. The three that were appointed to carry the Colony to Ardea, were Agrippa Menenius, T. Clælius Siculus, and M. Ebuicius Ælua; who, having offended the People in acting so much against their minds, when they assigned that Land to their Allies, which the Romans had judged to be their own; and having likewise disobliged the chief Senators in not shewing any extraordinary respect to e're an one of them, were fain to stay in that Colony, which could testify for their Integrity and Justice, to avoid vexatious Accusations at Rome, where the Tribunes had appointed a Day for their Tryal.

XII. U. C. 313. There was Peace both at home and abroad all this and the following Year, in which C. F. Pacilus, and M. Papirius Crassus were Consuls. Then the Games which the Decemviri, in the time of the Peoples secession from the Senate, had designed, were performed. Petilius sought to move sedition, but in vain; for though when he was Tribune of the People, he declared the very same things again, he could not only not get the Consuls to leave the matter, touching the division of Lands among the Commons, to the Senate; but besides that, when he had with much ado obtained that the Senate might be Consulted, whether they would have any Assemblies for Consuls or Tribunes, there was an Order made for the chusing of Consuls: so that they slighted the Tribunes menaces, when he threatened to hinder the Levy; for their Neighbours being all at quiet, there was no need of War or any Preparations for it. But after this calm season of Affairs, there came an Year (in which Proculus Geganius Macerinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus were Consuls) remarkable for many sorts of death and dangers; for Seditions, Famine, and the Peoples receiving almost the yoke of Kingly Government upon their necks through the sweetness of a bounteous largess made among them: There wanted only a Foreign, with which if they had been oppressed, they could hardly have withstood, though all the gods in Heaven had taken part with them. Their Calamities began with a Famine (whether the Year was unreasonable, or that the People, allured with the pleasure of being at Assemblies and in the City, had neglected the manuring of their Land, I know not; for both causes are assigned) for which the Senate accused the Commons as slothful, and the Tribunes of the People blamed sometimes the knavery and sometimes the negligence of the Consuls. At last the Commons prevailed, with the Senates consent too, that L. Minucius should be made Prefect of the Provisions, who was more likely to be successful in that Office as to the preservation of his Liberty, than diligent in his business: though at last he was much beloved and honoured (as he deserved) for the Provisions which he raised. He therefore, after many Embassies had been sent round about to the neighbouring Nations, both by Sea and Land, but all in vain (save that some small quantity of Corn was brought out of Etruria) having got no considerable quantity of Provisions together, and being reduced to an extremity, did, by compelling People to produce their Corn, and sell what remained above enough for a Month; as likewise by defrauding Servants of some part of their days allowance, accusing and exposing the Corn-Merchants to the fury of the People, rather discover than relieve their want, many of the Common People being now without all hopes, rather than live in Torment, threw themselves headlong into the Tiber.

Then

XIII. U. C. 315. Then Sp. Mælius, a very rich Man, of the Knightly Order, as the City then was, began a business, which though it were to publick advantage, was of very ill example, and a worse design. For he having bought Corn in Etruria with his own Money, by means of his Acquaintance and Clients (which very thing, I believe, was the cause why they could not buy Provisions at the publick Charge) began to make largesses of it among the People; whom he drew after him wherever he went, with much more vanity and pride than became a private Person; they being pleased with his gifts, for which they promised him, through their favour, he should be Consul. But he, as Mans mind is never satisfied with what Fortune promises, was ambitious of higher things, that were not to be allowed of; and therefore, seeing the Consulship must be wrested from the Senators, began to consult of his being King: for that he thought was the only reward that could requite all that trouble and pains, which he must undergo because he attained even to a Consulship. And now the Consular Assembly was at hand; which, since his designs were not yet ripe for execution, destroyed his enterprise. For T. Quintius Capitolinus was the sixth time made Consul, who was a Person very unlikely to favour one that would make any innovation; and his Collegue was Agrippa Menenius, Surnamed Lanatus; at first made for an uncertain time, as long as occasion required is not known, there being no evidence of it, but his name, as Prefect, put in the Linnen Books among the Magistrates both Years. This Minucius taking the same care of the Commonwealth, as Mælius privately had undertaken to do, since there were the same sort of Men in both their Houses, discovering the matter, told the Senate, That there were Arms carried into Mælius's House, and that he had Meetings at home, which without doubt were Consults how to gain a Crown: that the time for execution was not yet come, but all things else were agreed on. That the Tribunes also were bribed to betray their Liberty; as likewise that the several Commissions were given to those that should head the Multitude. That he came to tell them somewhat later, than was consistent with their safety, lest he should have informed them of what he did not know to be certainly true. Which when they heard, the chief of the Senate did not only chide the last Years Consuls for suffering such largesses or conventions of the People to be in any private House, but blamed the new Consuls also, for tarrying till the Prefect of the Provisions came and informed the Senate of a thing so weighty, which might require a Consul, not only for its detector, but revenger too. Then T. Quintius told them, The Consuls were not at all to blame; who being bound up by Laws that were made concerning Liberty of Appeal in order to dissolve Authority, had not so much strength in their Office as they had Courage to revenge that audacious attempt according to the heinousness of it: that would require not only a stout Man, but also one that were free and disengaged from the fetters of Law. Wherefore he would make L. Quintius Dictator; for he had a soul equal to that great Authority. Thereupon when they all approved of the proposal, Quintius at first refused it; and asked them, What they meant to expose such an old Man as he was to so much difficulty and danger? But soon after, when they all around him cried out, that there was more Policy and Courage too in that old Soul of his than in all the rest that were there; commending him as he deserved, whilst the Consul continued of the same mind, Cincinnatus having made his supplication to the gods, that his old Age might not prove either a damage, or dishonour to the Commonwealth in such dangerous circumstances, was declared Dictator by the Consul; and made C. Servilius Ahala Master of the Horse.

XIV. The next day having planted Guards in several places, he came down into the Forum, where the People stared upon him as a new and wonderful sight: the Mælians, and their Leader, saw the force of that great Authority designed against them: those that knew nothing of a design to make Mælius King, asked, What Tumults, what sudden War required a Dictator, or Quintius to be Governour of the Commonwealth when he was above eighty years of Age; whilst in the mean time Servilius, Master of the Horse, being sent to Mælius by the Dictator, told him, The Dictator would speak with you: to which he in a fear replying, What would he have with me? Servilius answered, You must make your defence against Minucius, who hath accused you before the Senate. Whereupon Mælius retired into the crowd of his followers, and first, looking about him, was very unwilling to move; but at last the Apparitor [or Serjeant] dragging him along by the Order of the Master of the Horse, he was rescued by those that stood about him, and running away, implored the favour of the Roman People: saying, He was oppressed by consent of the Senate, for having been kind to the Commonwealth; and desiring, that they would assist him now in his last extremity, nor suffer him to be murdered before their eyes. As he bawled out to this effect, Ahala Servilius overtook him and slew him: by which means, being bespattered with the blood of the Party slain, and guarded with a Company of Patrician young Men, he carried the news to the Dictator; that Mælius the Multitude upon them, had what he deserved: upon which the Dictator said, Go and prosper, C. Servilius! in thy Courage, now thou hast freed the Commonwealth.

XV. Thereupon seeing the Multitude in a Tumult, because they were divided in their opinions of the matter, he ordered an Assembly to be called, in which he told them, That Mælius was justly slain, though he were not guilty of a Design to be King, for not coming to the Dictator when the Master of the Horse called him; for he was then sitting to hear the Cause; which when he had examined, Mælius should have had as much favour as the case would have born. That he who made what resistance he could rather than submit to the Law, was restrained by violence; nor ought a Magistrate to have dealt with him like a fellow Citizen, who though he were born among a free People, among Laws and Privileges, in a City, from whence he knew all Kings were banished; and where, the same Year, the Sons of a Kings Sister, and of the Consul that delivered his Country, were Beheaded with an Ax for a Plot in which they were known to be engaged, for bringing in of the Kings again: a City, from whence Collatinus Tarquinius the Consul, out of hatred to the name, was forced to quit his Office, and go into banishment: a City, in which Sp. Cassius suffered after some Years for a design he had to be King: a City, in which of late the Decemviri were amerced in all their Estates, and punished with Exile or Death for their Kingly pride. He, I say, should not have been dealt with like a fellow Citizen, that would hope, as Sp. Mælius did, to make himself King. And pray what a Man is he? that he should aspire to Dominion without any Nobility of birth, any honours or deserts. For though the Claudii and the Cassii were high-minded, they had the Consulships, the Decemvirates, and other honours of their Ancestors and the splendor of their Families to brag of, so that it was no fault in them. But that Sp. Mælius, who should rather wish, than hope, to be Tribune of the People, who was only a rich Corn-Merchant should hope to buy the Liberty of his fellow Citizens for two pounds of Wheat apiece, or should think that by giving them a meals Meat he could wheedle a People into slavery, who had conquered all their neighbour Nations; or that the City should suffer him to be King, whom they could scarce find in their hearts to make a Senator, and to have all the Ensigns of State and all that Power which Romulus their Founder, who was descended from the gods, but now was one of their number, had, was not more wicked than monstrous. Nor was it enough that he atoned for it with his blood, except his House too were demolished, in which so much madness was conceived; and his Goods, that were infected with the Design of their being the price of a Kingdom, all confiscated. Wherefore he ordered the Questors to sell those Goods, and put them into the publick Treasury.

XVI. Then he commanded his House, that the place where it stood might be a monument of the frustration of his wicked purpose, to be immediately Demolished; and the space was called Æquimelium. L. Minucius was honoured with a figure of a Golden Bull, without the Gate called Porta Trigemina; nor were the People unwilling to have it so, because he divided Mælius's Corn amongst them at an As [i.e. a Bushel.] I find in some Authors, that this same Minucius went over from the Senate to the People, being made the eleventh Tribune of the Commons, and appeased the Sedition caused by the death of Mælius. But it is scarce credible, that the Senate suffered the number of the Tribunes to be augmented; or that such an example should be introduced by a Patrician especially. Nor is it likely that the People ever obtained such a Priviledg, or so much as stickled for it. But, above all, it is plainly confuted by a Law that pass'd some few years before; That the Tribunes should not have the power to take in any Collegue above their just number. Q. Cæcilius, Q. Junius, and Sext. Titinius were the sole Persons of all the College of Tribunes, that did not favour the Law touching Minucius's honour, but accused, one while Minucius, and another while Servilius, before the People, complaining perpetually of the foul murder of Mælius. By which means they brought it to pass, that an Assembly should be held for the chusing of Tribunes Military rather than Consuls; not doubting but, since there were six to be chosen (for that was now their legal number) some Plebeians, that should profess themselves revengers of Mælius's death, would be elected. The Commons though, that Year, they were disturbed with many and various Commotions, created no more than three Tribunes with power Consular; among whom was L. Quintius, Cincinnatus's Son; from the envy of whose Dictatorship they sought an occasion to raise a Tumult: but Mamercus Æmilius, a Man of great Quality, was chosen before Quintius, and L. Junius was the third.

XVII. In the time of their Magistracy, Fidenæ, a Roman Colony, revolted to Lar. Tolumnius King of the Veians, and to the Veians. But there was a worse offence added to that Revolt. For by the command of Tolumnius, they killed C. Fulcinius, C. Julius Tullus, Sp. Nautius, and L. Roscius, the Roman Embassadors, that came to know the reason of their new designs. Some extenuate the Kings fault, and say, that as he threw a lucky Cast at Dice, his doubtful words, being taken by the Fidenians as though he had meant they should kill them, was the cause of their Death. But that is incredible; that when the Fidenates, his new Allies, came to him to consult about a Murder that was like to break the Law of Nations, his mind should not be off from his Game: nor that afterwards he should be concerned for the fact. It is more likely, that the People of Fidenæ had a mind to be so engaged by that action, that being conscious of its heinousness, they might never after hope for any friendship from the Romans. The Embassadors, who were slain at Fidenæ, had their Statues set up publicly in the Roftra. And now a bloody Fight drew nigh, in which they were to engage with the Veians and the Fidenates, who, besides their being two neighbour Nations, occasioned a War by such an horrid Act: wherefore the People and their Tribunes being at quiet, that publick affairs might be the better managed, there was nothing said to the contrary, but that M. Geganius Macerinus (a third time) and L. Sergius Fidenas, should be made Consuls; of which the latter, I suppose, took his Surname of Fidenas from the War which he then waged. For he was the

the first that fought on this side the River Anien with any success against the King of the Veians; but he did not obtain a bloodless Victory. Wherefore the Romans were more grieved for the Citizens they had lost, than they rejoiced at the Defeat of their Enemies: and the Senate, as in a case of extremity, ordered Mamercus Æmilius to be proclaimed Dictator. Who was no sooner made, but he created L. Quintius Cincinnatus (a Youth very worthy of such a Father) who had been of the College the last Year, when they were Tribunes Military together, with power Consular. To the Levy which the Consuls made were added the old Centurions, who had experience in Warlike affairs, and the number of those that were lost in the late Battel made up. The Dictator commanded Quintius Capitolinus and M. Fabius Vibulanus to follow him as Lieutenants. As therefore he had greater authority than ordinary, so the Man was equal to his Commission; for he drove the Enemy out of the Roman Territories beyond Anien, where they took possession of the Hills betwixt that and Fidenæ, removing their Camp backward: nor did they descend into the Plains, before the Faliscan Legions came to their assistance: and then at length the Etrurians Camp was pitched before the Walls of Fidenæ. In the mean time the Roman Dictator fate down not far from thence at the meeting of the two Rivers upon the Banks of them both, and raising his Out-works as fast and as far as he could to defend himself for the present, the next day, led his Army into the Field.

There were several opinions among the Enemies. The Faliscans, being a great way from Home, very uneasy in a Campaign, and confident in their own strength, desired to engage: but the Veians and the Fidenates thought best to protract the War. Tolumnius therefore though he was better pleased with the sentiments of his own Countrymen, yet left the Faliscans should undergo too much hardship, declared, He would fight the next day. The Dictator and the Romans were the more encouraged, when they saw the Enemy declined the Battel; and the day following, when the Soldiers murmured among themselves, and said, that they would attack their Camp and City, if the Enemy would not come out to fight, both the Armies marched forth into the Plain between their two Camps. The Veians abounding in numbers, sent a Party round the Mountains to attack the Roman Camp in the time of the Battel. The Army of those three Nations stood in such order, that the Veians were in the right Wing, the Faliscans in the left, and the Fidenians in the middle. On the other side the Dictator with his right Wing engaged the Falisci, and Capitolinus Quintius with the left Wing, the Veians; whilst the Master of the Horse marched with his Cavalry against the main Body. For some small time there was silence and quiet; the Etrurians resolving not to joyn Battel, unless they were compelled to it, whilst the Dictator look'd back to the Castle at Rome, to observe when the Augurs, by the flying of the Birds, thought fit to give the appointed signal: which as soon as he beheld, he sent the Horse out first with a shout against the Enemy. Then the Foot marched after and fought very smartly; insomuch that the Etrurian Legions were not able in any part to sustain the shock of the Romans. Their Horse made the least resistance, and amongst them all the King himself, who was by far the stoutest Man they had, riding up to the Romans in a full Career, prolonged the Fight.

There was at that time among the Horsemen a certain Tribune, named A. Cornelius Cossus, a very handsome shaped Man, and of equal Courage and Strength, who being mindful of his noble Birth and Family (which he made much more renowned among Posterity) and seeing the Roman Troops very hard put to it by Tolumnius, which way soever he bent his Forces, no sooner discovered him, as he flew in a Kingly Habit to and fro over the whole Army, but he cried out, Is this the breaker of Human Leagues, and the violater of the Law of Nations? I'll presently make him a Sacrifice (if the gods will permit any thing here on earth to be sacred) to the Ghosts of our Embassadors. With that setting spurs to his Horse, and riding full Tilt at him, he with his Spear dismounted him; but so, that Tolumnius, leaning on his Javelin, lit upon his feet: from whence rising up to strike at Cossus again, he knock'd him down with his Buckler, and repeating his strokes upon him, with his Spear stuck the King to the Ground. Then having rifled his Body, cut off his head and got it upon the point of his Spear, to shew his Victory over him, he routed the Enemy with pure terror which they were in to see their King slain: and by that means also the Horse were defeated, who alone had made the Victory doubtful. The Dictator in the mean time pursuing the routed Legions, drove them into their Camp, where he slew them. A great many of the Fidenates, being acquainted with the Country, fled into the Mountains; whilst Cossus with the Horse, passing over the Tiber, carried a vast Booty with him to the City. But in the midst of the Fight they had another Engagement on the back of their Camp with part of the Enemies Forces whom Tolumnius, as I said before, had sent round the Hills. There Fabius Vibulanus at first defended the Rampire with a Company of Men whom he planted all round it: but whilst the Enemy was intent upon that part, going out at the right-hand Gate of the Camp with a Party of Triarii [commonly the best Soldiers the Romans had] he so surprized them, that they were all in a fright; and though the slaughter was less, because they were fewer, yet they ran away with as much consternation as the rest did out of the Field.

Having had such great success upon all occasions, the Dictator, by order of the Senate and consent of the People, returned Triumphant into the City. But that which made the greatest show of all the Triumph was Cossus's carrying the rich spoils of the King whom he had had slain: whilst the Soldiers sung extemporary Verses of their own making to his praise, comparing him even to Romulus. Those spoils he fixed with great solemnity as an Offering in the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, (near the spoils of Romulus, which were the first that were called Spolia Opima [i.e. rich spoils] and the only ones at that time there) turning the eyes of the People from the Dictators Chariot upon himself, and being almost the only person that enjoyed the benefit of that day. The Dictator offered a Crown of Gold of a pound weight, made out of the publick stock, by the Peoples Order, to Jupiter in the Capitol. Now in this affair, having followed all Authors that have written before me, I have told you, that A. Cornelius Cossus a Tribune of the Soldiers, was he that brought the second rich spoils into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius. But besides, that those are properly called rich spoils, which one General takes from another, nor do we call any one a General, but him under whose Conduct a War is managed, the title it self, inscribed upon the spoils, convinces both them and me, that Consul Cossus took them. And since I heard Augustus Caesar himself, who was the Builder or restorer of all the Temples in the City, when he went into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, which he repaired, (it being ready to fall down for age) read the same thing, which was written upon a Linnen Breast-plate, I thought it almost sacrilegious to rob Cossus of such a witness of his spoils as Caesar, the Rebuilder of that very Temple was. But if there be any mistake in the case, because not only the ancient Annals, but the Magistrates Linnen Books, laid up in the Temple of Moneta, which Macer Licinius quotes, make A. Cornelius Cossus to be Consul seven Years after with T. Quinctius Pennus, yet mine is the common received opinion. But for a farther argument, that such a famous Fight cannot be transferred to that Year, we know, that about the time that A. Cornelius was Consul, there was no Wars for almost three Years together, besides that there happened a Pestilence, and great scarcity of Fruits: insomuch that some Annals, to shew the fatality of that time, give us nothing but the names of the Consuls: and the third Year from Cossus's Consulship, he is said to have been Tribune of the Soldiers with power Consular. That the same Year also he was Master of the Horse, and in that Dignity fought another famous Battel on Horseback: in which I leave every one to their own free conjecture. But in this case I am apt to think Men will take the freedom to question the truth of any thing if they make a doubt of it; when the Warrior himself laying the fresh spoils in the Holy-place, and looking in the face of almost Jupiter himself, and Romulus, such venerable witness of his false Title, wrote himself A. Cornelius Cossus, the Consul.

XXI. U. C. 318. When M. Cornelius Maluginensis, and L. Papirius Crassus were Consuls, there were Armies led into the Veian and the Faliscan Territories: from whence they drove great numbers of Men and Cattel, but found no Enemy in all the Country, never had any occasion of fighting, nor attacked any of their Towns, because the Plague was in them. At the same time there were Seditions attempted at home, but not accomplished, by Sp. Maelius, Tribune of the People, who thinking he could make some bustle upon the score of his Name, had not only summoned Minucius to his Tryal, but likewise preferred a Bill for the Confiscation of the Goods of Servilius Ahala: saying, that Maelius was falsely accused by Minucius, and that Servilius had killed a Citizen uncondemned: but the People slighted what he said more than they did himself. In the mean time, though they were much concerned for the sickness which grew very fatal among them, as likewise for those terrible Sights and Prodigies which appeared; but most of all for that they were told the Houses in the Country tumbled down with frequent Earthquakes. Wherefore the People, with the Duumviri going before them, made publick Obsecrations to the gods. But the next Year, when C. Julius (a second time) and L. Virginus were Consuls, being much more Pestilential, made such a Desert of the City as well as the Fields, that (not to say, that no body went a foraging out of the Roman Confines, or that the Senate and People were careless of their Warlike affairs) the Fidenates on their own accord, who at first had secured themselves either in some Town, the Mountains, or within their Walls, came down to Plunder the Roman Territories. From whence sending for the Veian Army (for the Faliscans could not be persuaded to renew the War, either by the Mortality among the Romans, or the intreaties of their Allies) those two Nations crossed the Anien, and set up their Standards not far from the Gate Collina. Thereupon they trembled as much in the City as in the Country: wherefore Julius the Consul planted all their Forces upon the Rampire and Walls; whilst Virginus consulted the Senate in the Temple of Quirinus: where they thought fit to make A. Servilius Dictator, whose Surname, some say, was Priscus, and others, Structus. But Virginus staying till he had consulted his Collegue, had his permission, and declared Servilius Dictator in the night, and he made Postumus Ebutius Elus his Master of the Horse.

XXII. Then the Dictator commanded all the People to be, as soon as it was day, without the Gate Collina: and accordingly all that were able to bear Arms appeared: whereupon the Ensigns were brought out of the Treasury to the Dictator. Which being done, the Enemy betook themselves into higher places, into which the Dictator with his Army followed them, and not far from Nomentum, joyning Battel, routed the Etrurian Legions; whom he drove thence into the City Fidenæ, and surrounded that City with a Bulwark. But the Town was so high and well Fortified, that it could not be so much as scaled, nor was there any hardship felt all the time time of the Siege: because they had Corn not only enough to supply their necessities, but to spare also, their store was so great, which they had formerly laid in. So therefore having no hopes of taking by Storm, or forcing it by Famine to surrender, the Dictator began in places which, being adjacent, he was acquainted with, and on the back part of the City which was most neglected, as being naturally Impregnable, to dig a Mine into the Castle. About which, when he had set his Miners to work, he himself approaching the Walls in several very distant places, with his Army divided into four parts, to succeed each other in the Fight, by keeping the Enemy employed upon the Walls continually night and day, gave them no leisure to be sensible of his design; till having digged from his Camp quite through the Hill, they had made a way streight up into the Castle; insomuch that whilst the Etrurians were apprehensive of vain threats instead of certain danger, the noise of the Enemy above their heads showed that the City was taken. That Year C. Furius Pacilus, and M. Geganius Macerinus being Censors, approved of the Villa Publica [a Place raised in and made convenient for publick uses] in the Campus Martius, and the Pole of the People was then first managed in that place.

I find in Macer Licinius that the same Consuls, to wit, C. Julius (a third time) and Virginius (a second time) were made again the Year following. But Valerius Antias, and Quintus U. C. 320. Tubero say that Marcus Manlius, and Q. Sulpitius were Consuls for that Year; and yet though they differ so much in their account, both Tubero and Macer acknowledg the Linnen Books to be their Authors for what they say: nor does either of them deny but that old Authors say there were Tribunes of the Soldiers that Year. Licinius questions not the Authority of the Linnen Books, though Tubero makes some doubt; granting that among other things that time has made uncertain, this may be one. The People of Etruria were in a great fright after the taking of Fidenæ; nor did the Veians only dread the like misfortune, but the Faliscans too, when they considered that they had joyned with them in the War, though when they first rebelled they were not with them. Wherefore when those two Cities, sending Embassadors round about to all the two and twenty Nations of Etruria, had desired of them, that there might be a convention of all Etruria at the Temple of Voltumna, the Senate, seeing a great storm, as it were, acoming, ordered Mamercus Æmilius to be again declared Dictator: by whom A. Postumius Tubertus was made Master of the Horse: and the preparations for that War were so much the greater, by how much there was more danger to be feared from all Etruria, than from those two Nations only.

But that affair was something easier than any body expected. Wherefore when the Merchants brought news, That the Veians were denied any aid, and told, that seeing they had begun a War on their own heads, they might end it with their own Forces, and not seek partners in their adversity, with whom they had not communicated the blessings of their prosperity; the Dictator, for fear he should have been created to no purpose, now that the occasion of gaining glory in War was taken away, desiring to do something even in Peace, that might be a Monument of his Dictatorship, endeavoured to lessen the Censorship, either because he thought their power too great, or that he was offended, not so much at the greatness of their honour, as at the length of their continuance in the Office. He therefore calling an Assembly, told them, The gods had undertaken to manage the affairs of the Commonwealth abroad, and keep all things safe: that he, as for what was to be done within the Walls, would consult the Liberty of the Roman People. And the best way to preserve that, was, not to suffer great Offices to be long in one Magistrates hands; but to bound that with time, to which the Law had set no bounds. That other Magistrates were annual, but that the Censorship was of five years continuance: that it was hard for the People to live so many years, a great part of their life, obnoxious to the same persons; wherefore he would make a Law, that the Censorship should not last above a Year and half. Accordingly, the next day, with general consent of the People he passed the Law: and then told them, Romans! that you may see I don't at all fancy Offices of long continuance, I at this instant lay down my Dictatorship. Whereupon having quitted his own Office, and limited that of others, he was attended to his House with great applause and favour of the People. The Censors taking it ill, turned him out of his Tribe, for having diminished a Magistracy of the Roman People, and setting a rate upon him of eight times as much as he ought to pay, made him only a Tributary to the State. Which thing they say he bore with great courage, as considering the cause of his disgrace, more than the disgrace it self: and that the chief of the Senate, though they had desired before to have the Censors powers restrained, did now much more approve of it, being offended to see such an example of their severity: for each of them foresaw he might be longer and oftner subject to the Censors, than he should bear the Office. But the People were so enraged, that no body, save Mamercus, could have kept them from laying violent hands upon the Censors.

XXV. The Tribunes of the People, by their daily assemblies, obstructing the Consular Convention, so that the matter was almost reduced to an Interregnum, they at last prevailed to have Tribunes of the Soldiers chosen with Consular Authority. But they had not what they desired (though they carried the day) which was, to have a Plebeian chosen; for they were all Patricians, and their names were M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Fostius, L. Sergius Fidenas. That Year a Pestilence kept them from minding any thing else; and a Temple was vowed to Apollo for the recovery of the People; the Duumviri doing many things prescribed in their Books, Books, to appease the wrath of the gods, and turn the Plague away from the People. But for all that they could do, there was a great Mortality in the City and Country both of Men and Cattel: Yea, they feared a Famine too, for want of Men to Till the Land, and therefore sent into Etruria, Pometia, to Cumæ, and at last even into Sicily for Corn. In the mean time there was no talk of any Consular Assembly: but there were Tribunes of the Soldiers made with Consular Authority, and all Patricians, whose names were L. Pinarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Sp. Postumius Albus. That Year the force of the Disease was abated, nor was there any danger of their wanting Corn, they had so much before-hand. Mean while there was a Council held among the Æqui and the Volsci, and in Etruria, at the Temple of Voltumna, concerning a War. But there they put off the business for a Year, and made a Decree, That no Council should be held before such a time: whilst the Veians to no purpose complained, That the same fortune attended Veii, by which Fidenæ was destroyed. Whilst this was done, the heads of the Commons at Rome, having long waited in hopes of greater honour, (but all to no end) whilst there was peace abroad, they began to call Conventions into the Houses of the Tribunes of the People. And there making secret Cabals, they complained, That the People so despised them, that though for so many Years there had been Tribunes of the Soldiers made with Consular Authority, no Plebeian was ever yet admitted to that Honour. That their Ancestors indeed were very provident in taking care, that no Patrician should ever be a Plebeian Magistrate, or else the Tribunes of the People had been most commonly Patricians; so despicable were they even in the sight of their own Party, nor contemned less by the Commons than by the Senate. Thereupon some began to acquit the People, and lay the blame upon the Senate; That by their ambition and ill arts it was, that the Peoples way to honour was blocked up: if the People could but once be rid of their intreaties, mixt with menaces, they would betrink themselves and Vote for Commons; and having the assistance of the Tribunes, would vindicate the Authority of the Commons. Then it was thought fit, in order to the taking away all canvassing for Offices, that the Tribunes of the People should promulgate a Law, That no Man should make his Garment whiter than ordinary, when he went to get Votes: which Law, though it now may seem a small matter, and scarce worth serious consideration, yet then inflamed the Senate and the People to a very great degree. At last the Tribunes got the day and past their Law: and it appeared very plainly, when their minds were provoked, that the People would for the future favour their own Party. Wherefore, lest they should be totally free to do what they pleased, there was an Order of Senate made, for the holding of a Consular Assembly. At which juncture there was a sudden tumult in the City, caused by the news which the Latins and the Hernicans brought from the Æqui and the Volsci.

XXVI. Thereupon T. Quintius, the Son of Lucius, Surnamed Cincinnatus, (and Pennis too) and C. Julius Mento were created Consuls; nor was the terror of the War any longer deferred. By U. C. 323. a sacred Law, which with those People is of greatest force for the raising of Soldiers, they having made a Levy, two mighty Armies marched forth and met in Algidum; where the Æqui and the Volsci fortified their Camps apart from each other; their Generals being at that time more industrious than ever before they had been, not only to defend, but to exercise their Men: which put the Romans into a greater fear. Then the Senate ordered a Dictator to be made; because those Nations, though they had been often Conquered, yet still rebelled again with greater spirit than ever before: besides that some part of the Roman Youth was taken off by the sickness; but, above all, the private quarrel between the two Consuls, and their thwarting of each other in all their Counsels, increased their dread. There are, who say, these Consuls had but ill success in a Battel in Algidum, and that that was the reason why a Dictator was created. But this is manifest, that though they disagreed in other things, they consented even against the will of the Senate in this one thing, that they would not make a Dictator; till one thing coming still more terrible after another, and yet the Consuls would not submit to the Senate, Q. Servilius Priscus, one who had bore the greatest Offices with extraordinary applause, applying himself to the Tribunes, said, You, Tribunes of the People! since things are come to such an extremity, the Senate Appeals to; that you, in such a dangerous case as the Commonwealth is now in, would force the Consuls by your Authority to create a Dictator. Which when he had said, the Tribunes thinking they had gotten a good occasion to augment their Power, withdrew; and soon after, in the name of the College, declared, It was their pleasure, that the Consuls should submit to the Senate; and if they any longer opposed the Will of that most honourable Order, they would command them to be carried to Goal. The Consuls chose rather to be out-done by the Tribunes, than by the Senate, saying, That the Sovereign Authority was betrayed by the Senators, and the Consulship put in subjection to the Power of the Tribunes: seeing that now the Consuls might be compelled by Power of the Tribunes, and (than which, what has any private Person more to fear?) be carried to Goal too. It fell to T. Quintius's lot (for the Collegues could not agree upon it very well) to name the Dictator, and accordingly he declared A. Postumius Tubertus, his Father-in-law, a very severe Governor, Dictator; by whom L. Julius was created Master of the Horse. At the same time also, there was a stop put to all Judicial proceeding; nor was there any thing done all over the City, but what was in order to preparations for the War. The hearing of their defence that did not take up Arms, was deferred till the War was over: but indeed so ready all People ple were, that even those who might possibly have been excused gave in their names; and when the Latins and the Hernici were ordered to bring in their Quota: they both very readily obeyed the Dictator.

All this was done with great celerity: and C. Julius the Consul being left to Guard the City, with L. Julius, Master of the Horse, who staid to provide with all speed for their present necessities in the Camp; the Dictator, with A. Cornelius the High-Priest going before him, vowed to Celebrate the Ludi Magni [or great Games, Celebrated not above once in an Age] upon the score of that War: and then marching out of the City, and having divided the Army between himself and Quintius the Consul, came up to the Enemy. As therefore they saw the Foe had two Camps at a small distance from each other, they likewise a nearer to Lanuvium pitched their Camps. So four Armies and as many entrenchments had the Plain before them, in the middle, which was wide enough not only to make little excursions for skirmishing, but even to set their whole Armies on both sides in Battalia. Nor were they, seeing their Camps were opposite to each other; at any time disengaged from those little Rencounters; the Dictator being very willing, that his Men, by trying the Enemies strength in such light bickerings, might be able to tell him, what hopes they had of the general Victory. Wherefore the Enemy despairing of any success in a pitched Battel, attacked the Consuls Camp in the night time, and put the whole affair to the hazard of a doubtful event. Whereupon the sudden shout which they made alarmed not only the Consuls Sentinels, and consequently the whole Army, but awaked the Dictator also, who was then asleep. The Consul, though he were so surprized, wanted neither Courage nor Conduct; setting part of his Men to guard the Gates, and the rest round about the Rampire. In the other Camp, where the Dictator was, the tumult being less, made them the more careful of their business. Wherefore they immediately sent reliefs to the Consuls Camp, under the Command of Sp. Postumius Albus, a Lieutenant, whilst the Dictator himself marched a little about to a place most remote from the noise, that he might attack the Enemy in their Rere, before they were aware of his coming. When he went away, he left Q. Sulpicius, a Lieutenant, Master of the Camp, and M. Fabius, another Lieutenant, to Command the Horse, bidding him not to stir before day, because he knew the Horses were hard to be managed in such Nocturnal Conflicts. In short, he did and said all things that an active and a prudent General in such a case ought either to say or do. But that was an extraordinary instance of his Courage and Conduct, and a thing for which he was highly to be commended, that he on his own accord sent M. Geganius with a choice Party to attack the Enemies Camp, from whence, as his Scouts brought word, they were marched with the greater part of their Men. So that Geganius setting upon them, whilst they were intent upon the event of that danger which others were in, and neglected their own safety, took their Camp before the Enemy well knew themselves to be attacked. Then, as they had agreed, he gave the sign by making a great smoak; which when the Dictator saw, he cried out, The Enemies Camp's taken; and commanded the news to be told through all the Army.

By this time it was day-light and all things were visible; so that Fabius with his Horse charged up to them, and the Consul made a Sally out of his Camp upon the trembling Foe: whilst the Dictator, on the other side, giving Battel to the Body of Reserves, and the middle part of the Army, opposed the Enemy (who were in great distraction upon such different clamours and sudden hurly-buries) on all sides with his Victorious Horse and Foot. By which means, being now environed in the middle, they had every Man of them suffered for their Rebellion, had not Messius Vechnus, a Volscian, more famous for his Actions than his Birth, when his Countrymen were now putting themselves into a circular posture, crying out with a loud voice, asked them, What? will you stand here to be pelted by your Enemies without making any defence, or being revenged of them? Why then have you any Arms? or why were you the aggressors in this War? Are you tumultuous in Peace, and slothful in War? What can you hope for whilst you stand here? Do you think some God will protect you, and snatch you hence? No, you must make your way with your Swords, as you see me do before you. Courage then; all you that intend to see your own Houses, your Parents, or your Wives and Children any more, come along with me. 'Tis not a Wall or a Bulwark but armed Men that can oppose armed Men. You are equal to the Enemy in Courage, but in the necessity of your present circumstances, which is the last and greatest Weapon you have, you far out-do them. When he had said this, and did as he said, they set up another shout and followed him; making an Attack upon that side where Postumius Albus was with his Party: and indeed they made him, though he had then the better of it, give ground, till such time as the Dictator came up to assist his retiring friends: and that turned all the Fight the other way. The fortune of the Enemy depended upon one single Man, which was Messius, though there were many wounds on both sides, and a great many Men killed. Nor did the Roman General now fight without some loss of blood; but though Postumius, and he only, having his head broke with a stone, went out of the Field, yet the Dictator, for all he was wounded in the Arm, nor Fabius, though he was almost nailed to his Horse with a thrust through his Thigh, nor the Consul, though his Arm was cut off, would not stir out of so hazardous a Battel.

XXIX. But Messius made such an effort through the slaughtered Enemy, with a company of stout young Men about him, that he got into the Volscian Camp, which was not yet taken; and thither therefore the whole Army bent their Forces. The Consul pursuing them even to the Rampire, attacked both that and the very Camp it self: whilst the Dictator came up with his Men on the other side. Nor was their storming of the Camp less smart than the Fight had been: and they say the Consul also flung an Ensign over within the Rampire; to make the Soldiers more eager to scale it: and that the first effort was made to regain their Ensign. Mean while the Dictator having broke through the Bulwark, was fighting within the Camp: whereupon the Enemies, most of them, threw down their Arms and surrender'd themselves, being all, except Senators, (now that they and their Camp were taken) sold. Part of the Booty was given to the Latins and the Hernicans, according as every Man knew what was his own: the rest the Dictator made publick sale of: and having left the Consul to Command in the Camp, he coming with Triumph into the City laid down his Dictatorship. These Authors make the memory of his famous Dictatorship very grievous, who say, that he beheaded his Son for leaving his Post, and fighting without Orders, though he came off with Victory. But I am not apt to believe it, (though among so many Opinions I may if I will) and my reason is, because such severities are called Imperia Manliana, not Postumiana [i. e. Manlius's, not Postumius's Commands] and to be sure, he that was the first Author of such a barbarous example, would have the proverbial remark upon his cruelty. Manlius was also Surnamed Imperiosus, whilst Postumius was not distinguished by any infamous title. Mean while C. Julius the Consul Dedicated the Temple of Apollo in his Collegues absence, without casting Lots for it: which Quintius took very ill, and when he had disbanded the Army, returning into the City, complained of it in the Senate, but to no purpose. In this Year which was so signal for great Actions, there happened a business which at that time seemed not at all to concern the Roman State, and that was, that the Carthaginians, who were in time to be such mortal Enemies to them, then first sent over an Army into Sicily to assist one of the Factions of the Sicilians who were then seditionously up in Arms.

XXX. The Tribunes of the People in the City, indeavoured to have Tribunes of the Soldiers created with Consular Authority; but could not obtain their ends. L. Papirius Crassus, and L. Julius were made Consuls. Then the Embassadors of the Equi having desired a League with the Romans, (instead of which, the Senate told them they ought to surrender themselves) at last obtained a Truce for eight years. The Volscian State, upon the Defeat which they received in Algidum, was torn all to pieces with quarrels and seditions among such as stikled for Peace and War: but the Romans were at ease on all hands. Then the Consuls hearing by one of the College of Tribunes, who betrayed the secret to them, that the Tribunes had a design to prefer a Bill for the commuting of Mulets [which were formerly taken of Cattel, into Money] they prevented them and did it before, as knowing it would be very acceptable to the People. Then L. Sergius Fidenas [a second time] and Hofus Lucretius Tricipitinus were Consuls; in whose time there was nothing done worth the speaking of. U. C. 325. To them there succeeded A. Cornelius Cossus, and T. Quintius Pennus, a second time: in whose U. C. 326. Year the Veians made excursions into the Roman Territories. And the report went, that some of the Fidenean Youth were concerned in that ravage; which was referred to L. Sergius, Servilius and Mamercus Emilius to be inquired into. Whereupon some of them were banished to Hofia, because they could not give a good account why they were absent from Fidene at that time: and then the Romans augmenting that Colony, divided the Lands, that belonged to those who were slain in the War, among them. That Year there was a very great droughth: nor did they want rain only, but the Earth also being bereft of her native moisture, could scarce supply the running streams: insomuch that in some places the defect of water, about those dried Rivers and Fountains, caused a great many Cattel to die for thirst, whilst others were taken off by the murrain. Yea, there was a Contagion very rife at last among Men also, which though at first it seized upon the Country folks and Servants, soon after filled all the City. Nor were their Bodies only infected, but their Minds also with many sorts of Religion, and those most Foreign too; whilst those whose gain it is to make People mad with superstition, introduced new Rites of Artifices and Propheying, into several Families; so long, till the chief of the City were ashamed, when they saw in all the Streets, and Chapels, strange and unufal Offerings made to appease the angry gods. Wherefore the Aediles were ordered, To take care that none but Roman gods should be worshipped, nor in any other manner, than what had been the constant usage of their Country. Their revenge upon the Veians was deferred till the next Year when C. Servilius Ahala, and L. Papirius Mugilanus were Consuls. And then too Religion hinder'd them from declaring War so soon as they would have done, or sending out their Armies: for they thought fit to send Heralds first to demand back what was taken from them. They had fought with the Veians lately at Nomentum and Fidene in a pitched Battle; after which they made a Truce only, not a Peace: of which Truce, both the time was out, and they also before the day had risen again up in Arms. Nevertheless the Heralds were sent, but though they swore, after their Country fashion, when they demanded back the Plunder, were not at all regarded. Thereupon arose a Controverfie, Whether the War should be proclaimed by Order of the People, or whether an Order of Senate would be sufficient. At length length the Tribunes prevailed so far, by threatening that they would hinder the Levy, that the Consuls did refer the declaring of the War to the People, who in all their Centuries allowed from being chosen for the next Year.

There were four Tribunes of the Soldiers created with Consular Authority, that is to say, XXXI. T. Quintius Pennus, (sometime Consul) C. Furius, M. Postumius, and A. Cornelius Cossus: of U. C. 328. whom Cossus had the Government of the City, and the other three having made a Levy more than one General. For they by inclining each one too much to his own opinion, as being of different Judgments, gave the Enemy an opportunity of doing their business: and accordingly the Veians, whilst the Roman Army was at a stand which Officer they should obey, (one ordering the signal to be given for Battle, and another to sound a retreat) took the occasion to fall upon them, and putting them into disorder made them run away; but their Camp being near received them: so that they suffered more disgrace than loss of Men. The City was very sad, as being not used to be Conquered, and hating the Tribunes that red a Dictator, for in such a Person they thought all the Cities hopes lay: but seeing that in that case also Religion hindered them, so that a Dictator could not be declared but by a Consul, the Augurs being consulted removed that scruple. So A. Cornelius declared Mamercus Emilius Dictator, and himself was by him made Master of the Horse: so that as soon as the fortune of the City stood in need of true Courage, the Censors severity was no impediment, but that the Conduct of affairs might be committed to a Person of a branded Family. The Veians, proud of their success, sent Embassadors all over Etruria, to brag, that they had defeated three Roman Generals in one fight: and though they could not get any of those People formerly to joyn in an alliance with them, yet they now came in as Volunteers, in hopes of booty, from all parts of the Country. Only the Fideneans resolved to rise again, and, as though it had been a crime not to begin their War with some wicked action, they having embred their Weapons in the blood of the new Colony then, as of the Embassadors before, associated themselves to the Veians. Then the heads of those two Nations consulted, whether they should make Veii or Fidene the seat of War. Fidene seemed the more opportune place; and therefore the Veians, passing over the Tiber, transferred the War to Fidene. There was a great consternation at Rome; insomuch that having sent for their Army from Veii, which upon the score of its ill success there was much disheartned, they placed their Camp before the Gate Collina; and planting Soldiers upon the Walls, they ordered a Stop of Justice in the Forum, all the Shops being shut up, and every thing looking like the face of a Camp more than a City.

Then, seeing the City in so much fear, the Dictator sent Cryers or Beadles through all the Streets to summon the People to an Assembly, wherein he chid them, for being so anxious upon such a slight occasion; that they should fear the Veians whom they had so often conquered, upon the account of so small a loss which they had received (and that too not through the Courage of the Enemy, or the sloth of the Roman Army, but the dissention of the Generals among themselves) or Fidene either, which they had taken even almost more often than they had attacked it. That the Romans and the Enemies were the same Men they had been for so many Ages; having the same Courage, the same strength of Body, and the same Arms: and that he also was the same Dictator, Mamercus Emilius, who formerly defeated the Armies of the Veians and Fidenates; yea, when the Faliscans too were joyned with them, at Nomentum. Besides which, that A. Cornelius would be Master of the Horse and in the Army, being the same Person, who in the former War being a Tribune of the Soldiers, when L. Tolumnius King of the Veians was slain in sight of the two Armies, brought the rich spoils into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius. Wherefore remembering that Triumphs, and Spoils, and Victory, were all on your side; and on the Enemies part a great deal of guilt for their horrid crimes, murdering the Embassadors against the Law of Nations, killing the Colony at Fidene in time of Peace, breaking the Truce, and that their seventh unhappy defection, he advised them to take up their Arms: and told them, he was confident, that as soon as ever they had joyned Camp to Camp, the wicked Enemy would not only quickly cease to Triumph in the ignominy of the Roman Army, but the Roman People likewise would understand, how much better they deserved of the Commonwealth that made him the third time Dictator, than they, who because he abrogated the tyrannical Power of the Censors, would have laid a blot upon his second Dictatorship. Then having made his Vows he marched forth, and pitched his Camp a thousand and five hundred left by the River Tiber. He therefore commanded T. Quintius Pennus to take possession of the Mountains, and plant himself privately upon that part of them which was behind the Enemies: and himself the next day, seeing the Etrurians march forth full of Courage upon the account of their former success which was owing to a good occasion rather than any thing which they did, he having staid a little while too, till his Scouts brought word that Quintius Body of Foot in Battalia at an ordinary rate of marching against the Enemy: commanding the Master of the Horse, That he should not begin the fight without his order: for that he, when there was any need of the Horses coming in, would give the signal: and likewise, that remembering the fight with the King, the rich Offering, Romulus and Jupiter Feretrius, and behave himself accordingly. The Legions engaged with a mighty force, and the Romans being incensed with indignation, called the Fidenians Villains, the Veians Robbers, but both of them Truce-breakers, and saying, that they were polluted with the barbarous slaughter of their Embassadors; that they were embued with the blood of their Colony, being perfidious Allies, and cowardly Enemies, revenging themselves upon them both by words and deeds.

XXXIII.

For immediately upon the first onset they had shock'd the Enemy; when on a sudden, the Gates of Fidenæ being opened, a new Army fallied forth, which came in such a manner as had never been heard of or in use before that time: for a great Multitude, all armed with fire, and blazing all over with burning Torches, ran furiously upon the Enemy as though they had been mad: which strange kind of fighting did for some time a little startle the Romans. Then the Dictator sending for the Master of the Horse with his Cavalry, and likewise for Quintius out of the Mountains, himself ran up to the left Wing, which being affrighted at the flames, that lookt more like a Town on fire, than an Army, and with a loud voice spoke to them in this manner: Will you yield to an unarmed Enemy, and be driven away from your Post like an hive of Bees with smoke? Will you not extinguish their fires with your swords? Will you not take these very Torches, if you must fight with fire and not with any other more proper Weapons, away from them, each of you one, and manage them your selves against the Enemy? Courage, remember the Roman name, the valour of your Fathers and your own, and turn this fire upon the Enemies City; demolish Fidenæ with its own flames, which by your kindness you could not reconcile: the blood of your Embassadors, and of your Colony, besides your Plundered Country exacts this at your hands. With that upon the Dictators Command all the Army was moved; and the Torches were partly received as they were thrown at them, and partly taken away from the Enemy by force; so that both Armies were now armed with fire. The Master of the Horse also put the Horse too upon a new way of fighting; Commanding them to take their Horses Bridles off; and he himself was the first, that setting Spurs to his Horse rode without a Bridle into the midst of the fires: all the other Horses charging up full speed to the Enemy in the same manner. By which means the dust being raised and mingled with the smoke, made the Men and their Horses too almost blind; but that which frightened the Riders, did not at all scare the Horses: so that wherever they attacked the Foe, the Horsemen made a slaughter, like a general ruin. Then there was heard a new noise, which, seeing it startled both the Armies, the Dictator cried out; that Quintius the Lieutenant, and his Men had set upon the Enemies Rere, whilst he himself, with another shout, fell on more briskly than before. And now, since two Armies, and those in two different kinds, press'd hard upon the Etrurians both before and behind, so that they had no way to escape, either into their Camp, or back to the Mountains, from whence the fresh forces came down upon them, the Horses, which were unbridled, having scattered their Riders into all parts, the Veians, most of them, ran toward the Tiber, and the Fidenians, all that were alive, made toward Fidenæ. But, being in a consternation, their flight only exposed them to the fury of their Enemy; and they were killed upon the banks of the River: some of them, who were forced into it, being sucked in by the Whirlpools, and even those who could swim, being so weary, so mortally wounded, and in such a fear, that they sunk. Some few indeed among many got over, whilst the others fled through their Camp into the City, whither the Romans also followed them as fast; especially Quintius, and his Men, that came so lately from the Mountains, who were best able to undergo the fatigue, because they came last into the fight.

XXXIV.

They therefore having mix'd themselves among the Enemy, and got into the Gate, climb'd up upon the Walls, from whence they gave their friends the signal of the Towns being taken: which when the Dictator saw (for by this time he himself also was come into the Enemies deserted Camp) he led his Men, who would fain have fallen on plundering, to the Gate, in hopes, as he persuaded them, that they should have more Booty in the City. So, being received within the Walls, he marched to the Castle, whither he saw the crowd of the Enemies run. Nor was there less slaughter in the City than there had been in the Fight, till throwing down their Arms, they desired nothing else save their lives only, and surrendered themselves to the Dictator. Thereupon they rifled all the Camp and City; and the next day each Horseman and Centurion having one Captive, which they cast Lots for, and those who had behaved themselves extraordinarily, two, the rest were publicly sold, and the Dictator led his Victorious Army, laden with spoils, in Triumph back to Rome. Where ordering the Master of the Horse to quit his Office, he himself also laid down his the sixteenth day, restoring that Command in Peace, which he had taken in War upon a crisis of State. There are some Authors, that will tell you, there was also a Naval Engagement with the Veians at Fidenæ; a thing not only difficult, but incredible; for the River is not broad enough even at this day for such a Fight, which at that time, as I have it from ancient Writers, was somewhat narrower: unless perchance, whilst they magnifie (as People use) the concurrence of Ships to hinder the Enemies passing over the River, they had a mind to make you believe a strange Story of a Naval Victory.

The

The following Year produced Tribunes Military with Consular Power, whose names were A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Furius Medullinus, and L. Horatius Barbatus. In whose time the Veians had a Truce granted them for twenty Years, and the Aequi for three, though they desired to have it of a longer date; the City being now free from all Seditions. The next Year was very remarkable; for there was not any War abroad, or Sedition at home, but the Games, which were vow'd in the War being then celebrated made it extraordinarily signal upon the account of the preparations, which the Tribunes Military made, and the great concourse of neighbouring Nations. The Tribunes had Consular Power, and their names were, A. Claudius Crassus, Sp. Nautius Rutilus, T. Sergius Fidenes, and Sex. Julius Fulus: and the show was more grateful to the strangers, who came to it by publick consent, upon the score of their civil entertainment. After the Games were over, there were seditious Assemblies of the Tribunes of the People, who chid the Multitude, for that they, standing in admiration of those whom they hated, kept themselves in eternal slavery; and, besides that they durst aspire to any hopes of ever gaining the Consulate, did not so much as remember themselves or their friends even in the case of choosing Tribunes Military; which was to be done in a common Assembly both of the Senate and People. Wherefore they might well cease to wonder, why no body talked of the interest of the People: for People used to be at the expence of labour and danger in no affairs, save where there were some hopes of profit or honour: but Men would attempt any thing, if the reward would answer the greatness of the enterprise. If a Tribune of the People should run himself, like a blind Man, into quarrels and great danger to no purpose; for which he were sure, that the Senate, against whom he contended, would persecute him with an irreconcilable hatred, he should not be a whit the more esteemed among those very Commons upon whose score he engaged: no, that's a thing that he must neither hope nor desire. That great seals are made by great honours; and that no Plebeian, since they were now in general no longer contemned, ought to contemn or disparage himself, but try in one or two instances, whether any Plebeian were fit to bear any great and honourable Office, or whether it were a Prodigy and a Miracle for any stout and brave Man to be found among the Commons. That it was obtained by mere dint of resolution, that the Tribunes of the Soldiers should be invested with Power Consular, and chosen out of the People: and that several Men had sought that honour who had behaved themselves very well both at home and abroad: but for all that, they, the first Years, were lashed with Satyr, repulsed and laughed at by the Senate, insomuch that they at last thought fit no longer to expose themselves to contumely. Nor did he see any reason why that Law should not be abrogated, which made that lawful which was never likely to be put in execution: for there would be less ground for shame if there were no such just and reasonable constitution, than there is now, when Men are past by out of contempt.

This and such kind of speeches, heard with applause, incited some Men to sue for the Tribuneship of the Soldiers, who professed, each one of them, they would do something in their time for the good of the Commons. They gave the People some hopes, that the publick Lands should be divided amongst them, and new Colonies Planted; besides an overture, that a Tax should be laid upon the Tenants of such Lands, out of which the Soldiers should be paid. But then the Tribunes of the Soldiery took an occasion, when People went into the Country, to summon the Senators back against a certain day, and make an Order of Senate in the absence of the Tribunes of the People; contriving the matter so, that, since there was a report, that the Volsci were gone out a foraging into the Territories of the Hernicians, they themselves might be employed to see what the business was, and a Consular Assembly be held in the mean time. When they marched out they left Appius Claudius, Son of the Decemvir, Governor of the City; who from his very Cradle had a natural hatred to the Tribunes and the People: and by this means the Tribunes of the People had no opportunity to quarrel (the thing being effected) either with them, who were absent, though they had made the Order of Senate, or with Appius.

Then C. Sempronius Atratinus, and Q. Fabius Vibulanus were made Consuls; in whose Year a Foreign thing, but very well worth our observation, is said to have been done: and that is, that Vulturum, a City of the Etrurians, now called Capua, was taken by the Samnites, having its present appellation from their General, whose name was Capys, or (which is more likely) from Campus which signifies a Champaign place. The Samnites took it, after they had first tired the Etrurians out with a long fatigue of War, and were made sharers both in the privileges of the City and the Lands therunto belonging: for then, upon an Holy-day, in the night time, the new Inhabitants killed the old ones when they were drunk and asleep. When this was done, the Consuls, that I just now spoke of, began their Magistracy upon the Ides [i.e. the 13th] of December. And now not only they that were sent upon that errand, brought word the Volscian War was at hand, but Embassadors also from the Latins and the Hernici told the news; that the Volsci were never more intent upon their choice of Officers, or raising an Army; for that the common People generally murmured and said, that either they must for ever lay by their Arms, and not think of a War, but take the yoke upon their necks; or else not yield to those with whom they contended for Empire, either in Courage, Resolution, or Military Discipline. This was no slight report; though the Senate was not so much concerned at it; and C. Sempronius, to whose Lot that Province happened to fall, relying upon Fortune, as his most constant constant friend, because he led a Conquering Army against a Conquered Nation, carried every thing very rashly and negligently: insomuch that there was more of the Roman Discipline in the Volscian, than in the Roman Army; wherefore Fortune, as often it uses to do, attended upon their industry. The first time, Sempronius joyned Battel without any caution, or advice, and they engaged before they strengthened themselves with reserves, or Posted their Horse as they should have done. The extraordinary and frequent shouts made by the Enemy was the first argument which way the business was like to go; for the Romans made a confused, unequal, faint, though often repeated noise, and by their uncertain clamors betrayed the fear of their minds. For that reason the Enemy came on the more briskly, pressing forward with their Shields, and brandishing their glittering Swords. On the other side the Romans shew'd by the motion of their Helmets that they look'd behind them; for they were at a stand and trembled, retiring to the Body of the Army. By which means, the Ensigns of them that fought were either quite deserted by the Antesignani [such as fought in the Front, before the Ensigns] or received into the Maniples [i.e. Companies of Soldiers, whose Ensigns were anciently Bottles of Hay;] so that neither their flight was certain, and determined any more than the Victory, but the Romans seemed to be rather protected than to fight. Mean while the Volsci bore up, and lying very hard upon them, saw more likelihood of their killing all the Enemy, than that they would run away.

XXXVIII. And now the Romans gave ground on all sides, though Sempronius the Consul chid and exhorted them; for neither his Command nor Authority prevailed upon them; and they had certainly soon turned their backs upon the Foe, had not Sext. Tempanius a Decurion [somewhat like a Sergeant or Corporal in our Forces, [one that had the Command or Regulating of ten Men] when they were just a going, recovered them by his Courage. For he having cried out, That all those Horsemen, who desired the preservation of the Commonwealth, should alight off their Horses, all the Troops were as much moved, as it had been at the Consuls Command; and then he told them, If this Party, said he, does not give a check to the Enemies career, the Empire's ruined. Follow then, said he, my Spear instead of a Standard, and show both the Romans and the Volsci, that there are neither any Horse like you on Horseback, or any Foot equal to you when on Foot. His exhortation was approved by a shout, he going with his Spear up aloft, they forced their way wherever they went. But they made, with their Shields before them, to that part most, where they saw their own Men most put to it: by which means the Fight was restored in all places where they came in; nor was there any question, but, seeing so few could do the whole business of the day, the Enemies would turn their backs.

XXXIX. Now therefore seeing they were too strong for him in all parts, the Volscian General gave Order, that his Men should make way for those new Footmen of the Enemies, till such time as they were carried in so far among them as to be cut off from their own Army. Which being accordingly done, they were enclosed, and could not get back the same way they came, because the Enemy had doubled their Files upon them to obstruct their return. The Consul therefore and the Roman Legions, having lost the fight of those who were so lately the defence of the whole Army, left the Enemy should destroy so many brave fellows by so enclosing them, ventured into any danger. Whereupon the Volsci being divided several ways to receive the Consul with the Legions on the one hand, and on the other to press upon Tempanius with the Horsemen (who seeing, though they had made several attempts, they could not break through to their own Party, got upon a small Bank and defended themselves in a circular posture, nor were unrevenge'd of the Enemy) the Fight continued till night. For the Consul, following his blow on all sides, as long as there was any day-light, kept the Enemy in play, till night parted them upon an even lay; each Army being in such a taking to think of the uncertain event of the Battel, that leaving their wounded Men and great part of their Carriages, both of them fled, as though they had been Conquered, into the adjacent Mountains. But yet, the Bank was surrounded till after midnight; though when the news was brought to them that fate about it, that their Camp was deserted, they fancying their Army to be Conquered, themselves ran which way soever their fear, in the dark, carried them. Tempanius for fear of a wile, kept his Men there till day; and then going himself with a few after him to see how things stood, he, understanding by the wounded Persons belonging to the Enemy, that the Volscian Camp was deserted, called the rest of his Men with joy down from the Bank, and went quite through into the Roman Camp. Where when he saw all things lying waste and forsaken, as he found it in the Enemies Camp, before the Volsci knew their error and came back, he taking as many of the wounded as he could along with him, as being ignorant which way the Consul was gone, marched the nearest way toward the City.

XL. The report of their ill success, and of the Camps being deserted, was brought to Town before-hand: and above all, the Horsemen were lamented not with private more than public grief. Fabius the Consul (for the City too was in a great fear) kept a Guard before the Gates: who when they saw the Horsemen at a distance, not knowing who they were, at first were terrified, but soon after discovering them to be friends, turned their fear into so much joy, that a shout ran through the whole City, congratulating the safe and Victorious return of the Horsemen: and instead of mourning in their Houses, as they had done a little before, when they

they gave them up for lost, the People ran out into the Streets; yea, their fearful Mothers and Wives, forgetting the Rules of decency through their excess of joy, ran to meet the Troop, embracing them not only with their Bodies but their very Souls also, so (almost) mad they were for joy. The Tribunes of the People therefore, who had assigned a day for the Tryal of M. Postumius, and T. Quintius, for that by their means the Battel was lost at Veii, took an occasion, by this fresh quarrel against Sempronius the Consul, to renew their former grudge against them. Wherefore calling an Assembly, when they had declared aloud, That the Commonwealth was betrayed at Veii by the then Generals, and that, because they escaped unpunished, the Army was likewise betrayed in the Volscian Territories by the Consul; and the stout Horsemen being delivered up to be butchered, and the Camp basely deserted; C. Julius, one of the Tribunes, commanded Tempanius the Horseman to be called, and before them, said, Sext. Tempanius, I desire to know of you, whether you think, that C. Sempronius the Consul did either enter into the Battel in time, or fortifie the Army with reserves? yea, that he did any good office belonging to a good Consul? and whether you your self did not, when the Roman Legions were defeated, make your Horsemen alight, by that means recovering the fight? Then, when you were shut out from the rest of our Army, whether the Consul either himself came, or sent any body else, to assist you? In fine, whether the next day you had any succours at all? or whether you and your Men did not by pure Courage break through into their Camp? whether you find any Consul, or e'er an Army there? or whether you found the Camp deserted, and the wounded Soldiers left behind? This you must tell us, at this time, upon your faith, and the reputation of that Courage to which alone the Commonwealth in this War owes its preservation. Besides which, we must know, where C. Sempronius and our Legions are? whether you were deserted or did desert the Consul and the Army? and lastly, Whether we are Conquered or Conquerors?

In answer hereunto Tempanius, they say, made indeed a rough Speech, but it was grave, as became a Soldier, and neither stuffed with his own praises, nor swelled with accusations against others. For he told them, It was not for a private Soldier to judge what the abilities of C. Sempronius his General, were in point of Military Discipline; but the Roman People should have look'd to that when they in their Assembly chose him Consul. Wherefore he begged of them, that they would not expect to know of him what his Commanders designs were, or what measures Consuls ought to take, those being weighty matters to be considered by Men of great Parts and Understanding; but what he saw he could tell them. He saw the Consul, before he himself was inclosed by the Foe, fighting in the Front of the Battel; encouraging the Men amidst the Roman Ensigns and the Enemies Arms: and that afterward when he was out of sight of his own Countrymen, yet by the noise and shouts that they made, he perceived that the Battel was continued till night: nor did he believe it possible for them to break through so far as the Bank, where he lay, for the vast multitude of the Enemy. That he did not know where the Army was; but he supposed, that, as he, when his circumstances were so bad, had secured himself in a well guarded Post, so the Consul, to preserve his Army, had taken some safer place to encamp in. Nor did he believe, that the Volsci were in any better condition than the Romans; but that the night put them all under the same mistake: with that, desiring that they would not detain him any longer, as being tired and faint with the fatigue of the War, and his wounds that he had received, he was dismissed with no less commendation for his Moderation than his Courage. Whilst these things were transacted at Rome, the Consul was now got in the Rode to Lavicum as far as the Temple of Rest: to which place they sent Wagons and other conveniences from the City to meet the Army which was weary with fighting and marching in the night time. Soon after the Consul came into the City, where he took as much care to give Tempanius his due commendations, as he did to clear himself. But the City being much concerned for their ill fortune, and angry with the chief Officers, M. Postumius who had been Tribune of the Soldiery, instead of Consul, at Veii (to satisfy them) was Tried and Condemned in a Fine of ten thousand L. though all the Tribes acquitted T. Quintius, his Collegue (because he had been prosperous not only when he was Consul against the Volsci, under the Command of the Dictator Postumius Tubertus, but at Fidenæ too, when he was Lieutenant to another Dictator, Mamercus Emilius) as laying all the blame of that affair upon Postumius who was before Condemned. Some say, that the memory of his Father Cincinnatus did him a great kindness, who was a venerable Person, besides the intercession of an old Gentleman, called Capitolinus Quintius, who begged of them, that they would not let him, who had so little time to live, carry such a sad message, as the Condemnation of a Son, to his Brother Cincinnatus in the other World.

The People made Sext. Tempanius, A. Sellius, L. Antistius, and Sp. Icilius Tribunes of the People, in their absence: the Horsemen having chosen them before for their Centurions [i.e. Captains] by the advice of Tempanius. The Senate being offended, out of hatred to Sempronius, with the very name of Consul, ordered Tribunes Military to be created with Consular Authority. Accordingly L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, and L. Papirius Mugillanus were chosen: In the beginning of whose Year, L. Hortensius, a Tribune of the People, appointed C. Sempronius, who was Consul the Year before, a day for Tryal: and when his four Collegues, in the face of all the Roman People, desired of him, That he would not vex their innocent General, who had no other fault save only ill fortune; Hortensius could hardly bear it, supposing that they did it to try his resolution, and that the offender did not trust so much to the intreaties of the Tribunes, which were made for shew only, as to their assistance. Wherefore turning sometimes to him, he asked, Where were those Patrician spirits, where was that mind that relied upon and trusted to its own innocency? and said, That under a shew of Tribuneship there lay a Consular Design: and anon to his Collegues; And what will you do, if I Condemn him? Will you wrest your right from the People, and overthrow the Tribunitian Power of the Commons? To which when they replied, That the People of Rome had the sovereign Power, not only over Sempronius, but any other Person also: wherefore, that they neither would nor could take away the jurisdiction of the Commons; but, if their Prayers would not prevail for their General, who was as dear to them as a Father; they would change Cloaths with him. Hortensius made answer, and said, The People of Rome shall never see their Tribunes in such a sordid habit. I do not value the pardoning of C. Sempronius, since he has gained so much in his Generalship, as to be beloved by the Soldiers. In this case the piety and good nature of the four Tribunes was not more pleasing to the Senate and the People, than was the disposition of Hortensius, who was so easily appeased upon their just intreaties. But now fortune no longer indulged the Aequi, who had taken the doubtful Victory of the Volsi for their own.

XLIII. U. C. 333. The next Year, when Numerius Fabius Vibulanus, and T. Quintius Capitolinus, the Son of Capitolinus, were Consuls, under the Conduct of Fabius, to whose share that Province fell, there was nothing done worth the speaking of; in that the Aequi did no more than shew a frightened Army, before they were put to a dishonourable flight, though with no great reputation to the Consul: to whom a full Triumph was for that reason denied. But, because he had taken off the ignominy of Sempronius's defeat, it was allowed that he should come into the City Ovant [i. e. with a lesser sort of Triumph.]. As the War was ended with less ado than they feared; so in the City a sudden heap of Discords arose between the Senate and the People, which sprung from the number of the Questors being doubled: which thing (that, besides the two City Questors, there should be two more to assist the Consuls in Military Affairs) being proposed by the Consuls, the Senate very much approved; but the Tribunes of the People, in opposition to the Consuls, would needs have part of the Questors (who to that time had been all Patricians) chosen out of the Commons. Which demand of theirs was at first denied with all the vehemency imaginable both by the Senate and the Consuls; though afterward yielding, that as they had made Tribunes with Consular Authority, so the People should have the same liberty in chusing of Questors, but seeing that they got little by it, they laid down the whole business of augmenting the number of Questors. The Tribunes took it up again, adding unto some other Seditious pretensions also; among which was that of the Agrarian Law. Upon account of which commotions, the Senate being more inclined to make Consuls than Tribunes, and yet there could not any Order of Senate be made for the interposition of the Tribunes, the Commonwealth returned from Consular Government to an Interregnum, but that not without great contention; the Tribunes hindering the Patricians to assemble. When therefore part of the new Year had been spent by the new Tribunes of the People and some Interreges [i. e. Persons that governed in the time when there was no Chief Magistrate] the Tribunes one while hindering the Patricians from having any Assembly to make an Interrex, and another while interrupting the Interrex, so that he could not make an Order of Senate for the holding of a Consular Assembly. At last L. Papirius Mugillanus being declared Interrex, by rebuking sometimes the Senators, and other-whiles the Tribunes of the People, told them, that the Commonwealth, though deserted and neglected by Men, was taken care of by the Providence of the Gods, and stood upon the Truce made with the Veians, and the delays of the Aequi. So that if there should be any danger, they must be ruined without a Patrician Magistrate; for that there was no Army, nor General to raise any. Would they keep off a Foreign by a Civil War? Which if they should happen together, the very Gods themselves were scarce able to preserve the Roman State from ruin. He therefore advised them rather to remit each of them something of their Priviledges, and by a middle way make up their breach; the Senate by suffering Tribunes Military to be made instead of Consuls; and the Tribunes of the People by permitting four Questors to be chosen promiscuously out of the Senate and the Commons by a free Vote of the People.

XLIV. U. C. 335. First then a Tribunitial Assembly was held, and Tribunes made with Consular Power, all Patricians, whose names were, L. Quintius Cincinnatus (the third time) Sex. Furius Medullinus (the second time) M. Manlius, and A. Sempronius Atratinus. Which last having called an Assembly for the chusing of Questors, and the Son of Antistius, a Tribune of the People, standing for the place, among other Plebeians, together with the Brother of another Tribune of the People, called Sex. Pompilius, neither their Authority nor their Votes carried it; but they preferred them whose Fathers and Grandfathers they had known Consuls upon the score of their Birth. Whereupon all the Tribunes of the People were enraged, and above all Pompilius and Antistius, being incensed at the repulse which their Relations met withall; crying out, What was the meaning of that? Could not any Plebeian either for the good turns they had done, or upon the score of injuries done to them by the Senate, or lastly for the pleasure of using their Authority, now that it was lawful to do what formerly they could not have done, (if not a Tribune Military) be made so much as a Questor? Could not a Fathers intreaties for his Son, or a Brothers for for his Brother, even from Men that were Tribunes of the People, which was an Office whose sacred Authority was created for the preservation of the Peoples Liberty. Sure there was fraud in the case, and A. Sempronius shewed more art than honesty in that Assembly; and their relations were put by the Honour through his contrivance. Wherefore seeing they could do no good up on him, who was not only safe in his own innocency, but in the Authority he then had; they turned their malice upon C. Sempronius, Atratinus's Cousin-German: to whom, for the ignominy which they suffered upon account of the Volsian War, they, with the assistance of their Collegue M. Canuleius, assigned a day of Tryal. The same Tribunes also ever and anon made mention in the Senate of dividing the Lands, to which Proposal C. Sempronius had always been a bitter Enemy; supposing as it happened, that either he would lay down his Cause and so grow less esteemed by the Senate, or persevering in it 'till the time of his Tryal, would more and more offend the Commons. But he chose rather to be the object of his Adversaries envy, than be wanting in his duty to the publick; continuing in the same opinion, that no largesse should be made to ingratiate those three Tribunes among the People: saying, That they did not then desire the Lands for the Commons, but sought an occasion to make him odious: yet he would undergo even that tempest too with a stout heart; for neither he nor any other Citizen ought to be so dear to the Senate, as that they, to favour one Man, should do a publick injury. He therefore, keeping up his Spirit, when the day came, pleaded his own Cause; but though the Senate tried all ways to mitigate the Peoples fury, was Condemned in a Fine of fifteen thousand Sesterces. The same Year Postumia, a Vestal Virgin, was Tried for unchastity, who though she were innocent, yet was suspected to be guilty, because she went finer and was more gay in her conversation than became a modest Maid. Wherefore her Tryal was first put off 'till another day, and then she was acquitted by the opinion of the College, though the Pontifex Maximus, or Chief-Priest, told her, She must leave her Gayety, and dress herself modestly rather than modishly. The same Year also Cumæ, a City which the Greeks were then Masters of, was taken by the Campanians.

The Year following Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Sp. Nautius, and C. Servilius were Tribunes of the Soldiery with Authority Consular. But this Year was more remarkable for a great deliverance which the Romans had from danger, than for any hurt which they received. The Servants had conspired to set the City on fire in several distant places; and whilst the People were employed in helping to quench it, resolved in Arms to seize the Castle and the Capitol. But Jupiter averted these damned Designs; and the Conspirators, who were discovered by two of the Gang, suffered for it; the informers being rewarded with ten thousand Sesterces (which then was thought an Estate) besides their freedom. Then the War from the Aequi began to be renewed, and the new Lavican Enemies to join with the old ones; which was told at Rome for a certain truth. And indeed the City expected a War from the Aequi as much as they did any Anniversary. Then Embassadors, that were sent to Lavici [a Town in Latiūm] having brought thence a doubtful answer, whereby it appeared, that there was no preparations yet made for a War, though the Peace with them would not long continue: the Tusculans were ordered to take care, that no new tumult should arise in that Town. The next Year, when L. Sergius Fidenas, M. Papirius Mugillanus, and C. Servilius, the Son of Priscus (in whose Dictatorship Fidenas was taken) were Tribunes of the Soldiery with Consular Authority, there came Embassadors to them, as soon as they entered upon their Office, from Tusculum, with news, that the Lavicans were up in Arms, and having, with the Aequian Forces, ravaged the Tusculan Fields, had pitched their Camp in Algidum. Whereupon there was a War Proclaimed against the Lavicans; but after an Order of Senate was made, That two of the Tribunes should go to the Wars, and the other look after their affairs at Rome, there presently happened a dispute between the Tribunes, each of them thinking himself the fittest Man to be a General, and despising the care of the City as ungrateful and inglorious. When the Senate saw that undecent contention between the Collegues, they all wondered at it, but Qu. Servilius told them, Seeing you have neither any reverence for this honourable Order, nor respect to the Commonwealth, the Authority of a Father shall decide this Controversie: my Son shall be Governour of the City without casting Lots for it; and I wish those that desire to go to the Wars may behave themselves more considerately, and shew more concord than they do in the pursuit of their desires.

But they ordered a Levy to be made, not out of all the People in general, only ten Tribes being allotted; out of which they Lifted all the young Men, whom the two Tribunes led to the War. The contention which began between them in the City grew much hotter in the Camp through the same ambition of being chief. For they were not of the same opinion in any point, but defended each his own Sentiments, and would have his own Designs and Commands to be alone authentick. In short, they contemned and were contemned by each other, 'till the Lieutenants reproving them for it, at last it was so ordered, that they should have the Sovereign Power by turns every other day. Which news being brought to Rome, they lay, Qu. Servilius, a Person of years and experience in the World, beseeched the Gods, That the Discord of those Tribunes might not prove more fatal to the Commonwealth than that at Veii: and, as if he foresaw that ill fortune should certainly attend them, was urgent with his Son, to raise more Men and provide more Arms. Nor was he a false Prophet: for for under the Conduct of L. Sergius, when it was his day to govern, having got into an inconvenient place near the Enemies Camp (for the Enemy pretending fear, was retired into their Trenches; by which means they were drawn thither in vain hopes of taking the Camp) they were driven by a sudden effort of the Aequi upon them down a declining Valley, many of them being destroyed and slain as they tumbled headlong one over another, their defeat looking more like a ruin than a flight. Whereupon the next day, their Camp, which even that day they were hardly able to maintain, being great part of it surrounded by the Enemy, they basely forsook, and ran away from it out at the back Gate: the Generals and the Lieutenants with all the Forces that were about the Ensigns going to Tusculum. The rest stragling about the Country several ways, went to Rome and carried news of a greater misfortune than they had really suffered. At which the City was the less concerned, because the event was answerable to all Peoples apprehensions, and because there were supplies provided by the Tribune of the Soldiery to assist them in such dangerous circumstances. And by his Order also, when the inferior Magistrates had quieted the City tumults, there were Scouts sent with all speed, who brought word, that the Generals and the Army were at Tusculum, but that the Enemy had not moved their Camp out of the place. But that which gave them most encouragement, was, that Q. Servilius Priscus, being declared Dictator by an Order of Senate (being a Person whose providence and foresight in things belonging to the publick as the City had many times before had experience of, so especially in the event of that War, he being the only Man who had an ill opinion of the contention between the Tribunes before their overthrow) and having made his own Son (that Tribune of the Soldiery by whom himself was declared Dictator) Master of the Horse (as some say, though others write, that Abala Servilius was Master of the Horse that Year) went to the War with a new Army, and sending for them who were at Tusculum, pitched his Camp two thousand paces from the Enemy.

XLVII. And now the pride and negligence which had been in the Roman Generals was, upon the score of their success, got into the Aequi. Wherefore the Dictator having at the very beginning of the fight, by sending his Horse in upon them, put the Enemies Van into disorder, he ordered the Legions immediately to advance; killing one of his Ensign-bearers for not making haste. And so eager they were to fight, that the Aequi could not sustain the shock; but being defeated in the Field, and making as fast as they could toward their Camp, the Romans took that in less time and with more ease than they had fought the Battle. Their Camp therefore being taken and rifled, when the Dictator had given the Soldiers the Plunder, and the Horse, who pursued the Enemy flying from their Camp, brought word back that all the Lavicans were vanquished, and a great part of the Aequi fled to Lavici; the next day the Army was led to Lavici, and the Town being begirt was taken with Ladders and Pillaged. Then the Dictator marched with his victorious Army back to Rome, laid down his Office the eighth day after he was created. Thereupon the Senate very opportunely, before the Tribunes of the People could make any Agrarian tumults about dividing the Lands belonging to the Lavicans, thought fit, in a full House, to send a Colony to Lavici: and accordingly a thousand five hundred Planters, who were sent from the City, had each of them two Acres apiece. When Lavici was now taken, and after that, Tribunes of the Soldiery created with Consular Authority, whose names this Year were Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, L. Servilius Structus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus (who had all of them born that Office once before) and Sp. Rutilius Crassus, and the next Year A. Sempronius Atratinus (a third time) and M. Papirius Mugillanus, with Sp. Nautius Rutilus (a second time) there was Peace abroad for those two Years together, though Discord at home by means of the Agrarian Laws.

XLVIII. The disturbers of the Commons were Sp. Maelius (a fourth time) and Metilius (a third time) Tribunes of the People, who were both created in their absence. These two having promulgated a Law, That the Lands taken from the Enemy should be divided among the People to each man his share, and the Estates of a great many Noblemen like to be by that popular Decree taken from them (for there was hardly any spot of ground, (as belonging to a City Founded in anothers Dominions) but what was got by force of Arms; nor any ever assigned or sold, but what the People had) the proposed dispute seemed very severe both to the People and the Senate. Nor could the Tribunes of the Soldiery, though they sometimes spoke of it in the Senate, and sometimes at private Consults among the chief of the City, find out any expedient, till Appius Claudius, the Grandson of him who was Decemvir for making of Laws, (though the youngest Man at that time in the Senate-house) as 'tis reported, said, He had an old and a familiar remedy to tell them: and that was, that his Great Grandfather Appius Claudius shewed the Senate the only way to dissolve the Tribunes Power, to wit, by the interposition of their Collegues. For new Men would easily be brought from their opinions by the authority of their Chiefs: especially if a Man sometimes have more regard, in what he says, to time, than authority: their minds being always like their fortunes. Now therefore, since they saw the principal Collegues had got so far before the rest into the Peoples favour by their cunning management, so that there was no room now left for them, they would not stick to comply with the Senate in any thing, whereby to oblige that whole Order, and the chief of the Senators in particular. This all approved of, and especially Q. Servilius Priscus; who commended the young Man for that he did not degenerate from the Claudian Race, and in pursuance of it, agreed, that every one should tempt as many of the College of Tribunes as he could to an Interposition. The Senate therefore being dismissed, the Tribunes were courted by the Nobility; with persuasions, advice and promises, That it would not only be an acceptable thing to every single Person, but to the Senate in general, they brought over six to make an Interposition. And the next day, when there was a reference made, by compact, to the Senate, touching the Sedition which Maelius and Metilius were raising by a largess which would prove of very bad example; there were such Speeches made by the chief of the Senate, that they all said they could not tell what to do for themselves; for they did not see any other help for them, save in the assistance of the Tribunes. That the Commonwealth, being now oppressed, fled, like some private poor Man, to them for protection. That it was a glorious thing for them, and an honour to their authority (not to vex the Senate, and make discord between the several Orders, but) that they had more strength than was sufficient to resist their wicked Collegues. With that there was a great humming through all the Senate, whilst the Tribunes were called to from all parts of the House. At length, when they had made silence, those who were prepared by the Nobility, declared, that they would oppose that Bill which their Collegues had promulgated, because the Senate was of opinion that it would be the ruin of the Commonwealth. The Senate thanked those Intercessors; whom the preferrers of that Bill (in an Assembly which they summoned) calling, Betrayers of the Peoples Interest, and Slaves to Consular Men, with other the like invectives, laid down their pretensions.

The next Year had produced two continual Wars, (when P. Cornelius Cossus, C. Valerius Potitus, Quintius Cincinnatus, and Numerius Fabius Vibulanus were Tribunes of the Soldiery with Consular Authority) had not the Veian War been deferred through the superstition of the Nobility; whose Lands the Tiber, overflowing its Banks, had most of all laid waste by the ruins of several Villages. And then at the same time also the defeat which the Aequi received three Years before, kept them from aiding the Volans, a People of their Country. For they had made excursions into the adjacent Territories belonging to Lavicum, and brought a War upon the new Colony there. Which injury though they hoped they should defend by the consent of all the Aequi, they were deserted by their Country-men, and lost both their Town and Country without so much as a memorable War for it, or any thing besides a Siege and one slight Encounter. Then L. Sextius, Tribune of the People, attempted to pass a Bill, for the sending of a Colony to Volæ as well as Lavicum: which was dismissed through the interposition of his Collegues, who declared that they would suffer no Bill to pass among the Commons, but what the Senate approved of. Having recovered Volæ the Year following, the Aequi, and the Colony sent thither, fortified the Town with new Forces, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Valerius Potitus, Quintius Fabius Vibulanus (a second time) and M. Postumius Regillensis being Tribunes of the Soldiery with Consular Power. To the latter of them was committed the menage of the War against the Aequi, though he was an ill-minded Man; as the Victory at that time, more than the War demonstrated. For having raised an Army very speedily, and led it to Volæ, after he had broken the Aequians hearts in light skirmishes, at last he forced his way into the Town: where from the Foe he turned all his severity upon his fellow Citizens; for though he had declared, whilst they were storming of it, that the Soldiers should have the Plunder, when the Town was taken he broke his word. Now I am apt to believe that to be the reason of the Armies disgust rather than because there was less Booty in the City and new Colony when Sacked, than the Tribune had talked of. But he augmented their heats, when being sent for by his Collegues upon account of the Tribunital Seditions he returned into the City. For he was heard to say a very foolish and (almost) mad thing in a publick Assembly, which was, that, when Sextius a Tribune of the People preferred the Agrarian Law, saying withal, that he would propose the sending of a Colony to Volæ, and that it was fit that they who by their Arms had taken it, should enjoy the Volan City and Lands, he said, Let my Soldiers look to it; for I'll swing them if any of them stir. Which saying of his did not only offend that Assembly but even Senate also: wherefore the Tribune of the People, who was a sharp Man, and not uneloquent neither, having gotten among all his Adversaries a proud disposition and a lavish tongue to deal with, which by provoking and exciting he could make to say such things as would bring an odium not upon himself alone, but upon his Cause and the whole Order also, he had not any Debates with any Person in the College of Tribunes more frequently than with Postumius. And then reflecting upon that cruel and inhuman saying of his, Roman! said he, Do you hear him threatening his Soldiers as Men do their Slaves? Yet this Beast must be thought more worthy of such honour, than those who give you a City with Lands belonging to it and send you into Colonies; that provide a Seat for you in your age, and contend for your interest against such cruel and proud Adversaries. Do you begin now to wonder, why so few at this day undertake your cause? What can they hope for from you? Honours, which you give to the adversaries rather than the Defenders and Patrons of the Roman People? You sighed and groaned just now when you heard his words. But what's that to the purpose? if any thing should be this minute put to the Vote, you will prefer him that threatened you with mischief, before such as have a mind to settle you in good Lands, Seats and Estates.

- L. This saying of Postumius being carried into the Camp, caused much more indignation among the Soldiery, who said, What, a rascal that has cheated us of our Plunder to threaten the Soldiers with mischief also? Whereupon there being a great hubbub, which the Questor P. Sestius thought might be as easily restrained as it was occasioned: but sending a Liſtor to seize a bawling Soldier, upon which a noise and a quarrel arose, he received a knock with a stone, and went out of the crowd: with this check from the Party that gave him the blow, That the Questor had what the General threatened to inflict upon the Soldiers. Postumius being sent for to appease this Tumult, made all things worse by cruel tortures and grievous punishments. At last, now that he set no bounds to his passion, there being a concourse caused by the cries of those whom he had ordered to be put to death under an Hurdle, he ran down as if he had been mad from the Tribunal to them that would have interrupted the Execution: where when the Liſtors and Centurions thrusting the People aside incensed the Rabble, their indignation grew so high, that the Tribune of the Soldiers was stoned to death by his own Army. Which horrid act being related at Rome, the Tribunes of the Soldiers designed to have inquired in the Senate concerning the death of their Collegue; but the Tribunes of the People interposed: though that contention depended upon another cause. For the Senate were afraid lest the Commons being provoked by the dread of Tortures, should create Tribunes Military out of the People, and therefore strove with all their might to have Consuls chosen. But the Tribunes of the People not suffering them to make any Order of Senate, and opposing the Consular Assembly also, the business came again to an Interregnum; and then the Senate got the day.
- LI. Q. Fabius Vibulanus, being Interrex, held an Assembly, in which M. Cornelius Cossus, and L. U. C. 342. Furius Medullinus were chosen Consuls; in the beginning of whose Year an Order of Senate was made, That the Tribunes should make a report to the Commons as soon as possible concerning the question of Postumius's death, and that the Commons should commit the enquiry to whom they pleased. They therefore by consent of the People in general appointed the Consuls to hear the matter: who managing the affair with all lenity and moderation by the punishing of some few, who 'tis believed laid violent hands upon themselves, yet could not gain so far upon them, but that the common People took it very ill, That those Sanctions which were established for their interest should lie so long unexecuted; but a Law made touching their life, and to punish them, should be presently put in execution, and have so great a force. Wherefore this was the best opportunity, when they had quieted the Seditions, to sooth the People with the division of the Volan Lands among them: by which they might probably take off their desire to pass the Agrarian Law, which would dispossess the Senate of that publick Land which they injuriously detained in their own hands. But then this indignity also augmented their animosities, That the Nobility was not only resolute in detaining of publick Lands, which by force they held, but would not divide even that untenanted part which was lately taken from the Enemy among the Commons; that being like, as all the rest had been, to be a prey to some few particular Persons. The same Year the Legions were led by Furius the Consul against the Volsci, who were ravaging the Confines of the Hernici: who not finding the Enemy there, took Ferentinum, whither a great Multitude of the Volsci were fled. But the Plunder was less than they hoped for: for the Volsci, being in small hopes of defending themselves, packed up all they had and in the night time left the Town; which the next day was taken almost empty. The Land it self was given to the Hernici as a Present.
- LII. The next Year, though quiet through the moderation of the other Tribunes, was something disturbed by L. Icilius a Tribune of the People, Q. Fabius Ambustus and C. Furius Pacius being Consuls. For he in the very beginning of it, as though he had thought it the duty of his Name and Family, did all he could to stir Seditions by promulgating the Agrarian Laws. But then there happened a Plague, which, as it threatened more mischief than it did, turned Mens thoughts from the Forum and publick Controversies homeward, to take care of their Bodies: and they believed, that would have been less mischievous than the Sedition was like to have been. The City therefore having had a great many in it sick, but few that died of it, a scarcity of Corn, for want of Tillage (as it commonly happens) succeeded that Pestilent Year, M. Papirius Atratinus and C. Nautius Rutilus being Consuls. And now the Famine was like to be more grievous than the Pestilence had been, if there had not come supplies of Corn from all those Nations that live upon the Coast of the Tuscan Sea and the Tiber, to whom they sent Embassadors for that end. But the Samnites living at Capua and Cuma, proudly denied the Embassadors any Commerce; whilst on the other hand, the Kings of Sicily treated them very kindly, and the Etrurians readily afforded them great quantities of Provisions which were brought to Rome by the Tiber. Then the Consuls found a perfect solitude in the sick City; being forced, seeing they had had not above one Senator for each Embassy, to add two Knights. Except the Distemper and the Dearth, there was no inconvenience happened that Year to the Romans either at home or abroad: but as soon as they were rid of these misfortunes, all things, wherewith they used to be disturbed, both War abroad, and Discord at home, returned again.
- LIII. When Mamercus Aemilius and C. Valerius Potitus were Consuls, the Aequi prepared for a U. C. 345. War; with whom the Volsci, though not in a publick manner, took Arms and joyned as Volunteers, for pay. Upon the news of which Enemies (for they were now fallen into the

the Territories of the Latins and the Hernici as Valerius was making a Levy, M. Menius, a Tribune of the People, and the preferer of the Agrarian Law, endeavouring to hinder it (by whose assistance every one that was unwilling was excused from taking the Military Oath) on a sudden news was brought, that the Castle at Carventus was taken by the Enemy. Which disgraceful loss, as it was the occasion of the Senates hating Menius, so it gave the other Tribunes, who were before prepared to interpose against the Agrarian Law, a juster ground to resist their Collegue. Wherefore when the business had been deferred a great while by mutual wranglings on both sides, the Consuls taking the Gods and Men to witness, that whatsoever was already received either of disgrace or damage from the Enemy, or like to befall them hereafter, must be all laid to Menius's charge, who hindered the Levy; whereupon Menius on the other hand crying out, That if the unjust Lords would quit the possession of the publick Lands, he would not put any stop to the Levy; the other nine Tribunes by interpoling a Decree decided the quarrel, and declared, as the Opinion of the whole College, That they would assist C. Valerius the Consul upon account of the Levy, against the interposition of their Collegue, in laying any Mult or other Penalty upon them, that refused to give in their Names, and to go to the Wars. The Consul therefore, armed with this Decree, having * haled some few of them to Justice by the neck, who * Quum collum torisset, appealed to the Tribunes, the rest for fear took the Oath. Then leading the Army to the Castle of Carventus (though he were hated for his cruelty) the Consul, upon his first arrival, vanquished those that were in Garrison there, and retook it. The Pillagers that through negligence stragled out of the Garrison gave him the occasion to invade it. And by reason of their continual Plunderings, all that they got being conveyed into that secure place, there dragged was some booty, which the Consul had the Questors set publicly to sale, and keep the Money in the publick Treasury; though he had declared at the same time, That the Army should share in it, because they were willing to come to the War. This increased the Soldiers animosities against the Consul: and therefore when he came into the City Ovanti, there were rude Verses alternately thrown out and licentiously by the Soldiers; in which the Consul was blamed, but Menius's name celebrated, whilst the crowding People strove, every time his name was mentioned, with their applause and assent to out-do the Soldiers in kindness to him. Which thing gave the Senate more trouble than even (almost) the insolence of the Soldiers to the Consul: and therefore as though it had been certain that Menius, if he stood for it, would be Tribune of the Soldiers, he was excluded from the Consular Assembly.

Then Cn. Cornelius Cossus and L. Furius Medullinus were again made Consuls: In whose Year the People shewed resentment more than ever, that the Tribunitial Assembly was put into their management: and that resentment they as plainly shewed and revenged in the Assembly for choosing Questors, by putting Plebeians into that Office, that being the first time it ever had been so. So that, in making of four, they left but one place for a Patrician, and that was Cæso Fabius Ambustus, there being three Plebeians, Q. Silius, P. Atilius, and P. Pupius, who were preferred before young Men of the noblest Families. I find that the Scilii were the cause of that freedom in the Peoples Votes, being Men of a Family that was mortal Enemies to the Senate; out of which there were three Tribunes of the People chosen in one Year. And they, making great pretences to the greedy People of what mighty things they would do for them, declared, They would not meddle with any thing unless the People had Courage enough to do in the questorian Assembly (the only one now left in common between them and the Senate) which they so long had desired, and which so long had been lawful. That therefore was a great point gained by the Populace; for they did not so much value the honour of being Questors, but by that there was a way laid open for new Men to come to the Consulate and Triumphs. The Senate on the other hand were discontented, not because the Senate shared them, but because they by this means lost or were like to lose their honours; and said, *If things went so, it was in vain to get Children; who being turned out of their Ancestors places, and seeing others in possession of their Dignities, would be left as the Salm and Flamines (two sorts of Priests) to do nothing but sacrifice for the People, without any Command or Authority.* They therefore being on both sides provoked, after the People had resumed their spirit, and got three Leaders of great note to head the popular Cause; the Senate foreseeing that all things would go the same way in the Questorian Assembly, where the People had all liberty, were inclined to call a Consular Assembly, which as yet was not promiscuous. The Scilii on the contrary said they ought to make Tribunes of the Soldiers, that the honours of the Commonwealth might be once in their lives communicated among the Commons.

But they could do no Consular act to hinder that which they desired: for news was brought on a sudden, the Aequi and the Volsci were come out a foraging beyond their own borders into the Latin and the Hernican Territories. For which War the Consuls beginning to make a Levy, the Tribunes strongly opposed them, saying, That that was the business of them and the Commons. There were three of them, all very acute Men, and generous for Plebeians; whereof two took each of them a Consul into their daily custody, whilst the thirds business was, at Assemblies, sometimes to retain and sometimes to provoke the People. By this means neither did the Consuls accomplish the Levy, nor the Tribunes that Assembly which they desired. But afterward when fortune inclined to the Peoples side, there came a Message, That the Aequi, having killed some few that were left to keep possession of it, had invaded the Castle at Carventus, whilst whilst the Soldiers that were in Garrison there were gone a foraging; and had slain of the rest, some as they were coming back to the Castle, and others stragling in the Fields. That misfortune then happening to the City, increased the strength of the Tribunes Power: for it was now in vain to strive to make them desist from hindering the War, seeing they were invincible, both in respect to the publick calamity, and their own envy; insomuch that they prevailed to have an Order of Senate for the chusing of Tribunes Military, with a proviso, that there should be no notice taken of any one who that Year was Tribune of the People; nor any one be made Tribune of the People again for the next Year: the Senate taking particular notice of the Icilius, whom they accused of an ambition to be Consuls, as a reward for their seditious Tribuneship. Then the Levy was made, and provisions made for the War by consent of all the Orders or Ranks of Men. Both the Consuls went to the Castle of Carventus, though several Authors make it uncertain whether one of them did not stay at Rome to hold an Assembly. But this is certain, and they none of them deny it, that they retired from that Castle after they had a long time in vain attacked it: that Verrugo (a Town in the Volscian Territories) was retaken by the same Army; great plundering and spoils being made both in that and the Aequian Dominions.

LVI. U. C. 347. Mean time, at Rome, as the Peoples Victory lay in their having that Assembly which they most desired, so in the event of it the Senate got the better; for contrary to all Mens expectations Tribunes of the Soldiery were created with Consular Power, of whom three were Patricians, to wit, C. Julius Tullus, P. Cornelius Cossus, and C. Servilius Ahala. In which affair they say, the Patricians used art, (of which the Icilius also then accused them) and by mingling a company of unworthy Candidates with Men that were worthy, averted the Peoples inclinations from the Plebeians, out of the hatred which they bore to some of them who were most signally sordid. Thereupon news was brought, that the Aequi and the Volsci, either because they were encouraged by having still kept the Castle at Carventus, or enraged that they had lost the Garrison at Verrugo, were risen with all their forces: that the Antians were the cause of it, whilst, and that both their Embassadors went about to all the neighbouring People Nations, reproving their sloth, That they would lye hid within their Walls and let the Romans, not only the Year before come and pillage all their Countries, but suffer the Garrison of Verrugo to be taken: that now not only Armies, but Colonies also were sent into their Dominions; nor had the Romans themselves alone their Lands divided among them, but had given the Aernici also Ferentinum, which they took from them. At this their minds being inflamed, they raised an Army of young Men as fast as they came from City to City. By which means the Youth of all those Towns being gathered to Antium, they pitched their Camp there and waited for the Enemy. Which being told at Rome with much more noise than the thing deserved, the Senate presently (as in difficult circumstances it was their last refuge to do) ordered a Dictator to be appointed: At which Julius and Cornelius, they say, were vexed, and that the business was carried with great heat of mind. Whereupon when the chief of the Senate in vain complaining, that the Tribunes Military were not in the Senates disposal, at last also appealed to the Tribunes of the People, and said that the Consuls had been forced by their Authority upon such an occasion ere that time, the Tribunes of the People, who were glad to see the Senate at variance, made answer [by way of Irony] That they could never assist them, who were not fit to be reckoned in the number of Citizens, or so much as Men: if their honours ever became promiscuous, or the Commonwealth were shared among them, then they would take care, that the Orders of Senate should not be evacuated by the pride of any Magistrates; but in the mean time the Patricians who were void of all respect to Law or Magistracy might assume the Tribunes Power also, if they pleased, and act as they would themselves for them.

IVII. This contention had seized upon the thoughts of Men at a very unreasonable time, when they had such a War upon their hands; till Julius and Cornelius having long alternately discoursed, That it was not just, the honour conferred upon them should be taken from them by the People, Ahala Servilius, a Tribune of the Soldiers, said, He had held his tongue so long, not because he was not resolved in his opinion (for what good Citizen could divide his own interest or designs from the publick?) but because he had more mind that his Collegues should yield to the Senates Authority on their own accord, than suffer the Tribunes of the Peoples aid to be implored against them: yea, at that time also, if the thing would have permitted him, he would willingly have given them time to recede from his resolute opinion; but since the necessities for a War would not bear any humane deliberations, he valued the Commonwealth more than the good will of his Collegues; if the Senate continued in the same mind, he would declare a Dictator that night: and if any one interposed to hinder any legal Decree of Senate from being made, yet he would be satisfied with their Authority and approbation. By which having gained a great deal of just commendations and good will among all People, he declared P. Cornelius Dictator, and was himself by him made Master of the Horse. He therefore was an example to his Collegues and all others that took notice of him, that favour and honour sometimes are found to court those Men who are not ambitious of it. But this War was not very memorable; the Enemies being slain at Antium in one slight Conflict. After which, the Army being Victorious, pillaged the Volscian Territories, stormed the Castle that stood upon the Lake Fucinus, and in it took three thousand Prisoners, forcing the rest of the Volsci into their Walls, because they could not defend their Country.

Country. Then the Dictator having so managed the War as that he seemed only to attend upon fortune, returned into the City with more felicity than glory, and laid down his Office. The Tribunes of the Soldiers seeing there was no talk of a Consular Assembly (I suppose out of anger which they conceived upon the score of making a Dictator) appointed an Assembly for chusing of Tribunes Military. Whereupon the Senate was much more concerned, observing that their Cause was betrayed by their own Party: and therefore, as the Year before they had made even worthy Men odious by being competitors with the most rascally of the Plebeians; so at that time, preparing all the chief of the Senate with splendour and favour to stand for it, they got all the places; so that no Plebeian could be admitted. At which time the four that were chosen were all Men that had before born the same Offices, and their names L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, Numerius Fabius Vibulanus, and C. Servilius Ahala: which last of them was made again, and continued in his Office, as for his other virtues, so also through the late favour which he only by his moderation gain'd.

That Year, because the time of the Truce with the Veians was out, they began to demand things back by their Embassadors and Heralds: who coming to the Frontiers of that Country, the Veians Embassadors met them; desiring, That they would not go to Veii, before they themselves had been with the Roman Senate. The Senate upon their Petition granted, that seeing the Veians were under some intestine discontents, there should be no demands made of any thing back again; so far they were from taking the advantage of other Peoples misfortunes for their own ends. Then they received a Defeat in the Volscian Territories by losing the Garrison of Verrugo: where there was so much importance as to time, that though they could have succoured the Soldiers who were there besieged by the Volsci, and begged their assistance, if they had hastened, the Army that was sent as supplies to them, came up at such a juncture that finding all the Enemy stragling about the Country for Plunder, after their late slaughter, they overthrew them. In this case the Senate were the occasion of their slowness more than the Tribunes: who, because they heard the Garrison made a brave defence, thought nothing could be too hard for them: for indeed they were stout fellows, nor were they unrevenge of their Foes either whilst they lived, or even after death. The Year following, P. and Cn. Cornelius Cossus, Numerius Fabius Ambustus, and L. Valerius Potitus, being Tribunes of the Soldiery with Consular Authority, the Romans made War upon the Veians, for a proud answer made by the Veian Senate to their Embassadors, when they came to demand a reprisal, which was, That if they did not get them gone as fast as they could out of their City and Country, they would serve them as Lar. Tullius had formerly done some of their Predecessors in that employment. Which answer of theirs the Senate took so ill, that they decreed, the Tribunes of the Soldiery should propose to the People the declaring of a War against the Veians as soon as possible. Which when it was first offered, the young Men began to murmur, and said, They had not yet done with the Volsci: that two Garrisons of theirs were lately quite disabled, and still kept with great hazard: that no Year passed, in which they had not some Battel: and now, as if they were sorry they had no more work for them, they must needs prepare for a new War with a People that were their most powerful Neighbours, and like to engage all Etruria in their quarrel. This was what they said of their own accord; but ever and anon the Tribunes of the People also helped to blow the Coals; saying, That the greatest War, they had, was between the Senate and the Commons; whom they industriously teased with warfare, and exposed to mortal Enemies, sending them a great way from the City, lest, being at home, they might in Peace remember their Liberty, the Colonies, the publick Lands, or consult how to vindicate the freedom of their Votes. And, to cokes the old Soldiers, they reckoned up the Campaign they had each one served in, with their wounds and scars therein received. What whole place, said they, have you in your Bodies to receive new wounds? What blood remaining, to be shed for the Commonwealth? By this kind of method, both in their Discourses and Speeches, they having made the People averse to the undertaking of a War, the time was protracted for proposing of that Law, which it was manifest, if then it were made liable to the Peoples envy, would be annulled.

In the mean time they thought fit, that the Tribunes Military should lead the Army into the Volscian Dominions; Cn. Cornelius being the only Person left at Rome. The three Tribunes therefore finding that the Volsci had no Camp in any place, nor would put themselves upon the hazard of a fight, divided them into three Parties, and went several ways to plunder the Country. Valerius marched to Antium, and Cornelius to Ecetra; ravaging the whole Country, which way soever they went, to keep the Volsci afunder. Fabius (which was the great design) attacked the Town of Ansur without any pillaging of the Country: which Ansur was the same place that is now called Terracina, lying upon a Marsh, on which side Fabius began his Assault. Then four Regiments sent about under the Command of C. Servilius Ahala, having taken possession of an Hill, that lies above the City, from thence (it being an Avenue unguarded) with great noise and tumult invaded the Walls. At which the Men, who defended the lower part of the City being amazed, gave Fabius an opportunity to use his scaling Ladders. By which means all places were full of the Enemy, and there was upon the Walls for a long time a slaughter, not only of such as ran away, but those that made resistance either with Arms or without. They therefore being subdued were forced, having no hopes hopes to be saved by yielding, to fall a fighting. Whereupon it being declared all on a sudden, that no Men, except such as were in Arms, should be injured, the rest of the Multitude all voluntarily laid down their Arms: of whom there were two thousand and five hundred taken Prisoners: but Fabius kept the Soldiers from taking any other booty, till his Collegues came; saying, that those Armies also had taken Ansur, who had availed the Volsci from the defence of that place. Who when they came, the three Armies rifled the Town, which was very rich in Money and Goods which the People had laid up for many years: and that bounty of the Generals first reconciled the Commons to the Senate. But after that also, there was an addition made to it by the seasonable munificence of the Nobility especially, which was, that, before any mention of the People or the Tribunes, the Senate should Decree, That the Soldiers should be paid out of the publick Treasury, whereas before that time every Man had born his own Charges.

LX.

Nothing, they say, was ever more kindly taken by the Commons; who for that reason flocked to the Senate-house, and, catching hold of the Senators hands as they came out, said, they were truly called Patres, i. e. Fathers; and that they had now so brought it about, That no Man in Rome, as long as he had any strength left, would spare either his body or blood. For they were not only pleased with what they received, but very much satisfied, that their Estates would be quiet, at least whilst their bodies were employed in the service of the Commonwealth; besides, that it was freely offered to them, being never proposed by the Tribunes, or desired by themselves: for that redoubled their joy, and made it much the greater favour. The Tribunes of the People being the only Persons that had no share in the common joy and concord of the two Estates, said, That would not prove so pleasant and prosperous to all the Senators as they believed: and that their design was more plausible at first view than in the end it would appear. For how should they raise that Money but by laying a Tax upon the People? so that they had given away other Mens Estates. Nor would they, who had been old Soldiers, though others did, suffer them, that were now concerned, to go to the Wars on better terms than they had done; or be willing, since they had formerly maintained themselves, to pay others. With this kind of discourse they instigated part of the Commons: but at last the Tribunes also, when the Tax was imposed, declared, They would be assitant to any one that would not pay his share towards the Tax for maintaining the Soldiers. The Senate therefore having begun a good work were as persevering in the defence of it; themselves first paying their proportion. And because their Money was not yet Coined, certain Persons conveying the heavy Bullion in Waggon to the Treasury made the Collection look very great also. When the Senate had given in their Quota with all integrity according to their Estates, the chief of the Commons, who were friends of the Nobility began by agreement to bring in their allotment. Whom when the Common People saw, not only commended by the Senate, but look'd upon by all Men, of a Military Age, as good Citizens, they presently despised the Tribunes encouragement, and strove who should pay first. Then, when the Law was pass'd for declaring a War against the Veians, the new Tribunes of the Soldiers, who had Consular Power, led an Army to Veii, made up great part of Volunteers. Now the Tribunes were T. Quintius Capitolinus, T. Quintius Cincinnatus, C. Julius Fulus (a second time) A. Manlius, L. Spurius Medullinus (a second time) and Manius Emilius Mamercinus.

They first besieged Veii; at the beginning of which Siege, there being a full Assembly of the Etrurians at the Temple of Voltumna, it was not agreed upon, whether the Veians should be defended by a publick War of the whole Nation. But that Assault was more slow the Year after, part of the Army with the Tribunes being called away to the Volscian War. That Year produced Tribunes Military with Consular Authority, whose names were C. Valerius Potitus (a third time) Manius Sergius Fidenas, P. Cornelius Maluginensis, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, Cæso Fabius Ambustus, and Sp. Nautius Rutilus, who was now (a second time) in that Office. They engaged with the Volsci between Ferentinum and Ecetra; the Romans happening to win the day. But after that the Tribunes began to lay Siege to Artena, a Town belonging to the Volsci, whereinto the Romans took occasion to break, as the Enemy, who were all forced into the City, were sallying forth; and besides the Castle, taking all other places; for a crowd of Armed Men got up into that, which was naturally fortified and defended it; though a great many Men were killed and taken under it. Then next they besieged the Castle; but could not take it either by storm, because, for the bigness of it, it was well manned, nor had any hopes of a surrender, since all the Corn was carried into the Castle, before the City was taken: insomuch that they had been forced after a long fatigue to retire thence, if a Slave had not betrayed it to the Romans. For the Soldiers, being let in by that fellow at a steep place, took it: by whom the Sentinels being first killed, the rest of the multitude were in such a sudden consternation that they submitted to a surrender. When therefore they had demolished the City and Castle of Artena, they led the Legions back out of the Country of the Volsci; and all the Roman force was turned against Veii. The Traytor, besides his Liberty, had for a reward the Goods of two Families, being afterward called Servius Romanus [i. e. the Roman Servant.] There are some who think that this City of Artena belonged to the Veians, and not to the Volsci; which error was occasioned by there being a Town of the same name between Cære and Veii: but that the Roman Kings demolished. And besides that belonged to the

Cærians,

Cærians, not to the Veians, this other of the same name, of the sacking whereof I have just now spoken, being in the Volscian Territories.

DECADE I. BOOK V.

EPITOME.

2. At the Siege of Veii there were Winter Quarters prepared for the Soldiers: which being a new thing offended the Tribunes of the People, who complained, that the People had no respite for War; even in the Winter season. 7. The Knights began then first of all to serve in the Wars upon their own Horses. 15. There having happened an inundation of the Alban Lake, they took a Prophet from the Enemy to interpret the meaning of that accident. 21. Furius Camillus the Dictator took Veii, after it had been besieged ten years. 22. He carried the Image of Juno from thence to Rome. 23. He sent the tenth part of the Booty to Apollo at Delphi. 27. He also, being Tribune of the Soldiers, whilst he besieged the Falisci [a People of Tuscany] sent back certain Children, that were betrayed into his hands, to their Parents: whereupon they immediately surrendered the City, by his Justice thus Conquering the Falisci. 31. C. Julius one of the Censors being dead, M. Cornelius was put in his place. But that was not done any more afterward; because in that Lustrum [space of five years] Rome was taken by the Gauls. 32. Furius Camillus, being summoned to his Trial by L. Apuleius, Tribune of the People, went into banishment. 36. &c. When the Gauls, called Senones, were besieging Cluthum, and the Embassadors sent by the Senate to make a Peace between them and the Cluthians, stood and fought in the Cluthian Army against the Gauls; the Senones were so enraged at this action of theirs, that they attacked the City with a mighty Army, and having routed the Romans at the River Allia, took the City, all but the Capitol, into which the Youth had gotten. They killed all the old People, as they sat in the Porches of their Houses, with the badges of those honours about them that each of them had born: and when they had got up on the back-side, to the top of the Capitol, they were betrayed by the gagling of Geese, and forced down again by M. Manlius. 48. After that, when the Romans were reduced to such a strait by famine, that they were fain to give 1000 l. of Gold, and with that purchase the raising of the Siege. 49. Furius Camillus being created Dictator in his absence, came with an Army, as they were weighing the Gold, and after six Months time drove them out of the City and killed them. 50. There was a Temple built to Aius Loquutus, in the place, where, before the City was taken, a voice was heard to say, The Gauls are coming. 'Twas said, they must remove to Veii, by reason that the City was burnt and ruined. 51. Which design was defeated by the advice of Camillus. 55. The People were likewise concerned at what a certain Centurion said, who coming into the Forum had said to his Men: Stand, fellow Soldiers! it will be best for us to stay here.

HAVING made Peace with all others, the Romans and the Veians were in Arms, with so much spite and rage, that it was evident that side which happened to be Conquered, would be totally destroyed. The Assembly [for chusing Magistrates] of both those People was managed at a quite different rate [to what it had been.] For the Romans increased the number of their Tribunes Military, who had Consular Power; and made them eight, more than ever before they had been: whose names were Manius Emilius Mamercinus (a second time) L. Valerius Potitus (a third time) Ap. Claudius Crassus, M. Quintilius Varus, L. Julius Fulus, M. Postumius, M. Furius Camillus, and M. Postumius Albinus. The Veians on the other side, being weary of their annual canvassing, which was sometimes the occasions of discords among them, chose a King. Which thing offended the minds of the Etrurians, who hated not a Monarchy more than the Person of that King. For he had formerly been very grievous to that Nation through his wealth and pride, in that he had violently disturbed their solemn sports, which it was a sin to intermit; when for madness, that he was repulsed, and another Priest chosen before him, by the suffrage of those twelve People he took away the Artists, of whom great part were his own Servants, from the midst of the Action. Wherefore that Nation above all others being so much the more given to Religion, in that they knew best how to perform Holy Duties, Decreed, That they would not lend the Veians any aid, as long as they were under a King. Which Decree was not much spoken of at Veii for fear of the King; who look'd upon every Man that, he heard, should say any such thing as the ring-leader of a Sedition, and not the Author of a vain story. The Romans, though they heard of no disturbance like to come out of Etruria, yet, since news was brought them, that that affair was debated in all their publick Assemblies, made Lines of Circumvallation and Contravallation; the former toward the City and against the Sallies of the Townsmen, and the latter toward Etruria, as a bar to any succours that might possibly come from thence.

Now seeing the Roman Commanders had more hopes in a Siege, than an Assault, they began to build Winter Huts (which was a thing altogether new to the Roman Soldiers) and designed to continue the War by quartering there all the Winter. Which when it was told to the Tribunes of the People at Rome, who long since sought but could not find out any cause of Innovation, they ran forth into the publick Assembly, and there put scruples into the Peoples heads, saying, This it was, that made the Soldiers have so much Money allowed them:

and he saw very well, that that gift would be anointed over with the poison of their Enemies. That the Peoples Liberty was bought and sold: that the Youth of Rome was for ever removed and banished from the City and the Commonwealth: that now they gave not way even to Winter or the season of the Year, or had time to visit their own Houses and look after their Estates. What did they think was the reason, why the Campaign was continued? Why truly they would find it to be no other, than left by the number of those young Men, in whom all the strength of the People lay, there should be any thing done for their advantage: besides, that they were vexed and kept under with greater severity than the Veians. For they spent the Winter under their own roofs, defending their City with curious Walls and the natural situation of the place; whilst the Roman Soldier continued in toil and pains, all over snow and frost, under his Hutt, and did not lay down his Arms so much as in the Winter time, which usually gives a Cessation to all Wars both by Land and Sea. That neither the Kings, nor, (before the Tribunes Power was set up) those proud Consuls, nor the severe Commands of a Dictator, nor the importunate Decemviri ever enjoined them so much servitude, as to make a Campaign perpetual; though the Tribunes of the Soldiers took the liberty to tyrannize at that rate over the Roman Commonalty. What would they have done, had they been Consuls or Dictators, who made the Proconsulate, which was but the image (as it were) of Consular Authority, appear so fierce and severe? But that indeed that fell upon them not without reason; since there was not so much as one place for a Plebeian among eight Tribunes of the Soldiers. That the Patricians formerly used to fill up three places with the greatest zeal imaginable: but that now they go, as though they were all eight yoked together, to get their Commands, and no Plebeian can come amongst them: who, if he did nothing else, might put his Collegues in mind, that their Children and fellow Citizens were in the Wars, and not their Slaves; who ought in the Winter at least to be brought home to their own Houses; and once in the Year visit their Parents, Children and Wives; use their liberty and chuse Magistrates. Whilst they bawled out to this effect, they created to themselves an adversary, who was full hard enough for them, viz. Ap. Claudius, who was left by his Collegues to restrain and suppress the Seditions of the Tribunes: a Person used even from his youth to Plebeian Contests, and who, 'tis said, some Years before advised his Collegues, by their intercession, to dissolve the power of the Tribunes.

III. He therefore at that time, being not only of ready wit, but beaten to it by custom too, made this Speech. "Romans! if you ever doubted, whether the Tribunes of the People were always the Authors of Seditions upon yours or their own accounts, I am certain that cease this Year to be a doubt: and as I rejoyce that you at last are confuted out of so long an error, so I congratulate with you, and, for your sakes, with the Commonwealth, that this error is removed by your happiness more than any thing else. Is there any Man, that doubts whether the Tribunes of the People were ever offended and provoked with any injuries of yours (if perchance you ever did them any) so much as at the Senates largesse to the People, when they allowed such a sum to each Soldier? What do you believe they either at that time feared, or would at this day disturb but the concord of the several Orders? by which means they suppose they may best dissolve the Tribunes Power. Thus they, like drudging Artificers, that love to be doing, seek themselves work; and desire that there may always be some grievance in the Commonwealth, that they may be by you employed to cure it. For do you defend, or oppose the Commons? Are you the Adversaries of the Soldiery? or do you plead their Cause? Unless you'll say, whatever the Senate does displeases us; whether it be for or against the People. And as Masters forbid their Servants to have any thing to do with strangers, as thinking it fit for them to be equally unconcerned with them either in good or ill Offices, so you deny the Senate all commerce with the People: left we by our courtesie and munificence should oblige the Commons, or they be subject and obedient to us. How much rather should you, if you had any (I do not say, civility, but) humanity in you, favour, and (as much as in you lies) indulge the courtesie of the Senate and the obedience of the People? Between whom, if there were a perpetual agreement, who may not dare to promise, that this Empire would in a short time be the greatest among all our Neighbour Nations?"

IV. "Now I shall tell you anon, how this Design of my Collegues not drawing the Army off from Veii before they had done the business, was not only advantageous, but necessary too: though at present I intend to discourse touching the very condition of them that are Soldiers there. Which Speech of mine, I believe, might seem very just, not only before you, but even in the Camp, if it were made there, before the very Army themselves. In which, if I could think of nothing to say my self, I might well be content with what our adversaries have already said. They lately denied, that the Soldiers ought to have a largesse given them, because they never had any such thing before: how then can they be angry now, that they, who have a new advantage given them, should have a new proportionable trouble enjoined them? There never is any pains without some profit, nor profit, for the most part, without pains. Pains and pleasure, though very unlike each other in their natures, are yet joyned one to the other by a kind of natural connection. The Soldiery heretofore took it ill, that they should serve the Commonwealth at their own charge: and yet the same Persons were very glad, that they could till their Ground part of the Year, and get enough to maintain them and their Family both at home and in the Wars. But now they are very well satisfied that "the Commonwealth is a gain to them and receive their stipend with great joy. Wherefore he ought to be content to be a little longer than ordinary absent from his House and Family, who is at no great charge. If the Commonwealth should call him to account, might it not justly say, you have an yearly stipend, do the work of an Year? Do you think it just for you to receive a whole Years pay for six Months service? I am unwilling, Romans, to dwell upon this part of my Speech: for they ought to say thus, who have to do with Mercenary Soldiers: but we would deal as with fellow Citizens, and think they ought to deal with us as with their Country. Either the War ought not to have been undertaken, or it ought to be carried on according to the dignity of the Roman People, and should be made an end of as soon as possible. Now it will be made an end of, if we press the besieged; if we do not draw off, before we have put an end to our hopes by taking of Veii. If there were no other reason, the very indignity ought to engage our perseverance. There was a City heretofore besieged ten years together, for the sake of one Woman, by all Greece: How far from home? How many Countries, how many Seas distant? And yet we are weary of attacking a Town but one Year, which lies within twenty Miles, almost within sight of our City: because, forsooth, the occasion of the War was so small: and there is no sufficient reason to encourage our perseverance. Why they have rebelled seven times; nor were they ever faithful in time of Peace: besides that they have pillaged our Country a thousand times. They forced the Fidenates to revolt from us, killed our Colony there, and were the occasion (against the Law of Nations) of our Embassadors being barbarously murdered. They would have set all Etruria against us; and endeavour so to do even to this day: nor were they far from offering violence to our Embassadors, when they demanded back what was our due.

"Should we wage War with these kind of People gently and by degrees? If our just hatred does not move us, will not these things, I pray you, stir us up? Their City is surrounded with great Works, wherewith the Enemy is enclosed on every side: so that they have not manured their Ground, and what was Tilled is all laid waste by the War. Now therefore, if we bring back our Army, who doubts, but that they (not only out of a desire to revenge themselves, but also) out of meer necessity that is laid upon them to plunder their Neighbours, will invade our Territories? Wherefore by that means we do not differ the War, but take it into our own Confines. What? must that which properly belongs to the Soldiery, from whom the good Tribunes of the People would extort their stipend, be just now on the sudden inquired into, of what nature it is? They have made a Bullwark and a Trench, both which cost a great deal of labour, of such a length: they built Forts, at first a few, but afterward when the Army increased, many more: and planted Fortifications, not only toward the City, but toward Etruria also, lest any Auxiliaries should come from thence. Why should I talk of the Galleries, Towers, and Tortoises, with other instruments used in attacking of Cities? Since they have been at such pains, and are now at last come to the end of their work; do you think these things are to be left, that they may undergo the same toil again at Summer in making them anew? when it is easier for us to defend the Works we have made? to press on, persevere, and perfect our design? For indeed the business is but short, if it be done without interruption, and we our selves do not by intermissions and intervals make our hopes more slow: I speak of work and loss of time. What? Will these so frequent Assemblies of Etruria, touching their sending of Auxiliaries to Veii, suffer us to forget the danger, that we run into by deferring the War? As the case now stands, they are angry, they hate [the Veians] and say, they will send them no assistance; and therefore, for all them, we may now take Veii; but who will promise, that if we defer the War now, they shall be in the same mind hereafter? since, if you give them leisure, they may send greater, and more frequent Embassies: since that, which now offends the Etrurians, viz. the King which they have chosen and set up at Veii, may be altered by tract of time, either by consent of the City, to reconcile the Etrurians, or of the Kings own free will, who may be unwilling, that his grandeur should obstruct the good of his Citizens. Do but consider how many great inconveniences attend that way of proceeding: the loss of Works that cost so much pains in the making: an imminent devastation of our Country: and an Etrurian War raised instead of a Veian. These, Tribunes, are the methods; much like, as if a body should give a sick Man, who, if he suffered himself to be diligently look'd after, might soon be well, any grateful meat or drink that was at hand, and so throw him into a tedious and perhaps an incurable Distemper.

"If it did not really conduce to the perfecting of this War, yet it would be of very good consequence toward Military Discipline at least, to have our Soldiers inured, and not only to enjoy a Victory when they had got it; but, if the business were somewhat more tedious than ordinary, to endure the fatigue on't, and expect the event even of slow hopes: so as that if a War be not ended in Summer to stay till Winter, and not, like Summer Birds, look about in Autumn for shelter and recesses. I pray you, since the pleasure of Hunting hurries Men through Snow and Frost into the Woods and Mountains, shall we not employ as much patience about the necessities of War, as even our sport and pastime prompts us to? Do we think the Bodies of our Soldiers are so effeminate, and their spirits so weak, that they cannot endure

"endure a Camp, or be absent from home one Winter? as if they were to engage in a Sea Fight, where they must watch all Storms, and observe the time of Year? Can they not endure neither heat nor cold? Surely they would blush, if a Man should tell them so: and would be willing to persuade you, that they had a manly patience both in their bodies and their minds, and could wage War as well in Winter as in Summer: and that they did not give the Tribunes any order to patronize sloth and effeminacy, but remembered, that their forefathers created this very Power, not in the shade, nor in any House. These things are becoming the Valour of your Soldiers, and sute with the Roman name; not only to look upon Veii and this War, that is before you, but to gain Fame and Renown toward other Wars and against other Nations for the future. Do you believe the difference in point of opinion is so small; whether our Neighbours think the Romans to be such a People, as that if any City can but bear their first short effort, it need fear nothing after that; or whether the terror of our name be such [as that Men may believe] that neither the toil of a long Siege, nor the severities of Winter can once remove a Roman Army from before a beleaguered City? seeing they know no other end of War, but Victory? nor wage War with force more than perseverance? which as it is necessary in all sorts of warfare, so most especially in Sieges of Cities: many whereof, though they are well fortified, and by their natural situation rendred almost impregnable, are yet in time overcome and taken by mere hunger and thirst: as Veii will be, unless the Tribunes of the People assist the Enemy; and the Veians find those succours in Rome, which they vainly seek for in Etruria. Is there any thing that can fall out so luckily for the Veians, as that, first of all the City of Rome should be filled with Sedition, and then, as it were by Contagion, the Camp? But indeed among our Enemies there is so much modesty, that they have made no innovations for all the tediousness of the Siege, or the uneasiness of a Monarchy: the Etrurians denying them assistance did not disturb their minds: for he must presently die, that is the Author of Sedition; nor may any man say those things, that among you are said without any notice taken of them: but he deserves a Cudgelling, who either leaves his Colours or quits his Guard. Those that persuade, not one or two Men, but whole Armies to fly from their Colours, and desert the Camp, are publicly heard in the Assembly; so that, whatever a Tribune of the People says, though it be in order to betray his Country, or to ruin the Commonwealth, you have used to hear: and yet you are so taken with the sweetness of that Power, that you suffer any evil actions to lie hid under that cover. What remains but that they say the same things in the Camp, before the Soldiers, as they bawl out here; that they corrupt the Army, and keep them from being obedient to their Commanders: because that forsooth is the liberty and priviledge of Rome not to shew any respect to the Senate, Magistrates, the Laws, the Customs and Institutions of our Forefathers or the Discipline of War.

Thus Appius was now equal, in publick Assemblies, to the Tribunes of the People, when on a sudden, a misfortune which they had (from whence no body could have believed) at Veii, not only made Appius superior in the case, but caused a greater union among the several Orders, and a more vehement inclination resolutely to besiege Veii. For when a mound was raised just at the very City, and their Galleries now almost fixed to the Walls, whilst their Works were more intently carried on in the day, than looked after in the night; the Gate on a sudden was opened, and a vast Multitude, armed, most of them, with Torches, threw fire into them, and in a moment of an hour both the Rampire and the Galleries, which had been so long a making, were all on fire; and many People there, who vainly endeavoured to assist, were consumed by Fire and Sword. Which when it was told at Rome, made all People sad, but filled the Senate with care and fear, lest at that time more than ever the Sedition in the City, and in the Camp too, might become intolerable, and the Tribunes of the People insult, as if they themselves had subdued the Commonwealth: When on a sudden, those that had Knights Estates, though they had no publick Horfes assigned them, having first consulted among themselves, went to the Senate: and having permission granted them to speak, promised, that they would serve in the Wars upon their own Horfes. Who being thanked by the Senate in very gracious expressions, the noise of it was got all over the Forum and the City, and thereupon was there a sudden concourse of the Commons to the Senate-house; who said, They were as yet of the Plebeian Order who fought on Foot, and promised the Commonwealth their pains out of course, whether they would lead them to Veii, or any whither else: but if they were carried to Veii, they said, they would not return thence before they had taken the Enemies City. With that their joy grew very unruly: for they were not ordered to be commended as the Horsemen were, by a Magistrate chosen on purpose; nor were any of them called into the House, to receive the Senates answer, or was the Senate contained within the House, but each of them from the higher place [where they stood] made signs of publick joy to the Multitude that stood in the Court, both with their voice and hands, crying, Oh! happy Rome, that art invincible and eternal in this union: commending both the Knights, the Commons, and the very day it self: and confessing that the courtesie and bounty of the Senate was now out-done. The Senate and the People strove, they were so transported with joy, that the very tears flowed from them; till the Senators being recalled

into the House, there was an Order of Senate made, That the Tribunes Military, calling an Assembly, should give the Foot and Horse thanks: and tell them that the Senate would be mindful of their piety towards their Country: as also that they thought good, that all those, who had declared themselves Volunteers out of course, should receive pay: besides which, there was a certain sum assigned them for keeping of their Horfes. Then it was that Knights began first to serve in the Wars on Horseback. The Volunteer Army being led to Veii, did not only restore their ruined Works, but also made new ones: and Provisions were brought from the City with greater care than before, lest there should be any thing lacking that might be for the use of so deserving an Army.

The following they chose for Tribunes Military with Consular Power, C. Servilius Ahala (a third time) Q. Servilius, L. Virginus, Q. Sulpicius, A. Manlius (a second time) and Manius Sergius (a second time.) Now whilst the care of all things in order to the Veian War was committed to these Tribunes, the Garrison at Anxur being neglected for want of Men and by commonly receiving the Volscian Merchants, was taken by a surprise upon the Watch that was at the Gates: but no great number of Men was lost, because except those that were sick, all the rest traded like Sutlers, all over the Country and about the Neighbouring Cities. Nor did the affairs succeed any better at Veii, which was then the chief Seat of all their publick cares: for not only the Roman Generals had more quarrels among themselves, than animosity against their Enemies; but the War also was augmented by the sudden approach of the Capenates and the Faliscans. These two Nations of Etruria, being next adjacent to the Conquered Veians, believed, that they should be next also in the course of the Roman War (the Faliscans, as being obnoxious upon their own account, for having been formerly concerned in the Fidenate War) and therefore sending Embassadors to and fro, and being by Oath obliged to each other they came on a sudden with their Armies to Veii. They happened to attack the Camp in that part of the Country, which was under the Government of Manius Sergius: and put them into a mighty fear; for that the Romans believed that all Etruria was up in Arms and come in a full body against them: and the same opinion put the Veians also into confusion in the City. By this means the Roman Camp was attacked on both sides: so that they ran together, carrying their Ensigns to and fro; nor could they well keep the Veians within their Works, or defend their own Fortifications, and save themselves from their Enemy without: but their only hope was, if they were succoured from the bigger Camp, that some of their Legions might fight on one side against the Capenate and Faliscan, and the rest withstand the Sallics of the Townsfolk. But Virginus commanded the Camp, who was privately hated and an Enemy to Sergius. He therefore, when it was told him, that several of their Forts were attacked, that the Enemy had got over the Fortifications, and made their way in on both sides, kept his Men in their Arms; saying, That if there were need of his assistance, his Colleague would send to him. But the obstinacy of the other equalled his arrogance; for he, lest he should seem to desire any aid from his Enemy, chose rather to be overcome by the Enemy than conquer by the help of his fellow Citizen. The Romans for a long time were killed in the midst between their two Enemies; but at last, forsaking their Works some few of them got into the bigger Camp; though the greatest part, and Sergius himself, made their escape to Rome: where laying all the blame upon his Colleague, it was ordered, that Virginus should be sent for from the Camp, and the Lieutenants Command it in the mean time. Then the matter was debated in the Senate: and the Collegues inveighed against each other; whilst few regarded the Commonwealth; but most of them took this or the others part, as their private love and favour inclined them.

The chief of the Senators, whether that ignominious defeat was received through the default or infelicity of the Generals, were of opinion, That they ought not to expect the due time of the Assembly, but forthwith to create new Tribunes of the Soldiers, who should enter upon their Office on the first of October. To which opinion of theirs there was so general a consent, that the rest of the Tribunes Military did not at all gainsay it. But yet Sergius and Virginus, for whose sake it was manifest that the Senate repented of the Magistrates for that Year, first of all begged pardon for that ignominy, and then interposed against the Order of Senate, saying, That they would not go out of their Office before the 15 of December, which was the solemn day for Magistrates to enter upon their Offices. Hereupon the Tribunes of the People, who had held their tongues against their wills, when they saw such an agreement among the People and the City in so happy a state, began very fiercely to threaten the Tribunes Military, that if they would not submit to the Senates Authority, they would order them to be carried to Prison. Then C. Servilius Ahala, a Tribune Military, said, As for your parts, Tribunes of the People, and your menaces, I truly would willingly try how little justice these threats have in them more than we have resolution: but that 'tis a great crime to contend against the Authority of the Senate; wherefore do you cease, whilst we are quarrelling, to seek occasion of charging any injury upon us, and my Colleague shall either do what the Senate orders, or if they persist in their resolutions, I'll immediately nominate a Dictator, that shall force them to quit their Offices. Which Speech of his being approved on by all general assent, the Senators were glad, that there was some other greater force found out, besides the dread of the Tribunes Power, to curb the Magistrates: and so they, being over-powered by universal consent held the Assembly for choosing Tribunes Military, who who were to enter into their Office upon the Kalends of October, and quitted their own Offices before that day.

X. By L. Valerius Potitus (who was now Tribune Military a fourth time) M. Furius Camillus (a second time) Manius Aemilius Mamercinus (a third time) Cn. Cornelius Cossus (a second time) Cæso Fabius Ambustus, and L. Julius Iulus (being all of them invested with Consular Authority) there were many exploits done both at home and abroad: for they were engaged in many Wars at the same time, not only at Veii, but at Capena, Falerii, and against the Volsci, to recover Anxur from the Enemy: besides, that at Rome they took a great deal of pains in making their Levy, and gathering the Tribute; and had a mighty contest about taking in the Tribunes of the People; nor did the judgments passed by them, who a little before had been dignified with Consular Authority, cause any small animosities. The Tribunes Military thought fit first of all to make the Levy, nor were the younger People only enrolled, but the elder also forced to give in their names, in order to secure the City. But look how much the number of the Soldiers was augmented, so much the more Money was necessary to pay them: and that was raised by a Tax, to which the Persons that paid it were very unwilling to consent, at least such of them, who staid at home, because they were to undergo the duty of Soldiers and serve the Commonwealth in defending the City. Now though these things were grievous in themselves, the Tribunes of the People by their seditious Speeches made them seem much more intolerable: saying, That the Soldiers had Money raised for them, upon no other account, but to destroy and undo the Commons, partly by War, and partly by Taxes. That one War had been protracted now for three Years together; and was ill managed out of design; that they might keep it on foot the longer. That afterward, there were Forces raised at one Levy for four Wars, and that even Boys and old Men were taken for Soldiers. That now there was no difference between Summer and Winter, left the poor Commons should ever have any rest: who were now also at last made Tributary too; so that when they came home again with their bodies quite tired out, all over wounds, and broken with age, and found all places unmanured by reason of the long absence of the owners, they must pay Tribute out of their decayed Estate; and return their pay, (as though they had taken it up at Use) to the Commonwealth manifold. Amidst the Levy, the Tribute, and the many greater affairs wherewith their minds were taken up, the number of the Tribunes of the People could not be made up at the Assembly: wherefore they contended, to have Patricians chosen into the void places: which seeing they could not obtain, yet, to invalidate the Trebonian Law, it was so brought about, that C. Lacerius and M. Acutius were taken in to be Tribunes of the People, and that, no question, by means of the Patricians.

XI. It happened that that Year C. Trebonius was Tribune of the People; who seemed to behave himself like a just Patron of that name and Family in defending the Trebonian Law. For he, crying out, that what some of the Senate had in vain desired (as being repulsed upon the first attempt) the Tribunes of the Soldiers had extorted, said, That the Trebonian Law was evacuated, and that the Tribunes of the People were chosen [into the void places] not by the Votes of the People, but by the command of the Patricians: and that the matter was come to such a pass, as that the Tribunes of the People must be look'd upon either as Patricians or retainers to them. That the sacred Laws were taken away, the Tribunes Power wrested from them, and that done, by the fraud of the Patricians, and the knavery and treachery of their Collegues. Now since not only the Senate, but the Tribunes of the People also, (they that were taken in, and those that chose them too) had incurred the envy and hatred of the People; three of the College, viz. P. Curatius, M. Metilius, and M. Minucius, being concerned for their own private affairs, inveighed against Sergius and Virginus, the Tribunes of the foregoing Year; and by summoning them to Tryal, turned the fury and envy of the People from themselves upon those two: saying, That they had given all those, to whom the Levy, the Tax, the tedious Campaign, or the length of the War was grievous (as also to them, who had reason to be sorry for the defeat received at Veii; and them, who, having lost Children, Brothers, Kindred or Relations, had their Houses full of sorrow) Authority and Power to revenge their grief both private and publick upon those two guilty Persons: for the original causes of all their mischiefs were in Sergius and Virginus. Nor did their accusers prove that upon them more than they confessed it; who being both guilty laid the blame upon one another: Virginus by charging Sergius, that he ran away, and Sergius Virginus, that he betrayed him: whose madness was so incredible, that it was much more probable, that what they did was done by compact and the common fraud of the Patricians. That by these Persons the Veians had formerly opportunity given them to set fire on their Works, in order to protract the War, and that now the Army was betrayed; the Roman Camp delivered into the hands of the Faliscans; and all things done, that the young Men might grow old at Veii: nor could the Tribunes appeal to the People concerning the publick Lands, or any other conveniences of the common People, or get any considerable number in the City to back them in their actions, and to resist the Conspiracy of the Patricians. That there was a Judgment passed upon those guilty Persons already both by the Senate, the Roman People, and their own Collegue, for they were not only removed from the Commonwealth by an act of Senate; but when they refused to lay down their Offices, were constrained and checked by their Collegues with the fear of a Dictator: and that the Roman People had created Tribunes, who were not to enter upon their Office on the Ides of

December,

December, which was the solemn day, but immediately upon the first of October: because the Commonwealth could not have stood any longer if these Persons had continued in their Offices. And yet, that they, though marked and fore-judged by so many sentences already, come to be judged by the People: think themselves acquitted, and that they have suffered sufficiently, in having been made private persons two Months sooner than their time; not understanding, that they had then only the power of doing hurt taken from them, but no penalty inflicted on them: for their Collegues too were turned out of their Office, though they had done no harm. That the Romans ought to resume those thoughts, which they had, when they received the late defeat, when they saw a frightened Army running away, full of wounds, and marching with dismay into their Gates; accusing neither fortune, nor any God, but these two Commanders only. For he was sure, that there was never a Man in that Assembly, who, at that time, did not curse and detest the Persons, Families, and Fortunes of L. Virginus and M. Sergius. Wherefore it was absurd for any body, when he might and ought, not to use his Power against those Persons whom he had curs'd. That the Gods themselves never laid hands on the guilty; it was sufficient for them to arm those that were injured with an occasion of revenging themselves.

With these kind of Speeches the Commonalty was so animated, that they condemned the Persons accused in 10000 l. whilst Sergius in vain accused the common chance and fortune of War; and Virginus begged, that he might not be made more unhappy at home than he was in the War. So the fury of the People being thus turned upon them, had caused the admission of the Tribunes and their fraud against the Trebonian Law, to be almost forgotten. Now the Tribunes, having carried the day, (to the end that the Commons might have a present reward for their judgment) promulgated the Agrarian Law [concerning division of Lands] and forbade any Tax to be gathered; since they wanted Pay for so many Armies, and their affairs abroad were so successful, that they arrived not at the end of their hopes in any War: for at Veii, the Camp, which they had lost, was retrieved and strengthened with new Forts and Guards. The Tribunes Military that Commanded there were M. Aemilius and Q. Fabius: there were no Enemies found without their Walls by M. Furius in the Faliscan, nor by Cn. Cornelius in the Capenate Dominions: so that they drove away all the Booty that they found, laid the Country waste by burning their Villages and Fruits; but neither attacked, nor besieged their Towns. But in the Volscian Territories, after they had ravaged the Country, they attempted Anxur to no purpose, which was seated upon a high place, and afterwards, since 'twas to no purpose to make an Assault, begun to be besieged with a Bullwark and a Trench. Valerius Potitus happened to have the Volsci for his Province. At this juncture of Military Affairs, a Domestick Sedition arose with greater violence than their Wars were carried on: and seeing the Tax could not be raised for the Tribunes, nor any Pay sent to the Officers, though the Soldiers were very earnest to have their Money, the Camp had like to have been disturbed by the Contagion of the City Sedition. Amidst these heats of the People against the Senate, though the Tribunes of the People said, that was the time to establish their Liberty and to transfer the chief Authority from such as Sergius and Virginus to Commoners that were stout and brave fellows; yet they went no further, than to create one Plebeian (and that only to shew their right) viz. P. Licinius Calvus, a Tribune Military with Consular Authority. The rest were all Patricians, as, P. Mænius, P. Titinius, P. Mælius, L. Furius Medullinus, and L. Publilius Volsius. For which reasons all the Commons wondered, that they had gained so great a point, and not only he that was created; who was a Man that had never born any honourable Office, but was only an ancient Senator and very old. Nor is it well known, why he was first chosen and look'd upon as the fittest Person to receive that new honour. Some think he was pitched upon for the sake of his Brother Cn. Cornelius, who had a Tribune Military Year before, and given the Horsemen treble Pay: others, that he made a seasonable Speech about the union of the several Orders, which pleased both the Senate and the People. Now the Tribunes of the People were so over-joyed at this their Victory in the Assembly, that they, to the great damage of the Commonwealth, remitted somewhat of the Tax: but the rest was paid very obediently and sent to the Army.

Anxur, in the Volscian Country, was soon retaken, when the Watches upon an Holy day neglected the defence of it. This Year was remarkable for a very cold and snowy Winter; inasmuch that the Roads were dammed up, and the Tiber become unnavigable. But the price of Provisions, by reason of the stores, which before were bought in, did not rise at all. And because P. Licinius, as he had got the Office [of a Tribune] without any tumult, so also bore it with greater joy to the Commons, than indignation in the Senate, the People had a desire, at the next Choice of Tribunes Military to put in Plebeians. And accordingly M. Veturius was the only Patrician of all the Candidates, that got a place: but most of the Centuries Voted for Plebeians to be the other Tribunes of the Soldiers, whose names were L. Titinius, P. Mænius, P. Acilius, Cn. Genutius, and L. Racilius: That severe Winter, either through the ill temper of the air, that changed on a sudden for the contrary, or for some other reason, was attended by a Summer which was as hurtful and pestilent to all sorts of Animals. Of which incurable Distemper seeing they could not find either the Reason, or Cure, the Sybil's Books were, by Order of the Senate, consulted: and the Duumviri, appointed pointed to do Sacrifice, having then first prepared an Holy Feast in the City of Rome, for eight days together appeased Apollo, Latona, Diana, Hercules, Mercury and Neptune, upon three Beds made [in a Temple] and set out as splendidly as possibly they then might be. That sacred [Feast] was also kept privately too: for they lay the whole City, setting open their doors, and making all things common, entertained all Persons, whether friends or strangers, that came to their Houses: that they laid all quarrels and debates aside, and talk'd very courteously and kindly even with their Enemies: that against those days, those that were in Prison had their Bonds taken off; and that it was afterward look'd upon as an horrid crime to imprison them, whom the Gods had in that manner released. In the mean time their dread at Veii was become manifold, since three Wars were united into one. For in the same manner as before, now that the Capenates and Faliscans were come to relieve that place, they were fain to fight both forward and backward, about their Fortifications, against three Armies at once. That which did them most good was the remembrance of Sergius and Virginius's Condemnation: wherefore a Party brought about, in a short space, from the bigger Camp, whence before they had no succour, attacked the Capenates, who charged upon the Roman Bullwark, in the Rere. Thence therefore the Fight began, and terrified the Faliscans, who were opportunely forced back in a consternation by a Sally out of the Camp: whereupon the Conquerors pursuing, made a great slaughter among them. Nor was it long before the Pillagers of the Capenian Territories, who were now stragling about, and met them, as it were, by accident, destroyed those that were left at the Fight: besides, that many of the Veians, who fled back into their City, were slain at the Gates, whilst the foremost, for fear, lest the Romans should get in along with their Men, shut up the passes and kept out the hindmost of their own Party. These things were transacted that Year.

XIV. And now the Assembly for chusing Tribunes Military was come; for which the Senate were full as much concerned as for the War: because they saw the chief Authority not only communicated to the Commons, but now almost quite lost. Wherefore though they had prepared the most eminent in the City on purpose to stand for that Office, whom they thought the People would be ashamed to refuse; yet they themselves, as if they had been all Candidates, tryed all manner of means, and drew over, not only Men, but even the Gods too to their Party, making the Assemblies of the last two Years a matter of Religious consideration. For they said, That the Year before, they had an intolerable Winter, which was terrible in many Divine Prodigies: and that the Year next to that, they had not Prodigies indeed, but the event of them, viz. a Pestilence raging all over their Country and City, which was, no question, the effect of the Gods wrath upon them: whom to appease, in order to remove that Plague, it was found expedient in their fatal Books: That at an Assembly, which was held by the direction of the Soothsayers, the Gods thought it an undecent thing, that honours should be prostituted to the vulgar, and the differences of Families confounded. Hereupon the People were so astonished, not only at the Majesty of the Candidates, but with Religious awe too, that they chose Tribunes Military with Consular Power, who were all Patricians, and those most part of them the most honourable Persons; as, L. Valerius Potitus (a fifth time) M. Valerius Maximus, M. Furius Camillus, (a third time) L. Furius Medullinus, (a third time) Q. Servilius Fidenas, (a second time) and Q. Sulpicius Camerinus, a second time. Whilst these Men were Tribunes, there was nothing memorable done at Veii: for all their force was employed in pillaging. The two chief Officers brought away vast Booties, Potitus from Falerii, and Camillus from Capena; leaving nothing entire that could be injured by Fire or Sword.

XV. In the mean time there were many Prodigies spoken of: whereof most were disbelieved and slighted, not only because they had but one Author, but also because, the Etrurians being their Enemies, they had no Soothsayers to atone for them. Wherefore all their care was employed upon one only; which was, that the Lake in the Alban Grove, without any rain, or any other apparent cause, to make it less than a Miracle, swelled to an unusual height. There, upon there were Deputies sent to the Oracle at Delphi, to enquire what the Gods foretold by that Prodigy: but a nearer Interpreter was by Destiny prepared for it, being an old Man of Veii, who, amidst the Roman and Etrurian Soldiers, who were wrangling in their Stations and upon their Watches, said, like a Prophet, That the Romans should never take Veii, before the Water was let out of the Alban Lake. Which Prophecy of his was at first despised, as a rash word, but soon after began to be more seriously considered; till at last one of the Roman Soldiers asking the next Townsman to him (for the War had continued so long, that they now conversed with one another) who that was, who spake so mysteriously of the Albane Lake; when he heard he was a Soothsayer, he, being a Man not altogether void of Religion, pretended, that if he had any leisure, he would consult him about the expiation of a private Prodigy, and so got the Soothsayer to discourse with him. And when they were both got a good way from their Party, unarmed, and without any fear; the lusty young Roman being too strong for him, forced the feeble old Man in sight of them all away, and, for all the Etrurians could do, carried him to their Post. Who, when he came to the General, and from thence was sent to the Senate at Rome, they enquiring of him, what that was, that he had said concerning the Albane Lake, he replied, That the Gods were really angry with the Veians that day, on which they had put it into his mind to discover how his Country should be destroyed. And therefore what he then said, as being moved by a Divine impulse, he could neither recall so as to unspeak it, but might perhaps commit as great a crime in concealing, what the Gods would have divulged, as by revealing what should be kept secret. Now therefore it was so delivered in their fatal Books, and by the Tradition of the Etrurians, that when the Alban Water had swell'd, then if the Romans before that was, the Gods would never forsake the Walls of Veii: Then he went on and told them, what was the solemn method of drawing it. But the Senate looking upon him as a vain babbler, and not creditable enough in such a weighty matter, decreed, that the Embassadors, and the answer of the Delphick Oracle, should be expected home again.

But before the Deputies returned from Delphi, or the atonement for the Albane Prodigy was found out, the new Tribunes invested with Consular Authority; viz. L. Julius, L. Furius Medullinus, (a fourth time) L. Sergius Fidenas, A. Postumius Regillensis, P. Cornelius Maluginensis, and A. Manlius, entered upon their Office. That Year the Tarquinius, a new Enemy, rose up, because they saw the Romans engaged in so many Wars (as, that against the Volsci at Anxur, where their Garrison was besieged; against the Equi at Lavici, who attacked the Roman Colony there; and besides these, in the Veian, Faliscan and Capenian War) all at the same time: and that their affairs were as unsetled within their Walls too through the contentions between the Senate and the People. Wherefore supposing this juncture a good opportunity to set upon them, they sent several expediate Troops a foraging into the Roman Territories; for they thought that either the Romans would not revenge the injuries done to them, for fear of burthening themselves with a new War, or would pursue them with a small, and consequently a weak Army. Now the Romans resented the indignity more than they valued the ravage that the Tarquinius made. Wherefore this business was neither undertaken with any extraordinary concern, nor long deferred: but A. Postumius, and L. Julius, without any regular Levy (for they were hindered by the Tribunes of the People) but with a Party of Men, who were in a manner Volunteers, that they by persuaasions got together, went forth through the Cæretian Territories cross the Country, and surpris'd the Tarquinius as they came back from Plundering, and loaded with Booty: killing many of them; but took all their Plunder from them, and so, having retrieved the spoils of their own Dominions, returned to Rome. There was two days given the owners to find out their Goods; and the third day, such things as were not owned (among which there were many things belonging to the Enemies themselves) were publicly sold; and the Money, made of them, divided among the Soldiers. The other Wars, and especially the Veian, on the Fates and Gods; when at last the Embassadors came from Delphi, with the Oracles answer, which was agreeable to what the Captive Prophet had told them; being this, Romans! have a care, lest the Alban Water be kept in the Lake; but do not let it run into the Sea down its own Channel: let it out and sprinkle it all over the Fields, and make drains to exhaust it. Then do thou press hard upon the Enemies Walls, remembering that the Victory over the City, which thou hast besieged so many years, was given thee by direction of this Oracle, that now reveals it. When the War is over, and thou art Conqueror, bring a large Present to my Temple; and perform thy ancient Country Sacrifices, the care of which thou hast omitted, according to custom.

From that time the Captive Prophet began to grow great, and the Tribunes of the Soldiers, Cornelius and Postumius made use of him to atone for the Albane Prodigy, and appease the Gods after the due manner; and it was found out at last, that when the Gods were angry that the Ceremonies were neglected, or the solemnities intermitted, the meaning of it was nothing else, but that the Magistrates were not rightly chosen: that that did duly Celebrate the Latin Holy-days, and perform the sacred Rites in the Albane Mount: that it was the only expiation of those things, for the Tribunes Military to lay down their Office, for the auspices to be again repeated, and an interregnum set up. All which was accordingly performed by order of the Senate. Thereupon there were three Interreges [or Persons that ruled, when there were no chief Magistrates besides] viz. L. Valerius, Q. Servilius Fidenas, and M. Furius Camillus. But in the mean time they had continual disturbances; for the common People made a tumult in the Assembly, till it was first agreed upon, That the greater part of the Tribunes Military should be chosen out of the Commonalty. Which whilst they transacted, the States of Etruria met at the Temple of Volumna: where seeing the Capenates and Faliscans required, that all the People of Etruria should, with one consent, rescue Veii from the Siege that was laid to it, answer was made, That they had denied the Veians that before; because they ought not to expect aid from them, whom they had not consulted about so weighty an affair: besides, that at this time their very condition denied them, especially in that part of Etruria: for a Foreign Nativance of Peace or War. Yet they would be so kind to their own blood and name, and shew so much regard to the dangers of their Kindred, that if any of their Youth would go voluntarily into that War, they would not hinder them. Then there was a report at Rome, that such a vast number of Enemies were come; and thereby their intestine discords began (as it usually happens) to be allayed.

XVIII. It was not against the Senates will that the Tribes by their Prerogative chose Licinius Calvus Tribune of the Soldiers, who was a Person of known moderation in his former Office; but at that time very old: and it was apparent that all those of the College in the same would be chosen again; viz. L. Titinius, P. Menenius, Cn. Genutius, and L. Atilius: who before they were declared, P. Licinius Calvus, by the permission of the Interrex, made this Speech to the Tribes: Romans! I see you have a desire to make the ensuing Year, at this Assembly, the omen of concord (which is a thing most advantageous to you at this time) by the remembrance you bear of our Magistracy: in that you chuse the same Collegues again, who are now grown better by experience. But you see me now not the same Person, but left like the shadow and name of P. Licinius. My strength is decayed; the sense of my eyes and ears grown dull; my memory fails me, and the vigour of my mind is enervated. See here, said he, (and took his Son by the hand) the Effigies and Image of him, whom you heretofore first made Tribune of the Soldiers out of the common People: this Boy, who has been educated by me, I give and dedicate to the Commonwealth as my Vicegerent; and I beseech you, Romans! that you would bestow that honour which you have freely offered me upon this Candidate, for the sake of those intreaties which I have added upon his account. Thereupon the Fathers Petition was granted, and his Son P. Licinius was declared Tribune of the Soldiers with Power Consular, along with those whom I mentioned before: Titinius and Genutius, two of the Tribunes Military, going against the Faliscans and the Capenates, whilst they carried on the War with greater Courage than Conduct, ran headlong into danger. Genutius suffering for his rashness by an honourable death, fell before the Ensigns in the Van. But Titinius, having retrieved his Men out of a consternation to the top of an high Hill, rallied again, but he did not engage the Foe in a convenient place. Yet he got more disgrace than he lost Men: though that had like to have occasioned a mighty Defeat; by reason that they were so terrified, not only at Rome, (where there were many several reports of it) but in the Camp at Veii too. For there the Soldiers were with great difficulty kept from running away, when a rumour had fled through all the Camp, that their Generals and their Army were slain, and that the Capenate and Faliscan had got the Victory; as also, that all the Youth of Etruria was not far from that place. But they fancied greater danger than this at Rome, viz. that the Camp at Veii was now attacked, and that part of the Enemies were coming in a dreadful Body toward the City. Wherefore they ran up upon the Walls, and the Matrons, whom the publick fear had forced from their Houses, made their supplications in the Temples; where they prayed to the Gods, That they would guard the Houses of the City, the Temples and the Walls of Rome from ruin and destruction; and would turn that dread upon Veii, if their Holy Rites had been rightly renewed, and Prodigies duly atoned.

XIX.

By this time the Games and Latin Holy-days were Celebrated: and now the Water was let out of the Albane Lake, and the destruction of Veii was at hand. Wherefore M. Furius Camillus, a fatal General, not only to ruin that City, but to preserve his Country, was declared Dictator, and made P. Cornelius Scipio his Master of the Horse. The changing of their General made a sudden alteration in all things; for now they had other hopes, other sentiments, and the fortune of their City seemed quite another thing. First of all he punished those who in that consternation had fled from Veii, according to the rules of War: and brought it so to pass, that the Soldiers should not fear their Enemy above any body. Then having appointed a day for the Levy, he himself in the mean time posted over to Veii to encourage the Soldiers there. And thence he returned to Rome to raise the new Army; nor did any one refuse to be Listed. Yea, the Foreign Youth of the Latins and Hernicans, promising their service, came to that War: whom when the Dictator had thanked in the Senate, and prepared all things necessary for the War, he vowed, by Order of the Senate, that he, when Veii was taken, would set forth the Grand Games: and would Dedicate the Temple of the Goddess Matuta, which was now repaired, and formerly Dedicated by King Servius Tullius. Going from the City with his Army, which raised Peoples expectation beyond their hopes, he engaged the Faliscans and the Capenates first near Nepete; where all things were carried with the greatest caution and Conduct, and fortune (as in such cases she usually does) attended on him. For he not only routed his Enemy in the Battel, but forced him out of his Camp too: where he got a vast Booty, the greatest part whereof was brought to the Questor, and not much of it given to the Soldiers. Thence the Army was led to Veii, and the Forts there made thicker: and the Soldiers were drawn from making farther approaches, (as they did many times very rashly between the Bullwark and the Wall) to work, by an Order, That no Man should fight unless he were commanded to it. Now the far greatest, and most toilsom work, was a Mine, which began to be made into the Enemies Castle. Which Work that it might not be interrupted, nor their continual labour under ground quite tire the same Persons, he divided the Workmen into six parts, and made each company work six hours at a time, as it came to their turns: so that they never left off, night nor day, till they had made a way into the Castle.

The Dictator seeing the Victory now in his hands; that so rich a City was taken, and that there would be more Booty than had been got in all the Wars before, (put them all together) he, lest he should gain any ill will from the Soldiers by the unequal division of the the spoils, or envy from the Senate by his prodigal largess, sent a Letter to the Senate, That through the blessing of the immortal Gods, his Conduct, and the Soldiers patience, Veii would now be in the hands of the Romans; [and desired to know] what they would have him do with the spoils? Now the Senate were of two opinions: one of which was that of P. Licinius, who, they say, being asked by his Son about this matter, first said; That the People thought fit to declare, that whosoever would share in that booty, should go into the Camp at Veii: and the other, the opinion of Ap. Claudius, who finding fault with a new, prodigal, unequal, and unadvised largess, said, If they look'd upon it as unlawful, that Money taken from an Enemy should be put into their Treasury, though now exhausted by so many Wars, he advised them at least to pay the Soldiers out of it, that the Commons might pay the less Taxes: for all Houses would feel the benefit of that gift alike. That by that means the greedy hands of idle Citizens who are so ready to seize on all they can get, would not rob stout Soldiers of their rewards; though it most commonly so falls out, that he who is most forward to venture upon toil and danger, is slowest in carrying off the booty. Licinius on the contrary said, That Money would be always suspected and hateful, and would give occasion for Appeals to the Commons, and thence for Seditions and new Laws. Wherefore it was better, that the People should be reconciled by that gift: that they, who had been exhausted and drained by the Taxes of so many years should be relieved; and should reap some benefit by the booty out of that War, in which they were almost grown old. That that would be more acceptable, and welcome to them, which every Man brought home with him after he had taken it from the Enemy, than if he received three times as much from the disposal of another Man. That the Dictator himself strove to avoid envy upon that score, and therefore left it to the Senate: and that the Senate also ought to leave the matter (though referred to them) to the People, and suffer them to have what the fortune of War has given each one of them. This seemed to be the safer opinion, to make the Senate popular. Wherefore it was ordered, that all who had a mind to share in the Veian spoils, should go into the Camp to the Dictator: upon which so vast a Multitude went, that they filled the Camp.

Then the Dictator having consulted the Soothsayers went forth, and when he had given his Soldiers orders to stand to their Arms, said thus, O Divine Apollo, 'tis under thy Conduct, and by the Inspiration of thy Deity, that I go to destroy the City Veii, and from henceforward I solemnly promise thee the Tib of the prey: And I beseech thee Juno, preserver of Veii, to follow us Conquerors into the City, which in a short time will be thine and ours; where thou maist have a Temple fit to receive thy Greatness. After this Prayer, he goes with a vast Company from all parts to the City, to lessen the sense and apprehension they had of danger from the Mine. The Men of Veii little thinking that they were now cheated by their own Diviners, and by Foreign Oracles, that some of the Gods were intreated to partake of their Prey, that others were invited out of their City to behold the Temples and new Seat of the Enemies, and that they were now breathing their last day; fearing nothing less than the undermining their Magazines, or taking their Tower, run up and down upon the Walls in their Armour, wondering that the Romans, who had not stirred (so much as a Man) from their stations in so many days time, should now, as if they were driven by some sudden Fury, run so unadvisedly to the Walls. And here 'tis reported, that as the Veietian King was sacrificing, the voice of the Soothsayer, that divided the Entrails of that sacrifice, and promised him Victory, was heard so plain in the Mine, that it moved the Roman Soldiers to open the Mine, and carry away the Entrails to the Dictator. But it is sufficient if such ancient stories as these, which are but probable, be received as true. These things are fitter to be admired, to maintain the ostentation of such a joyful Scene, than to be believed; neither will it be worth ones while either to affirm or deny them. Out of the Mine, that was then full of choice Soldiers, on a sudden there sprang Armed Men in the Temple of Juno, which was in the Veientan Tower, and some of them set upon the Enemies that ran away upon the Walls; others tear back the Bars, others fling fire into those Houses, from whence the Women and Servants threw Stones and Tiles. The noise of them, being scared with fear and dread, being made up of the several cries and complaints of Women and Children filled all places with horror and amazement. The Soldiers being presently dismounted the Walls, and the Gates open, the City is filled with Enemies, some of which climb the forsaken Walls, others ran in throngs up and down the Streets, so that there was nothing but fighting in all places. After much slaughter, the heat of the skirmish was over, and the Dictator commanded the Cryers to make Proclamation that they should no longer kill Women and Children: whereupon the shedding of blood ceased, and the unarmed Crew began to deliver up themselves. Then the Soldiers, by the permission of the Dictator betake themselves to pillaging the richness and abundance of which, when it was brought before him, did so far surpass his hopes and expectations, that with lift up hands to Heaven, (as 'tis said) he prayed, That if any Gods or Men thought the fortune of the Romans too great, they would mitigate their envy by laying some private affliction upon him, and not at all injure the publick concerns of the Roman People. As he thus prayed, 'tis reported that he fell down in turning himself, which Omen (as some conjecture) seemed to preface the Condemnation of Camillus himself to Banishment, and the destruction of Rome, which happened not many years after. Thus that day was spent in killing Enemies, and pillaging the riches of that wealthy City.

XXI.

XXII. The next day the Dictator sold the Freeman, and that was the only Money allotted for public use: at which the common People was much disturbed, in regard that Priests was not acknowledged to be received from their General who had referred the matter to the Senate, to find out the Authors of such a mischief; nor from the Senate, and the Father was the Author and giver of such popular Advice. When they had carried out all the Wealth that belonged to the Men, they began to remove that which was Consecrated to the Gods, but rather like Worshipers than Pillagers. For the choicest young Men in all the Army being appointed to carry Queen Juno to Rome, all in white, and with Bodies cleansed from all filthiness, entered the Temple with Veneration, and put their hands towards her with Reverence, it being customary among the Etrurians, that none but a Priest of some trusty Nation should handle that Image. And when one of them, either by Inspiration or by way of Jest, said, Wilt thou go to Rome, Juno? the rest cried out that she nodded to him, and 'twas afterwards said, that the voice of her, saying, That she would, was heard. I heard that she was removed from her Seat, and carried to Rome with so great ease, that she did as it were follow them, and there seated for ever on the Mount Aventine, where Camillus the Roman was required to pay his Vows, and where afterwards he Dedicated a Temple to her. This was the fall of Veii the richest City among the Etrurians, that shewed its greatness even to the last. For after the Siege of ten Years together, and giving more overthrows than they received, at last by the compulsion of Fate, they were Conquered more by Works and Stratagems than force.

XXIII. As soon as the news of Veii's being taken came to Rome, though the Prodigies were taken off, the Responses of their Wise Men and Oracles were known; though according to the best of Mens advice, they had declared M. Furius their Commander the greatest of Generals; yet because they had several brushes with them for so many Years together, and had many discomfitures, their Joy was beyond measure, being as it were unhopd for: and before an Order of the Senate could pass for it, the Temples were thronged with Roman Mothers giving thanks to the Gods: The Senate Decree that they should Sacrifice four days, more than ever was known in any War before. The coming of the Dictator also was Celebrated by all sorts of Men that ran out in great companies to meet him, beyond the examples of former times, and the honour of his Triumph somewhat exceeded their customary solemnities on such occasions. He himself sits in State in the view of all, coming into the City in his Chariot drawn with white Horses; (which seemed to be not only somewhat affected, but unkind also to those that had Triumphed before.) The Horses of Jupiter and the Sun carried the Dictator (now their equal) to sacrifice; upon which account chiefly the Triumph was not so pleasing as Honourable. Then he built a Temple on Mount Aventine to Queen Juno, dedicating it to her under the Title of Mature Maker. And when he had performed these Divine and Humane Offices he resigned his Dictatorship. Then the matter began to be debated about Apollo's Present. For though Camillus said that he vowed to him the Tith of the Pillage; yet the High-Priests might be of opinion that the People should be free from the Vow; so that they could not easily hit upon a way to make the People bring back the Pillage. At last they light upon that which was easiest, viz. That he that would free himself and Family from the Vow, should, when he had set a price upon his Prey, bring the value of the tenth part of it into the publick, that therewith, according to the condition of the Roman People, they might buy a present of Gold befitting the Deity of the God, and the greatness of his Temple. And truly this Collection alienated the minds of the Commonalty from Camillus. At which time Embassadors came from Volsci and Aequi requesting Peace, which was granted, more recruiting the wearied City after so long a War, than that the Petitioners deserved it.

XXIV. Upon subduing Veii there were six Tribunes or Colonels appointed over the Soldiers the following Year, viz. P. P. Cornelius, Cossus and Scipio, M. Val. Maximus, twice in the Office, Cæso Fab. Ambustus thrice, Lucius Furius Medullinus five times, and Quintius Servilius thrice. The War with Faliscæ fell to the Cornelius's, and Capena fell to the Lot of Valerius and Servilius, they did not set upon the Cities, but destroyed and pillaged the Fields, for that there was not so much left as a good Tree, or any good thing behind them. That damage brought in the People of Capena, and upon their request Peace was granted them. But their War still continued with the Falisci; mean while there was a great Sedition, and to appease it, they thought fit to enroll a Colony of 3000 Roman Citizens among the Volsci, and the Triumviri created for that purpose had three Acres of Ground and three Septunces a Man divided among them. But that Largess began to be despised, in regard they thought 'twas given them to divert their minds from greater hopes. For why should the Commons be translated among the Volsci, when the Vientan Fields were in view, much larger and fruitfuller than those about Rome? The City also was esteemed better then as to its situation, or the Magnificence of publick or private Buildings and Places. But they had thoughts of going to Veii most of them (especially when Rome was taken by the Gauls) designing it to be inhabited partly by the Commons and partly by the Senate, it being not impossible that two Cities should be in common to the Romans, which the Nobles were so much against, that they said they would sooner die in the fight of the Roman People, than any such Bill should be proposed to the Senate: For if there were so much Dissention in one City, what would there be in two? Was it not fit to prefer the Conquered Country before that which Conquered quered it, or to let the condition of the Captives be better now than when they were at Liberty? lastly, that they would never be brought to relinquish their Country and Citizens, to leave their God Romulus, the Son of a God, the Parent and Builder of Rome, and T. Sicinius (the framer of that Bill) to Veii.

XXV. While they were warmly Debating their matter (the Senators having drawn some of the Tribunes of the Commons on their side) nothing kept the common People so much from striking, as the Senators offering themselves in the midst of the Brawls, and commanding the People to assault, strike, and kill them. Whereupon the Commons kept in their hands from violating Men of that Age, Dignity and Honour, and modesty set a stop to any such attempts. Camillus also made a Preachment every where, That 'twas no wonder the City should be in an uproar, when they were more careful in worldly concerns, than paying their Vows, saying nothing of the Collation, which was rather Wages than Tythes, when the People were free from that Vow, to which every particular Man obliged himself. But for his part his conscience would not let him be silent in it, especially because only the tenth part of their moveable Pillage was designed, there being no mention made of the City and Fields, which were also within the compass of the Vow. The Senate finding some difficulty in the matter, sent it to the High-Priest, and, Camillus being convened, 'twas the Judgment of the College, that the tenth part of whatever was Veientan before his Vow, and the Romans after, was sacred to Apollo: so that the City and Fields estimated, Money taken out of the Treasury, and Charge given to the Military Tribunes of the Consular Dignity to buy Gold with it; and there being not enough, the Matrons came together in Council, and by a common Decree obliged themselves, and brought their Gold and Ornament to the Treasury, to be disposed of by the Military Tribunes, which thing pleased the Senate exceedingly, and 'tis reported they had the Honour of riding in Litters to the Temples and publick Shews, in Chariots upon Festivals and Working days, conferred upon them for that their Munification. The Gold being received from every one of them, and valued, they thought fit to buy a Golden Cap to be carried to Delphos, and presented to Apollo. As soon as they were free from the Vow, the Tribunes of the Commons blow up Sedition anew: The Multitude rise up against the Nobility, especially Camillus. Those that were absent cry out that by Collations and Vows they have brought the Veientan Prey to nothing; those that were present are now modest, because the Senators offered themselves voluntarily to their anger: and when they saw the matter almost at an end for that Year, they make the same Tribunes Legislators for the other, and the Senate endeavoured to make the same Intercessors (who were to give a Negative Voice) for that the same Tribunes were for the most part made again.

XXVI. At the Assembly for chusing Military Tribunes the Senators made it plain that M. Furius Camillus ought to be created one; by reason of the Wars in hand, they made as though 'twas better to make a General, but there was a stop like to be set to the passing that Bill for the Tribunes. However with Camillus, L. Furius Medullinus being in that Office six times, C. Æmilius, L. Valerius Poplicola, J. Postumius, P. Cornelius twice in that Office, were created Tribunes, all Men of Consular Power. The Tribunes of the Commons did not stir the beginning of the Year; till M. F. Camillus was gone against Falisci, against whom his Commission was directed; and even then by delays the matter cooled, and Camillus whom they were most afraid of, became glorious at Faliscæ. For first the Enemies kept themselves within their Walls, thinking that the safest course, but when they saw their Fields wasted, and their Villages burned, they come out of the City about a Mile (being afraid to adventure farther) and then they pitch their Camp, relying upon nothing more than the baseness of the way to them, and the roughness and cragginess of those high Rocks and Mountains that were about them. But Camillus getting a Captive for his Guide, and removing his Camp late at night, till break of day shews himself upon the Hills. The Romans made their Fences three manner of ways, the other Army stood ready for Battel, and as they endeavoured to hinder their Fortifications, Camillus routs them and puts them to flight. Whereupon the Falisci were so greatly afraid, that breaking out of their Camp, which was pretty nigh, they ran as fast as they could to the City. Many were killed and wounded before they could get within the Gates. The Camp is taken, and the Prey brought to the Treasurers, not without great grumbling among the Soldiers, but being forced to submit to the severity of the Command, they did as well admire as dislike the Power that commanded it. Then they besieged the City, and thereupon the Soldiers and Townsmen would fall out against the Roman Stations, and raise little skirmishes, spending the time without much hope on either side. For the besieged had more plenty of Corn and other Provisions (before laid in) than the besiegers, and truly the Siege in all probability had been as long and laborious as that of Veii, had not fortune put the Roman General in remembrance of his Valour and Experience in Warlike affairs, and so given him a seasonable Victory.

'Twas customary among the Falerians, that their Childrens Schoolmasters should be their Companion too; and many Boys (which custom continues still in Greece) were committed to the care of one Master, and he that appeared to be the greatest Scholar, was made choice of to instruct the Nobility. Now the Schoolmaster of this Town being used in the times of Peace to lead his Lads out to play, he left not this custom in the time of War, but one

one day he drew them a little way, another day somewhat farther from the Gate. At last by variety of Play and Discourse he drill'd them on farther than ever, and having opportunity, he goes with them among the Roman Guards: from thence to the Camp, afterwards he leads them even to Camillus's Pavilion, and there he makes a Speech more horrid than the baseness of the Fact. That he had (forsooth) delivered the Falerians into the hands of the Romans, in giving those Children into their Power, whose Parents were in all things the Heads and Governours of the Place. Which when Camillus heard, Thou art come, O base fellow, with thy abominable Present to a People and General not like thy self: We never had any Alliance with the Falerians by Human League or Treaty; but what nature has implanted in us, does and shall continue between both. There are Laws in War as well as Peace, which we know how to execute with Justice as well as Courage. We draw not our Swords against that Age, which we spare even upon our taking Cities, but against our Soldiers and those very Men who without any provocation or injury offered them, opposed the Roman Camp at Veii: Thou as much as lay in thy Power hast conquered them by a new sort of wickedness; but as for my part, I will conquer by the Roman Arts and Stratagems, by Arms and Valour. After this, when he strip'd him, he tied his hands behind him, he delivered him to his Boyes to bring him back to the Falerians, and gave them Rods to lash the Traytor into the Town; whereupon the People ran out wondering at such a strange sight, and the Magistrates were assembled upon this unheard of occasion, their minds being so suddenly changed, that whereas they were before for being utterly destroyed, rather yielding themselves up upon terms of Peace; the whole City were now for desiring Peace, and publicly Celebrating the Roman Fidelity, and the Justice of their General in the Court and Forum. And by the Counsel of all, they sent Embassadors to Camillus into the Camp, and by his permission to the Senate at Rome, to tell them, that the Falerians freely yielded up themselves: when they were admitted to the Senate, 'tis reported they said thus. We, O Senators, being conquered by such a Victory, which neither Gods nor Men can envy, do here give up our selves to you, being persuaded we shall live better under your Government (than which there is nothing in the World more honourable) than our own Laws. The event of this War has produced two examples beneficial to Mankind: you prefer Fidelity in War before present Victory, and we being thereupon encouraged have yielded up our selves. Send men to take our Arms, our Pledges, our Cities, the Gates being open to receive them, neither shall you ever repent of your Fidelity, or we of being under your Government! The Enemies as well as the Citizens gave thanks to Camillus. The Falerians were commanded to pay the Soldiers for that Year, to ease the Roman People. Peace was granted, and the Army brought back to Rome.

XXVIII. When Camillus being thus signalized for his Justice and Fidelity returned, he went through the City with far greater praise, than when he was a little before drawn through it with white Horses in Triumph, and the Senate to free him from his Vow did with all speed send a Golden Cup as a present to Apollo at Delphos. The Messengers were L. Valerius, L. Sergius, and A. Manlius, who being sent in a Galley not far from the Sicilian Sea, were taken by the Lyparensian Pyrates and carried to Lypara. In which City they used to divide the Prey as in a common warfare. The chief Magistrate in that City for that Year, was by chance one Tamasibens, a Man more like the Romans than his own People, who himself bearing some Reverence to the name of the Messengers, their Present, the reason of sending it, and the God to whom it was sent; satisfied the Multitude, that are always for bearing sway, of the Justice and Religion of it: and after a publick Treat made them, he Guarded them with a Fleet to Delphos, and brought them back safe to Rome. And there by an Order of the Senate he is entertained, and Presents are given in publick. The same Year they had Wars with Aequi, but so various and uncertain, that neither the Armies themselves nor the Romans could well tell whether they were the Conquering or Conquered Party. C. Emilius and Spurius Posthumus Military Tribunes were the Roman Generals. They first joyned their Forces together, and when they had routed the Enemy, Emilius was pleased to go with a Guard to Verrugo, and Posthumus to destroy the bordering Places; and as he was marching on somewhat carelessly by reason of his success, with a disordered Army, the Aequi set upon him, and put his Soldiers into such a fright that they were driven among the next Hills, nay, their fear carried them to Verrugo where the other Guards were: Posthumus when he had received all in safety, calls them in together and chides them for their fear and cowardise, telling them that they were discomfited by a Lazy and Cowardly Enemy; the whole Army made answer, that they deserved to be told of it, and they that did, confessed they had committed a great fault, but they would mend it: neither should the Enemies joy continue long, desiring him to lead them to the Enemies Camp (which was in sight upon the Plain) immediately, refusing no punishment, no not the Conquering it even before night; whereupon he commended them, bidding them refresh themselves and be ready at the fourth Watch: And the Enemies being there about to hinder the Romans that were among the Hills from flying by night to Verrugo, they met them, and the Moon shining all night, they joyned Battel before day, and fought as well as if it had been by day: but the noise of this being carried to Verrugo, they thought the Roman Camp had been set upon, and were so much afraid, that notwithstanding all the endeavours and entreaties of Emilius they were disperfed disperfed and fled to Tusculum; from thence a report fled to Rome, that Postumius and his Army were slain, who when day had removed all fear of dangers that might proceed from those that followed in abundance upon them, and when he had rid through the Army repeating his promises, inspired them with so great courage that the Aequi were not able to sustain the first brunt. Hence it came to pass, that the slaughter of those that fled away, being such as proceeded more from Anger than Valour, was to the destruction of the Enemy, and a Laureate Letter sent by Postumius followed the sad news from Tusculum (a City frighted for nothing) and gave them to understand that the Victory was the Romans, and that the Army of the Aequi were utterly routed.

The Proceedings of the Tribunes for the Commons finding yet no end, the Commons endeavoured to continue the Tribuneship to the Legislators, and the Senate to make new Intercessors (to have a negative Voice when Bills were proposed) but the Commons were too hard for them. Which grievance the Senate redressed by making an Order that Consuls (a sort of Magistracy never liked by the Commons) should be created. After 15 years Cessation, L. Lucretius Flavius, and Servilius Sulp. Camerinus, were made Consuls. At the beginning of the Year, the Tribunes of the Commons, because none of their Society was about to withstand them joyning briskly their forces to carry on a Law, and the Consuls as briskly resisting them, the whole City being quite taken up about that one affair the Aequi beat the Vitellian Colony of Romans out of their Territories, and the greatest part of them, in regard the Town was treacherously taken by night, safely fled through the back parts of the City and got to Rome. The management of which affair fell to L. Lucretius Consul, who went with an Army and overcame the Enemy in Battel, returning Conqueror to Rome to a Contention somewhat greater, the day was set for A. Virginus and Q. Pomponius Tribunes of the Commons for the two last Years, whom the whole Senate was obliged to defend, neither could any Man accuse them of any other crime either in their lives or Magistracy than that, to gratifie the Fathers they withstood the Bill for continuing Tribunes: but the fierceness of the Commons balked the favour intended them by the Senate; so that the innocent Men were fined in 10000 l. of Mony payable by weight, a bad example sure! which the Fathers resented ill. Camillus accused them publicly of their wickedness, telling them, That by setting themselves against their own Officers they did not consider that by wicked Judgment they took away from the Tribunes the priviledg of their negative Voices, and by taking away that, they destroyed their Power. And whereas they thought the Senators would order that rudeness and licentiousness which the Tribunes took, they were mistaken. If Tribunes force could not be repelled by the assistance of Tribunes, the Senate would find out another way (telling them of Consuls) and no longer suffer those Tribunes who stood up for their authority, to mis of the favour of the publick, and hold their peace.

Thus he every day made Speeches publicly, whereby he increased their anger; neither did leave off stirring up the Senate against that Law, telling them, That they should not come into the Forum, when the day came for making the Law upon any other terms, than as Men keeping in memory that they ought to fight for their Religion, the Temples of their Gods, and the Land of their Nativity. As for his own private concerns, if 'twere fit to have respect to his own glory amidst those scuffles of his Country, 'twas Honour enough to him that frequent mention was made of the City which he had took; that he took pleasure every day in that monument of his Glory, and that he had always before his eyes that City for which he triumphed, that all People trod in the footsteps of his praises. But he accounted it a wicked thing to inhabit a City forsaken by its Gods, or that the Romans should live in a place which they had taken, or exchange the Conquering Country for that which was Conquered. The Fathers, the Nobles, old Men and young being hereby stirred up and encouraged, throng into the Forum, when the Law was made, and being divided into their respective Tribes, each particular Tribe caught hold on one another, begging with tears in their eyes, that they would not forsake that Country for which themselves and their Progenitors had fought with great Courage and Success, bragging of their Capitol, Vesta's Temple, and other Temples of the Gods built all about them, that they would not banish the Roman People from the Land of their Nativity, and Household Gods, into an Enemies City, and bring the matter to that pass, that it had been better we had never taken Veii, than that we should forsake Rome. Since they did not act by force, but by intreaties, and frequent mentioning their Gods, the greatest part of them thinking themselves obliged to it by Religion, unanimously abrogated the Law they had before made: And this Victory was so grateful to the Fathers, that the day after an Order of Senate was made and reported by the Consuls that the Commons should have seven Acres a Man of the Veientan grounds divided among them, neither should this division belong only to the Fathers of the Family, but every free Person therein, not excluding their Children from such hopes.

When the Commons were appeased with this gift, no man withstood the chusing of Consuls, so that L. Val. Potitus, M. Manlius, afterwards called Capitolinus, were made Consuls. These Men ordered great Shews, which M. Furius, Dictator, vowed in the Veientan War. The same Year a Temple is Dedicated to Queen Juno, vowed by the same Dictator in the same War; and 'tis reported that the Dedication was Celebrated by the great care of Matrons. There was then a War at Algidum with the Aequi, but not very considerable, in regard the Enemy Enemy was almost routed before they joyned Battel. The Senate Decree a Triumph to Valerius, because he killed and pursued the Enemies farther than Manlius, who entered the City with Ovation, or the lesser Triumph. The same Year there arose a War with the Volturnians; but by reason of a Famine and Plague at Rome, which proceeded from too much dryness and heat, an Army could not be led thither. Whereupon the Volturnians having procured the Assistance of the Inhabitants of Salpinum, were puffed up that they made an inroad upon the Roman Territories. Then War was Proclaimed against them both, C. Julius the Censor died, into whose Place was chosen M. Cornelius, which proving ominous, because that Lustrum Rome was taken, there was never afterwards any Censor chosen into a dead place, and when their Consuls were very sick, they had an Interregnum, daily making use of their Soothsayers; and when the Consuls by an Order of Senate had resigned their Office, M. Furius Camillus is made Interrex, who chose P. Corn. Scipio Interrex, and he L. Val. Potitus, who created six Military Tribunes, Men of Consular Power, that the Commonwealth might not be at a loss for Magistrates, if any of them should fall sick.

XXXII. On the Calends of July, L. Lucretius, S. Sulpitius, M. Aemilius, L. Furius Medullinus the seventh time in that Office, Agrippa Furius, C. Aemilius the second time. Of these the management of the War with the Volturnians fell to L. Lucretius and C. Aemilius; and the care of the Salpinatian War fell to Agrippa Furius and S. Sulpitius. They first engaged with the Volturnians; the War was not sharp, though famous for the number of Enemies: the Army fled at the first onset, and 8000 of their armed Men being stop'd by the Horsemen, laid down their Arms, and delivered up themselves. The fame of this War hindered the Salpinatians from joyning Battel; they therefore mounted the Walls, and there stood upon their defence. The Romans every where pillaged the Volturnian and Salpinatian Country, no Man withstanding them: until the Volturnians being tired out with the War obtained a Truce for twenty Years, upon condition they would make restitution to the Romans, and pay their Army for that Year. The same Year M. Cædicius, one of the Commons, told the Tribunes, that about mid-night, in the way where there is now a Chappel, he heard a Voice over the Temple of Vesta, somewhat louder than a Mans, which commanded him to tell the Magistrates that the Galls were coming. The mean condition of the Author (as it commonly happens) made this thing not much regarded, the Nation also being a good distance from them, and therefore the more unknown to them. Neither when the hand of Fate was thus upon them, did they only despise the warnings of the Gods, but human assistance also, which was present with them, in removing M. Furius from the City: who, upon a day appointed by L. Apuleius, a Tribune of the Commons, concerning the Veientan Prey, those of his own Tribe also, and his Clients, who were no small part of the Commons, being summoned to the House (at that time also having lost his Son) ask'd them concerning the business, and their answer was, that they would give him as much as the Fine was, but they could not acquit him of it. Whereupon he is forced into Banishment, beseeching the immortal Gods that if he were innocent, they would, the first opportunity, let the ungrateful City know the want of him. In his absence he is fined fifteen thousand pound of Money to be paid by weight.

XXXIII. Thus he is Banish'd, who, had he staid, (if human assistance can afford any certainty) had kept Rome from being taken. When the fatal destruction of the City approach'd, Ambassadors came from Clusium desiring help against the Galls. 'Tis reported, that that Nation being much taken with the sweetness of their Fruit, especially the strange deliciousness of their Wine, passed the Alps, got possession of the Fields before Tilled by the Etrurians, and carried over into Gallia some Wine to entice their Nation thither. Some say that Aruns of Clusium, whose Wife was vitiated by Lacuman his Pupil, a stout young Man, and not punishable but by Foreign aid, led them over the Alps, and was the Ringleader at the siege of Clusium; but 'tis clear enough, that those that assaulted Clusium were not the Galls that first passed the Alps. For the Galls got over into Italy two hundred years before the siege at Clusium, or taking Rome: neither was their first encounter with the Etrurians, but long before they often fought with those that live between the Apennine and the Alps. The wealth of the Tuscans being an open encouragement to them both by Land and Sea, long before the Roman Empire, even the upper and lower Sea, wherewith Italy is encompassed like an Island: and the names of those Seas are an argument for it; for the Italians call the one the Tuscan Sea after the common name of the Nation, and the other the Adriatick Sea, from Adria a Colony of the Tuscans. These Men extending their Territories to both Seas, inhabited 12 Cities first on this side the Apennine towards the lower Sea, and forwards on the other side having sent as many Colonies as were requisite to impeople the Country. And these had all places beyond the River Padus to the Alps in their Possession, except that corner of the Venetians who inhabit a Bay of the Sea. And without question they were the original of the Alpin Nations, especially the Rætians: whom the very places having made so barbarous, that they retain nothing of their ancient Language besides the sound of it, and that too not without corruption.

XXXIV. Concerning the Galls passage into Italy I have been thus informed. In the Reign of Tarquinius Priscus, the sole management of Celtæ, which is one third of Gallia, did belong to the Biturigians, Biturigians, who gave them a King, this King was Ambigatus, a Man virtuous and rich in himself and his People. For that part of Gallia under his Command did so abound with Men and Plenty, that he had enough to do to govern them. Being therefore honourably born, and desiring to rid his Kingdom of some of the Multitude, he declares that he will send Bellovesus and Sigovesus, his Sisters Sons, two smart young Men, into whatever seats the Gods by Auguries would allot them; and that they should raise as many Men as they pleased, that no Nation might be able to repel them. The Hercinian Forrests fell to Sigovesus's share; and the Gods gave Bellovesus a far pleasanter Journey into Italy. Who, because he was over-stock'd with People, when he had raised the Biturigians, the Arvernians, the Senonians, the Meduans, the Ambarruans, the Carnutians, and the Aulercians, he went with great Forces of Horse and Foot against the Tricastinians. Then the Alps were between them and Italy, which seemed insuperable, and truly I do not wonder at it, since there was no way (as 'tis still, unless we'll believe the Stories about Hercules.) Then when the Gauls were as it were hedged in by the height of the Mountains, and they look'd about to see which way they might pass into another Country over tops as high as Heaven, they had some scruple upon them, because they heard that some strangers, seeking some places of abode, were opposed by the Salian Nation; these were the Marslians going in Ships from Phocia. The Gauls supposing this to be the Omen of their fortune, resolved to fortify with Woods whatever place they came first to. They pass over the pathless Alps to that Taurinian Forrest; and when they had routed the Tuscans, and heard that the Plot of ground, where they then were, being not far from the River Ficinus, was called the Insubrian Ground, after the name of the Insubrians, they followed the Omen of the place, and built a City called Mediolanum.

Afterwards another company of the Cænomani followed the steps of the former, under the Conduct of Elitovius through the same Forrest, by the favour of Bellovesus, and fate down, when they had passed the Alps, at Brixia and Verona, which places were possessed by the Libuans. After these came in the Salluvians, and made their abode near the ancient Nations of the Lævians and Ligurians. Afterwards when all places were taken up between Po and the Alps, the Lingonians came in, and Boating over the River Po, they drive not only the Etrurians, but the Umbrians also out of their Territories, keeping themselves within the Apennine. Then fresh Senonians came in, and enlarged their Borders from the River Urente to Æsis, and from thence I find they came to Clusium and Voma; but 'tis uncertain whether they did this of themselves, or by the assistance of all the Gauls on this side the Alps. The Inhabitants of Clusium being frighted at the sight of their numbers, their monstrous bigness, and their unusual Weapons; and at the news of their Conquering all places on this side the Po, and farther, and routing the Etrurian Legions, sent Ambassadors to Rome, desiring aid of the Senate, though they had no alliance or acquaintance with them, unless it was, that they did not defend the Men of Veii, their Kindred, against the Roman People. No aid was granted, but the three Sons of M. Fabius Ambustus were sent Ambassadors to treat with the Gauls in the name of the Senate and Roman People, telling them, that they ought not to oppose the Allies and Friends of the Romans from whom they had received no injury; and that if there were necessity, they should be assisted by them; but 'twere better, if possible, to forbear fighting, and that the Gauls, a new Nation, should be known to them rather by Peace than War.

A mild Embassie, had it not been carried by Ambassadors more like Gauls than Romans. XXXVI. Who after they had delivered their Message in the Council of the Gauls, received this Answer, That though the Roman Name was new to them, yet they believed them to be valiant, because the Men of Clusium implored their aid in their trembling condition. And because they offered in their Embassie rather to stand up for them than their Allies, they did not disregard their Overtures of Peace, if so be the Men of Clusium would give them part of their Borders, which the Gauls stood in need of, otherwise no Peace was to be granted. In which particular they would receive an answer in the presence of the Romans, and if Grounds were denied them, they would fight in the presence of the same Romans, that they might tell at home how much the Gauls excelled other Men in Valour. What sort of Right was this, either to require the Possessors Lands or threaten them? And when the Romans asked, what the Gauls had to do in Etruria? they fiercely answered, that they carried their Right in their Arms, and that Valiant Men had a Title to all things; whereupon both sides were exasperated, and to Battel they went. At that time, the Fates being displeased with the Roman City, the Ambassadors take up Arms against the Law of Nations; neither could it be privately done, since the Noblest and Valiantest of the Roman Youth fought before the Etrurian Colours. The Valour also of the Foreigners was as conspicuous. But at last Q. Fabius prancing on Horseback on the outside of the Army, thrust the General of the Gauls through the side with a Javelin, as he was briskly making up to the Etrurian Colours, and killed him; but as he was dispoiling him, he was discovered by the Gauls, who gave the word through the whole Army that it was the Roman Ambassador, whereupon their anger abating towards the Clusians, they found a retreat, and threaten the Romans. Some were for going presently to Rome, but the Seniors ordered Ambassadors to be sent first to complain of their injuries, and to require the delivery up of the Fabii according according to the Law of Nations by them violated. When the Embassadors from the Gauls had delivered their Message, the Senate were not well pleased with what the Fabii had done; the Barbarians seemed to require that they might have Right done them; but their ambition hindered them from Decreeing Justice (which would have made up the matter) upon such Noble Men. Therefore that the blame might not be upon themselves, they acquaint the People with the misfortune the Gauls had received, and with their demands, throwing the business upon them. But the Fabii were more in favour with them for what they had done, and they who should have been punished were created Military Tribunes of Consular Power for the ensuing Year. Whereupon the Gauls being angry, as they had reason, threatened open War, and returned. Q. Sulp. Longus, Q. Servilius four times in that Office, and Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis were with the three Fabii created Military Tribunes.

XXXVII. Upon the approach of so great a calamity (so much does Fortune blind Mens minds, when she is unwilling they should withstand her Power) that City which had made use of all helps against the Fidenates and Veientians and other neighbouring People, and had oftentimes made Dictators, had at this time no extraordinary Assistance or Commander, though they were challenged by an unusual and unheard of Enemy, that came from the Ocean, and the farthest Coast of Gallia. The Tribunes by whose rashness the War was hastened, had the sole management of all things, neither were they more careful in their preparations, than they were before in common Wars still making as though 'twas nothing. In the mean time when the Gauls had understood that the violators of human Right were advanced to high places; and their Embassie disregarded, being accordingly enraged (as that Nation is very passionate) they presently flourish their Colours, and set themselves upon a March. And when the Cities as they passed by, were afraid of their noise and tumult, and began to stand upon their defence, the Country fellows in the mean time betaking themselves to their Heels, they told them with a loud voice that they were going to Rome; taking up as they went a vast deal of ground with their Men and Horses. But the speed of the Enemy made them terribly afraid at Rome, especially when Fame was the Harbinger, and Messengers were sent from Clusum, and many other places, to give them notice of their coming. For they met with an Army led in haste and confusion, but about eleven Miles out of the City, where the River Allia that rises out of the Crustumian Mountains, runs not much below the way into the River Tiber. Now the Enemy was before them, and every where about them; a Nation given to tumult and hubbub, that filled all places with extravagant singing and balling, with horrid shouts and clamours.

XXXVIII. There the Military Tribunes put their Army in Order without ever making choice of a place before-hand for their Camp, or fortifying it with a Trench, or consulting either Gods or Men by Augury or Sacrifice; and divided into Wings that it might not be surrounded by the number of Enemies, but could not make the Vaunt Guards even, though they drew their Men so far asunder, that the middle of their Army was infirm and thin. There was a little way from them on the right hand a pretty high place which they stocked with Subsidaries, which as it was the occasion of their fear and running away, so 'twas their only refuge when they fled. For Brennus the Commander of the Gauls fearing some trick in the small number of Enemies, and supposing that they chose that high place for no other reason, but that they might set upon the Gauls overthwart them, and flying off from them, Marches up to the Subsidaries; not at all questioning, if he could displace them, to conquer the rest easily in the open plain. Thus not only Fortune, but Reason also was on the Barbarians side. In the other Army neither the Officers nor Soldiers did behave themselves like Romans. Trembling and flying was in their minds; and the men so much forgot themselves, that more of them fled to Vii, their Enemies City, from which Tiber kept them, than the straight way to Rome to their Wives and Children. This place is not very well defended by the Subsidaries. In the other part of their Army, they that were farthest off hear shouting behind them, and they that were nearest hear it close by them, and every Man of them ran before they were touched; nay, almost before they had seen the Enemy, not only without striking a blow, but without returning so much as a shout, so that there was no blood spilt among them that fought. As they strove to run away, the backs of those that hindered their flight, in the throng were bruised. About the banks of Tiber whither all the left Wing fled throwing away their Arms, there was a great slaughter, and many that were not skilled in swimming, or were weak, being tired with their Helmets and other Armour, were swallowed up in Whirlpools. But the greatest part of them got safe to Vii, from whence they did not only send no Garrison, but not so much as the news of this Discomfiture to Rome. As for the right Wing that were not next to the River, but more under the Hill, they every Man of them got to Rome, and fled into the Tower, not so much as shutting the Gates of the City after them.

XXXIX. The Gauls being as it were amazed at such a miraculous and sudden Victory, stood at first like Men frightened, and ignorant at what had happened, afterwards they began to suspect that there were some in Ambush, and after that to strip off the spoil from the slain, and according to their custom to pile up their Armour. But last of all, when they saw nothing like an Enemy, they set themselves upon the March, and got to Rome a little before Sun-set. Now when the Horsemen

Horsemen that were sent before brought them word back that the Gates were not shut, neither was there any Guard or Watch before them, they were as much taken up with wonder as before; and fearing they should be benighted, and being not at all acquainted with the situation of the City, they sat down between Rome and Anien, not without sending their spies about the Walls and Gates to hear what the Enemy intended in such desperate circumstances. The Romans not thinking that any of the Army were alive but those that fled back to Rome, whereas more of them got to Vii than Rome, set themselves a bewailing the sad condition of those that were alive, as well as dead, and so filled the whole City with Lamentations. Then the fear of the publick stifled their private griefs, as soon as ever they heard that the Enemies were present. A little after, their ears were filled with howling and confused singing which came from the Barbarians that scampered about the Walls in Companies. From which time they were so much in suspense till the next day, that they expected they would enter the City with violence at their first coming to it: concluding, that they would have staid at Allia, had not this been their intention. Afterwards about Sun-set they supposed they would enter, in regard they had but little day-light to do their business in. Then again they were of opinion, that they deferred their resolutions till night, that their coming might be more dreadful. Last of all when they came not then, they thought 'twas deferred till the next day that they might search all places more narrowly. Thus their calamity was mingled with perpetual fear, which was much augmented, when they saw their Enemies Colours advance to the Gates of the City. However the City was not that whole night, nor the day following, in such a consternation as they were in when they fled from Allia. For when they had no hopes of defending the City with so small a company as was left, they thought fit that the Youth of the Town, with their Wives and Children, and also that the strongest of the Senators should betake themselves into the Tower and Capitol, and having got Arms and Provision there to preserve their Flamen, those of the Vestal Priest-hood, and whatever was sacred, from fire and common ruin, and not to leave off worshipping them, as long as there were Men alive to Worship. If the Tower and Capitol, those receptacles of their Gods, if the Senate, the Head of their publick Council, if their Military Youth did but survive the imminent ruin of their City, they thought the loss of their old Men, and the Mob that was left behind them to perish in the City, not very considerable. And that the Multitude might take it more patiently at the hands of the Commons, the old Men of Triumphal and Consular Dignity declared openly they would die with them, and not be a burthen to the small Company that were fit to bear Arms, with those Bodies which were not able to bear Arms or defend their Country.

XL. Thus the Seniors, though appointed to die, comforted one another, then they encouraged the company of young Men, following them even to the Capitol and Tower, and commending to their Youth and Valour the remaining Fortune of that City that had conquered in all Wars for 360 Years together. The sad departure of those, who were their only hopes and help from those who were resolved not to out-live the destruction of the City, the howlings and cries of Women, running after sometimes one and sometimes another, and asking their Husbands and Children, What death they would die? The cloudy face and dismal appearance of all things, were without all question the highest aggravation of calamity that can befall humane nature. Yet a great many of them followed their Mistresses into the Tower, being not invited thereunto, nor forbidden by any; because 'twas not manly to have Women with them, though they were useful to their Children in the Siege. Another Company of the Commons, whom so small a Hill could not hold, nor feed in such a scarcity of Provision, break, as it were, in Army out of the City, and go to Janiculum. From thence they are scattered, some of them over the Fields, others go to the neighbouring Cities, without any Conduct or Advice, every Man following his own Counsel, and comforting himself with his own hope, at the same time that they bewailed the Publick. In the mean time the Flamen Quirinalis (or Romulus's Priest) and the Vestal Virgins taking no care of their own concerns, consult what Gods they should carry with them, and what (because they were not able to carry off all) they should leave behind, and which was the safest place to put them in; and at last think it the best way to dig a hole in the Chapel, next to the Flamen's House, where they thought it a sin to spit, and they lay them up in Vessels. The rest they divided among them, and carry over the great Timber-bridg that leads to Janiculum. And when Q. Albinus one of the Roman Commons, who was carrying his Wife and Children, and the rest of their unwarlike gang in a Cart out of the City, saw them upon the Hill; he made a difference between Divine and Humane things, supposing it a piece of irreligion, to let Priests and Vestal Virgins, Persons of publick Office, his Wife and Children to come down, whilst he and his were carried in a Cart: he therefore ordered they determined to go.

XLI. In the mean time all things being as well settled at Rome as their circumstances would permit for the defence of the Tower, the old Men return into their Houses, and being fully resolved to die, they wait for the coming of their Enemies. Those Magistrates among them, that that had been carried in their Chairs of State to the Senate-house, that they might die attended with all the Ensigns of their former Fortune, Honour, or Valour; put on their August Robes, wherein they had either triumphed, or devoutly waited upon the Chariots that carried Images, and in the middle of their Houses sate in their Ivory Chairs. There are some that report, that repeating their Vow, which M. Fabius the Pontifex recited to them, they Devoted and gave up themselves for their Country and the Roman Citizens. The Gauls, in regard they had now enjoyed a whole nights respite from fighting, and indeed because they were never engaged in any doubtful Battel, neither did they at that time take the City by force and violence; entered with minds not discomposed with heat or anger at the Colinus Gate, the day after; and when they came into the Forum, they cast their eyes upon the Temples of the Gods and the Tower, which was the only Specimen of War: then leaving a small Garrison, left any out of the Tower or Capitol, should assault them when they were dispersed, they betake themselves to Plunder, not meeting so much as a Man in the streets, some of them rush in throngs into the Houses next them; others into those farthest off, concluding them yet unpillaged, and consequently stuffed with Prey; but when they saw no body, they were frightened thence, upon supposition the Enemy would by some trick set upon them as they were scattered; and so they returned in Companies to the Forum and places near the Forum. And there seeing the Commons Houses locked, and the Palaces of the Nobility open, they lingered more in entering the open Houses than the shut. But when they beheld them sitting in such State and Habits, far beyond any thing that is Humane, when they beheld the Majesty and Gravity they carried in their looks, they approach them with such reverence as if they had been Gods. And when they had for a time stood by them, as if they had been so many Images, 'tis reported, that one of the Gauls stroaked down M. Papyrius his Beard (which they then wore very long) and thereupon the old Man shook his Ivory staff at him. Then began the slaughter. The rest were murdered in their Chairs. When they had killed the Nobles, they gave no Quarter to any, but killed and plundered their Houses, and then set them on fire.

XLII. But the first day they did not burn much of the City; because perhaps all of them had not a mind to it, or because the chief of the Gauls thought it best only to burn some few Houses, thereby to terrifie those that had shut themselves up to yield freely, and to engage them upon hopes of enjoying what was left. When the Romans from the Tower saw the whole City full of Enemies, and running up and down every Street; when they saw fresh murders in one place or other continually, they were not only almost distracted in their minds, but they were also not able to fix either their ears or eyes upon any one Object: for the shouts of the Enemies, the lamentations of Women and Children, the crackling of the fire, and the noise of Houses falling every-where, did turn away their trembling minds, their eyes and faces from what before they reflected on. Thus they were placed by fortune to behold the fall of their Country, having nothing left them to defend but their own bodies; labouring under a far greater misery than ever any besieged Persons did; because they saw all they had in the hands of the Enemy. Neither did a quieter night succeed that fatal day; but even the night and the day after, and every minute, they beheld fresh spectacles of Rapine and Murder. Yet notwithstanding they were thus laden and overwhelmed with calamities, did their courage sink; but though they saw all places levelled by flames and ruins, they were resolved to defend their liberty to the last and the little Hill which was all that was left to them: For now the like mischiefs happening every day, they were accustomed to miseries, and laying by all thoughts of their own concerns, they trusted only to their Arms and Swords; which they beheld with pleasure in their own right hands, accounting them the only Relicks of their hopes.

XLIII. When the Gauls, who for some days spared the Houses, saw nothing remaining among the ruins of the Captive City, but Armed Men, and those not at all terrified by these misfortunes, nor inclinable to yield up themselves, unless they were assaulted, they resolve to try the utmost, and assaulted the Tower. At break of day at the sound of the Trumpet, they meet and are put in order in the Forum. Then giving a shout, and having made a Fence to keep the Fire-balls and stones from them, they march under the Tower. Against whom, the Romans did nothing rashly nor fearfully, but having fortified all their passages with Guards, and knowing the steeper the Hill was, the easier they could beat them down, they let them climb up to the middle of it; and then from a Place somewhat higher, which was as it were for the purpose, they set upon the Gauls, and throwing them down, made a great slaughter. Insomuch that no part of them, nor all of them together, ever after attempted to get up again. Being therefore quite out of all hopes of taking the Tower by Force, they lay Siege against it, which they never thought of till that time, having themselves burnt all the Corn in the City, and that which was in the Fields, was carried thence to Veii. The Army then being divided, some of them pillaged the neighbouring People, others kept Siege at the Tower, receiving supplies of Provision from the Foragers. But as the Gauls went from the City to try the Valour of the Romans, even fortune herself led them to Ardea, where Camillus was banished, who being there in greater sorrow for the calamities of the Publick than his own; blaming both Gods and Men, and with indignation wondering what what was become of those Men, who with him took Veii and Falisci, who in other Wars came off with greater Courage than success; on a sudden hears that the Army of the Gauls are coming, and when the trembling Ardeatians asked him, What they should do? Though before he kept from the publick Councils; he then goes into the middle of the Assembly, and as if he had been inspired, said thus:

My old friends of Ardea! (who are now also my fellow Citizens) since not only your kindness has so contrived it, but my fortune too has put me into these circumstances, I hope none of you think, that I was forgetful of my condition in coming hither: but the affair in hand, and the common danger, forces every one to contribute what they can in this case, now that the Garrison is in such a consternation. And indeed, when should I return my acknowledgments for your great favours to me, if I omit this opportunity? Or where can you make use of me, if not in War? Upon the reputation of this skill [in Military affairs] I lived in my own Country: but though I were conquered in War, yet in peace I was banished by my ungrateful fellow Citizens. Now you, Ardeans! have an occasion offered to you, not only of requiting the Romans for all their extraordinary kindnesses, that you your selves well remember (nor is it any reproach to say so, since you know 'tis true) but of making this your City very glorious for its warlike actions against a common Enemy. The Nation that is a coming against you, are such a sort of Men, to whom nature has given rather great than strong bodies: and therefore they bring, to every combat, more dread than force. Take the Roman miscarriage for an instance of it. They took the City when it lay open to them: but were beaten off from the Castle and the Capitol with a small Party. Now being quite tired with the fatigue of a Siege they march off, and straggle, like Vagabonds, about the Country, where they are filled with Meat and Wine, that they get by thieving. When night comes on, they lay themselves down by the Rivers sides, without any Fortification, without any formed Camp, and without any Watches, all over the Fields, like so many wild Beasts; being now, since their prosperity, grown much more careless than ever. If you therefore resolve to defend your Walls, and not to suffer your whole Country to be turned into Gaul; stand to your Arms in a full body at the first watch; and follow me, to kill, not to fight: and if I do not give you an opportunity, whilst they are asleep, to kill them like beasts, I am content to undergo the same fate at Ardea, as I have met with at Rome.

Now every body, both Friends and Enemies were before convinced, that there was never such a Man in the World at that time for Warlike affairs: so that, the Assembly being dissolved, they refreshed themselves, and then waited very diligently till the signal should be given. Which being given, they met Camillus, as soon as it was night, at the Gates: and when they were got a little way from the City (as he had foretold them) they came to the Camp of the Gauls, which was unguarded and neglected on every side; which they, with a great shout, invaded. Nor had they any need to fight, but slew all before them; killing their naked bodies, which were dissolved and buried in sleep. But the fright roused up the hindmost from the places where they lay; who, being ignorant, what, or whence that force was, some of them fled away; some ran unawares upon the Enemy; and a great part of them being gotten into the Antian Territories, were circumvented by the Townsmen, who made an Incurion upon them as they straggled about. The like slaughter was made of the Tuscans in the Veian Territories; who were so far from pitying a City, that for almost four hundred Years had been their Neighbour, now oppressed by a strange, unheard of Enemy, that they made Incurions into the Roman Dominions even at that time; and, being laden with booty, had a design to attack Veii also, which was the Guard and the last hopes of the Roman Nation. Then the Roman Soldiers had seen strouling over the Fields, and in a full body driving the Cattel before them; besides that, they saw their Camp pitched not far from Veii. Thereupon they conceived, first, pity to themselves, then indignation; and out of that fury, which enraged their minds. Were their misfortunes (said they) a pleasure to the Etrurians too, from whom they had turned the Gallick War upon themselves. With that they could hardly forbear making an immediate attack upon them: but being restrained by Caditius Centurio, whom they themselves had made their General, they deferred the business till night. Now in this case they only wanted an adviser equal to Camillus; but the rest of their actions were performed in the same order, and with the same event of fortune. But besides this, they went, by the guidance of the Captives, who survived that slaughter, to another party of Tuscans, that were at Salinae, and there the next night, before any body was aware of their coming, made a greater slaughter; and so returned triumphant, with a double Victory, to Veii.

In the mean time the Siege at Rome was, for the most part slow, and silence kept on both sides; the Gauls being intent upon nothing else, save, lest any of the Enemies should get into their Camp: when on a sudden a Roman Youth made both his own fellow Citizens and the Enemy too admire him. There was a set Sacrifice to be on the Hill Quirinalis, for the Family of the Fabii: which to perform C. Fabius Dorso came down from the Capitol, with his Gown girt about him after the Gabian fashion, and the things he was to Sacrifice in his hands; and passing through the midst of the Enemies, without being at all concerned, or frightened at what any of them said to him, came up to the Hill Quirinalis: and there having solemnly performed all that he was to do, he returned the same way back, with the same steady countenance.

nance and step, (well hoping that the Gods would favour him, who had not been deterred from their worship by the fear even of death itself) till he came home to the Capitol; the Gauls being either astonished at the miracle of his audacity, or moved with Religion also, whereof that Nation is not at all neglectful. In the mean time the Veians grew every day, not only more courageous, but strong too: for not only the Romans flocked thither out of the Country, who had stragled from the unfortunate Battel, or the defeat of their taken City, but there came also a great number of Volunteers out of Latium, to share in the booty. And they thought it high time to attempt the recovery of their Country, and retrieve it out of the Enemies hands: but their strong Body wanted an Head. The place it self put them in mind of Camillus; and there were a great part of the Soldiers, who had been very successful in their actions under his Conduct and good Fortune: and Cædicius said, He would not do any thing, to make any God or Man put an end to his Command, rather than he himself, remembering his own Quality, would desire another General. So it was ordered, by general consent, that Camillus should be sent for from Ardea, but not before the Senate was consulted at Rome: so modest they were in all respects, and observed the differences of things even when they were almost undone. Now they were to pass with great danger through the Enemies Watches. Wherefore Pontius Cominus, an active Youth, promising his pains in that affair, laid himself upon the bark of a Tree, and swam upon it down the Tiber to Rome. Then, on the side that was next to the Bank, he got up a craggy Rock (which was therefore neglected by the Enemies Watch) into the Capitol: and being carried to the Magistrates, delivered his Message from the Army. Whereupon having received the Senates Decree, viz. That Camillus, being by the curiate assembly recalled from Banishment, should by order of the People be immediately declared Dictator, and that the Soldiers should have whom they pleased for their General; the Messenger went the same way back to Veii; and Embassadors, sent to Camillus, at Ardea, brought him to Veii: or (which I rather believe, viz. that he went not from Ardea before he found there was a Law made, that he should neither change his place of abode without the Peoples order, nor, unless he were made Dictator, have any Command in the Army) there was a Curiate Law [by all the Wards] made, and he was chosen Dictator in his absence.

XLVII. Whilst these things were transacted at Veii, the Castle at Rome and the Capitol meanwhile were in greater danger: For the Gauls (whether they had observed the Tract of a Mans foot, where the Messenger had come from Veii, or whether they on their own accord had observed an equal ascent hard by Carmentis Rock) having first, in a star-light night, sent a Man before unarmed, to try the way, and where there was any inequality or roughness in it, given him instruments [to make his way with] they leaned one upon another by turns, and lifted each other up, as the place required; till they got to the top with so much silence, that they did not only escape the Watch, but the Dogs too, who are a sort of Animals very apt to be disturbed at the least noise in the night time: yet they did not escape the Geese, from whom, as being sacred, the Romans abstained, though in the greatest want of meat, which was their preservation. For by the gagling of them, and the clapping of their Wings, M. Manlius was alarm'd, who had been Consul three Years before, a Man very expert in War, who taking up his Arms in all haste, and giving the rest the Word to do so too, marched toward them: and whilst the rest trembled, he tumbled the Gaul, who was now standing upon the top of the Rock, with a blow that he gave with his Buckler, quite down: whole fall, as it threw down those that were next to him; so it killed others, who being scared let go their Arms, and caught hold of the Rocks, to which they stuck. And now the rest also, being come together, with Darts and Stones that they flung down, put the Enemy into a great confusion, so that the whole body of them fell headlong down. After that, the tumult being allayed, they spent the remainder of the night (as much as People under such a disturbance, when the pass'd danger still ran in their minds) in quiet. Next morning, as soon as it was day, the Soldiers were called by sound of Trumpet to a Council before the Tribunes; where, since there was a reward due both to good and bad actions, Manlius was first commended for his Courage, and presented, not only by the Tribunes, but by consent of the Soldiers also: for they each of them brought into his house, (which was in the Castle) half a pound of meal and two quarts of Wine: which was indeed but a small thing to speak of, but their necessity had made it a great argument of their love to him; in that each one of them depriving himself of his Victuals, neglected his own Body, and the common conveniences of life to shew their respect to that one Man. Then the Sentinels of that place, where the Enemy had stoll up, were summoned to appear: and though P. Sulpicius, Tribune of the Soldiers, had declared, That he would punish them all according to the Law of Arms, yet, since the general voice of the Soldiers, who laid the fault upon one of them, was so uniform, he desisted and spared the rest; but threw down the person, who, doubtless, was guilty of the crime: by universal approbation, from the Rock. From that time the Watches began to be more intent on both sides; not only among the Gauls, who had heard, that there were Messengers who came to and fro between Veii and Rome; but among the Romans also, who remembered the danger of that night.

But

XLVIII. But above all other misfortunes of the Siege and the War, famine press'd the Armies on both sides: besides that the Gauls had the Plague also among them, who being encamped in a place that lay among Tombs and Burial places, which was hot by reason of the flames stirring) whereof that Nation is very impatient, as being used to moisture and cold) and not only so, but being tormented with excessive heat of the weather, and very fainty, died like rotten sheep. For now they had buried so many single Persons, that they were quite a weary of it, and therefore burnt them promiscuously in great heaps altogether: and thence the famous place, called Busta Gallica [the Gauls Burial place] took its name. After that they made a Truce with the Romans, and had Parleys by permission from the Generals: at which, seeing the Gauls did often tell them of their scarcity, and would have had their, upon the score of their necessity, to have made a surrender; they say, that in many places there was bread cast down from the Capitol into the Enemies Camp. But now their want of Provisions could no longer be either hid or endured: wherefore whilst the Dictator himself made the Levy at Ardea, he ordered L. Valerius, Master of the Horse, to bring away the Army from Veii: and then prepared and formed a Body strong enough to attack the Enemy. In the mean time the Army in the Capitol, being tired out with continual Duty and Watching, yet having overcome all human evils, except hunger, which nature had made invincible, look'd day after day, whether any relief appeared from the Dictator; till at last, now that their hopes as well as their meat was quite spent (so that the Soldiers, though they continued in their stations, were ready to faint, for weakness, under their Arms) they desired, either to surrender or be delivered from that necessity upon what terms soever they could: since the Gauls openly professed, That they would take a small sum to raise the Siege. Thereupon a Senate was held, and the Tribunes Military were employed to make the bargain. So the business was transacted at a Parley, between P. Sulpicius, a Tribune Military, and Brennus, the petit King of the Gauls: and a thousand pounds of Gold was set as the value of a People, who were soon after to Command the World. But though this thing were very base in it self, yet there was a farther indignity added to it: for the Gauls brought false Weights; which the Tribune refusing, the insolent Gaul added, to the weight, a Sword: and there was a voice heard, which the Romans could not endure, saying, Wo to the Conquered.

XLIX. But the Gods and Men too kept the Romans from buying their lives: for by a kind of fatality, before the cursed bargain was made an end of (for they wrangled so long that the Gold was not yet all weighed) the Dictator came up: who commanded, the Gold to be taken away, and the Gauls to be gone. Which seeing they refused to do, and said they had made a bargain, he told them, That Contract was not valid, which was made after he was chosen Dictator, by an inferior Magistrate without his Order: and with that gave the Gauls warning to prepare themselves for Battel; Ordering his own Men to throw all their Baggage in an heap together; to make ready their Arms, and retrieve their Country, not by Gold, but their Swords: as having in view the Temples of their Gods; their Wives, Children, and their native soil, (which was now deformed by the misfortunes of War) with all other things that could be lawfully defended, regained, or recovered. When he had so done, he set his Army in Battalia, as the nature of the place would suffer him, amidst the ruins of the City which was half destroyed, besides that it was also naturally uneven; and provided all things, which by the art of War could be prepared, or made choice of, as advantageous for his Men. The Gauls were surprized at this new accident, but yet took up their Arms and ran upon the Romans with more fury than consideration. And now their fortune was changed; for now the assistance of the Gods, and Human Counsels helped the Romans: so that, upon the first onset, the Gauls were routed with as much ease, as, at Allia, they had Conquered. After that they were again defeated in a more formal Battel, eight Miles from Rome (upon the Road that leads to Gabii) whither they had fled out of the former fight, by the Conduct and good management of the same Camillus. There they were all slain, their Camp taken, and not so much as a Messenger left, [to carry the news of their defeat into their Country.] The Dictator having recovered his Country from the Enemy, returned triumphant into the City; and among the Soldiers sayings, which they threw out very uncouthly, he was truly stiled, The Romulus, and Father of his Country; yea, a second builder of their City. After that, when he had preserved his Country in time of War, he did the like in Peace too, without all question; in that he hindered them from removing to Veii: though not only the Tribunes were very intent upon it, since the City was burnt, but the common People too were of themselves more inclined to take that advise. That therefore was the cause, why after his Triumph, he laid not down his Dictatorship; since the Senate desired him, not to leave the Commonwealth in an uncertain state.

I. First of all, as he was a most devout Person in point of Religion, he took care of those things, that related to the Immortal Gods: and procured an Order of Senat; That all the Temples, (for that the Enemy had been possessed of them) should be repaired, bounded, and purified: and that the manner of their purification should be sought for in the Books, by the Duumviri. That they should make a friendly and publick alliance with the Cæretes; for that they had entertained the holy things belonging to the Roman People, together with their Priests, and that through the kindness of that People the honour due to the Immortal Gods was not intermitted. That the Games called called Ludi Capitolini, should be set forth; upon the account, that Jupiter had defended [the City] his own Seat and the Castle of the Roman People in time of danger: and that M. Furius the Dictator should appoint such a body of Artists for that purpose, out of those that dwelt in the Capitol and the Castle. There was likewise mention made about expiating that voice in the night time, which was heard, though neglected, when it foretold their defeat, before the Gallick War; and order given, That there should be a Temple built to Aius Locutius. The Gold that was taken from the Gauls, and that, which, amidst their confusion, was brought out of other Temples into that of Jupiter, since they had forgot whither it ought to be returned, was all judged to be sacred, and ordered to be laid under Jupiters shrine. Now the Religion of the City had formerly appeared in this; that when they wanted Gold in the publick stock, to make up the sum, which they were to give the Gauls, they had had the request raised by the Matrons, that they might not meddle with the holy Gold. The Matrons therefore had thanks given them, and a new honour bestowed upon them, viz. that they as well as their Husbands should have a laudatory Oration made in praise of them after their deaths. When all those things were performed, that related to the Gods, and could be done by the Senate; then he, at last, seeing the Tribunes importuned the common People with daily harangues, to leave those ruins and remove to the City of Veii, which was ready to receive them; came into the Assembly with all the Senate attending on him, and made this Speech:

LI.

Romans! the contests I have had with the Tribunes of the People are so vexations to me, that I had no other comfort in my severe exile, all the while I lived at Ardea, than in being removed from these debates: nor would I, upon this very score, have ever come back, had you not recalled me by an Order of Senate, and the consent of the People. Nor was it the alteration of my mind, at this time, but your fortune, that induced me to return. For their great design was, that our Country should remain upon its old bottom; not that I should be in it. And truly I should not only be now quiet, but hold my tongue very willingly, were there not any such occasion as this to fight for my Country: which to refuse, as long as life lasts, is dishonourable in all other Men, but in Camillus a sin. For what do we contend for? Why did we deliver it, when besieged, out of the Enemies hands, if, now 'tis recovered, we our selves desert it? And when, though the whole City were taken by the Conquering Gauls, the Gods and People of Rome still kept and inhabited the Castle and the Capitol; shall that same Castle and Capitol, now that the Romans are victorious and have recovered their City, be quite forsaken? Shall our good fortune make more waste in this City than our bad did? Truly, if we had no religious Rites enjoined, and delivered down to us along with the City; yet there was the hand of Heaven so evident in the late management of the Roman affairs, that I suppose Men can never hereafter neglect the Divine Worship. For do but consider either our good or our bad success for some years past: and you shall find that all things went well with those that worshipped the Gods, and ill with those that despised them. First of all, How many years and with what difficulty was the Veian War carried on? There was no end of it, before, by Command from the Gods, the Water was let out of the Albane Lake. What say you to the new defeat of this our City? Did it happen, before that despised voice was sent from Heaven, concerning the arrival of the Gauls? before the Law of Nations was violated by our Embassadors? or before that was, through the same neglect of the Gods, omitted, when it ought to have been revenged? We therefore, in being conquered, taken, and redeemed, suffered so much from the Gods and Men too, as to make us an example to the whole World. Then our ill circumstances put us in mind of Religion: for we ran into the Capitol, to the Gods, to Jupiters shrine, and, amidst our confusions, hid some of our holy things in the earth, removing others into the adjacent Cities, out of the Enemies sight: nor did we, though deserted both by Gods and Men, omit the worship of the Gods. They therefore restored to us our Country, Victory, and our ancient glory in War, which we had lost; turning all the terror, defeat and slaughter upon our Enemies, who, blinded with avarice, broke their contract and their word in the weight of the Gold.

LII.

Now since you see such instances in Humane affairs of what attends the Worship or neglect of the Deity, are you not sensible, Romans! how great a crime we (before we are well got clear of the Shipwreck of our former fault and misfortune) are about to commit? We have a City, built by advice and direction of the Soothsayers and Augurs: nor is there any place in it, but what is full of Religion and Gods; besides that there are set places, as well as days, for the performance of our solemn Sacrifices: and will you, Romans! forsake all these Gods, both publick and private? How agreeable is this act of yours to that which, during the late Siege, was done by that brave Youth, C. Fabius, to the astonishment of the Enemy as well as you? when going down from the Castle, amidst all the Gallick Darts, he performed the solemnity of the Fabian Family upon the Hill Quirinalis? Now therefore will you, who would not have the Holy Rites of a private Family neglected even in time of War, have the publick Rites, and Roman Gods forsaken in time of Peace? or allow the Priests and Flamens to be more negligent of the publick Worship, than a private person was in the solemn Sacrifice of his own Family? But some one, perhaps, will say, that we will either sacrifice at Veii, or send Priests from thence hither, to do so: neither of which can be done with safety to our Ceremonies. And that I may not run through all the Holy Rites, or speak of all the Gods in particular, at Jupiters Feast, can the bed, that he is to lie upon, be set in any place but the Capitol? Why should I talk of the eternal fire of Vesta, or that Image, which is kept in her Temple, as a pledge of Dominions? Why should I talk of your Ancilia [i. e. holy Shields] Mars Gradicus, and thou Father Romanus?

lus? Would you have all these holy things left in a prophane place; which are as old, as the City, and some too older than the Original of it? Do but consider what difference there is between us and our Fore-Fathers: they delivered to us certain Rites, to be performed in the Albane Mount, and at Lavinium. Was it a Religious act to translate these holy Rites from the Cities of our Enemies to Rome, and shall we carry them hence to our City of Veii, without committing the greatest offence imaginable? Pray, call to mind, how often the holy Rites have been performed anew, when any thing of ancient usage has been by negligence or chance omitted. What was it of late, when the prodigy of the Albane Lake; but the renewing of the holy Rites, and repeating the auspicious that healed the Commonwealth, when it was sick of the Veian War? But besides this, we, as becomes. How signal and memorable a day (upon the score of the Matrons extraordinary zeal) was Queen Juno, brought over from Veii, and lately dedicated in the Aventine? We ordered a Temple to be built to Aius Locutius, in the new Street, upon the account of that heavenly voice that was heard: we added the Ludi Capitolini [Games in honour of Jupiter] to other Solemnities; and built a new College for that purpose, by order of the Senates. What needed we to have taken all this care, if we were resolved to leave the City of Rome together with the Gauls? If we did not stay in the Capitol so many Months, whilst the Siege lasted, of our own free will? If we were kept from our Enemies by fear? But we talk now of holy Rites and Temples: what have we at last to say of the Priests? Don't you consider, what a crime 'tis [for them to vary from their ancient Customs?] The Vestals, for example, have one sole place of Residence; from which nothing ever remov'd them, but the taking of the City. And for the Flamen Dialis [Jupiter's person Veian, instead of Roman Priests? Shall thy Vestals, Vesta! leave thee? or shall the Flamen, by dwelling abroad, contract each night so much guilt not only to him, but the Commonwealth too? What should I mention other things which we do by direction of the Soothsayers, most of them within the limits of the City, neither forgetting, nor neglecting any part of them? The curiate Assemblies, that manage the Military affairs; and the centuriate Assemblies, at which you choose Consuls and Tribunes Military; where can they be held as they ought to be, but where they use to be? Shall we transfer all these things to Veii? or shall the people meet to hold the Assemblies, with so much inconvenience to them, in this City, which is deserted both by Gods and Men? But the thing it self [some will say] compels us to leave this City, which is laid waste with fire and ruine, and go to Veii, where all things are entire; nor ven the poor commonalty here with Building. No; Romans! this reason, I suppose (though I should not tell you so) you know to be rather given out, than real: you, that remember, how, before the coming of the Gauls, when our Buildings, both private and publick were all safe, and the City standing, this same business was in agitation, about our going to Veii. Now see, Tribunes! how much difference there is between mine and your opinion. You think, that though it were not fit so to do at that time, yet now it may be: and I on the contrary (do not wonder at it, before you hear what 'tis) am of opinion, that though at that time we might have removed, when our City was standing, yet we ought not now to leave these ruins. For then the reason of our removing into a City, which we had taken, might have been our Victory, which would have been glorious to us and our Posterity: but now this removal will look sneaking and dishonourable in us, but glorious to the Gauls: for we shall seem not to have left our Country with Victory, but to have been defeated and lost it. Did our flight at Allia, the taking of our City, or the besieging of the Capitol, lay such a necessity upon us, that we should desert our native Soil, and banish our selves, or run away from that place, which we could not defend? And could the Gauls destroy Rome, which the Romans seem not able to rebuild? What remains, but that they now come with new Forces (for 'tis well known, they are an incredible multitude) and settle, by your permission, in this City, which they took and you desert? Yea what if (not the Gauls, but) your old Enemies, the Aequi and the Volsci, should do this; that is, come to Rome? Would you have them be called Romans, and you Veians? Or would you rather that this place should be your solitude, than your Enemies City? Truly I cannot see, what is a greater crime. Are you willing to commit these offences, because you are loth to build, and had rather suffer so much disgrace? If there could be no better, or larger House built in the whole City, than yonder Hovel where my Builder works, had we not better live in Hovels, like Shepherds and Country people, among our own holy things and household Gods, than to go publickly and banish our selves? Did our Fore-Fathers, who came hither out of several Countrys and were Shepherds (when there was nothing in these places but Woods and Fens) build a new City in so short a time; and shall we think it difficult, though the Capitol and the Castle are safe, and the Temples of our Gods standing, to rebuild a City that's burnt? Or shall we all together refuse to do that in the case of a publick conflagration, which we should each of us have done, if our own single Houses had been burnt?

LIII.

What, pray, if, either by treachery or misfortune, there should happen a fire at Veii, and the flames (as it may chance) being diffused by the wind should consume great part of the City; shall we remove thence to Fidenæ, Gabii, or any other City? Has that native Soil no influence upon you at all? Nor this Earth, which we call Mother? Does the love we bear to our Country only affect the outside and the rafters [of the Building?] Truly I'll tell you (though I am less pleased to remember your injustice, than my own calamity) when I was absent; as often as I thought of my Country; all these things came into my mind; the Hills, the Fields, the Tiber, the Country that I had been used

used to see; and this Skie; under which I was born and bred: which I hope; Romans! may now rather make you so far as love with them, as to continue in your native Country, than torture you with desire hereafter, when you have left them. It was not without reason, that the Gods and Men chose this place to build a City in; very wholesome Hills; a River, as convenient, for conveying of all sorts of Fruits out of the midland Countreys; and receiving all Maritime Provisions: the Sea near, to all useful purposes, but the place not exposed by being too near, to the dangers of Foreign Navies; that lies in a place in the middle of Italy, and the only one that could have been found to augment the grandeur of a City. You may know by the very bigness of so new a City. For this, Romans! is now but the 365th. Year since the City was built: and you have waged Wars among so many ancient Nations so long; though in the mean time (not to speak of single Cities) neither the Volsci and the Æqui together (so many and those such strong Towns) nor all Etruria, which is so Potent both by Sea and Land, and takes up the breadth of all Italy between the two Seas, is able to cope with you in War. Which being so, what (the Devil) can be the reason why you shou'd be for new experiments; when, though your courage may be able to remove to another place, yet the fortune of this place can never be transferred? Here is the Capitol, where in times past, upon the finding of a Mans head, it was foretold, that in that place should be the chief Seat of Dominion. Here, when by direction of the Soothsayers the Capitol was freed, Juventas and Terminus, to the great joy of our Fore-Fathers, suffered not themselves to be stir'd. Here is Vesta's fire; here are the sacred Shields that fell from Heaven; and here are all the Gods, who will be propitious, whilst you continue here.

- LV. Now they say, that Camillus moved them very much; not only with his other Speeches, but with that which concerned Religion especially. But this doubtful matter was opportunely made an end of by a word that was accidentally spoken. For when the Senate a while after were consulting about these things in the Court called Curia Hostilia, and the Regiments returning from the Guards, by chance came in a Body through the Forum, a Centurion cry'd out in the Comitium, or Assembly Court; Ensign-bearer! fix here your Ensign; this is the best place for us to stay in: which when they heard, the Senate, going out of the Court, cry'd out all together, that they receiv'd the Omen, and the common people all about them approved of it. Then, having abrogated the Law, they began promiscuously to build the City; toward which there was Tile provided at the publick charge, and leave given to every man, to get Stone, and cut down Timber where they wou'd, having first given security, that they wou'd finish their Houses that Year. Their haste was the cause why they took no care to make the Streets strait; whilst, making no distinction between their own and others ground, they built in any void space. That's the reason, why the old Common-shoars, which were at first carried along the Streets, go now altogether under private Houses: and that the form of the City is like a place taken up [with building] rather than divided.

DECADE I. BOOK VI.

E P I T O M E.

1. &c. It shews the successful Actions performed against the Æqui, the Volsci and the Prenestines. 5. There were four Tribes added; the Stellatine, the Sabatine, the Tormentine, and the Arnian Tribe. 20. M. Manlius, who defended the Capitol from the Gauls, though he set those that were in Debt at liberty, and freed those that were Bound to work out their Debts; being condemned for attempting to make himself a King, was thrown down from the Tarpeian Rock: and for a mark upon him there was an order of Senate made, that no one of the Manlian Family shou'd after that time, be named Marcus. 35. &c. C. Licinius and L. Sestius, Tribunes of the people, promulgated a Law, that Consuls shou'd be made out of the Commons too, who were usually chosen out of the Senate: and that Law, (though the Senate was very earnest in opposing of it) those same Tribunes of the people, who had been the sole Magistrates for 5. years together, caused to pass: so that L. Sestius was the first Consul, that was chosen out of the Commons. There was also another Law made, that no one man shou'd have above 500. Acres of Land.

- I. I Have already given you an account in 5. Books, from the time that the City of Rome was built, to the taking of it, first under their Kings, and then their Consuls, Dictators, Decemviri and Tribunes Consular, what Wars they had abroad, and what Seditions at home: things which are obscure not only by reason of their great Antiquity, and cannot through the vast distance, as it were, of place, scarce be discerned; but because writing in those days was not common (which is the only faithful Record of actions) and that even those things, that were described in the Priests Books, or other publick and private Monuments, when the City was burnt, were most of them lost. But hereafter I shall give you a more clear and certain relation from the new born Cities second beginning, as from a stock that's that's more fertile, of what exploits they did as well in Peace as War. Now by the help of him, who first set it upright (which was M. Furius above any man else) the City was at first supported; for they wou'd not suffer him to lay down his Dictatorship till that year was out. The Assembly for the next year thought not fit to have Tribunes, in whose time the City had been taken: and so the business came to an Interregnum [or time of vacancy when there was no chief Magistrate.] Now whilst the City was imploy'd in daily work and labour to repair their Buildings, in the mean time Q. Fabius, as soon as ever he went out of his Office, was warn'd to his Tryal by C. Martius, Tribune of the people; For that he, when a Lieutenant, had fought the Gauls, to whom he was sent as an Envoy, against the Law of Nations: from which Tryal Death (which came so opportunely, that a great many thought it voluntary) snatch'd him away. Then P. Cornelius Scipio enter'd upon the Interregnum; and after him M. Furius Camillus, a second time. He created for Tribunes of the Soldiers, with power Consular, A. Valerius Publicola, a second time, L. Virginus, P. Cornelius, A. Manlius, and L. Posthumus. Who, from the Interregnum entering immediately upon their Office, consulted the Senate first of all about Religion. First they ordered all the Leagues and Laws (which were the 12. Tables, and some made by the Kings too) to be got together, that could be found: whereof some were published among the Commonalty; and others that related to holy things, suppress'd by the Priests, most of all, that they might keep the peoples minds under an awe to Religion. Then they began to discourse of Holy dayes, and called the 17. of August, which was memorable for a double defeat (being the day, on which the Fabii were slain at Cremera; and when they had such ill fortune to lose the day in the Battel at Allia, with the ruine of their City) Dies Alliensis, from the latter defeat, and made it remarkable by ordering, that no business shou'd be done on it, either publick or private. Some think, That because on the 17. of July, Sulpicius the Tribune Military had not appeased the Gods, but that, before they were reconciled, the fourth day, the Roman Army had been exposed to the Enemy, that therefore it was ordered, that no holy duties shou'd be performed that day: and that from thence also proceeded the same usage upon the day after the Calends, and the Nones.

But they were not long at leisure to consult how to raise the Commonwealth out of so grievous a condition. For on the one hand the Volsci, their old Enemies, had taken Arms, to extinguish the Roman name; and on the other, Merchants brought them word, that there was a consult about a War held by all the great Men in Etruria at the Temple of Voltumna: besides that a new fright also was come upon them, by the revolt of the Latins and the Hernicans, who, after the Battel at the Lake Regillus, had, for almost 100. years, been constant Friends to the Romans. Wherefore since so many fears encompass'd them on every side, and that it was evident to all people, that the Roman name was not only hateful to their Enemies, but contemptible even to their Allies also; they thought fit that the Commonwealth shou'd be defended by the same persons Conduct, who recover'd it: and that M. Furius Camillus shou'd be made Dictator. He therefore being Dictator, chose C. Servilius Ahala Master of the Horse: and having put a stop to all judicial proceedings, made a Levy of the younger sort of men: but so, that he lifted the Seniors too, that had any strength left, and made them take an Oath to be true to him. When he had raised and armed his Men, he divided them into three parts: whereof he planted one in the Veian Dominions opposite to Etruria: another he order'd to Encamp before the City (of whom A. Manlius was Tribune Military [i. e. Colonel] as Emilius was Commander of those that were sent against the Etrurians) and the third part he himself led against the Volsci. Nor was it far from Lanuvium (at a place near the hill Marcius) that he began to attack their Camp. Who marching forth out of contempt (for they thought the Gauls had kill'd almost all the Roman Youth) to War, the name of Camillus, who was General, put them in such a fright, that they secured themselves with a Rampire, and their Rampire with heaps of Trees, that the Enemy might not any way enter upon their Works. Which when Camillus observ'd, he order'd fire to be thrown into the Wood; there being, as it happen'd, a great wind at that time, which blew toward the Enemy; and by that by means he not only opened the way with fire, but the flames, making toward their Camp, he put the foe with the heat, smoke, and crackling of the green stuff, as it burnt, into such a consternation, that it was less trouble for the Romans to go over the Rampire into the Volscian Camp, than it had been to go over the fence, which was burnt down. When the Enemy was all routed and slain, the Dictator, having taken the Camp by storm, gave the Spoil to the Soldiers, which, the less it was expected from a General, that was not used to make Presents, was so much the better taken. After that pursuing the Foe as they fled, when he had pillaged all the Volscian Territories, he brought the Volscians to make a Surrender at last after 70. years Wars. Having Conquer'd the Volscians, he went over to the Æqui, and surprized their Army at Bola, as they were there preparing for a War: nor did he attack their Camp only, but their City too, and took it upon the first Assault.

But whilst they had such good fortune on that side, where Camillus was the chief manager of the Roman affairs, they were mightily terrified on the other: For almost all Etruria was up in Arms and Besieging Sutrium, a Town in Alliance with the Romans: whose Embassadors, desiring aid in that their unhappy condition, went to the Senate and got a Decree; That the Dictator, as soon as possible, should relieve the Sutrians. But the fortune of the besieged being unable to endure the delay of that hope, seeing the few men they had in the Town were all disabled by toil, watching, and wounds, which still lay heavy upon them, they delivered up their City to the Enemy upon terms, and being sent forth unarmed with one coat a piece, they left their native soil in a wretched manner. At that time Camillus chanced to come in, with the Roman Army, to their assistance: at whose feet when the sorrowful crowd of them had laid themselves down, and the cries of the Women and Children (who were sharers in their Exile) seconded the speeches of the Nobility, which were forced from them by extreme necessity, he had the Sutrians forbear their Lamentations; For he brought sorrow and tears to the Etrurians. Then he ordered his men to lay down their Baggage, and the Sutrians, with whom he left a small Guard, to sit down there together: but bid his Soldiers take their Arms along with them. So going, as fast as he could, to Sutrium he found (as he supposed he should, and as in such cases it generally happens,) all things dissolved in Luxury; no Guard before the Walls; the Gates wide open; and the stragling Conquerer carrying the Booty out of the Enemies Houses. By this means Sutrium was taken again the very same day; and the Victorious Etrurians were killed by this new Foe all over the Town; nor had they time to Rendezvous, and meet in a Body, or take up their Arms. And when they made, every man as he was able, towards the Gates they found them (according to the Dictators first orders) shut. With that some of them took up their Arms, and others, who were by chance got Arm'd amidst the crowd, call'd their party together to joyn Battel: which had indeed been brought to effect through the Enemies despair, had not the Cryers, who were sent all about the City given order to them, to lay down Arms, that the unarm'd should be spared, and that nobody should be hurt, save those that were Arm'd. With that even those, who before were resolv'd, as their last refuge, to fight for it, when they had hopes of life given them, began every one to throw away their Arms, and present themselves unarmed (since Fortune had made that their safest way) to the Enemy. A great number were sent into several Prisons: and the Town before night was restored to the Sutrians inviolate, and free from all the injuries of War: because it had not been taken by Storm, but surrender'd upon conditions.

IV. Camillus return'd triumphant into the City; and having been Victorious in three Wars together, drove before his Chariot a great many more Etrurians than any others. Whom after he had publicly sold, there was so much money made of them, that, having repaid the Matrons their Gold, out of what remained, there were three golden Cups made; which, 'tis well known (before the Capitol was burnt) were set in Jupiter's Temple, at Juno's feet. That Year they were taken into the City, who (either Veians, Capenates, or Faliscans) had come over to the Romans during those Wars, and Land was assigned to all such new Citizens. They likewise were recalled into the City by order of the Senate, who to avoid the trouble of building at Rome, had removed to Veii. Whereupon at first they murmured and slighted the command, till a day being prefixed, a capital punishment set upon each man, that did not return to Rome, cooled all their courages, and made them every man obedient out of fear. Now therefore Rome began to grow very populous, and buildings to rise in every part: for the Commonwealth helped to defray the Charge, the Ediles forwarded the work, as though it had been the publick business, and even private persons (for their desire to have a convenient Habitation prompted them to it) made haste to finish; so that there was a new City standing within a year. At the end of the year the Assembly was held for choosing Tribunes Military with Consular Authority; and they chose T. Quintius Cincinnatus, Q. Servilius Fidenas (a fifth time) Julius Fulvus, L. Aquilius Corvus, L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and Serv. Sulpicius Rufus. Then they led one Army against the Aequi, not to make War (for they confessed themselves already Conquer'd) but out of hatred, to ravage their Country, lest they should leave them any strength for new attempts: and another into the Tarquinius Territories; where they storm'd and plunder'd two Towns of Etruria, called Cortuosa and Contenebra. At Cortuosa they had no dispute at all; but having surprized it, they took it upon their first shout and effort; rifling and burning the Town. But Contenebra endured the Siege some few days; though continual toil, night and day, disabled them: in so much that, seeing the Roman Army, which was divided into six parts, fought six hours, each in their turns, whilst the same Townsmen were still expos'd to the whole fatigue of the Battel (though few and weary) they at last gave way, and let the Romans into the City. The Tribunes thought fit to confiscate the Booty by way of publick sale; but their orders were slower than their design: for whilst they deliberated upon the point, the Booty was all in the Soldiers hands, nor could it be taken from them without envy. The same year, lest the City should increase in private works only, the Capitol also was repaired, in its Foundation, with square Stone, which looks very fine even at this day, though the City be so very Magnificent in its Buildings.

V. And now the Tribunes, seeing the City was all built, endeavour'd to introduce the Agrarian Laws into their publick Assemblies: and to raise the peoples hopes, they instanced in the Pomptine Lands, which was then first of all, since Camillus defeated the Volsci, become a certain tenure. They pretended, That those Lands were now the occasion of more oppression from the Nobility, than they had been formerly, when in the hands of the Volsci: for they only made incursions into them, as long as they had strength and Arms: But the Nobility took possession of them by force; nor would there be any room there for the Commonalty, unless they were divided, before the great men had gotten all into their clutches. But they had not much moved the people, who were but few of them in the Forum, by reason of their being employ'd about their Buildings; as also, for that they were, upon that account, impoverished by the charge they were at, and therefore regarded not those Lands, which they had not abilities enough to cultivate. At this time the City being full of Religion, and the Nobility grown superstitious since their late defeat; to the end that the auspices might be renew'd, they fell back into an Interregnum. The Interreges were, M. Manlius Capitolinus, Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus, and L. Valerius Potitus: the last of which held an Assembly for choosing of Tribunes Military with Consular power, and chose L. Papirius, C. Sergius, L. Aemilius (a second time) L. Menenius, and L. Valerius Poplicola, a third time. These persons (instead of the Interregnum) entred upon their Office. That year the Temple of Mars, which was vowed in the Gallick War, was Dedicated by T. Quintius a Duumvir, whose Office it was to look after the Sacrifices. There were four Tribes added of new Citizens, the Stelatinae, the Formentine, the Sabbatine, and the Arnian Tribe: which made the Tribes up twenty five.

L. Sicinius, Tribune of the people propos'd the business of the Pomptine Lands again, now that the Commons were more numerous about him, and more inclined to desire them, than they had been. There was likewise mention made of the Latin and the Herulican War in the Senate; but that was deferred upon the score of a greater War, Etruria being up in Arms. The matter was refer'd to Camillus, who was Tribune of the Soldiers with power Consular; and had five Collegues assign'd him, viz. Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis, Q. Servilius Fidenas (a sixth time) L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Horatius Pulvillus, and P. Valerius. At the beginning of that year mens thoughts were diverted from the Etrurian War: by reason, that a Body of men, who fled out of the Pomptine Territories, came on a sudden into the City and brought word, That the Antians were in Arms, that the Latins had sent their Youth for Auxiliaries to that War: and said, that they therefore rejected the publick design, because Volunteers were allowed to serve, where they pleas'd. At this time there was not any War so inconsiderable as to be slighted: wherefore the Senate thank'd the Gods, that Camillus was in Office: for he must have been made Dictator, if he had been a private person; and his Collegues confess'd, That the management of all matters, where there was any Warlike terror approaching, rested in him alone: as also, that they design'd, to give up their Authority to Camillus; nor should they think that their grandeur was any way less'n'd by what they added to the greatness of that man. For which the Senate commended the Tribunes, and Camillus himself, though in a confusion of mind, thank'd them, saying; That there was a vast burden laid upon him by the Roman people, who had created him Dictator now four times; a great one by the Senate, through the judgments of that Order concerning him; but the far greatest, by the difference of his honourable Collegues. Wherefore, if there could be any more labour, or care added to it; he would strive to acquit himself; as to make that opinion (which was the greatest that could be) that the City generally had of him, lasting. That, as to the War and the Antians, there was more threatenings than danger: but that he notwithstanding as he said, there was nothing to be feared, so he would not say, there was any thing to be slighted in that Affair. That the City of Rome was begirt by the envy and hatred of its Neighbours; so that there was need of more Generals and Armies to manage the Commonwealths business. I would have you, P. Valerius! said he, to be my assistant in Command and Counsels, and lead forth part of the Legions against the Antian Foe: and you, Q. Servilius! to Encamp in the City with an other Army ready, to watch, for fear either Etruria in the mean time, (as of late they did) or this new vexation, the Latins and the Hernicans, should stir: for I am sure, you'll so behave your self as may suit with the honour of your Father; Grand-Father, your self, and six Tribuneships. A third Army I would have rais'd out of the Caussaries [such as were excus'd from the Wars upon the score of sickness] and elder sort; by L. Quintius, to be a guard to the City and the Walls. Let L. Horatius provide them Darts, Arms, Corn, and other necessities of War: and you, Serg. Cornelius! we appoint to be Overseer, and manager of this publick advice, of all Religions Worship, of the Assemblies, the Laws, and all other affairs in the City. Upon this all kindly promising to perform their parts in the discharge of their duty; Valerius, who was his partner in Command, added, That M. Furius should be his Dictator, and he would be his Master of the Horse: and therefore look what hopes they had of one sole General, the same they might have of the War: but he had good hopes himself, both of War and Peace, and the whole Commonwealth. With that the Senators, being overjoy'd, began to Humm; and said, The Commonwealth would never need to have a Dictator if it had such men for Officers, who agreed so well together; were ready to obey, as well as to Command: and bestow'd their commendations upon the people in general, rather than arrogated all to themselves, that was as much due to all.

Then having order'd a stop to be made in Judicial proceedings, and made a Levy, Furius and Valerius went to Saturnum; to which place the Antians had gathered, not only the Volscian

Volscian Youth, chosen out of their new fry, but a vast number also of Latins and Hernicans, out of Cities that had lived long in peace and were thereby grown very populous. Now therefore this new Enemy; joyn'd to the old one put the Roman Soldiers into a fright. Which when the Centurions told Camillus, as he was setting his Army in Battalia, viz. That the Soldiers were disturb'd in their minds; that they were loth to take up their Arms, and that they marched lazily, and with reluctance out of the Camp: yea that they were some of them beard to say, that they must each of them fight with an 100. Enemies; and that such a vast multitude could hardly be endured without Arms, much less Armed: He presently mounted his Horse, and turning, before the Ensigns, toward the main Body of his Army, rode among the Ranks and ask'd them: What sadness is this, fellow Soldiers? what unusual delay? Don't you know your Enemy, or me, or your selves? What is your Enemy, but perpetual matter for your courage and glory to work upon? You, on the contrary, when I was your General (to pass by the Falerians, and Veians, whom we took, and the Gaullick Legions, that were slain in our own Country after it was by them taken) made a triple triumph but t'other day for a threefold Victory over these very Volsci, the Aequi and Etruria. Don't you acknowledge me for your General because I was not a Dictator, but a Tribune when I gave you the signal? I don't desire the greatest Commands over you: nor ought you to look upon any thing else in me besides my own person. For my Dictatorship never rais'd my courage, as, on the other hand, even Banishment never lessen'd it. We therefore are all the same men still: and since we have brought all the same resolutions to this War, as to the former, let us expect the same event. As soon as you engage, let every man do as he hath learnt and used to do: so shall you Conquer, and they fly before you.

VIII. Then having given the signal, he straight alighted from his Horse, and laying hold of the Ensign-bearer, that was next to him, forced him along with him towards the Enemy, crying out, Fellow-Soldier! advance your Ensign: which when they saw (viz. that Camillus himself, though by old age render'd unfit for action, made way toward the Enemy) they all in like manner ran forward, hollowing and laying with one accord, Follow the General. They likewise report, that an Ensign was thrown, by Camillus's order into the Body of the Enemies; and that the Antesignani were encouraged to regain it. They say also, that the Antians was there first beaten, and that a dread was infused not only into the Front, but even the Rear too of the Army: nor did the force only of the Romans, back'd by the presence of their General, put the Enemy into confusion; but, besides that, there was nothing more terrible to the Volscians apprehensions than an accidental sight of Camillus himself. So that which way soever he went, he carried certain Victory along with him. And that was very plain from this instance; that when the left Wing was almost routed, he immediately took Horse, and riding up with a Footmans Shield in his hand, by his very presence retrieved the Battel, and shew'd, that the rest of the Army were Victorious. Now therefore they had like to have got the day, but that they were hindred by the multitude and flight of the Foe; having a great multitude to kill though they themselves were tired: when on a sudden there came a shower pouring down with great violence, which rather obstructed a certain Victory, than put an end to the fight. Upon that they retreated, and the following night, when the Romans were quiet, made an end of the War. For the Latins and the Hernicans, leaving the Volscians, went home, having success proportionable to their evil Counsels. The Volscians seeing themselves deserted even by those, in confidence of whom they had rebell'd, left their Camp, and shut themselves up in the Walls of Sutrium: where Camillus began first to inclose them with a Bullwark, and to attack them from a Rampire and other works. Which when he saw they did not hinder by any Sally forth; thinking the Enemy had too little resolution in them, for him upon that account to expect and wait for so lingring a Victory; he encouraged his Soldiers, not to tire themselves with a tedious fatigue, as they that attack'd the Veians; for Victory was in their hands: and so scaling the Walls on every side, through the great alacrity of his men, took the Town. The Volscians laying down their Arms surrendred themselves.

IX. But the Generals mind was set upon a greater matter, which was the taking of Antium, the chief City of the Volscians: For that was the first cause of the late War. But because so strong a City could not be taken without great preparation; Instruments and Engines of War, he, leaving his Colleague with the Army, went to Rome, to perswade the Senate to Sack Antium. Whilst he was discoursing upon this affair (I suppose the Gods were pleas'd, that the Antian State should continue somewhat longer) there came Embassadors from Nepete, and Sutrium, to desire aid against the Tuscan: saying, that they had but a small time to bring in their Auxiliaries. Thither therefore did Fortune divert Camillus's Force, from Antium. For since those places were opposit to Etruria, and, as it were, Barriers and Gates thereunto: they did what they could, upon any new design, to get possession of them, as the Romans did to recover, and defend them. Wherefore the Senate thought fit that Camillus should be treated with, to quit Antium, and undertake the Etrurian War. The City Legions, which Servilius had Commanded, were assigned him: though he would rather have had that experienced and well disciplin'd Army, which was in the Country of the the Volsci: but yet he refused nothing [that was offer'd by the Senate:] only he desir'd that Valerius might be his assistant and partner in the Command. Quintius and Horatius were sent as Successors to Valerius in the Volscian Territories. So Furius and Valerius setting forth from the City arriv'd at Sutrium, where they found one part of the Town already taken by the Etrurians: and the Townsfolk in the other part scarce able to repel the Enemies force by blocking up the Streets. But then not only the arrival of the Roman aids, but the very name of Camillus, which was of such renown both among the Enemies and their Allies; for the present supported their declining condition, and gave [their Friends] time to bring in their Succours. Wherefore Camillus, having divided the Army, ordered his Colleague to go with his Forces about, and attack the Walls on that side, which the Enemy had gotten possession of; not so much out of any hopes he had that they might be able to take the City by Scaling it, as that, when the Enemy was diverted to the defence of that part, the Townsfolk, who were now wearied with fighting might be eas'd of their toil, and he himself have an opportunity to enter the Walls without any opposition. Which being done at the same time on both sides; so that the Etrurians were environed by a double terror; seeing their Walls attack'd with the greatest vehemency, and the Enemy already within their City; they Sallied forth at a certain Gate, (which was the only one, not Besieged) in a consternation all at once. There were a great many of them slain as they fled, both in the City and all over the Country: but the most part of them were killed by Furius's men within the Walls: whilst Valerius's Soldiers, being more nimble and fit for a pursuit followed them, and made no end of killing [those, they overtook] before night, when they could no longer see them. When Sutrium was retaken, and restored to the Allies, the Army was led to Nepete, which the Etrurians now had wholly in their hands, being taken by Surrender.

They thought it would cost the more pains to retake that City, not only because it was all in the Enemies possession, but also because the Surrender had been made by the contrivance of some part of the Nepesines, who betray'd their City. Yet they resolv'd to send to the chief of them; to separate themselves from the Etrurians, and shew that integrity, and fidelity in themselves, which they had required of the Romans. Whereupon, when answer was brought back; That they were not able to do any thing at all in the case; for the Etrurians had possession of their Walls, and the Guards of their Gates; They first of all put the Townsfolk into a fright by pillaging the adjacent Country; and seeing that they had a more sacred regard to the Surrender [which they had made to the Etrurians] than to their Alliance [with the Romans] the Roman Army got Fagots out of the Neighbouring Fields, and march'd up to the Walls. Where having fill'd the Trenches, they apply'd their scaling Ladders, and upon the first shout and effort, took the Town. Thereupon the Nepesines were ordered, to lay down their Arms, and the Soldiers were commanded not to meddle with any of them, that was unarmed: but the Etrurians were all kill'd, arm'd or unarm'd. And of the Nepesines also, those that had been the authors of the Surrender were beheaded; though the innocent multitude had their Estates again, and the Town was left with a Garrison in it. Having in this manner retaken two Allied Cities from the Enemy; the Tribunes brought back their Victorious Army with great glory to Rome. The same year the Latins and the Hernicans were called to account, and asked, Why for several years together they had not sent their Quota of Soldiers according to agreement? To which both Nations, in full Assembly, made Answer; That there was no publick fault or design to be laid to their charge; for that some of their Youth were Soldiers in the Volscian Territories: but that those young Men themselves underwent the penalty of an ill design; for there was ne'r an one of them that came home again. But that the reason why they did not send in such a number of Soldiers, was their daily dread of the Volscians; who were a pest, that stuck so close to them, that they could not be rid of it even by so many continued Wars, one upon the neck of another. Which when the Senate heard, they were of opinion, that they rather wanted a fit opportunity, than good grounds, to make a War.

The following Year, when A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, T. and L. Quintius Capitolinus, L. Papirius Cursor (again) and C. Sergius (again) were Tribunes, with Consular Authority, there broke out a grievous War abroad, but a more grievous Sedition at home: the War, from the Volscians, to which there came in, as an addition, a revolt of the Latins and Hernicans; and the Sedition, from whence it was least to be feared; even from a person of a Noble Family and great Honour, viz. M. Manlius Capitolinus; who being a man of a proud Spirit, as he condemn'd all their Noblemen, envied one, and that was M. Furius, a person very extraordinary both for his Honours and his Virtues. For he took it very ill, that he alone should be in great Offices, and he alone with the Army: For he was now got to that height, that he reckon'd those, who were created at the same time, not his Colleagues, but his Servants: when at the same time, if people would consider well of it, their Country could not have been recovered from the Enemy by M. Furius, had not the Capitol and Castle been first preserved by himself. Besides, M. Furius set upon the Gauls, when their minds were divided between receiving of Gold and hopes of Peace: but he himself repell'd them when they were in Arms and just taking the Castle. That each Soldier had a share in Furius's glory, who help'd him to Conquer;

quer; but no man living could pretend to be a partner in his Victory. Being puff'd up with these kind of thoughts (besides that he was naturally very violent and tyrannical) and seeing, that his Circumstances, among the Senators, were not so good, as he imagin'd they ought to be, he first of all, from a Senator, grew popular; held correspondence with the Magistrates of the common People; accusing the Senate, and alluring the Commons; and began to be now born away by the publick vogue, and not by good Counsel; desiring to be a Man of a great rather than a good name. Nor was he content with the Agrarian Laws, which had alwayes been the ground of Seditions to the Tribunes of the people, but went about to advance his own credit [by an other method too; for he said] That the burden of Debts was too great, and threaten'd not only poverty, and disgrace; but put a man, that was free into a fear of torture and Bonds: for indeed there were abundance of Debts at that time (which was a thing that mightily endamaged even the rich themselves) contracted by Building. Wherefore the Volscian War, which was in it self very grievous, and loaded with the revolt of the Latins and Hernicans, was made a pretext, whereby to gain more power: but the new designs of Manlius rather compell'd the Senate to create a Dictator. And accordingly they did create A. Cornelius Cossus, who chose T. Quintius Capitolinus Master of the Horse.

XII. The Dictator, though he saw, there was a greater feud set on foot at home, than abroad; yet either because it was necessary to make hast to the War, or supposing that, by a Victory and a Triumph, he shou'd add new strength to the Dictatorship, made a levy, and march'd forth into the Pomptine Territories, where he had heard, the Volscian Army was to Rendezvous. I don't doubt but that, besides the tediousness that Readers will accuse me of, for having given a Relation of the continual Wars with the Volsci, already described in so many Books, this also will fall under your consideration (which indeed was a wonder even to me my self, when I seriously thought upon the authors of these things as nearer to those times) whence the Volsci and the Aequi, who were so often Conquer'd had still new recruits of Soldiers. Which seeing it is answer'd, but omitted by the Ancients; what can I say more than barely give you my opinion, which is free and peculiar to every man, that makes a conjecture? 'Tis probable, that either in the Intervals of their Wars, as it now happens in the Roman Levies, there were several Generations of young men one after another, whom they made use of to renew their Wars; or that their Armies were not always raised out of the same people; though the same Nation always made the War: or that there was an innumerable multitude of Free-men in those parts, which now-adays would be solitary and desert (there being but a very small number of Citizens left to make Soldiers of) did not Roman Slaves inhabit there. This is certain, that Volscian Army, though they had been lately much disabled by the Fortune and Conduct of Camillus, was (as all Authors agree) very great: besides the addition of the Latins and Hernicans, with some Circeians, and Inhabitants of Velitrae also. The Roman Dictator having pitched his Camp that day, the next day march'd forth with all encouragements from the Soothsayers, and having Sacrificed to appease the Gods, went cheerfully up to his men, who at break of day (as he had given orders) were taking up their Arms against the signal of Battel shou'd be given them; Fellow Soldiers! said he, the day is ours, if either the Gods or their Prophets foresee any thing to come: wherefore (as it becomes men full of certain hopes, and such as are to engage hand to hand with an Enemy too weak for them) let us lay our piles at our feet, and arm ourselves with our Swords only. I would not have you run forward from the place where you now are, but stand still and receive the effort of the Foe. When they shall throw their foolish Darts and throng upon you, standing your ground; then let your Swords glitter, and think each man of you, that there are Gods, who assist the Romans; and who sent you to Battel with good Omens [or tokens.] Do you, Quintius! be sure to keep back the Horse at the first onset of the fight; but when you see the Armies engaged foot to foot; then bring in your dreadful Horse upon them, whilst they are already possessed with another fear, and charging up break their Ranks. The Horse and Foot both fought, as he had order'd them; nor did either the General disappoint his Legions, or Fortune the General.

XIII. The multitude of the Enemies relying upon nothing but their numbers, and viewing both Armies, went rashly to the fight, and as rashly quitted; for though they shewed some audacity by the shout they made, threw their Darts, and were fierce enough at the first onset, yet they could not endure the Enemies Swords, their fighting foot to foot, nor so much as their faces, which glitter'd (as it were) through the ardour of their minds. Their Vanguard therefore was repell'd, and their Reer put into confusion: besides that the Horse came in with their dreadful force. By that means the Ranks were broken in many places, all things were in disorder, and the whole Army tossed to and fro like a Wave. After that, when the foremost fell, and every man saw, it would be his turn ere long to be slain, they turn'd their backs. The Romans pursu'd them close; and whilst they march'd off Arm'd and in a full Body, the Foot were order'd to follow them; but when it was observ'd, that they threw away their Arms, and were scatter'd in their flight all over the Country, then the Troops of Horse were sent out, with a command, That they should not stay so long to kill single persons, as to give the Body of the Enemy time the mean while to escape. It would be sufficient, cient, if they by throwing of Darts and other terrible actions, hindr'd the Enemies flight, or by riding up against them detain'd their Army, till the Foot overtook and totally destroy'd them. They fled and the Romans followed them till it was night. The Camp also of the Volsci was taken and rifled that same day, and all the Booty, save the Freeman, given to the Soldiers. The greatest part of the Captives were Latins and Hernicans; and those no ordinary fellows, such as a man might have thought had fought for pay; but there were found among them some young Noblemen; to make it evident, that the Volscians were assisted by publick Authority. There were also some Circeians taken notice of and Inhabitants of Velitrae; who were all sent to Rome; where, when the chief Senators asked them the question, they each of them plainly and truly declared to them, as they had done to the Dictator, That their Nations were revolted [from the Romans.]

The Dictator kept his Army Encamped, not doubting in the least but that the Senate would Vote a War with those People, when at the same time a greater affair arising at home, forced them to send for him to Rome, seeing the Sedition grew higher every day, and became by means of its Author more dreadful than before. For now not only Manlius's Speeches, but his Actions too were popular to all appearance, and therefore tending to a tumult, were to be [by the Dictator] considered, [that a judgment might be made] with what intention they were done. When he saw a Centurion, who had done many famous exploits in the Wars, going to Prison for Debt, he ran to him with his Train at his heels in the midst of the Forum and laid hold on him; and there exclaiming against the pride of the Senate, the cruelty of the Bankers, and the miseries of the common People; but extolling the virtues and Fortunes of that man, he said; Then have I with this right hand in vain preserved the Capitol and the Castle, if I see my fellow Citizen and Soldier dragg'd into Slavery and Bonds, as though he were a Captive to the conquering Gauls: whereupon he paid the Creditor his Debt before all the people; and so set the Centurion at liberty, who conjur'd all the Gods and Men, to thank M. Manlius, that set him at liberty, and was a Father to the Roman People. Upon that being immediately received into the tumultuous crowd, he also increased the tumult, by shewing the scars that he had received in the Veian, Gallick and other Wars: saying, That he, whilst he was a Soldier, and by paying interest upon interest a great many times more than the principal, to retrieve a ruined Estate, was quite overwhelm'd with Usury: but that now he saw the light, the Forum, the faces of his fellow Citizens, and the good works of M. Manlius: that he had all the kind offices of a Parent perform'd by him: that he devoted to him all his Body, Life and Blood, that was left; and that whatever rights he had in his Country, either publick or private, was at that one mans service. With these words the common People were so animated, that they subscribed to one single Person: but then there was another thing added, which was of far greater force to put all affairs into disorder. For he put a Farm, that he had in the Veian Territories (which was the best part of his Patrimony) into the Cryers disposal; saying, I'll never suffer any of you, Romans, (as long as I have any Estate left) to be sentenced, or made Slaves on. Now that so enflam'd their minds, that right or wrong they seem'd resolv'd to follow the vindicator of their liberty. But besides this he made Speeches at home, full of accusations against the Senators: among whom, making no difference whether he said true or false, he laid to their charge, That the Treasure of Gallick Gold was imbezell'd by the Senators: and that they were not now content with the publick Lands, unless they could convert the publick Money also to their own use: which if it were publicly discovered, the common people might be eas'd and discharg'd of their Debts. Which since the People had hopes of, it seem'd an unworthy act, that, when there was Gold enough to be gathered out of Gaul to set the City free, it should be raised by Contribution at home: or that the same Gold, which was taken from their Enemies (should become the prey of some few persons. Wherefore they went on, asking, where so much theft could be concealed. To which he defer'd his answer, and said, That in due time he would tell them; which made them careless of other matters and turn all their care that way: nor was their any doubt made, but that Manlius, if he told truth, would gain extraordinary favour among the People, as, if his discovery were false he would not fall into any great disgrace [with the Senate]

When affairs were in this posture, the Dictator, being sent for from the Army came in to the City: where having the next day called a Senate, and sufficiently tried the Peoples inclinations, he commanded the Senate to attend him; and then, surrounded with that company, placed a Throne in the Assembly Court, and sent a Messenger for M. Manlius: who being summon'd by the Dictators order, gave notice to his Party, That the contest was now coming on; and came with a great Train of followers to the Tribunal. The Senate on one side, and the Commons on the other stood, each looking toward their Leader, as they had been in Battalia. Then, after silence was made, the Dictator began: I wish, said he, I and the Roman Senate may agree with the common People concerning other matters as well as I am very confident we shall in what relates to you, and that matter which I am to enquire into touching you. I find that you have put the City in hopes, that they may honestly pay what they owe out of the Gallick Money, which the chief Senators conceal. To which I am so far from being an hinderance, that on the contrary, M. Manlius! I encourage and advise you to it: free the Com- means of Rome from Usury; and to those who lye brooding upon the publick Treasure, which they clandestinely made their prey. Which if thou dost not do, either because thou thy self art a sharer in that Booty, or because thy Information is false, I'll order thee to be carried to Prison: and will not suffer the multitude any longer to be disturb'd with a fallacious hope. To which Manlius replied; That he knew very well, they created a Dictator, not against the Volsci, who were made Enemies as often as the Senate thought fit; nor against the Latins and the Hernicans, whom they forced by false accusations to take up Arms; but against him and the Roman People: and that now, they, quitting the pretended War, bent all their fury toward him. For now the Dictator professed to be Advocate for the Bankers against the People; and that they sought occasion from the favour of the multitude to accuse and destroy him. Does the company that I have here about me, A. Cornelius, said he, offend thee, and you, grave Fathers? Why don't you drand them from me, each one of you, by your kindness to them? by interceding with their Creditors, by delivering their fellow Citizens from Bonds, by keeping such as are sentenced to it out of Slavery, and by relieving the necessities of others out of that, which you have more than you need? But why do I exhort you to spend out of your own stock? Make a new account, and substract from the principal Debt which is paid for use, and then my retinue will be no more taken notice of than any other Mans. But why do I alone thus concern my self for the Citizens? I have nothing more to answer, than if you should ask me, why I alone preserved the Capitol and the Castle: for at that time I did what good I could for them all in general, and so I will now for every single man. As to the Gallick Treasures, the very question makes a thing, which in its own nature is easie enough, very difficult: for why do you enquire about a thing that you already know? why do you bid that which is in your pocket be shaken out, rather than lay it down your selves? unless there be some fraud in the case. The more you bid us reprove or find out your juggling tricks, the more I fear you have robbed us even whilst we look'd most wisely upon you. Wherefore I am not to be forced to tell what Booties you have taken; but you, to bring them forth into publick view.

XVI.

Hereupon when the Dictator bid him leave off his Rhetorick, and put him to't either to make a true discovery, or confess that he had fallly accused the Senate, and laid upon them the envy of a fraud they were not guilty of, He said, he would not speak when his Enemies pleased, and so was ordered to be carried to Goal. Then being laid hold on by the Officer, he cryed out, Great Jupiter! Queen Juno! Minerva! with the rest of the Gods and Goddesses, who inhabit in the Capitol and the Castle, will you suffer your Soldier and Protector to be thus tormented by his Enemies? Shall this right hand, wherewith I routed the Gauls from your Shrines, be now in Bonds and Chains? Now there was no one by, whose eyes or ears could endure this indignity: for that City, which was so extraordinary patient under a just Government, had made some Laws which they could not break: nor durst either the Tribunes of the People, or the people themselves lift up their eyes, or so much as open their mouths against the Dictator's Authority. But after Manlius was put into Prison, 'tis certain, that great part of the people changed their cloaths, that many men let their Hair and Beards grow very long, and that a mournful crowd were observ'd to stand at the Prison Gate. The Dictator triumphed over the Volsci: but his triumph got him more envy, than glory: for they murmured and said; It was gain'd at home, not in the Wars: and that it was a triumph over a Citizen, not an Enemy. That there was only one thing lacking to satisfy his pride, and that was, that M. Manlius was not led before his Chariot. And now the business was not far from a Sedition; which to appease, the Senate (though no body desired it) became of a sudden a voluntary Giver, and order'd that a Colony of 2000. Roman Citizens should be carried to Satricum: to each of whom there were assigned two Acres and an half of Land. Which since they lookt upon as very little, bestowed upon a few, and as a reward for betraying M. Manlius, the remedy renewed and heighen'd the Sedition. And now Manlius's party were more remarkable than before for their fordid appearance and guilty looks; and the dread being removed after the triumph by his laying down the Dictatorship, had set both the tongues and minds of men at liberty.

XVII.

Then several people were publickly heard to upbraid the multitude; That they always raised their defenders to a vast height by their favour, but afterward, in the very nick of all their danger forsook them. That Sp. Cassius who invited the Commons into the Country; and Sp. Maelius, who kept the People from famishing at his own charge were so served: and lastly that M. Manlius, who redeemed part of the City, when it was drawn'd and o'whelm'd with Usury, into liberty and light, was so betray'd into the hands of his Enemies. That the common People fed their Countrymen only to be kill'd? Was this to be born, that a Consul's fellow [must be hurried to Prison] because he did not answer at the command of a Dictator? Suppose he had told a lie before, and for that reason had nothing then to say; what Servant was ever punish'd with Bonds for a lie? Did they not remember that night, which was almost the last and an eternal one, to the Roman name? Had they no image of the Gallick Forces, that climb'd the Tarpeian Rock? nor of M. Manlius himself, as they had seen him in Armour, all over sweat and blood, when he rescu'd (almost) great Jove himself out of the Enemies hands? Would they give the preserver of their Country half a pound of Bread for his pains? and suffer him, whom they had made almost Divine, by giving him the Surname of Capitolinus (the name of Jupiter himself) to lie bound in Prison, and in darkness, obnoxious to the pleasure of an Executioner? was one man so able to assist you all, and cannot so many lend him any aid? Now therefore the crowd departed not from that place so much as in the night-time, but threatened to break open the Prison; till that was granted, which they would have had by force, and Manlius, by order of the Senate, was freed from his Bonds. By which means the Sedition was not made an end of, but the Ringleader put in the head of it. At the same time the Latins and Hernicans, together with the Circians, and those of Velitrae, who endeavoured to clear themselves of having any hand in railing the Volscian War, and demanded back their Captives, that they might punish them according to their own Laws, receiv'd sad answers: but those of the Colonies more severe ones; For that they, being Roman Citizens had enter'd into cursed designs of ruining their own Country. They therefore were not only deny'd their Captives, but also (though their Allies in that case were alwayes spared) Proclamation was made in the Senates name; That they should forthwith depart the City, out of the presence and sight of the Roman People, lest the privilege of an Embassy, which was intended for foreigners, not for Citizens, might be no protection to them.

Now when the Manlian Sedition began to break out again, about the end of the Year, the Assembly was held, and there were chosen, for Tribunes Military with Consular Authority, out of the Senate, Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis (a third time) P. Valerius Potitius (a second time) M. Furius Camillus (a fifth time) Ser. Sulpicius Rufus (a second time) C. Papirius Crassus and T. Quintus Cincinnatus a second time. At the beginning of which Year, both the Senate and People had a Peace very seasonably offered them from abroad; the People, for that they, being not call'd away by any levy, had hopes, now they had so potent a Leader, to rout the Usurers: and the Senate, in that their minds were not diverted by any foreign terror from healing their Domestick evils. Wherefore, since both sides were now become more brisk, they were ready to join in the contest: besides that Manlius, having summon'd the People to his House, treated with the chief of them both night and day concerning the methods of innovation, being now somewhat fuller of animosity and fury, than before. For that late disgrace had kindled anger in his mind, who was not used to suffer contumely: and he was the more encouraged, for that the Dictator had not dar'd to do that to him, which Quintus Cincinnatus had done to Sp. Maelius: as also, that not only the Dictator had escap'd the envy of his imprisonment by laying down his Dictatorship, but neither could the Senate themselves have born it. He therefore being at once puffed up and vex'd upon these accounts, incens'd the minds of the People, who were already enflamed; saying: How long, for Heavens sake, will you be ignorant of your own strength, of which nature would not have even brute Beasts to be ignorant? Reckon at least how many you are, and how many Adversaries you have. If you were to engage one to one, yet I am confident, you would fight with more vehemency for your Liberty, than they for Dominion: for look how many Clients have you been about each Patron, so many will you now be against one Enemy. Do but let them see that you are ready to take up Arms and you'll have Peace. Let them see that you are prepared for force, and they'll soon give you back your right. We must all attempt something, or each of us suffer all things. How long will ye stand gazing round about on me? I for my part will not be wanting to assist anyone of you; therefore take you a care, that my Fortune miscarry not. I myself who am your vindicator, when our Enemies thought fit, was on a sudden made no body at all. Yea all of you saw him, who had kept each of you from Bondage, dragg'd into Prison. What have I to hope for, if my Enemies should dare to do any thing more against me? May I expect the fate of Cassius and Maelius? You do well to abominate [any such thoughts.] No the Gods will hinder that; but they'll never come down from Heaven for my sake. They should give you the courage to hinder this, as they did me, in Arms and in my Gown too, to defend you from barbarous Enemies, and your tyrannical fellow Citizens. Has this great People so little a Soul, that you can alwaies think it sufficient to have assistance against your Enemies? Nor will you maintain all conflict with the Senate, unless it be to determine, how far you are willing to be commanded. Nor is this by nature planted in you, but you are Slaves by use. For why do you bear such a slight against Foreigners, as to think it just for you to command them? Because you have used to contend with them for Dominion, but against these persons, to attempt rather than defend your liberty. But what kind of Generals soever you have had, what sort of men soever you your selves were, you have gained all that you aimed at, how great soever, either by your force or Fortune. Wherefore 'tis now time to try even at greater matters. Do but only venture upon your own success and me, who (I hope) have had very happy experience: you will with more ease set up one to Command the Senators, than you did one to resist them in their Commands. Dictatorships and Consulships are to be laid level with the ground, that the Roman Commonalty may lift up their heads. Wherefore stand to it, and forbid any Judgment to pass touching Debts. I profess my self Patron of the Commons; a name, which my care and fidelity has laid upon me. But if you will call your Leader by any other more illustrious Title of Honour or Command, you shall find him more Potent to obtain those things, that you desire. Thereupon, as said, they began to discourse of setting up a King: but it is not plainly signified either with whom [they treated] or to what end their counsels came.

On the other side the Senate held a consultation touching the Peoples retiring into a private House, which was (as it happen'd) in the Castle too, a place very dangerous to their their liberty. Great part of the Citizens cry'd out; They had need of Servilius Ahala, who would not provoke a publick Enemy by ordering men to be haled to Prison, but with the loss of one Citizen, would put an end to a Civil War. Thence they fell to a saying which is lighter in words, but had the same force, viz. That the Magistrates should take care, that M. Manlius's Commonwealth received no detriment. Then the Tribunes, who had Consular Power, and the Tribunes of the People (for, since they saw that there would be the same end of their power, as of the universal Liberty, they had now submitted themselves to the Senates Authority) altogether consulted, what was necessary to be done. And when they found that nothing but violence and slaughter could ensue; and that that must cost them a mighty conflict; then M. Manlius and Q. Publilius, Tribunes of the People [said;] Why do we make that the Controversie of the Senate and the Commons, which ought to be the quarrel of the whole City against one pestilent fellow? Why do we attack him and the People together, whom it is safer for us to set upon with the Peoples Arms; that he may fall even by his own strength? We intend to summon him to his Tryal: nothing is less Popular, than the design of setting up a Kingdom. As soon as the multitude see, that we do not contend with them, they will not only, of Advocates, become Judges, but Accusers also instead of the Commonalty: and look upon their Patrician as the party accused; the Crime in dispute between him and them to be a design to reduce the Commonwealth into a Kingdom; and consequently favour no person or thing more than their own liberty.

XX.

The whole Assembly approving of what they said, they summon'd Manlius to Tryal: which when they had done, the People were at first disturb'd; that is to say, when they saw him in his fordid cloaths, such as persons Accused used to wear: and no man with him, not only of the Senators, but not so much as any of his Relations; no not his very Brothers A. and T. Manlius: which was a thing that till then had never been used; that in such a dangerous case the Relations of the party did not change their Garb. For it was known that when Appius Claudius was put into Bonds, C. Claudius though his Enemy, and all the Claudian Family were in a fordid Garb: but this popular man was taken off by general consent, because he was the first, that revolted from the Senate to the Commons. When the day came, I do not find in any Author, what his Accusers objected against him, relating properly to his design of setting up a Monarchy, besides the meetings of the Multitude, seditious words, his giving money to the People, and his false Information [against the Senate:] though I don't question but the things laid to his charge were very great; since the People deferr'd his Condemnation not in regard to his Cause, but the place [the Campus Martius] where he was Tried. This is worth our observation; that men may know, what and how great actions the immoderate desire of a Kingdom rendered not only ungrateful, but even hateful also. For he is reported to have produced almost 400. men, whose Debts he paid without Usury; whose goods he kept from being sold, and the persons themselves from Slavery. Besides which, he did not only recount his gallant exploits in the Wars, but brought forth into publick view the Spoils of Enemies that he had slain to the number of thirty; presents made to him by Generals, to the number of forty; among which there were two very remarkable mural Crowns, and eight civick ones [i. e. Crowns given for scaling a Wall, or saving a Citizen.] Besides these, he produced several Citizens, whom he had saved from the Foe; among whom was C. Servilius, made Master of the Horse in his absence. And when he had related what he had done in the War, in an Oration that he made equal to the height of his performance; he opened his Breast, which was all over scars, that he had received in the War; and looking ever now and then toward the Capitol, call'd Jupiter and the other Gods down from thence to succour his condition, and pray'd them, that they would give the People of Rome the same resolution in his dangerous circumstances, as they had given him when, for the preservation of the Roman People, he saved the Capitol: and begg'd of every single person and of them all in general, that they would look toward the Capitol and the Castle, and turn to the immortal Gods, when they pass'd Judgment upon him. Now the People being summoned by Centuries into the Campus Martius, where the party accused lifting up his hands toward the Capitol, turned all his prayers from men to the Gods; the Tribunes saw, that, unless they removed peoples eyes too from all objects, that might put them in mind of so gallant an Exploit, they, whose minds were so prepossessed, would never think him guilty of any real Crime: Wherefore they put off his Tryal to another day, and appointed an Assembly of the People to be in the Grove, called Lucus Petelinus, from which there was no prospect into the Capitol. There the Accusation took, and (as they resolved it should) a sad Sentence pass'd upon him, which was hateful even to the Judges themselves. There are some Authors that say, there were Duumvirs created, to enquire into this Treason: [for which Manlius] being Condemn'd was thrown by the Tribunes order down from the Tarpeian Rock: So that the same place was, to the same person, at once a Monument of his extraordinary Renown, and of the severest punishment. There were also marks set upon him after he was dead: whereof one was publick; viz. That, since his House had been, where the Temple of Juno Moneta, and a Work-house stand; it was propos'd to the People, That no Patrician should dwell in the Castle, or the Capitol: and another a mark upon his Family; in that it was provided by a Decree of the Manlian Race, That no man should ever

after

after that time be called M. Manlius. Now this was the end of that man, who, had he not been born in a free City, was a memorable person. The people soon after, when there was no danger from him, remembering his great endowments, wish'd him alive again: and a Pestilence which in a short time ensued (seeing there was no reason that occurred of so great a mortality) seem'd to a great part of the City to have sprung from Manlius's being so punished: [for they said;] That the Capitol was polluted with the blood of him, that preserved it: and that the Gods were angry, that he should be punished just before their eyes, who had rescued their Temples out of the hands of the Enemy.

The next year, after the Plague, a dearth of provisions, and that a rumour touching both those evils had been spread abroad, they had many Wars to engage in; when L. Valerius, (a fourth time) A. Manlius (a third time) Ser. Sulpicius (a third time) L. Lucretius, L. Amilius (a third time) and M. Trebonius were Tribunes of the Soldiers with Consular Authority. For there arose of a sudden a new Enemy (besides the Volsi) who were sent by a kind of fatality, to teaze the Roman Forces) the Circeians, and Velitrae, (two Colonies which had for a long time design'd to revolt) and the suspicion they had of Latinum (even the Lauvians, who had formerly been a very faithful and loyal People. Now the Senate supposing this to happen through contempt, in that the Revolt of the Velitreses, their own Citizens, had been so long unpunished, made a Decree, That a proposal should be made to the People as soon as might be about declaring a War against them: and that the Commons [Officers] for the dividing of the Pomptine Lands, and Triumvirs [Three Officers] to carry a Colony to Nepes. Then they propos'd it to the People, to consent to a War: and accordingly all the Tribes, though the Tribunes were to no purpose against it, were for a War. There were preparations made for the War that Year, but the Army was not led forth by reason of the Pestilence: which delay gave the Colonies time to beg the Senates pardon: and a great many of them were for sending an humble Embassy to Rome, had not the publick danger (as it sometimes falls out) been involved in a private hazard, and the persons, who first advis'd that Revolt from the Romans, (for fear, lest they, who were only obnoxious to that Accusation, should be delivered up as Sacrifices to atone the Roman fury) diverted the Colonies from their thoughts of Peace. Nor was this Embassy obstructed in their Senate only, but great part of the Commons too were perswaded to go out and plunder the Roman Territories: which new affront ruined all their hopes of Peace. There was also a report rais'd that year concerning a revolt of the Prænestines: and upon complaint made of them by the Tusculanes, Gabines and Lavicanes, into whose Countries they had made incursions, the Senate gave such a mild answer, that it was thought, they did not give credit to the accusations, because they had no mind that they should seem to be true.

The next year Sp. and L. Papirius, being two of the new Tribunes Military with Consular power, led the Legions to Velitrae; whilst their four Collegues Ser. Corn. Maluginensis, (a fourth time) Q. Servilius, Ser. Sulpicius, and L. Amilius (a fourth time) were left behind to guard the City, and prevent any disturbances in Etruria, if any new ones should thence arise; all things being there in a suspicious posture. At Velitrae they fought a successful Battel against the Prænestine Auxiliaries, who were full as many as the People of that Colony: so that the nearness of the City was the occasion of the Enemies running away the sooner, and their only refuge after their flight. But the Tribunes did not attack the Town, because it was dangerous; and they did not think fit to engage to the destruction of the Colony. Now there were Letters sent to the Senate at Rome, with news of the Victory, which were sharper against the Prænestine, then the Velitern Enemy: Whereupon there was a War declared, by order of Senate, and consent of the People, against the Prænestines: who joining the Volsi, the year after, storm'd Saturnum, a Colony of the Romans, which was stoutly defended by the Planters, and after their Victory shew'd a great deal of cruelty to the Captives. The Romans, taking that very ill, made M. Furius Camillus (a seventh time) Tribune of the Soldiers; who had for his Collegues A. and L. Postumius Regillensis, with L. Furius, Lucretius, and M. Fabius Ambustus. The Volsian War was assign'd to M. Furius out of course; and he had given him by lot, for his assistant (one of the Tribunes) L. Furius; not so much for the interest of the Commonwealth, as to be the foundation of all praise to his Colleague: not only publicly, in that he repaired what was lost by his rashness; but privately also, in that he rather fought the others good will, than his own glory. Camillus was now very old; but yet the consent of the People was against him, when he would have sworn himself off in the Assembly upon the score of his Age and infirmity: for his wit was quick and his Body brisk; besides that he had his senses all in their full vigour, nor did civil affairs much disturb him in his Warlike undertakings. He therefore having rais'd four Legions consisting of 4000. men, and appointed the Army to meet next day at the Esquiline Gate, went to Saturnum; where those that had taken the Colony, being not at all dismay'd, but confiding in their numbers, in which they were somewhat superior, waited for him. Who when they saw the Romans approach, march'd presently out into the Field, resolving to make no delay, but try one push for all: seeing, by that means, the stratagemas stratagems of their single General, in which alone they put their trust, would do the Enemy, who were so few, no good at all.

XXIII.

There was the same heat both in the Roman Army, and in one of the Commanders: nor did any thing hinder their engaging just at that time, save the advise, and conduct of Camillus, who sought an opportunity of strengthening his Forces with reason for protracting the War. But the Enemy was so much the more urgent; nor did they now set their Army in Array before their own Camp only; but marched into the midst of the Plain, and by bringing their Bulwark near the Enemies Camp, shewed a proud confidence in their own strength. This the Roman Soldiers could not well endure: but much less (one of the Tribunes Military) L. Furius; who as he was fierce and hot both in age and inclination, was also filled with hopes from their number, who took courage even upon the greatest uncertainty. He therefore farther instigated the Soldiers (who were of themselves already incited) by lessening the Authority of his Colleague (the only way he could) upon the score of his Age: saying, That Wars were designed for young men, and that courage grew and decreased with mens Bodies. That he was become, instead of the keenest Warrior, the greatest lingerer: and that he, who was wont to take Camps and Cities, when he came to them, upon the first effort, now spent his time idly within his Bulwark. For what could he hope would be any addition to his own party, or a diminution of the Enemies force? what occasion? what time? what place, to lay an Ambuscade? That the old mans designs were now grown cold and dull. But that Camillus had already lived and got renown enough: what reason therefore had they to suffer the strength of a City, which ought to be immortal, to wax old and feeble with one mortal Body? With this kind of discourse he had turned the whole Camp to his side; and then seeing they desired, in all parts of it, to fight, said; M. Furius! We cannot restrain the bent and inclination of our Soldiers; besides that the intolerable pride of the Enemy, whose courage we, by delays, have augmented, insults over us: do thou therefore, who art but one man, give way to the whole Body, and suffer thy self to be overcome by advice, that thou mayst the sooner Conquer in the War. To which Camillus reply'd; That neither he himself nor the Roman People had ever had cause to repent either of his Conduct or Fortune, in any Wars, which to that day had been left to his sole management. That now he knew he had a Colleague, who was in Commission equal to himself, though he outdid him in Vigour and Youth: so that, as to the Army, he had used to govern, not to be ruled. But he could not withstand his Colleague's Authority; let him do, in the name of Heaven, what he thought best for the Commonwealth. He only desired that his Age might obtain the favour, that he might not be in the Front of the Battle; though to whatsoever was the duty of any old man in War, he would not be wanting. Only this he begg'd of the immortal Gods, that no accident might make his advice commendable. But neither was this his wholsom opinion regarded by men, nor his pious prayers by the Gods: for L. Furius who was for fighting, let the Van in Array, whilst Camillus led the Reer; planted a strong Guard before the Camp; and then stood himself upon a rising ground, as an intent spectator to see the issue of another mans adventure.

XXIV.

As soon as ever they were engaged, the Enemy, out of Policy, not fear, retired: for there was a gentle ascent on their backs, between the Enemies Army and their Camp; and, because they had strength enough, they had left some stout Regiments ready Arm'd and in Battalia, behind them in their Camp, who, when the fight was begun, and the Enemy was come near to their Bulwark, were to fall forth. Now the Romans by following the Enemy, as they gave back, too hastily, were drawn into an inconvenient place and obnoxious to this fall: so that the terror being all turn'd upon the Conquerors, what with their new Enemy, and what through the steepness of the place, disheartened the Roman Army. For the Volscians came fresh upon them, who had made that fall out of the Camp; and they too renewed the fight, who had pretended to run away. And now the Roman Soldiers did not recover themselves, but, forgetting their late briskness, and ancient glory, all turn'd their backs and ran again as fast as possible to their Camp: till Camillus, being lifted up upon his Horse by those, that stood about him, and letting the Rere-guard with all expedition in their way, said, *Is this, fellow Soldiers! that fight, you desired? What man, what God is there, that you can accuse? The first was the effect of your rashness, as this is of your cowardise. You that have followed another Commander, pray, at this time, follow Camillus, and as you use to do by my conduct, Conquer. Why do you look toward the Bulwark and Camp? It shall not entertain one man of you, unless he be Victorious. At first when those that ran away heard this, they stop'd for shame: and soon after, when they saw the Ensigns turn back, and the Army face about, ran upon the Enemy, and the General (who besides that he was famous for so many Triumphs, was venerable for his Age too) put himself into the Front of the Battel, where there was most toil and danger: upon which the Army blam'd, each man, themselves and others; but mutually encouraged one another too with such a chearful shout, as went through the whole Body of them. Nor was the other Tribune behind-hand in the affair; but being sent by his Colleague (who was making good the Body of Foot) to the Horse, did not rebuke them (for his being a sharer in the blame had made that an improper thing for him to do) but turning wholly from Commands to intreaties, desired them one and all, *That they would pardon him for the ill success of that day. For I [said he] though my Colleague were against it, made my self a partner in the rashness of a multitude rather, than in the prudence of one single man. Camillus sees his own glory in both your conditions: but I, unless the fight be renewed shall find (which is a most wretched thing) my Fortune equal with that of you all, but shall suffer disgrace alone. Hereupon it seemed the best way, now that the Army was in such a wavering condition, to quit their Horses and set upon the Foe on foot. And accordingly they marched with glittering Arms and great courage to that part, where they saw the Foot Forces were most put to't: nor did the Commanders, or the Soldiers remit any thing of the greatest demonstration of their courage. So the event prov'd what an assistance their resolute courage was to them; and the Volscians, running that way, which they had lately retreated out of a pretended fear, now under a real consternation, were many of them slain, both in the fight it self, and afterward in their flight: but the rest in the Camp, which was taken at the same time; though there were yet more taken, than kill'd.

the

XXV.

When they took an account of the Captives, a company of Tusculans, who were known to be such, were separated from the rest, and brought to the Tribunes. To whom upon examination they confessed, That they bore Arms by the publick allowance of their Superiors; Camillus therefore, being moved with the fear of so near a War, said, He would carry the Captives immediately to Rome, lest the Senate should be ignorant, that the Tusculans were revolted from their Alliance; and that in the mean time his Colleague (if he thought fit) should Command the Camp and the Army. Now that one day had taught him, not to prefer his own Counsels before better. But yet neither did he himself, nor any one else in the Army think it reasonable, that Camillus should bear the blame of having ruined the Commonwealth: besides that in the Army and at Rome too it was the common report (since their affairs were carried on among the Volsci with such variety of Fortune) That L. Furius had been the occasion of their defeat and flight, but M. Furius had gotten all the renown. When the Captives were brought into the Senate, and the House had declared, That they would make War against the Tusculans, the management of it being committed to Camillus, he desired, that he might have one assistant in the business. Whereupon being petitioned to choose which of his Collegues he pleased; he, contrary to every bodies expectation, chose L. Furius: by which act of good nature, he not only lessened the infamy of his Colleague; but gain'd to himself great honour. But yet for all this there was no War with the Tusculans: who by manifest signs of Peace repelled the Roman force, which by their Arms they could not. For when the Romans entered their Confines, they removed not from any place near the Rode, nor omitted the Tillage of their Lands; besides that the Citizens set the Gates of their City wide open, and went out in their Gowns to meet the Generals; and Provisions were carried out of the City and Country too into the Roman Camp. Camillus therefore, having Encamped before the Gates, was desirous to know, whether there were the same appearance of Peace within the Walls, as had been made in the Country, and so went into the City: where seeing all the doors open as well as the Shops; all things expos'd to publick view; the workmen every one about their own business, and that the Schools founded with the noise which the Scholars in them made; besides that the Streets were fill'd, among the rest of the crowd, with Women and Boys, who went to and fro, as their several occasions led them, he could discover nothing that was like fear in them, or even so much as admiration; but was fain to cast his eyes quite round, to find, where the War had been. For there was no sign either of any things being any where removed, or laid aside for a time; but all things were in such a peaceful posture; that one could hardly have thought they had ever heard of a War.

He therefore being overcome by the patience of the Enemy, ordered their Senate to be called, and told them; Tusculans! You are the only People who have yet found out true Arms, and true Force, to defend your selves from the fury of the Romans. Get you to Rome, to the Senate: they'll tell you, whether you formerly deserved punishment more than now you do pardon. I will not anticipate the honour of a publick kindness; but I'll grant you leave to beg pardon, and the Senate will give such success to your Petitions, as they think fit. When the Tusculans came to Rome, and the Senate of them, who were so lately faithful Allies, was seen to stand with sad countenances in the Porch of the Court, the Roman Senators were presently concern'd at it, and order'd them even at that time, to be call'd in more like Friends than Enemies. Then the Dictator of Tusculum made this Speech: As You, grave Fathers! see us (against whom you have declared and made War) standing in the Porch of your Court, in the same manner were we quipp'd when we went out to meet your Generals, and their Legions. This was our garb, and the garb of our People; and always shall be, unless at any time we take up Arms from you, and for you. We thank your Generals and your Armies too, that they believed their eyes more, than their ears: and where there was no shew of Hostility they themselves made none. We therefore desire of you that Peace which we have kept; and beg, that you would turn your Arms upon those places (if any such there be) that are at War with you. If we must try by suffering, what power your Arms have against us, we'll try it unarmed, that's our resolution: Heaven grant, it may be as successful as it is pious. As to the accusations, at which you were so concern'd as to declare War against us, though they are already confuted by our actions, and need no words to baffle them, yet though they were true, we think it safe enough for us even to confess them, since we have so manifestly repented of them: for we may well grant that we have offended you, when you are worthy to receive such satisfaction. To this effect was the Tusculan Address: who obtained Peace for the present, and not long after the freedom of the City too: so that the Legions were brought back from Tusculum.

XXVII. Camillus having got great honour by his Conduct and courage in the Volscian War, by his success in the Tusculan Expedition, and, upon all occasions, by his patience and moderation toward his Collegue, went out of Office, after the Tribunes Military for the next Year were Elected; whose names were L. and P. Valerius, (Lucius a fifth time, and Publius a third time) C. Sergius (a third time) L. Menenius (a second time) Sp. Papirius, and Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis. That Year they wanted Censors too, by reason of the uncertain report that went about concerning the publick Debts: seeing that the Tribunes of the People aggravated the chief cause of that animosity, though the Creditors were willing to lessen it, whose interest it was, to have the World think that the money was not paid for want of honesty rather than ability in the Debtors. Thereupon they chose for Censors C. Sulpicius Camerinus, Sp. Postumius Regillensis; who had no sooner begun the Pole, but it was interrupted by the death of Postumius, because it was not lawful to create a Collegue to a surviving Censor. Wherefore, when Sulpicius had laid down his Office, there were other Censors created; who being not duly chosen did not bear that Office: and to create a third pair (seeing the Gods did not (as it were) accept of Censors for that Year) was not consistent with their Religion. But the Tribunes said, that was an intolerable cheat put upon the Commons: and, That the Senate were not willing to bear Witness, state the publick Accounts, or look into every mans Estate, because they would not have it known what the publick Debts came to, which would demonstrate that one part of the City was ruined and undone by the other: when at the same time the poor Bankrupt Commonalty were exposed to several Enemies, and Wars were now in all places, without any difference, fought after the Legions having been led from Antium to Satricum, from Satricum to Velitrae and thence to Tusculum. That they bent their Forces now against the Latins, Hernicans, and Praenestines, more out of hatred to their fellow Citizens, than to their Enemies, to wear the Commons in Arms quite out of heart: and not giving them time to breathe, or so much leisure as once to think of liberty; or to appear at a publick Assembly, where they might over-hear the Tribunes discourse touching the method of lessening the Usurers profit, and of putting an end to other grievances. But if the People remembered the ancient liberty of their Fore-Fathers, they would neither suffer any Roman Citizen to be made a slave upon the score of his Debts, nor any Levy to be made, till such time as the Account of them being inspected, some way were thought of to lessen them, and every man knew, what he had of his own and what he ow'd: and, if he had his Body left at liberty, whether that too ought to be put into Slavery. The reward of a Sedition which was thus proposed, soon raised it to an height: for there were many persons condemned to Slavery, and the Senate had ordered, upon the news of the Praenestine War, that there should be new Le-gions raised: both of which, what by the help of the Tribunes and the consent of the Commons together, began to be obstructed: for neither did the Tribunes suffer those that were condemned to be carried away; nor did the younger sort give in their names, seeing the Senate had less regard to the interest of Creditors in getting the money which they had lent, than to the Levy. For now it was reported that the Enemy, who came from Praeneste, were late down in the Sabine Territories. But in the mean time that very report had animated the Tribunes of the People to carry on the contest which they had undertaken, rather than deterred them: nor was there any other means to extinguish Sedition in the City, than by that War, which was advanced even to their very Walls.

XXVIII. For when the Praenestines were told, That there was no Army raised at Rome, nor any General yet pitched upon, but that the Senate and the Commons were set against each other: their Commanders, supposing that a good occasion, forming a Body with all speed, straight wasted all the Country before them, and carry'd their Ensigns up to the Colline Gate. Thereupon the City was in a great consternation, and made a general Alarm, driving one and all up upon the Walls and to the several Gates. So that at last, being diverted from Sedition to War, they chose T. Quintius Cincinnatus Dictator, who made A. Sempronius Atratinus Master of the Horse. Which being once heard (such was the terror of that Magistrate) the Enemy immediately retreated from the Walls, and the younger Romans came together [to be lifted] upon the Dictators order, without any manner of delay. Whilst they were raising the Army at Rome, the Enemy lay Encamped not far from the River Allia. Where ravaging the Country round about they bragg'd to one another, That they had taken a place, which was fatal to the City of Rome: and that the Romans should be in the same fright there again, and run away as fast as they did in the Gallick War. For if the Romans feared a day, that was set apart for Religious Duties, and remark'd with the name of that place; how would they dread Allia it self (which was the Monument of so great a slaughter) more than the Allian day? There they would certainly fancy they saw the killing looks of the Gauls, and the sound of their voice would be in their ears. Thus forming images of vain things with thoughts as vain as them, they repos'd all their hopes in the ominous circumstances and Fortune

Fortune of the place. The Romans on the other side, knew well enough, that, wheresoever they had a Latin Enemy, it was the same, whom they had defeated at the Lake Regillus and kept in slavish Peace for 100. years together. That the place, by being famous for so great a slaughter, would rather incite them to blot out the memory of the dishonour, than make them afraid, lest there might be some Country, which it was not lawful for them to Conquer. Yea, if the Gauls themselves should come against them, that they would fight in that place at the same rate, as they did at Rome, when they retrieved their Country, and as they did the next day at Gabii: then, when they so brought it to pass, that there was no one of the Enemies, who had entered the Walls to carry the news of that good and ill fortune home: and with these resolutions on both sides they came to Allia.

The Roman Dictator, after the Enemy was in fight, and ready to fight, said; A. Sempronius! dost see, how they are come to Allia as trusting in the fortune of the place? I wish the Gods may give them nothing, that may be a greater security, or assistance to them. But do they rely upon thy Arms, the courage of our men, and charge in full career the main Body of their Army: whilst I with the Legions will attack them, when they are disordered and in a consternation. Be witness, Assist us, Oh ye Gods! that are Witnesses to our League; and take due revenge both for the offence committed against you, and the cheat put upon us by making use of your sacred Names. The Praenestines could not bear the shock either of the Horse, or Foot; but their Ranks were confounded at the first onset and shout; and soon after, seeing their Army could not, in any part, stand their ground, turn'd their backs. Whereupon being consternated, they ran, through the force of their fear, even beyond their own Camp; nor did they stop, before they were within sight of Praeneste. There those that remained after their flight took a certain place, which they could quickly fortify with tumultuary works: lest, if they had gone within the Walls, the Country might presently have been burnt, and, when all things were laid waste, a siege laid to the City. But when the Victorious Roman, having rifled the Camp at Allia, was come up, they left that Fortrefs too; and scarce thinking the Walls secure, shut themselves up in the Town of Praeneste. There were eight Towns more under the Dominion of the Praenestines: to each of which the War was transferred, and, after they were one after another with no great difficulty taken, the Army was carried to Velitrae; which was likewise taken. Then they came to Praeneste the chief Seat of the War, which they retook not by force, but surrender. T. Quintius, after he had been Victorious in one set Battel, taken two Camps of the Enemies, and nine Towns by Storm (besides Praeneste, upon surrender) return'd to Rome: and brought in Triumph a Statue of Jupiter Imperator from Praeneste into the Capitol. It was dedicated between the Shrine of Jupiter and Minerva, and a Table hung under it, as a Monument of his Exploits with an Inscription to this effect: Jupiter and all the Gods were pleas'd, that T. Quintius the Dictator should take nine Towns. The twentieth day after he was created, he laid down his Dictatorship.

Then they held the Assembly for choosing of Tribunes Military with Consular Authority: at which the number of Patricians and Plebeians was made equal; for out of the Senate were elected P. and C. Manlius, with L. Julius, and the People chose C. Sextilius, M. Albinus and L. Antistius. To the Manlii (for that they were above the Plebeians in point of Birth, and in greater favour too than Julius) was allotted the Province of the Volsci out of course, without casting Lots or so much as any debate or conference [among his Collegues:] whereof not only they a while after, but the Senate too, that had given it to them, repented. For before they had searched the Country, they sent out certain Troops to Forage: concerning whom there was false news brought as if they had been circumvented. Whereupon the Manlii making all the haste they could to relieve them (without securing the author of the report, who was a Latin Enemy, instead of a Roman Soldier which he told the Generals he was) ran themselves headlong into an Ambuscade. Where whilst relying only upon the Soldiers valour, they made what resistance they could in such a disadvantageous place, killing and being kill'd, the Enemy in the mean time invaded the Roman Camp that lay upon a Plain on the other side. And indeed these Generals ruin'd all their affairs upon all occasions through their rashness and want of skill: and what remained (of their Armies) that the Fortune of the Roman People and the courage of the Soldiers, which was steady even without a Governour, preserved. These things being related at Rome; they thought fit first to make a Dictator: upon which when news came that all things in the Volscian Territories, were at quiet; and it appeared, that they did not know how to make use of Victory and good occasions, the Armies and Generals were called back from thence too: nor had the Romans any more disturbance from those parts than from the Volsci: save that there was a rumour at the latter end of the Year, that the Praenestines had got the Latin People to join with them and rebelled. The same Year there was a new Colony carried to Setia, upon their complaint that they wanted Inhabitants: and though they had not had so good success in War, they enjoyed the comfort of quiet at home, which was owing to the good will that the Commons bore to the Tribunes Military and their Authority among those of their own Order.

XXXI. At the beginning of the next Year there broke out a great Sedition, when Sp. Furius, U. C. 378. Q. Servilius (a second time) C. Licinius, P. Clælius, M. Horatius and L. Geganius were Tribunes Military with Consular Authority. The ground and cause of this Sedition was the Peoples Debts: which to inquire into Sp. Servilius Priscus and Q. Clælius Siculus were made Censors, but were hindered from doing that business by a War. For frightened Messengers first of all, and after that a general concourse of people out of the Country brought word, That the Volscian Legions were come into the Roman Confines, and were a ravaging all before them. In which consternation so far were their civil contests from being restrained by foreign terror, that on the contrary the Tribunes were so much the more violent to hinder the Levy; till conditions were imposed upon the Senate; That no man, till the War was over, should pay Tribute, or give any judgment concerning the money that was lent: which relaxation being accepted by the Commons, there was no stop put to the Levy. When the new Legions were raised, they thought fit, That the Legions should be divided and two several Armies led into the Volscian Territories. Sp. Furius and M. Horatius went to the right hand toward the Sea-coast and to Antium, whilst Q. Servilius and L. Geganius went to the Mountains on the left hand, toward Ecetra. But they met not the Enemy on either hand; and therefore they plundered the Countrey, not in that stragling manner as the Volscians did, (who took their Booty more like thieves than Soldiers, in a consternation and in haste, as relying only upon the discord of the Romans, and fearing their courage) but, as they were a compleat Army, so was their fury proportionable; yea in time too great and severe. For the Volsci, fearing, lest the Army should come out of Rome in the mean time, made inroads into the utmost borders of their Country; but the reason why the Roman on the other hand continued even in the Enemies Country was, that he might provoke his Enemy to fight. Wherefore when they had burnt all the Country Houses and some Villages also, and not left any fertile tree, nor so much as Seed to give them hopes of any fruit to come, they drove away all the Booty of Men and Cattel that was to be found without the Walls and so led both their Armies back to Rome.

XXXII. After the Debtors had had some little respite to breath in, now that things were secure from all Enemies, judicial proceedings began again to take place: and they were so far from having any hopes of lessening the old Interest-money, that a new Debt was contracted by a contribution toward the making of a Wall for which the Censors had agreed, that it should be built with square Stone. Which burden the Commonalty were forced to submit to, because the Tribunes of the People had no'r a Levy to hinder. They were likewise compelled by the power of the Nobility to make all the Tribunes Military Patricians, whose names were L. Æmilius, P. Valerius (a fourth time) C. Veturius, Ser. Sulpicius, L. and U. C. 379. C. Quintius Cincinnatus. By the same means they prevailed so far, as to raise three Armies against the Latins and the Volscians; who then had join'd their Forces and lay Encamp'd at Satricum (for there was no body that withstood the Lifting of all the younger sort) one to Guard the City; another to be sent upon sudden Expeditions, if any rising should happen elsewhere; and the third, which was much the strongest, to be led to Satricum by P. Valerius and L. Æmilius. Where having found the Enemies Army ready marshall'd in a plain, they presently engaged: but before they had perfected their Victory, a violent storm of Rain forced them to quit the Combat. The next day, they renewed the fight: and for some time the Latin Legions especially, who had by their long Alliance been thoroughly taught the Roman Discipline, with equal courage and fortune made resistance. But the Horse charging up broke their Ranks; upon which disorder the Foot too came in: and as the Roman Army got ground, so the Enemy still lost it; till at last, when the day was like to be theirs, the Roman force became intolerable. So the Enemy being routed, (since they made to Satricum, which was two miles distant, and not to their own Camp, were slain chiefly by the Horse; and their Camp taken and rifled. From Satricum, the night next after the Battel, they went in a kind of flying Body to Antium: whither though the Roman Army pursued them at the very heels, yet their fear was swifter, than the Roman fury. By which means the Enemy got within the Walls, before the Romans could overtake, or stop the very Reer of their Body. After that they spent some days in ravaging the Country; since neither the Romans were furnished with due Provisions to attack the Walls, nor the Enemy with force enough to endure a Battel.

XXXIII. Then there arose a Sedition between the Antians and the Latins: in that the Antians, being overcome with their misfortunes and subdued by War (in which they were not only born, but now grown old) were inclined to a Surrender; but their revolt, after a long Peace, had made the Latins, whose courage was yet entire, more resolute to persevere in War. The thing that put an end to this contest was, that both of them were at last convinced, they could neither of them hinder the other from prosecuting their design. So the Latins went forth and vindicated themselves (as they supposed) from the Alliance of a dishonourable Peace: and the Antians, being rid of such troublesome judges of their wholesome Counsels, Surrendered their City and Country to the Romans. Thereupon the fury and rage of the Latins, because they could neither hurt the Romans by a War, nor keep the Volsci still in Arms, broke out to that degree, that they set fire on the City of Satricum, which which had been their first refuge after their defeat: nor was there any Building in that City left standing (for they threw fire-brands into all places both Sacred and Profane) except the Temple of Matuta: though 'tis said, it was not their Religion, nor their fear of the Gods, which kept them from violating that too, but a dreadful voice, that was heard out of the Temple with sad menaces, if they did not remove their wicked fire far from those sacred Walls. Now when they were inflam'd with that rage, their fury carry'd them to Tusculum, to take revenge upon that People; for that they, having deserted the Common Council of the Latins, had made themselves not only Allies but Citizens of Rome. And so happening to come thither at unawares as the Gates were wide open, they took all the Town, except the Castle, upon their shout. The Towns-men with their Wives and Children fled all into the Castle; and sent Messengers to Rome, to inform the Senate of their condition. Upon that there was an Army carried to Tusculum with such speed as became the honour of the Roman People; which was Commanded by L. Quintius, and Ser. Sulpicius, two Tribunes Military. There they saw the Gates of Tusculum shut, and the Latins, who had the concern of Besiegers and People besieged at once upon them, defending (on the one hand) the Walls, and (on the other) attacking the Castle; so that they terrified others and were themselves at the same time affrighted: but the arrival of the Romans had changed the resolutions of both parties. For it had reduced the Tusculans from a great fear to the greatest cheerfulness, and dejected the Latins from an almost certain confidence of taking the Castle (because they had already taken the Town) to small hopes of themselves. Then there was a shout set up by the Tusculans in the Castle; which was seconded by a greater from the Roman Army; and the Latins were hard put to't on both sides. Nor could they now either endure the efforts of the Tusculans, who sallied down from the higher ground, or beat off the Romans who were getting up the Walls and endeavouring to unbar the Gates. But the Walls were first taken with their scaling Ladders: and then the Bars of the Gates were broken: and seeing there were two Enemies at once upon them, one before, the other behind; and that they had neither strength to fight, nor room to run away, they were all slain upon the place even to a man. When they had recovered Tusculum from the Enemy, the Army was led back to Rome.

But look how much more quiet all things were, that year, abroad, by reason of their XXXIV. success in War, so much more did the Tyranny of the Senate, and the miseries of the Commons daily increase at home; since for that very reason, that they were all forced to pay their Debts together, their ability to pay was impeded. Wherefore seeing there was nothing to be had in specie, they satisfied their Creditors by ignominy and corporal punishment by being condemned as Cheats, and made Slaves of; and that Penalty went for payment. By this means not only the lowest, but even the chiefest of the Commonalty were so cast down, that no understanding and experienced man had the courage, not only to stand for the Tribuneship of the Soldiery, among the Patricians, (which was a point, that they had so earnestly endeavoured to gain) but to sue for, or take upon them even Plebeian Offices; so that the Senate seemed to have for ever recovered the possession of that honour, which was only usurp'd by the Commons for some few years. But to take off the other party's jollity, a small reason (as it often does) of attempting a great matter interven'd. M. Fabius Ambustus, a potent man, not only among those of his own Rank, but with the Commons also, (for that he was thought among that sort of people not to despise them) had two Daughters; the Elder of which was Married to Ser. Sulpicius, and the Younger to C. Licinius Stolo, an eminent Person, though a Plebeian: and his not contemning that Affinity got Fabius great good will among the Vulgar. Now it so fell out, that, as these two Sisters were talking (as 'tis usual) one with the other at Ser. Sulpicius's House, one of Sulpicius's Listers [or Servants,] when he came home from the Court, knock'd with a Rod (as the custom is) at the door. At which the younger Sister, who was not used to any such custom, being frighted, her Sister laughed at her, and wondred that she should be ignorant what the matter was. But that laughter incensed her very much (as Womens minds are easily disturb'd upon the least occasion) besides that, I suppose, seeing how many people followed Sulpicius, asking him, What Service he had to command them? made her think her Sister was happily Married; and therefore she lamented her own fortune, out of a dissatisfaction that every body has when they are outdone by their Relations. Her Father happening to see her in that confusion through her late grief of mind, ask'd her, what she ail'd? To which she reply'd, but pretended some other cause of her sorrow (but it was neither so kind as it ought to have been in respect to her Sister, nor very honourable in regard to her Husband) till at last by mild Questions he got her to confess, The cause of her grief was, that she was Married to a Man below her, and into a Family, that was not capable either of Honour or common Favour. Upon which Ambustus comforting his Daughter, bad her, be of good cheer; and she should ere long see the same Honours at her House, that she had seen at her Sisters. Then he began to advise with his Son-in-Law, taking L. Sextius also into the Consult, who was a strenuous young man, and wanted nothing, that could be hoped for, except it were to be of a Nobly Family.

XXXV. Now they thought the best ground for innovation was the Peoples vast Debts; which evil the Commonalty could not hope to alleviate, but by placing some of their own Party in the highest Offices. They therefore thought it their business to contrive that; not but that the Plebeians, by their industry and endeavours had gone so far in it already, that if they push'd on, they might arrive at the highest pitch, and equal the Senators, as much in Honour as in Courage. For the present they look'd upon it as necessary that there should be Tribunes of the People chosen; that by that Dignity they might open a way for themselves to other Honours: and accordingly there were Elected for Tribunes, C. Licinius and L. Sextius who promulgated Laws, that were all against the power of the Nobility, and for the good of the Commons: one, concerning the Debts; That, deducting that from the principal, which had been paid for Use; that which remained should be paid in three Years in equal portions: another, concerning the measure of Lands; that no man should have above 500. Acres: and a third; That there should be no Assembly for choosing Tribunes Military, and that one of the Consuls should be elected out of the Commons: all which were very great things, and could not be obtained without the greatest and most vigorous opposition. Wherefore when all that men so much desire, (as Lands, Money and Honours) was at stake, the Senate being in a great fright, and finding no other remedy for their publick and private designs but an Interposition, which they had experience of in many Conteſts heretofore; they got their Collegues to thwart those Tribunes Proposals: who, when they saw the Tribes summoned by Licinius and Sextius to give their Votes, they, Guarded by the Senate, would neither suffer the Bills to be read, nor any other solemn Act to be done for the People to pass into a Law. And now after the Assembly had been often call'd to no purpose, the Bills being thrown out; Very well, said Sextius; since you are pleased to lay such stress upon an Intercession, we'll defend the Commons with the very same Weapon. Come on, you Gentlemen of the Senate; pray appoint an Assembly for the choosing of Tribunes Military: I'll see, that the Word Veto [i. e. I forbid it] which you now with so much joy hear our Collegues unanimously pronounce. Nor did their menaces prove vain: for there were no Assemblies held but for choosing of Ediles, and Tribunes of the People. Licinius, and Sextius being made Tribunes of the People again suffered no Curule Magistrates [such as came to the Senate in their Chariots] to be chosen; and that defect of Magistrates, occasioned by the Commons choosing two Tribunes the same that were the year before, and their obstructing the Assembly for choosing Tribunes Military, continued in the City for five years.

All other Wars were at an end; but the Colony at Velitrae, being grown wanton through long ease, because there was no Roman Army, not only made incursions into the Roman Territories, but attack'd the Town of Tusculum also. Which action, (when the Tusculans, their old Allies and new fellow Citizens desired their aid) made not only the Senate, but the Commons also very much ashamed. The Tribunes therefore remitting their intercession, there was an Assembly held by an Interrex: at which there were chosen for Tribunes Military, L. Furius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpicius, Ser. Cornelius, with A. and C. Valerius, who did not find the People in any wife so obedient at the Levy, as in the Assembly. But nevertheless having with much ado raised an Army, they not only removed the Enemy from Tusculum, but forced them into their own Walls; and Velitrae was now Besieged with much greater vigour, than Tusculum had been before. But yet it could not be taken by those, who first began to besiege it. There were new Tribunes Military first created, whose names were, Q. Servilius, C. Veturius, A. and M. Cornelius, Q. Quintius, and M. Fabius; though even these Tribunes also did nothing at Velitrae worth remembering. Things were now in greater danger at home: for besides Licinius and Sextius, that made several Laws, and were now the eighth time made Tribunes one year after another, Fabius also being a Tribune Military, and Stolos Father in Law, said he would certainly stand up for those Laws that he had formerly proposed. And whereas there had been eight of the College of Tribunes Plebeians at first against those Laws, there were now but five only; who (as it usually happens among those, that revolt from their party) being blinded in their understanding spoke other mens words and back'd their Intercession with nothing but what they had been taught at home: saying; That a great part of the Commons were absent in the Army at Velitrae: that the Assembly ought to be deferred till the coming of the Soldiers, that the whole Commonalty might Vote for their own good. Sextius and Licinius with part of their Collegues, with Fabius, one of the Tribunes Military, who had learnt by experience in so many years time, to manage the People, seized the chief of the Senate, whom they called forth [to answer for themselves] by interrogating them upon the several Cases, which were proposed to the People: How durst they desire, that, when the Commons had but two Acres of Land apiece, they might have above 500? That they might each of them enjoy the Estate of almost 300. Citizens, when a Commoners Land was scarce enough to build a convenient House upon, or for a Burial place? Would you have the poor Commons, who are overwhelmed with Usury, unless they'll pay that, rather than the Principal, deliver their Bodies up to bonds and torture: and to be bated in droves every day out of the Forum into Slavery? Noblemens Houses to be fill'd with Prisoners? and a private Jayle to be, wherever any Patrician dwells?

Having

Having inveighed against these base and wretched doings, before the People, who stood in fear of their Creditors, so as that they stirred up greater indignation in their Audience, than in themselves, they farther affirm'd; That the Senate would never make an end of getting the publick Lands into their own hands; nor murdering the People with Usury, till the Commons had chosen one of the Consuls out of their own Body, to be the keeper and maintainer of their Liberty. That the Tribunes of the People were now contemned, as being an Order, who by interceding themselves destroy'd their own Authority. That there could be no right done, as long as the Consuls had all the power of commanding, and they only of forbidding; and that till the right of commanding was communicated the Commons would never have an equal share in the Commonwealth. Nor ought any man to think it enough, that there should be some respect had to the Commons in the Consular Assemblies; for unless it were made absolutely necessary, that one of the Consuls should be a Commoner, no Plebeian would ever be chosen. Had they already forgot, though it was Voted, that they would choose Tribunes Military rather than Consuls, for that very reason, that the Commons also might be advanced to the highest Honours, yet there has not been one Tribune Military chosen out of the Commonalty these four and forty years? How could they imagine, that they would willingly bestow Honour upon the People, where there was but two Places to dispose of, who had been used to fill eight places with [Patricians] at their choice of Tribunes? or that they would suffer any way to be made to the Consulship, who had so long blocked up the Tribuneship? But that might be gained by a Law, which could not be obtained by favour; and therefore they ought to put one of the Consuls places out of dispute, for the People to have access to: because if it were left in question, it would always be theirs, that could make the best interest. Nor could that be now said, which they were formerly wont to throw out; viz. that there were none among the Commons, fit to make curule Magistrates. For has the Commonwealth been managed with more sloth or imprudence since P. Licinius was Tribune, who was the first that was chosen out of the Commonalty, than it was in those times, when none but Patricians were Tribunes Military? No, quite contrary; for some Patricians, after their Tribuneship, were condemn'd [for what they had done in their Office] and so was never any Plebeian. The Questors too [they said] as well as the Tribunes Military, began a few years ago to be elected out of the Commons: nor did the Roman People repent of ever an one of them. That the People therefore had nothing now to get but the Consulship; which was the very Fortress and Pillar of their Liberty. If they once arrived at that, then the People of Rome would think that their Kings were certainly banished, and their Liberty was secured. For from that day the People would be possessed of all things, wherein the Senate outdid them; viz. Authority, Honour, the glory of War, Birth, and Quality; which were great things for them in their own Persons to enjoy, but greater, to be left to their Posterity. When they saw that these kind of Speeches were acceptable, they promulgated a new Bill; That, instead of Duumvirs [two Officers] to look after the Sacrifices, there should be Decemvirs [Ten such] created; in such a manner, that part of them should be chosen out of the Commons and part out of the Senators: but they deferred the Assembly, to pass those Bills, till the coming of that Army, which was then besieging Velitrae.

But the Year was at an end, before the Legions were brought back from Velitrae: and therefore the business touching those Laws was put off for the new Tribunes Military [to finish:] for the Commons chose the same Tribunes again, and especially those two, that were the proposers of those Laws. The persons elected for Tribunes Military were T. Quintius, Ser. Cornelius, Ser. Sulpicius, Sp. Servilius, L. Papirius, and L. Veturius. At the very beginning of the Year they came to the last push about the Laws; and when the Tribes were called, seeing no Intercession of their Collegues withstood the proposers, the affrighted Senate fled to their two last shifts, their highest Authority, and their chiefest Magistrate; resolving to make a Dictator. The person made choice of was M. Furius Camillus, who took L. Amilius for his Master of the Horse. The proposers of the Laws too, seeing so great preparations made by their Adversaries, did not only themselves strengthen the Cause of the Commons with great resolutions, but also appointed an Assembly of the People and called the Tribes to give their Votes. When the Dictator, compassed round with a Band of Patricians, had late him down, full of wrath and menaces; seeing the matter was argued at first with the same earnestness as before, between the Tribunes of the People who proposed, and opposed any Law; and that the more powerful of right the Intercession was, the more it was overborn by the favour that was shewed both to the Laws themselves and those that proposed them; yea that the first Tribes passed them: Then Camillus said; Romans! since the passion of the Tribunes and not lawful Authority now guides you; and that you evacuate all Intercession (which was formerly gain'd by a secession of the Commons) by the same force that you procured it; I, as Dictator (not upon the publick account, more than for their sakes) will stand by their Intercession: and will by my Authority defend their right of giving a negative Vote to aid the Commons. Wherefore if C. Licinius and L. Sextius yield to the Intercession of their Collegues, I'll not put any Patrician Magistrate into the Assembly of the Commons. But if they strive, against the Intercession, to impose Laws upon the City, as though it were taken [by an Enemy] I will not suffer the Tribunes power to be by it self dissolved. Now, when, in opposition to what he said, the Tribunes of the People went on with their business as fast as before: then Camillus, being mightily enraged, sent the Dictors

Lictors [Serjeants] to turn the Common People out of the Assembly; adding these menaces; That if they went on, he'd make all the younger sort take the Military Oath, and carry an Army forthwith out of the City. This put the Commonalty into a great fright, but it rather heightened than lessened the resolutions of their Ringleaders: but he, before the matter was determined one way or t'other, laid down his Office: either because he was not duly created, as some say; or because the Tribunes of the People proposed to the People, and they Enacted, That if M. Furius had done any thing as Dictator, he should be fined 500000. Deneeres. But I am apt to think that he was deterred by the Auspices more, than any new sort of Bill, that was proposed; and that not only upon the score of his disposition, but because P. Manlius was immediately made Dictator in his stead: (for to what purpose was it to make a Dictator to decide that Controversie, in which M. Furius had been overcome?) and also because the same M. Furius was Dictator the next Year; who resolved, not without shame no doubt, to recover that Authority, which had been diminished the year before in him: yea farther, because at the same time, that they proposed to mulct him, he might either have opposed this Bill too, whereby he saw himself so treated, or at least not hindered those, for the sake of which this was made: and lastly, because even to this day, as long as ever the Tribunes and the Consuls have contended one with another, the Dictatorship has advanced still higher, and higher.

XXXIX. Between the time that the former Dictatorship was laid down, and the new one taken up by Manlius, there was an Assembly of the People held (as in a kind of Interregnum) by the Tribunes: at which it appears, which of the Laws proposed were most grateful to the People, and which to the proposers of them: for they consented to the Bills touching Usury and the Lands, but rejected that which was for one of the Consuls being chosen out of the Commonalty: and both those matters had been accomplished, had not the Tribunes said, That they consulted the People upon all together. After that P. Manlius the Dictator favoured the Commons, and made C. Licinius, who had been a Tribune Military, Master of the Horse, though a Commoner: That, I am told, the Senate took ill; and that the Dictator was wont to excuse himself to them upon the score of his near relation to Licinius: but said at the same time; That the Dignity of a Master of the Horse was no greater, than that of a Consular Tribune. Licinius and Sextius, after the Assembly for choosing of Tribunes of the People was appointed, so behaved themselves, that, by saying they had now no mind to have that honour continued to them, they incited the Commons more than ever to do what they pretended to refuse. They said; They had been now nine Years exposed, as in a Battel, against the Nobility, to the greatest hazard imaginable of their own persons and Estates, but without any benefit to the Commonwealth. That now both the Bills that were promulgated and all the strength of the Tribunes power was grown old, as they were. That their Laws were opposed, first of all, by the Intercession of the Collegues: secondly, by sending away the Youth to the War at Velitræ; and lastly, that there was a Dictatorian thunderbolt prepared against them. But that now neither their Collegues, nor any War, or Dictator withstood them; for the Dictator had given a good omen that he would agree to have a Plebeian Consul, by making a Plebeian Master of the Horse. That the Commonalty only hindered themselves and their own advantages. That they, if they pleased, might soon have the City rid of the Creditors, and the Lands free from the unjust Possessors of them: which benefits when would they esteem so gratefully as they ought, if, whilst they had Bills proposed for their own advantage, they cut off all hopes of Honour from the proposers of them? That it did not suit with the modesty of the Roman People to desire, that they might be eased of the Usury; and to be instated in Lands, that were wrongfully kept from them, by those great Men, through whom they got those things; and yet to leave old men, that had been Tribunes, not only without Honour, but without so much as the hopes of it. Wherefore they advised them to consider with themselves what they would have: and after that declare their pleasure in the Assembly for choosing of Tribunes. If they desired to have all the promulgated Bills pass'd together, they ought to make the same persons Tribunes again: for they should carry what they had proposed: but if they would barely accept of what was needful for every one in his private capacity, there was no need of continuing an envied honour; nor should either they themselves have the Tribuneship, or the People, what was promulgated.

XL. Upon this obstinate Speech of the Tribunes, though the indignity of what they said had struck the rest of the Senate with amazement and silence, to hear it; Ap. Claudius Crassus, they say, stood forth, more out of hatred and anger, than any hopes he had to oppose them; and spoke to this purpose: Romans! it is no new, or unexpected thing, if I too at this time hear, what has been always objected against our Family by the seditious Tribunes: viz. That to the Claudian Race nothing has ever been from the first rise of it, more sacred in this Commonwealth, than the Majesty of the Senate: and that they were always Enemies to the Peoples advantages. The one of which charges I neither deny, nor go about to disprove: viz. That we, ever since we have been taken into the City and the Senate, have done our utmost endeavour, that it might be truly said, the Majesty and grandeur of these Families, among which you were pleased to place us, has been rather augmented, than diminished. But as to the other, Romans! I dare vouch both for my self and my Ancestors (unless any man thinks, those things, that are done for the good of the Commonwealth in general, are disadvantageous to the Commons; as tho' they lived in another City) that we never did any thing, to our knowledge, either as private men, or in any Office, which was injurious to the Common People: and that no man can truly tell of one word or action of ours against their interest, though some there were against their wills. Could I forbear, though I were not come of a Noble Family, but an ordinary Roman, who only knew my self to be born of ingenious Paternal Tribunes (forsooth) have taken so much liberty these nine years, wherein they have domineered like Kings, as to say, they'll not give you the freedom of Voting, either in Assemblies, or in making of Laws. You, says he, shall make us the tenth time Tribunes upon condition. What's that, but as if they should say, What others desire, we so much disdain, that we will not accept of it without some great reward? But pray, what is that reward, for which we may have you still Tribunes of the People? Why, that you accept (says he) of our Proposals, whether they please or displease you, whether profitable or unprofitable, all together. I beseech you, the Tarquinian Tribunes your good leave, let us choose, out of these Bills, those that we think wholesome for us; and reject the rest. No, says he, you shan't. Thou [Citizen, whose thou art] wouldst give thy Vote concerning Use-money, and the Lands, which belongs to you all; and may not this Miracle then be done in Rome, for thee to see (what thou abhorrest and abominat'st) L. Sextius and Licinius here, were ready to starve, Poison and good Meat at the same time; and then command him, either to abstain from that which was wholesome Food, or mix them both together. Would not a great many upon this score, if this were a free City, cry out; Get thee gone with thy Tribuneships and thy Bills? What thou dost not propose, that which is advantageous to the People, will there be nobody else to do it? If any Patrician, if any Claudius (which they would have to be a more envied name) should say, either take all, or I'll offer you nothing; which of you, Romans! would endure it? Will you never consider things, rather than persons? but always hear, whatever such a Magistrate says, with great regard, and turn your ears from what any of us say? But truly, your manner of speaking is not at all like that of Citizens. What? What sort of Bill is it, which they are angry that you reject? Why, Romans! 'tis much like this: viz. I, says he, desire, that you may not have leave to make such Consuls, as you think fit. Does he say any thing else, who orders you to choose one Consul out of the Commonalty; and will not let you have the power to choose two Patricians? If there were Wars now, such as the Etrurian War was, when Porcena was got upon Janiculum: or such as the Gallick War of late, when, except the Capitol and the Camp, all these things were in the Enemies hands: and L. Sextius there stood for the Consulship with M. Furius here, or any other Senator; could you endure that Sextius should certainly be Consul, and that Camillus should storm for being repulsed? Is this the way to make Honours common [to both Orders]? by making it lawful for two Plebeians to be chosen Consuls, but not two Patricians? or imposing it as necessary that one be chosen out of the Commons, and leaving it at liberty whether either of them shall be a Patrician, or no? What society, what equality is this? Is it a small matter, if thou comest in for a part of that wherein thou never hadst any share before, unless, whilst thou desirest a share, thou take the whole along with it? If fear, says he, left, if it be lawful to choose two Patricians, you will choose ne'r a Plebeian. What's that, but as much as to say; because you will not willingly choose those that are unworthy, I'll lay a necessity upon you of choosing kindness to the Peoples favour, that, if one Plebeian stand with two Patricians, he may say, he was chosen by the Law, and not by their Votes?

They seek, how they may extort, not how to sue for Honours; and resolve so to obtain the greatest Honours, as not to owe so much for them as for the least; choosing to stand for great Offices, when they have opportunities, not upon the score of their deserts. Is there any man, who disdains to be looked into, or valud? who thinks it reasonable that he alone should be sure of such and such Honours, among a company of Competitors that struggle for them at the same time? who will not submit himself to your judgment? who would make your Votes, instead of voluntary, necessary, and instead of free ones, servile? I pass by Licinius and Sextius, whose years of perpetual power you number, like those of Kings, in the Capitol. Who is there in this City so abject, but that he is in a readier way to the Consulship, by the help of this Law, than any of us or our Children? For you cannot choose us sometimes though you'd never so fain, but you are forced to choose them, even against your wills. But I have said enough of the indignity [of these things] (for Dignity belongs to men) what shall I say of the Religious Rites and Auspices [being abused], which is an immediate contempt and affront to the immortal Gods? That this City was Built by the direction of the Soothsayers, and that all things both in War and Peace, at home and abroad, were done by the same Authority, who knows not? Who then had the care of the Auspices committed to them, according to the usage of our Ancestors? Why the Senate had. For no Plebeian Magistrate is created with that Ceremony. Yea so peculiar are the Auspices to us, that the People must not only create what Patrician Magistrates they do create according as the Soothsayer directs, but we also our selves without the Vote of the People can duly declare an Interrex; and have Auspices in private, which they have not even among their Magistrates. What then does he do less than take away the Auspices, who by making Plebeians Consuls, takes them from the Senate, who are the only persons that can have them? Let them now laugh at Religious Rites: for what matter is't, if the Chickens will not feed? if they go but slowly out of the Coop? if a Bird bode ill luck? These are small matters: but yet our Ancestors made this the greatest State in the World by not condemning these small things. We on the contrary in our Age, as though we needed not the favour of the Gods, pollute all Ceremonies. Then let Priests, Soothsayers and the chief Sacrificers be chosen out of the dregs of the People; let us put Jupiter's Priest's Mitre upon any Bodies head, so he be but a Man, and let us deliver the Ancilia [sacred Shields] the Temples, the Gods and the care of them to Villains: let no Laws be made nor Magistrates created with any due Ceremony; nor the Senate give Authority to the Centuriate Assemblies: but let Sextius and Licinius, like Romulus and Tatius, Reign in the City of Rome; because they give away other mens moneys, and other mens Lands: such a sweetness there is in preying upon other peoples Estates. Nor do you consider, that by the one of your Laws there are vast Deserts like to be made in the Country, by driving the right owners out of their Possessions; and that by the other their credit is ruined, with which all human Society is destroyed. Now upon all these accounts I think you ought to reject and throw out these Bills. Whate'r you do, I pray the Gods may prosper.

XLII. This Speech of Appius's so far prevailed upon them, that the time of passing the Bills was deferred: and the same Tribunes, Sextius and Licinius, were chosen again, who pass'd a Law for the Electing of the Decemvirs, who took care of the holy Rites, half out of the Commonalty. So there were five chosen out of the Senate, and five out of the Commons: and by that step they thought they now made some progress toward the Consulship. The People, being content with this Victory gave way to the Senate, and omitting any mention of Consuls for the present, let Tribunes Military be chosen. The persons chosen were A. and M. Cornelius (a second time) M. Geganius, P. Manlius, L. Veturius, and P. Valerius, a sixth time. But now, when, besides the siege of Velitrae (a thing, whereof the issue was more slow, than doubtful) the Roman affairs were all quiet abroad; a sudden report of a Gallick War forced the City to make M. Furius a fifth time Dictator; and he chose T. Quintius Pennus Master of the Horse. Claudius says, that they fought with the Gauls that year about the River Anien: and that there was a famous Combat, upon a Bridge, between T. Manlius and a Gaul, that challenged him hand to hand, in the fight of the two Armies; in which Manlius kill'd the Gaul and brought off a Gold Chain. But I am more inclin'd by most Authors, to believe, that these things were done no less than ten years after, and that this year they engaged the Gauls, (M. Furius being Dictator) in the Albane Territories. The Victory was neither doubtful nor difficult to the Romans (tho' the Gauls had put them into a great fright through their remembrance of their former defeat) but there were many thousands of Barbarians slain in the field, many after their Camp was taken. The rest straggled and going most of them toward Apulia, what by their long flight, and their being through dread and terror scattered all over the Country, defended themselves from the Enemy. The Dictator, by consent of the Senate and People had a Triumph Decreed him. But he had no sooner made an end of that War, than a more bloody Sedition received him at home: and through great contests the Dictator and the Senate were forced, to accept the Tribunes Bills; besides that there was a Consular Assembly held against the will of the Nobility, at which L. Sextius was the first man, that ever was made Consul, of the Commons. But even that was not the end of their contentions. For, because the Patricians said they would not consent to it, the thing had like to have come to a Secession of the Commons, and other dreadful approaches of Civil Broils. But these discords were appeas'd by the Dictator upon conditions, allowance being granted by the Nobility to the People that the Plebeian Consul should continue in his Office, and by the People to the Nobility, that there should be one Praetor, who should do justice in the City, and be chosen out of the Senate. By this means the two Orders being at last reduced out of their long Animosities into Concord, the Senate was of opinion that then, if ever they should do well, and would willingly, in honour of the immortal Gods, cause the grand Games to be set forth, adding one day to the former three. But the Aediles of the People refusing that Office, the Patrician Young men cry'd out, That they would willingly do that honour to the immortal Gods, so that they might be made Aediles. For which they were thank'd by the whole Senate, and an Order was made, That the Dictator should propose to the People the making of two men Aediles, out of the Senate; and that the Senate should give Authority to all the Assemblies of that Year.

DECADE I. BOOK VII.

E P I T O M E.

1. THere were two new Offices added, the Pretorship and the Curule Aedileship. 2. The City was Afflicted with a Plague, which was Signal for the Death of Camillus: the remedy and end whereof being by new Ceremonies inquired into, Stage-plays were then first Acted. 4, 5. When a day of Tryal was appointed for L. Manlius, by M. Pomponius, Tribune of the People, upon the score of his severity in the Levy, and his banishing T. Manlius, his Son, without any reason; the Youth himself, whose banishment was laid to his Fathers charge, came into the Tribunes-Bed-Chamber, and with his Sword drawn forced him to swear, that he would not go on with his accusation. 6. Then all pretious things were thrown into a gaping Gulf in the City of Rome; whereinto Curtius, being Arm'd, threw himself headlong off his Horse, and it was closed. 10. T. Manlius, the Youth that freed his Father from the Tribunes vexation, fought a Duel with a Gaul, that Challenged any Roman Soldier; whom he kill'd and plundred of a golden Chain: which he afterward wore, and was thence called Torquatus [from Torquis, which signifies such a Chain.] 15. There were two Tribes added, the Pomptine and the Publician. 16. Licinius Stolo was condemned by a Law of his own making, for having more than 500. Acres of Land. 26. Sc. M. Valerius, a Tribune Military killed a Gaul, that challenged him; a Crow sitting all the while upon his Helmet, who with his Claws and Beak annoy'd his Enemy; from whence he was Surnamed Corvus; and created Consul the next Year, for his Valour, when he was but 23. Years Old. 27. They made an alliance with the Carthaginians. 29. &c. The Campanians, being molested with a War from the Samnites, desired aid against them of the Senate: which since they could not obtain, they surrender'd their City, and Country to the Romans: for which reason, the Senate thought fit, that what was made theirs, should be defended by a War against the Samnites. 34. &c. When the Army, being led by A. Cornelius into a disadvantageous Place, was in great danger, it was preserved by P. Decius Mus, a Tribune Military: who having posted himself upon an Hill, above that where the Samnites lay, gave the Consul occasion to escape into a plainer Place: and himself though surrounded by the Enemy broke through them. 38. &c. The Roman Soldiers, who were left in Garrison at Capua, having conspired to make themselves Masters of that City, their Plot was discover'd, and they for fear of being Punished Revolted from the Romans; but were Restored to their Country by M. Valerius Corvus, who by his Advice had retrieved them from their Fury. It farther continues their Actions against the Hernicans, Gauls, Tiburtes, Privernates, Tarquinians, and Samnites. which they performed with good success.

THis year was remarkable for the Consulship of a new Man, and two new Offices, the Pretorship and the Aedileship: which Honours the Patricians gain'd in lieu of one Consul's place, which they granted to the Commons. The People bestow'd their Consulship upon L. Sextius, by whose Law it was gained: and the Senate gave the Pretorship to Sp. Furius Camillus, Son of Marcus; but the Aedileship to Cn. Quintius Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio, Men of their own Quality, by their Votes in the Campus Martius. L. Aemilius Mamercus was chosen Colleague to L. Sextius, out of the Senate. At the beginning of the year, there was great talk of the Gauls, (who, though at first they had straggled through Apulia, were now said to be gathered into a Body) and of the Revolt of the Hernici. Now seeing all things were industriously deferred, that nothing might be done by a Plebeian Consul, all matters were silent, and there was such a Calm in business, as when a stop is put to judicial proceedings; save that the Tribunes of the People murmur'd, that the Nobility had taken to themselves three Patrician Majestates, who came in their Curule Chaires, and Scarlet Gowns, like Consuls, to the Senate; and among them, the Praetor too determining causes as a Judge, in which he was as a kind of Colleague to the Consuls, created with the same Ceremony: and therefore the Senate was ashamed to order the Curule Aediles to be chosen out of the Senat: about which Affair at first they agreed, that they should be so Chosen every other year; tho afterward the Choice was promiscuous. After that, when L. Genucius, and Q. Servilius were Consuls, all things being at quiet both from Sedition and War, lest they should at any time be free from fear and danger, there arose a great Pestilence. They say, that, this year, a Cenfor, Curule Aedile, and 3. Tribunes of the People died; and that proportionably to the Number of them, there were many other Funerals of the People too: but that which made that Plague most famous was the mature, as well as much lamented death of M. Furius. For he was really the only Person of his Age in all sorts of fortunes; being the greatest Man both in War and Peace, before he was banished; more famous in his banishment; either through the necessity of the City, which, when it was taken, begged his help in his Absence; or upon the score of his success, whereby being restored to his Country, he restored the Country itself at the same time. For which reason he was afterward, for 25. years (for so many he after that time lived) thought to deserve a Title equal to such a glorious Exploit, and lookt upon as worthy to be stiled the Second Founder of the City, after Romulus.

Both this and the next year, C. Sulpicius Peticus, and C. Licinius Stolo being Consuls, there was a Plague: and therefore in it there was nothing done in it worth remembring; save that there was an holy Feast then made to appease the Gods, which was the third of the kind since the Building of the City. And seeing that the force of the Distemper was not taken off either by human advice, or divine assistance, their minds being overcome with Superstition, tis said, there were Stage-plays too, (which was a new thing to that War-like People, who had no Shews before but those of the Circus [as Running and Fencing, &c.] instituted among other things to atone the wrath of Heaven. But this was a very small thing at first (as most at their beginnings are) and strange too. For the Players, who were sent for out of Etruria, Danced without any Singing, or any thing like it, a plain Country Dance after the Tuscan manner, to a Pipe. After which the young men, who Joked upon each other, began to utter themselves in artless Verses; nor were their motions dissonant from their Voices. So the thing being received, and by use improved, the Roman Artists, who were concerned in that Affair, were called Histriones, (from Hister, which in the Tuscan Language signified a Player.) who did not, (as formerly) throw out Extemporary, rude and uncorrect Verses, like Fescennine Poetry [i. e. such as was Anciently used at Weddings;] but acted Satyrs filled up with measures, Singing now to the Flute, and using an agreeable gesture. But after some years Livy, who was the first that ever attempted to make a Play of one continued plot from the beginning to the end (which he himself acted, as all People then did) is said, (after he had, by reason that his Voice was grown hoarse with continual straining, got leave to put a Boy to Sing to the Flute) to have acted what was Sung with a much more vigorous motion; because the use of his Voice did not hinder him: and from that time the Players had others to Sing to them, who spoke all the words whilst they only Acted. Now when, by this rule of Plays, that business was stript of all ridiculous and extravagant Fooling; and Playing grew by degrees into an Art; the Young People, leaving the Plays to be Acted by the Players, began among themselves, after the Ancient manner, to Act the Buffoons in Verses, which were afterward thence called Exodia [or Musical Entertainments at the end of the Play,] and consisted chiefly of Atellane Interludes [so called from the City Atella] which kind divertisements they had and retained from the Oscians; nor suffer'd it to be vitiated by the Players. And therefore the Law is, that such Actors of Atellane Interludes shall not be disfranchis'd, but shall serve in the Wars as though they did not Practise any such lulicrous Art. Among the small beginnings of other things, I thought fit to tell you the Rise of Plays too, that it might appear from what a sober Original that matter grew up to the present Extravagancy and Madness, which is hardly to be endured even in the most Opulent Kingdoms.

III. Yet this original of Plays, which were instituted to appease the Gods did not ease either mens minds of the Superstitious fear they were in, or their Bodies of their Distempers; but on the contrary seeing the Tiber overflow'd the Circus in the midst of all their Sports, it made the People believe the Gods were averse [to their endeavours] and would not accept of any atonements, which put them into a mighty consternation. Wherefore, in the Year that U. C. Cn. Genucius, and L. Aemilius Mamercus were the Second time Consuls, (when the difficulty of finding out atonements afflicted their minds more than the Disease their Bodies) they say the Elder People called to mind and told the rest, that there was a Pestilence formerly cur'd by the Dictators driving of a Naile. The Senate being induced by that Religious consideration order'd a Dictator to be Chosen to drive a Naile; and accordingly L. Manlius Imperiosus was pitch'd upon, who made L. Pinacius Master of the Horse. There is an old Law, written in old Characters and old Words; that he, who is Chief Praetor shall drive a Naile on the Ides of September. This Naile therefore was driven on the right-side of Jupiters Temple where Minervas is. That Naile they say (because writing was in those Days very rare) was a mark for the Number of Years; and that it was done in Minervas Temple, because she was the Inventress of Number. And Cincius, who was a diligent searcher into such Monuments affirms, that there were Nails driven at Volsinii too, in the Temple of Nortia, an Etrurian Goddess, to shew the Number of their Years. M. Horatius, when he was Consul, drove the first Naile by that Law in the Temple of Jupiter, the Year after the Kings were banish'd: but this Solemnity of driving the Nail was afterward Transferr'd from the Consuls to the Dictators, because theirs was the greater Dignity. And in time, after the Custom had been intermitted, this business seem'd to be of it self worth the making of a Dictator. Upon which score L. Manlius was created, who (as if he had been created to do some great publick matter, and not to appease the Gods) affecting to have a War with the Hernicans plagued the young People with a severe Levy: and at last, seeing all the Tribunes of the People were against him, he being overcome either by Force, or Shame laid down his Dictatorship.

IV. Yet for all that, at the beginning of the next Year, when Q. Servilius Ahala, and L. Genucius were the second time Consuls, Manlius was Summon'd to a Trial by M. Pomponius Tribune of the People. For his severity at the Levy, which he exercised not only to the damage of the Citizens Estates, but the torturing of their Bodies too (whipping some, who had not answer'd to their Names, and Imprisoning others) was very odious. But above all his his stern disposition was in it self hateful, and his Surname of Imperiosus, which he took upon him, was ungrateful to that free City because it carry'd Cruelty and Tyranny in its very sound: which he indeed shew'd, not only to Strangers but even to his own Relations, and nearest Kindred. And therefore the Tribune made this one part of his Accusation; That he kept his own Son, who was a Young Man; though he were Convicted of no manner of Offence, (like one that's banish'd) out of the City, from his House, his Household-gods, out of the Forum, from seeing the Light and from the Conversation of his Equals; putting him to Slavish-work, almost into a Prison, and a Bridewel: where the Noble Youth, who was Son to the greatest man in Rome, even the Dictator himself, by daily hardship should learn, that he was Born of a truly Imperious Father. But for what reason, pray? why because (forsooth) he was not so Eloquent as he should have been, and had an Impediment in his speech. Which defect in Nature whether he, as a Father, ought not (if he had any humanity in him) to have been tender of, but rather punished and by his Tyranny exposed, was the Question. That even dumb Beasts did not refuse to cherish and preserve any of their Offspring, which were any way deficient. But L. Manlius encreased one misfortune of his Sons with another, imposing still more and more upon the dullness of his Wits: and if there were any little natural vigour in it, destroy'd what there was by a Country Life, and rustic conversation among Brutes.

All People were more concern'd at these accusations, than the young man himself; who on the contrary, taking it to Heart, that he should be the cause of Envy and such Charges against his Father, to the end that all the Gods and Men too might see, that he had rather assist his Father than his Enemies, he took a course, which shewed indeed his rude and Country Breeding, but, though it were not like a Gentleman, was yet commendable for the Piety of it. He went, unknown to any Body, with a Knife about him, in the Morning into the City, and from the Gate directly home to M. Pomponius the Tribune's House. When he came thither, he told the Porter, He must needs speak with his Master; and bad him say, he was T. Manlius, the Son of Lucius. Being immediately introduced (for the Tribune hoped that being inflamed with Anger against his Father he had either some new Crime to Charge him with, or had found out some new Method to accomplish the business) after they had mutually saluted each other, he told him, he had some private business with him, which admitted of no Company to be by whilst they discourse it. Whereupon all others being order'd to avoid the Room he pull'd out his Knife, and standing upon the Bed with it ready in his Hand, threaten'd, that if he did not Swear as he should direct him, viz. That he would never hold an Assembly of the Commons to accuse his Father, he would presently Stab him. The frighted Tribune (seeing the Knife glitter before his Eyes, himself alone, unarmed, and him a stout Young Man, and (which was more to be fear'd) Fool-hardy upon the score of his strength) Swore what he was forced to; and afterward profess'd, that he was by that means forced to desist from his Design. Nor were the People so much concerned that the Son had done so bold an Action for his Father, as that they had not the Power of giving their Votes against so cruel and Tyrannical a Malefactor. And the thing was so much the more commendable in him, in that his Fathers extreme severity had not at all averted him from his natural Love and Duty. By this means the Father was not only acquitted, but that Action was an honour to the Son. For whereas that Year there was an Order made, that the Tribunes Military for the Legions should be chosen by Vote of the People (for before, as well as now the Generals themselves made those whom they call Rufuli) he got the second Place of six, though he had done nothing either at home or abroad to merit the Peoples favour, as having liv'd all the time of his Youth in the Country and far from the converse of men.

That same Year, either by an Earth-quake, or some other force, the middle of the Forum, 'tis said, sunk down with a vast hollown'ess to a mighty depth. Nor could that Gulfe be fill'd up with Earth, which every one threw into it, till they began to enquire, by admonition from the Gods, what was the greatest advantage, and strength of the Roman People, for that the diviners foretold must be dedicated to that Place, if they would have the Roman Commonwealth to be everlasting. Upon which they say M. Curtius, a very Warlike young man, reprov'd those that doubted, whether there was any thing that conduced more to the advantage of Rome, than Arms and Courage: and that then, silence being made, he look'd toward the Temples of the Immortal Gods, that are above the Forum, and the Capitol, and stretching forth his Hands one while toward Heaven, and another while toward the gaping Gulfe to the Infernal Gods devoted himself. After which being mounted upon an Horse, that was trapped as Gayly as possible could be, he, all in Armour, threw himself into the Gulfe; whilst multitudes of Men and Women flung Gifts and Fruits in upon him: and that Place was called Lacus Curtius [i. e. the Curtian Lake or Gulfe] not from that ancient Soldier of T. Tatius, Curtius Metius, but this Man. I would not be wanting to inquire after it, if there were any way that led to the truth of this; but now we must rely upon common report, where antiquity will not suffer us to be certain: and the name of the Lake is made more Famous by this later story. After they had expiated for that great Prodigy, the same Year, the Senat being Consulted about the Hernicans, and having sent Heralds to demand satisfaction of them but in vain, they Voted, that the very next Assembly it should be proposed to the People to declare War against the Hernicans: and the People in a full Assembly consented to that War. L. Genucius the Consul happen'd to have that Province; and therefore the City was in expectation; by reason that he, who was the first Consul chosen out of the Commons was to carry on a War by his own Conduct; and would esteem the communication of their great Honours to the Commonalty as a good or an ill Act, according to the success of that affair. It happen'd so to fall out, that Genucius, setting out against the Enemy with great Eagerness, was surpris'd by an Ambuscade: and that, the Legions being Routed through that sudden Consternation, the Consul was circumvented and slain by Persons, that knew not, whom they had Kill'd. Which being reported at Rome, the Senators were not in any proportion so sorry for the publick Calamity, as overjoy'd at the unhappy conduct of a Plebeian Consul; and therefore they cryed out in all Places and said; now let'em go and choose Consuls out of the Commonalty, and transfer the auspices to those that could not lawfully meddle with them. That the Senate might be deprived of their Honours by an Act of the Commons: but did that wicked Law stand good against the Immortal Gods too? No, they had vindicated their own Deity, and their own auspices; which were no sooner touched by one, that had no Right or Title to it, but a whole Army, who were all together with their General Destroy'd was a warning, that no Assemblies should after that time be held in an illegal manner. With these words both the Court and the Forum rang; and Servilius the Consul, by consent the Patricians, made Appius Claudius Dictator, because he had argued against that Law, and cou'd now with greater Authority enveigh against the event of a design by him withstood: besides that there was a Levy and a stop in judicial Proceedings ordered to be made.

VII. Before the Dictator and the new Legions came into the Hernican Dominions, the business was occasionally very well managed by the conduct of C. Sulpicius, a Lieutenant. For when the Hernicans came, after the Consuls Death, contemptuously, up to the Roman Camp, with certain hopes of taking it, through the Lieutenants encouragement, and the Soldiers own inclinations, whose minds were full of Fury and Indignation, they sallied forth: upon which the Hernicans were far from all hopes of coming to the Bullwark; so that their Ranks being thereby all put into disorder they Marched off. Then when the Dictator came there was a new Army added to the old one, and their Forces were doubled: and the Dictator in a Publick Speech so praised the Lieutenant, and the Soldiers, by whose Courage the Camp had been defended, that he at the same time heighten'd the resolutions of them, who heard their own due commendations, and induced the rest to emulate their Atcheivements. Nor did the Enemy make slower Preparations for the War, who being neither unmindful of the Honour which before they gained, nor ignorant that the Roman Forces were encreased, augmented their own Forces too: raising all the whole Hernican Nation, that were able to bear Arms, consisting of 3200. choice, stout, lusty men. These, who were all the very Flower of their Youth they fill'd with hopes and resolution by decreeing, that they should have double Pay. Besides, they were excused from all Military duties else, that, being reserved for the toil of a Fight only, they might know they ought to endeavour at things even above their strength; and they were Planted out of order too in the Army, that their Courage might be the more conspicuous. A Plain of two Miles long divided the Roman Camp from the Hernicans; and there they both came almost halfway to fight in the middle. At first it was doubtful, which of 'em should win the Day, whilst the Roman Horse in vain endeavour'd by a strong effort to disorder the Body of the Enemies. But seeing their fight was more vain in the effect than in their attempts, the Horse, having first consulted the Dictator, at last, when they had got his leave, quitted their Horses and with a great shout ran before the Ensigns, where they renew'd the fight: nor could they have been endured, had not the extraordinary Regiments opposed them with equal vigour both of Bodies and Minds.

VIII. Then the business was Managed between the best men of those two Nations; and whosoever fell on one side or the other the loss was many times double to the number of them that were slain; whilst the other Common Soldiers, as though those men alone had been deputed to decide the Quarrel, placed all their hopes in the Courage of others; many being slain on both sides, and many wounded. At length the Horse-men, blaming one another, asked, what now remain'd; since they had neither Routed the Enemy on Horse-back, nor could do any good on Foot, what kind of fight must the Third be? why had they ran forward so fiercely before the Ensigns; and fought in other mens Post? Being provoked by these words among themselves, they renew'd their shout, and fell on. First they made the Enemy give ground, then drove 'em still farther back, and at last quite Routed 'em. But it is not easie to tell, what it was that gave the overthrow to a People of such equal strength, except it were that their perpetual Fortune could raise and diminish the Courage of both People. The Romans pursued their Hernicans to the very Camp: but did not Attack it, because it was late in the day: for the Dictator was detain'd so long by having not made an acceptable Sacrifice, that he could not give the Signal till Noon; and by that means the fight continued till Evening. The next day the Hernicans ran away from their Camp, and there were some wounded Persons found in it: and the Body of those that fled from the Ensigns, after they saw, their own Ban-

Banners, near the Walls of the Town almost deserted, was scatter'd, and ran straggling about the Country. Nor was it a Bloodless Victory to the Romans: for a fourth part of their common Soldiers were lost, and, (which was no less damage to them) some Roman Knights fell.

The next year, when L. Sulpitius and C. Licinius Calvus had led the Army against the Hernicans, and, not finding the Enemy in all the Country, had Storm'd and taken Ferentinum their City, as they came back from thence, the Tiburtes shut their Gates against them. That was the last reason, (though there were many complaints before on both sides made) why War was by the Heralds (who send to demand satisfaction) declar'd against that People. It is well known that T. Quintius Pennus was Dictator that Year, and that Sergius Cornelius Maluginensis was his Master of the Horse. Macer Licinius says, that he was created, to hold the grand Assembly, and by Licinius the Consul, because, seeing his Colleague endeavour'd to have the Assembly held before the War began, that he might continue his Consulship, he thought fit to oppose that his evil design. But the commendation which he seeks of his own Family makes Licinius a less creditable Author: for I find no mention of that matter in any ancient Annals; and therefore I am rather apt to believe, that the Dictator was created upon the score of the Gallick War, the Gauls being that Year encamped three Miles from Rome in the Road called Salaria beyond the Bridg of Anien. The Dictator, having order'd a stop to be put to all judicial proceedings, upon the account of the Gallick Insurrection, forced all the younger men to take the military Oath, and setting out from the City with a mighty Army, pitched his Camp on the higher Bank of the River Anien. The bridg was between them, which neither of them broke, lest it should be an argument of their fear: but they had many skirmishes to take the bridg: though they could not well tell, their forces being uncertain, how to do it. Thereupon a Gaul of a mighty stature marched forth and got upon the empty bridg; where with as loud a Voice as he could, he said, let the stoutest man of all the Romans come forth and fight me, that the success of our combat may shew, which of the two Nations is the more War-like.

The chief of the Roman youth were for a long time silent, not only because they were ashamed to refuse the duel, but because they did not care to undergo the greatest part of the danger: till T. Manlius, Son to Lucius, who had saved his Father from the Tribunes malice, stepped forth from his Post to the Dictator, and said; General! I would never fight out of course without your Order, no, though I were sure to gain the Victory. But if you'll permit me, I'll shew that beast, since he stalks and talks at such a rate before the Enemies banner, that I am come of that Family, which beat an Army of the Gauls down from the Tarpeian rock. To which the Dictator reply'd; Well said, brave T. Manlius; thou shewest an equal Piety to thy Father and thy Country. Go on, and, by the Gods assistance, make the Roman Name invincible. Thereupon his associates armed the young man; who took a Foot-mans Shield, was girt with a Spanish Sword, (which is more convenient for close fighting) and, when he was so Arm'd and equip'd, they led him forth against the Gaul, who was so Fool-hardy, and (because the Ancients have thought that too worth remembering) put out his Tongue in derision. Then the rest return'd to their Post, and those two were left between the Armies, more like a show, than according to the Law of War, seeming no way equal, to those that saw 'em, either in their looks or stature. For the one was an huge, tall man, with a particoulour'd garment, and shone in Painted Arms, made of engraven Gold: but the other was of a middle stature, and look'd not half so gay, as being in Armour, that was useful rather than splendid. Nor did he sing, exult, or vainly flourish his Arms; but his Soul, being full of resolution and silent Fury had reserv'd all his Vigour till the very push of the Combat. When they stood together between the two Armies, (in which so many were in suspense between hope and fear) the Gaul, who was like a little Hill above him, holding his Shield before him in his left hand, gave a vain cut, though it made a mighty noise, upon his Enemies Arms as he came toward him. The Roman, lifting up the point of his Sword, after he had with his Shield beat an hole in the bottom of the Gaul's, and got too near for the Gaul to hurt him with so long a Sword, he slipt between his body and his Shield, and there with one or two Thrusts wounded him in the Belly and the Groin, and so brought down his haughty Foe, who as he lay took up a mighty space. When that was done, he, without doing him any farther injury, took from him a Gold Chain [in Latin, Torquis] which, though all bloody, he put about his own Neck. The Gauls were astonish'd with fear and admiration: whilst the cheerful Romans, going from their Post, to meet their Champion, brought him, with praises and gratulations to the Dictator. Among the jocular expressions, which, though extempore and rude, like Soldiers they cast forth in a kind of Verses, there was heard the surname, Torquatus; which was afterward Famous even among Posterity and an Honour to his Family. The Dictator gave him a Golden Crown for a present, and in a publick Oration extolled that Combat to the Skies.

And indeed that duel was of such great moment toward the Issue of the whole War, that the Gallick Army the next night, leaving their Camp in a consternation, went into the Tiburtine Dominions; where having made Alliance for carrying on the War, and being kindly kindly assisted with all conveniences by the Inhabitants, they presently passed away into U. C. Campania. That was the reason, why, the next Year, C. Pætelius Balbus, the Consul (his 378. Colleague M. Fabius Ambustus happening to have the Hernicans for his Province) led an Army against the Tiburines; to whose aid the Gauls return'd out of Campania, and there-fore great ravage was made in the Lavicane, Tusculane and Albane Territories, the Tiburines being, no question, the Ring-leaders. And when the publick Arms were wholly employ'd against the Tiburines, under the conduct of the Consul, a Gallick insurrection forced them to create a Dictator. Q. Servilius Ahala was chosen, who made T. Quintius Master of the Horse: and, by Authority of the Senate, vowed, if his success in that War were good, to set forth the grand Games. The Dictator, to engage the Tiburines in a peculiar War, ordered the Consuls Army to stay where they were, and compell'd all the younger People, (who none of 'em refused it) to take the Military Oath. They fought not far from the Colline Gate with the strength of the whole City, in the fight of their Parents, Wives and Children: who being a great encouragement to them even when they were at a distance, did then, when they were before their eyes, inflame the Soldiers at once with shame and compassion. After a great slaughter made on both sides, the Gallick Army was at last put to flight, and ran to Tibur, as the head Quarters of the Gallick War. Straggling about they were met by Consul Pætelius not far from Tibur, where, the Tiburines being come out to assist them, they were driven with them into the Gates. The matter was carry'd very bravely not only by the Dictator but the Consul too: and the other Consul, Fabius, first in little skirmishes, and at last in one Signal Battel, in which the Enemies attacked him with all their Forces, subdu'd the Hernicans. The Dictator, having mightily commended the Consuls in the Senate, and before the People, and bestow'd on them the Honour even of his actions too, layd down his Dictatorship. Pætelius Triumph'd doubly, over the Gauls and Tiburines too; but 'twas thought enough for Fabius to come into the City Ovant. The Tiburines scoffed at Pætelius's Triumph; saying, where did he ever engage with them? That some few spectators indeed of the fight and consternation of the Gauls, who went without the Gates, when they saw themselves also made at, and that every body, who stood in the way, was kill'd without any distinction, retired into the City. But did the Romans think that deserved a Triumph? That they would advise 'em not to think it too wonderful and great an action to raise a Tumult in an Enemies Gates; for they should see a greater Consternation ere long before their own Walls.

XII. Accordingly the next Year, M. Popilius Lænas, and Cn. Manlius being Consuls, toward
U. C. mid-night they sett out in a full body from Tibur, and came to Rome. This surprisè and their
396. dread in the night time; struck them with Terror, being on a sudden waked out of their Sleep. Besides that, through the ignorance of many who knew not, who the Enemies were, or whence they came, there was a sudden Alarm given; and the Gates as well as the Walls had Guards set upon them. But when day-break discover'd the number to be but indifferent before the Walls, and that the Enemy were none but Tiburines, the Consuls, going out at two Gates, set upon their Army as they lay under the Walls on both sides. Then it appeared that they, when they came, relyed more upon the occasion, than their own Valour: and therefore they could hardly endure even the first effort of the Romans; yea it was evident that their coming was an advantage to the Romans, in that a Sediton, that was arising between the Senate and the People, was by the fear of a War, so near at Hand, suppressed. But there was another Arrival of their Enemies in the next War, which was more terrible to the Country than to the City. For the Tarquiniens ravaged and over-ran the Roman confines, especially on that side that borders upon Etruria. Upon which account when they had in vain demanded satisfaction, the new Consuls C. Fabius and C. Plautius, by the Peoples order, declar'd War; and Fabius happening to have that Province, Plautius had the Hernicans. There was also an hot report of a Gallick War: but among their many frights it was a Comfort that they had granted a Peace, upon their Petition, to the Latins, and receiv'd of them a great number of Auxiliaries, according to an Ancient League, which they had intermitted for many Years. Which aide being a support to the Roman State; they were the less concern'd when they heard, that the Gauls were come to Prenesta, and from thence sat down near Pedurn. Thereupon they thought fit to make C. Sulpicius Dictator; and he was accordingly chosen by C. Plautius the Consul, (who was sent for for that purpose) and had M. Valerius for his Master of the Horse. These two led the strength of the two Consular Armies, which they cull'd out from the rest, against the Gauls. That War was something more tedious, than both Parties would have had it. For whereas the Gauls only at first had been desirous to engage; and after that the Roman Soldiers by their eagerness to take up their Arms and fight, did some what out do the Gallick fierceness; the Dictator was not at all pleas'd, since there was no necessity, to trust Fortune, against an Enemy, whom time and that strange Country wou'd daily weaken; being without Provisions, or any firm Fortification: and besides that, men of such Spirits and Bodies, as that all their Force lay in an Effort, but would dwindle by a small delay. For these reasons the Dictator protect'd the War, and laid a great penalty upon any one that should fight without Orders. The Soldiers taking that ill, first upon their Guards and at their Watches among themselves, blamed the Dictator, and sometimes the Senate too in general, for for that they had not order'd the War to be managed by the Consuls; saying; They had chosen a very fine General indeed, a sole Commander, who thought that, though he were idle, wou'd fly down into his bosom from Heaven: and after that said the same words in the day time openly; yea and bolder things too; viz. That they would either fight without the Dictators order, or would go all in a body to Rome. The Centurions also began to mix with the Soldiers: nor did they now murmur in Crowds only among one another, but in the Principia too [where the chief Officers were quartered] and in the Prætorium [i. e. the General's Tent.] they and they cryed out in all places; That they would go immediately to the Dictator; and that Sex. Tullius should speak for the Army, as became their courage.

This Tullius had now been a Centurion of the Vanguard for seven years; nor was there any one in the Army, that had been a Foot-soldier, who was more eminent for his services. He therefore going before the body of the Soldiers, march'd up to the Tribunal, and told Sulpicius, who admir'd not at the Crowd, more than at Tullius the leader of it, who had always been a most obedient Soldier to all orders; Sir, (said he) the whole Army thinking themselves by you condemn'd of sloth, and almost disgracefully forsaken, as being without Arms, desired me, to plead their cause before thee. If it could be said, that we had ever given ground, turn'd our backs upon the Foe, or dishonourably lost our Ensigns, yet this, I think, is reasonable for you to grant, that we may by our courage make amends for our Crime, and blot out the memory of our offence by gaining new honour. The Legions, that were routed at Allia, going afterward from Veij, recovered by their valour that same Country, which by their fear they had lost. But our honour, and affairs through the bounty of the Gods, their good success and that of the Roman People, are still intire: though I dare hardly talk of honour, since even our Enemies speak as disgracefully of us as if we were a company of Women shut up within a Bullwark. And thou, our General too, (which we take more unkindly,) thinkest that thy Army is without Souls, without Arms, and without Hands: and before thou hast try'd us, hast so far despair'd of us, that thou thinkest thy self General of maimed and weak Wretches. For what else can we believe is the reason, that thou who art an old Commander, a stout Warriour, sittest (as the saying is) with thy hands in thy Pockets? For what ever the matter is, 'tis more certain, that you seem to have doubred of our courage, than we of yours. But if this be not your own, but a publick design, so that the Senates consent too and not the Gallick War, does in some measure detain us, like People banish'd, from the City and our own Houses; I desire, that what I say you would not look upon as said by the Soldiers to their General, but to the Senate by the Commons: who say, as you have your designs, so they too will have theirs. Pray who can be angry with us for saying, that we are Soldiers, and not your Slaves? sent forth to War, not into banishment? and such men, as if any man would give the Signal, and lead us forth into the field, would fight, as became men and Romans; but, if there be no need of our Arms, would rather spend our time quietly at Rome, than in a Camp. Thus much we have to say to the Senate. As to you, my Lord General! we your Soldiers humbly beg, that you would give us leave to fight: for we not only desire to get the Victory, but to get it under your conduct; to confer upon you an honourable Laurel Wreath; to enter with you Triumphant into the City; and, following your Chariot, to go with gratulations and ovations to Jupiter Opt. Max's Temple. The Prayers of the multitude seconded Tullius's speech; and they on all sides loudly desired, that he would give the Signal; that he would command them to handle their Arms.

The Dictator, seeing a good thing done, though in such an irregular manner, promised to do what the Soldiers desired: but privately asked Tullius, what this business was, and how it came to pass. Whereupon Tullius begged of the Dictator, that he would not think, he had forgot either the discipline of War, himself, or the honour due to his General. But that he had not refused to head the multitude (who are most commonly ruled and acted by their leaders) when they were once rais'd; lest any other such Person should have appeared, as the mobile, when they are moved, use to create. For he would do nothing contrary to his Generals mind: but then he also ought to take great care, to keep the Army in obedience. That such hot and vehement spirits could not be put off; who would themselves take time and place to fight, if the General would not give it them. Whilst they talked thus, two Roman Soldiers took certain Beasts, that by chance were feeding without the Bullwark, from a Gaul, that was driving them away. For which the Gauls threw stones at them: and then there was a shout made in the Roman Camp; upon which they ran forth on both sides. And now they were very near being engaged in a set Battel; had not the fight been deferr'd by means of the Centurions. Now by that accident the Dictator was confirmed in the truth of what Tullius had said: and therefore, seeing the business admitted of no delay, they declar'd that, the next day, they would engage in a field Battel. Yet the Dictator, relying more upon the courage than the strength of his Army, began to consult and consider all ways, how he might by some stratagem strike a terror into the Foe. And accordingly through his extraordinary policy he invented a new device; which many of ours as well as Foreign Generals have made use of, yea and some of 'em in our time too. He ordered the pack-saddles to be taken off from the Mules; and leaving on them only two Horse-cloths, set their drivers (whom he equipped partly with Arms which had been taken, and partly with those of Persons, that were Sick,) upon their Backs. These making about a thousand thousand he mixed an hundred Horse-men among them; commanding them to get in the night time up to the mountains above the Camp and hide themselves in the Woods; nor stir from thence, till they had notice from him. He himself, as soon as 'twas day, began with all speed to range his men a long the foot of the Mountains, that the Enemy might stand opposite to the Hills. When he had now made provision for a false flight, (which was indeed of equal advantage as real force) the Gallick Commanders at first thought, that the Romans would not come down into the Plain: but afterward when they saw them descend on a sudden, they themselves too ran as furiously to battle; so that the fight began, before the Generals had given the Signal.

XV. The Gauls pressed very hard upon the right Wing; nor could they have been endured, had not the Dictator been in that place, who calling to Tullius, chid him and asked him; Had he promised that the Soldiers should fight after that rate? Where were those shouts that they made when they desired to handle their Arms? Where were those menaces, that they would join Battle without their Generals order? Now they might see the General himself, who loudly called them to the fight, march Arm'd in the Van: but which even of them followed him, who were so lately ready to lead him? No, in the Camp they were fierce, and in the Field faint-hearted. What he said was true; and therefore shame so spur'd 'em on, that they ran upon the Enemies Weapons without once thinking of the danger. This mad effort at first put the Enemies into disorder; and then the Horse being, upon that confusion, sent in, made them give ground. The Dictator himself, after he perceived one part of their Front give ground, carried the Ensigns to his own left Wing, where he saw the greatest Body of the Enemy pressing on; And withal gave the appointed Signal to those on the Hill. And when from thence too, a shout was heard, and that the Gauls saw them marching down the side of the Mountain towards their Camp, they presently for fear of being surrounded and having their Retreat cut off, gave over the fight, and ran head-long to their Intrenchments: but being there encountered by M. Valerius General of the Horse (who upon the defeat of the other Wing, had fetcht a compass about, and was got up to their works) they were forced to turn their flight toward the Mountains and Woods; and many of them fell into the hands of the Ambuscade of Horse and Miltiars, so that after the heat of the Battle was over, there was yet a greivous slaughter made of those whom fear had driven into the Woods. Nor was there ever any man, after M. Furius, that more deservedly Triumphed over the Gauls, than did C. Sulpitius for this service. Who also out of the Booty consecrated a Mass of Gold of considerable weight, and laid it up in an enclosure of square stone in the Capitol.

The same year both the Consuls were engaged in Wars, but with different success, for C. Plantius routed and subdued the Hernic's; But his Collegue Fabius fought rashly and unadvisedly against the Tarquinians, and yet the loss there in the field was not so much, as that 307 of the Roman Soldiers taken Prisoners, were Offered up as Sacrifices to their Gods by the Tarquinians, which strange punishment rendered the reproach and scandal of the Romans defeat, more notorious. Just upon the nick of this Loss, it happened that the Roman Territories were wasted, first by the Privernates, and afterwards by the Veliternians, who made sudden incursions into the Country. Two new Tribes, the one called Pomptina, and the other Publicia, were this year added to the former five and Twenty. The solemn Sports or Games, which M. Furius the Dictator had vowed, were Celebrated, and a new Law was put up to the People by C. Pætilius Tribune of the Commons with the Approbation of the Senate, against procuring Votes by money or other indirect means in Elections to Offices and dignities; whereby 'twas design'd to crush the ambitious standing for places, especially of some Upstarts who were wont to haunt the Fairs, and hold Conventicles for that purpose.

XVI. Not so welcome to the Senators was the Law preferred by M. Duilius the Tribune next year when C. Martius and Cn. Manlius were Consuls, against the excessive Usury of 12 per cent; but very forward were the Commons to receive and establish it; Besides the Wars design'd last year, the Faliscans were now declared Enemies on a double account, one because their Youth had served against the Romans under the Tarquinians; the other, because when certain defeated Romans had fled to the Valerians, they refused to part with them, notwithstanding they were demanded by the Roman Heralds. This Province fell to the Lot of Cn. Manlius. Whilst Marcus advanced with an Army into the Territories of the Privernates, Flourishing with a long Peace, and thereby enrich'd his Soldiers with a plentiful Booty, increased by his Bounty that Sequestred no part of the Spoil to the publick, (as was usual in such cases) but divided it all amongst his men. For the Privernates lying strongly Encamped before their own Walls, he called his Soldiers together, and at the head of their Troops made a short Speech to them; Both the Camp of the Enemy (saith he) and their City I will freely bestow upon you for a Booty, if you will promise me to acquit your selves like men, and be as forward to fight as to Plunder: Hereupon with an unanimous shout they called for the word of Command to fall on, and with an exalted courage and assurance of Victory advanced towards the Enemy; The beforementioned Sextus Tullius being in the head of them, cried out, Behold noble General! how punctually your Army performs their promise, and herewith laying aside his Javelin, rushes with his drawn Sword upon the Enemy, whom all the Vanguard and those appointed to defend the Standards followed, and in this first Charge put the Enemy to flight, and pursued them to the Town, where mounting their Scaling-ladders to the Walls, the same was rendered up into their hands; and a Triumph celebrated for the success. By the other Consul nothing memorable was achiev'd, but that as he lay before Sutrium, he, after a manner never practised before, proposed a Law to be passed by the Tribes in the Camp, concerning the paying to the State the 20th. part of the price of all such servants as should be manumitted or made free; The Senators allow'd of and consented to this Law, because thereby no small Revenue accrued to the Exchequer, which was much exhausted: But the Tribunes of the Commons offended not so much with the quality of the Law in it self, as at the ill precedent given in passing of it, Ordained that thenceforwards no Person upon pain of Death, should withdraw the People from the accustomed places of Assembling, or gather together a part of them, for the making of any Law; For if that should be suffered, there would be nothing, tho never so pernicious to the People, but might be carried and established by the Soldiers being altogether at the Devotion of their Consul. The same year C. Licinius Stolo at the Prosecution of M. Popilius Lænas, was Condemned upon a Law of his own promoting, in the sum of Ten thousand Pieces (or about 600l. Sterling.) For that whereas it was thereby provided, that none of the Nobles should possess above 500 Acres of Land; He himself held 1000. And to elude the Law had Emancipated his Son [or made him his own man] that he might colourably own 500 of them.

XVII. The new Consuls were, M. Fabius Ambustus, and M. Popilius Lænas, who had both served that Office before. These made two Wars, whereof one which Lænas waged against the Tiburtines, was easily dispatcht; for having driven the Enemy into the Town, he Foraged their Country at his pleasure. But the other Consul was discomfited in the first Battle by the Faliscans and Tarquinians, occasioned chiefly by a panic fear that had seiz'd his Soldiers, for the Enemies Priests came on before their Army with Flaming Torches in their hands and Painted Fillets resembling Snakes about their Heads, and hanging down over their shoulders, which waving to and fro by the Wind, seemed to be real Serpents; being thus accounted and marching with a furious and frantick gesture, the strangeness of the sight, daunted at first the Romans, so that like men agast or Distracted, they fled trembling back to their Trenches. But then when the Consuls, the Commissary Generals and the Tribunes laugh'd at and Reproached them for being scar'd like Children, with Bug-bears; for very shame they presently took heart again, and with a blind fury rush'd upon those very things which before they had fled from; And having dissipated this vain Parade of their Enemies, fell upon those that were Arm'd indeed, and routed their whole Army. And the same day making themselves Masters of their Tents, returned Victors with a vast Booty; the Soldiers with Military Catches and Drolls Joking both at the Enemies ridiculous Stratagem, and their own silly Fears. Soon after this the whole Nation of the Tuscans took Arms, and led on by the Tarquinians and Faliscans, were advanced as far as Salina; In this time of eminent danger C. Marcus Rutilius a Plebeian was chosen Dictator, (the first Commoner that ever obtained that dignity) who nominated for his General of Horse C. Plantius a Commoner likewise; This the Senators took as an affront, that the Dictatorship should be shared by the Commons, and therefore endeavoured all they could, that no preparations should be made for the War, nor any obedience be paid to this Dictator; but so much the more readily, was whatever he proposed, granted by the Commons; So that in short time he march'd from the City on either side of the Tyber, having Vessels in readiness to Transport his Army to any place where he could hear of the Enemy; He not only surprized several Parties that were sent out to Harass the Country, and cut off many straglers that were met with in the fields, but unexpectedly fell upon their Camp, and made himself Master of it taking 8000 Prisoners, and having either kill'd or Chaced out of the Roman Dominions all the rest of Enemies, he by the Suffrages of the People Triumph'd, but without the approbation of the Senate. Who because they would by no means suffer an Assembly for Election of Consuls to be held by the Dictator a Commoner, nor by Popilius Lænas the Consul, who was also a Commoner, and for that the other Consul was necessarily detained abroad in the Wars, so that he could not be there; the matter came to an Inter-regnum, [that is, for a Magistrate to be appointed for the present called an Interrex who was always one of the Nobility and was to continue in that Office but five days] so there were Interregents successively Q. Servilius, Abala M. Fabius, Cn. Manlius, C. Fabius, C. Sulpitius, L. Aemilius, Q. Servilius and M. Fabius Ambustus. In the second Inter-regency their happened a controversy, because they were both Patricians [or of the Nobility] that were created Consuls, which was opposed by the Tribunes; but the Inter-regent Fabius alledged a Law out of the 12 Tables, that whatever was last Ordained and Commanded by the People, should stand good and valid, and that their Votes were a Law; So that the Tribunes gaining nothing by their Interposing, but the Proroguing the Assembly for the Election for some time, at last two of the Patricians carried it, viz. C. Sulpicius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius Poplicola, who the same day they were chosen entered into their Office.

Thus in the 400th. year after the Building of Rome and the 35th. after the City was recovered from the Gauls, the Consulship was taken away from the Commons after they had enjoy'd it eleven years, and now was brought into the hands of two Patricians. The Town Empulum was this year taken from the Tyburtines without any extraordinary Action, whether the War was manag'd there by both the Consuls jointly, as some Authors have related, or whether at the same time Valerius was concerned in that service, Sulpicius was employed to over-run and lay waste the Tarquinian Territories. But a greater sticking there was at home between the Consuls, and the Commons and their Tribunes. The present Consuls thought themselves obliged not only in Courage but Fidelity, as they, two Patricians, had received the Consulship, so to deliver it up to Persons of the same Rank, and that they must either wholly quit their Interest, if the Consular dignity should become a Plebeian Magistracy, or else must carefully conserve to the Nobility the possession thereof as they had received it intire from their Ancestors; On the other side the Commons storm'd and rag'd, To what purpose (say they) do we live? or why are we number'd amongst the Citizens, if that which was at first obtain'd by the virtue only of two Persons L. Sextius and C. Licinius, we cannot now all of us together maintain? Better it were to endure the Kings or the Decemvirs again, or if there be yet any more greivous name of Arbitrary Empire, than to behold both the Consulships engross'd by the Nobles, to lose the privilege of Commanding and obeying by turns, and sigh under the oppressions of so many Lords who settled in an everlasting Power of Domineering and Ruling over us, will esteem us born only to be their Vassals. The Tribunes under hand blew the Coals and encreased the Tumults, but all were so forward, that the principal Ring-leaders could scarce be seen in the action above the rest. Several times the People were in vain Assembled in the Campus Martius, and many Election-days spent in seditious heats without coming to any conclusion; at last the Commons over-match'd by the obstinacy of the Consuls could no longer endure it, but their Tribunes crying out aloud, That they might now bid adieu to their Liberties for ever, that henceforward they should be obliged not only to forbear coming into the field of Election, but also to abandon the City it self since it was thus Captivated and oppress'd by the Tyranny of the Nobles; And with these words the Tribunes departed, and all the Commons full of Grief and vexation presently followed them; the Consuls tho' forsaken by so great a part of the People, did nevertheless proceed to an Election with that thin Assembly that was left, and made choice of two Nobles, viz. M. Fabius Ambustus (who had been Consul twice before) and T. Quintius; Tho in some Annals I find M. Popilius named in stead of the latter.

XIX.

Two Wars that year were manag'd with prosperous success, in the first of which the Tyburtines were brought to a submission. For having taken from them the City Saffula by storm, the rest of their Towns must have run the same Fortune, had not the whole Nation laying aside their Arms, cast themselves upon the Consuls mercy, and sworn Allegiance to the Romans. Thus there was a Triumph over the Tyburtines, but otherwise a mild and gentle Victory. The Tarquinians were more sharply chastiz'd, abundance of them being slain in the field, and of a vast number taken Prisoners, three hundred fifty and eight of the Noblest and greatest Gentlemen, were drawn out and sent to Rome, and all the rest of the Common sort put to the Sword; nor sped they better at the Peoples hands that were carried to Rome; for being led into the midst of the Forum they were all first severally scourged with Rods and then Beheaded, that Execution being done upon them in Retaliation for the 307 Romans not long before Sacrificed in the Market-place of the Tarquinians. This good success of the Romans Arms caused the Samnites to Court their Friendship, to whose Ambassadors the Senate return'd a courteous Answer, and a firm Alliance was concluded.

But the Commons sped not so well at home in the City, as abroad in the Campaign; for tho' they were eas'd of the paying excessive Interest, yet the poorer sort were not able to discharge the Principal, and consequently were liable to be seized for Slaves by their Creditors; Therefore in regard of their private streights, they the less troubled their heads with the Choice of Consuls, or other publick Affairs, so that the Office continued in the hands of the Nobles, the Consuls for the next year being C. Sulpicius Patricus the 4th. time, and M. Valerius Poplicola the second.

Whilst the City was now designing a War against the Tuscan because 'twas reported that the People of Care (one of their Towns) took part with their Kinsmen the Tarquinians, Ambassadors arriving from the Latins diverted all mens thoughts to another point; for they brought advice, that the Volscans had Levyed and Arm'd a great Army, which was already upon the borders, and would presently enter into and lay waste the Roman Territories. The Senate therefore decreed that neither of these Affairs should be neglected, but that to both places certain Legions should be appointed, and the Consuls to cast Lots which Province should fall to each Mans charge.

But afterwards they found the Tuscan War required the greater care, being advertised by Letters from Sulpicius the Consul, (who happened to have the managment of the War against the Tarquinians) that the Enemy had Forrag'd all the Country as far as the Roman Salina (or Salt-pits) and that part of the Booty was carried into the possession of the Carites, and that the youth of that People were undoubtedly amongst the Plunderers. Whereupon the Senate thought thought fit to recall the other Consul Valerius, who was advanced against the Volscians and Encamped on the Marshes of Tusculum, and ordered him to Create a Dictator, who nominated T. Manlius the Son of Lucius, who having appointed A. Cornelius Cossus his General of Horse, contenting himself with his Consular Army, by the authority of the Senate and Command of the People, Proclaim'd War against the Carites.

Then first of all the Carites began to dread a War in earnest, as if there had been a greater force in their Enemies words to signifie it, than in their own deeds which had provoked the Romans to it; and now also they plainly saw how unable they were to manage it, and therefore repented them of their Spoils, and curs'd the Tarquinians as the Authors of their defection; nor did one of them take Arms or make any preparations for their defence, but every man labour'd what he could, that Ambassadors might be sent to mediate for Peace, and beg Pardon for the Offence they had given. Who addressing themselves to the Senate, they were by them turn'd over to the People for Audience, whereupon they besought the Gods whose sacred Images in the Gallick War they had devoutly receiv'd and entertain'd, that the Romans now in their flourishing Estate might take that pity and compassion of them, as they in pels of the Goddess Vesta, they invok'd the Hospitality of the Flamens and Vestal Virgins, whom they had so chafly and Religiously Treated, when heretofore they were their Guests; Could any man (said they) believe that we had deserv'd such usage, to be all on a sudden declared Enemies, without any just cause Administred on our part? Or suppose we had Committed any thing that might look like Hostility, must it needs be Interpreted to be done maliciously and on purpose, and not rather unwillingly and by a mistake? Or can it be imagined that we would sully the Merit of our Ancient good Offices, and those too conferr'd upon so grateful a People, by an accession of new Injuries? Is it likely that we should make Choice to have the Romans now flourishing and Victorious, for our Enemies; whose friendship we embraced in the lowest ebb of their Fortune? We beseech you account not that voluntarily and advisedly done, which ought rather to be call'd the effects of necessity and force; the Tarquinians marching through our Country with a formidable Army desiring nothing but merely a passage, drew along with them a few of our Peasants and made them Associates in their Plundering, which now is so heavily charged upon us as if it had been the Act of our State; the Persons that were thus guilty, if you please to have delivered up, we are ready to surrender them; or if you would have them punished, they shall suffer accordingly; But still let our City Care, once the Sanctuary of the People of Rome, the harbour and place of shelter for your Priests and Holy Reliques, remain free from the violence of your Arms, if not for our own sakes, yet at least for the sake of that Hospitality which we shew'd to the sacred Vestals and the devout Honour paid to your Gods. The Justice and Equity of the present Quarrel sway'd not so much with the People of Rome, as the ancient Merits, of the Suppliants; so that they were willing to forget rather the Injury than the Benefit, and accordingly granted Peace to the Carites, it being agreed, that a Truce should be Concluded for 100 years, and Registred amongst the Acts of the Senate. And now the whole strength of the War is turn'd upon the Faliscans, but the Enemy was not to be found, therefore having Forrag'd all over their Country, it was not thought fit to spend time in Attacking their Cities, but the Legions were ordered back to Rome, the rest of the year being spent in repairing the Walls, Towers and Fortifications. Also the Temple of Appolo was dedicated.

At the end of the year the Contention between the Patricians and the Commoners brake of the Election of Consuls, the Tribunes refusing to suffer any Assembly for that purpose to be held, unless the proceedings therein might be according to the Licinian Law [by which one Consul was to be of the Commoners.] On the other side the Dictator was as obstinately bent to abolish wholly the Consular Office out of the Common-wealth, rather than to admit it to be promiscuous to the Commons as well as the Nobility. Therefore to put off the Meeting for Election, the Dictator quitted his Office; and so it came to an Inter-regency; who found the Commons so exasperated against the Senators, that the dispute continued to the Eleventh Inter-regent undetermined. The Tribunes boasted that what they did was only to assert the Licinian Law, but the truth was, the Commons were more nearly concern'd about the business of Interest-money, which tho' abated, yet lay very heavy upon them, and their private grievances heated their publick Debates. Wearied with which at last the Lords of the Senate Ordered that L. Cornelius Scipio the Inter-regent for the time being, should for Peace-sake observe the Licinian Law in the Consular Election, whereupon P. Valerius Poplicola was chosen one of the Consuls, and C. Marcus Rutilus a Commoner the other. The Minds of men being once inclined to Concord, the new Consuls thought it a fit juncture to try if they could accommodate the business of Use-money, the great thing which seem'd to threaten an Obstruction of their full and perfect unity and agreement. Therefore they made the Payment of debts part of the publick care, Establishing a Committee of five whom from Equity and diligence therein was such as well deserves to have their Names transmittred with Honour to all Posterity, being C. Decilius, P. Decius Mus, M. Papirius, Q. Publius, and Tib. Aemilius. These Gentlemen manag'd this difficult affair (wherein many times both parties, parties, and always one would be apt to think himself aggrieved or injured) as with other prudent moderation, so with the present Charge or Anticipated Expences, rather than real damage of the publick. For debts of a long standing and such as were much entangled, more by the debtors negligence than Inability, either the City discharged out of the Common stock, by setting up certain Banks or Tables with ready Cash in the Common-Hall, (provided the debtors gave sufficient security to Reimburse the City) or else paid them off by causing the parties Goods to be valued and sold at reasonable Rates, so that a power of debts were in a little time satisfied, not only without any Injury unto, but also without any murmuring or complaint from either side. After this a groundless apprehension of a Tuscan War, (all whose 12 Tribes or Nations were reported to be Associated in one Common Band or League against the Romans) caused a Dictator to be nominated; which was done in the Camp, (the decree of the Senate being dispatch'd thither to the Consuls) and C. Julius was the man pitch'd upon, to whom was added L. Emilius for General of the Cavalry.

XXII. But notwithstanding this false alarm, all was quiet abroad. But at home in the City the Dictator tampering to get both the Consuls to be of the Nobility, occasioned another Inter-regency, during which C. Sulpicius and Fabius, the Inter-regents by their Interposition obtain'd that which he attempted without success; For the Commons being sweetned with the late kindness of paying off their debts, were become more pliable, and so the said C. Sulpicius Peticus who was the first Inter-regent and T. Quintius Pennis both Patricians, were chosen. Both of them took the Field, Quintius against the Faliscans, and Sulpicius against the Tarquiniens; But neither of the Enemies would come to an engagement. So that their chief service being to burn and harass the Country and lay all waste wherever they came, they may be said to have wag'd War rather against Fields, than Men. The continuance of which like a lingering Consumption brought down the haughty and obstinate spirits of both those Nations so far, that they first Petition'd the Consuls, and afterwards with their leave, the Senate, for a Peace; which they obtain'd for the Term of 40 years, and so the care and trouble of those two Wars being over, whilst there was now some respite from Arms, it was thought fit, because the late general payment of debts had much altered Peoples fortunes, and changed the properties of things, that there should be made a general Cense, or valuation of every mans Estate; But when the Assembly for choice of Censors (whose Office it was to dispatch that business) came to be held, C. Marcus Rutilus, who had been the first Plebeian Dictator, standing for the Censorship disturb'd the Peace of the States of the City. This he seem'd to attempt in a very unseasonable time, seeing both the Consuls at that time happen'd to be Patricians, who declared, that they would not admit him for a Competitor, nor put up his name at the Election. However both he by his earnest perseverance in his pretensions gain'd his point, and the Tribunes endeavouring with all their might to recover their right in the choice of Consuls, (which for some time had been interrupted) assisted him therein; For as the Majesty of his Person was equal to the highest pitch of Honour, so the Commons were willing and in hopes, that the same man who had opened the way to the Dictatorship, should also procure their party a share in the Censorship. And accordingly it was clearly carried by the Votes in the Assembly, that together with Manlius Cneus, the said Martius should be created Censor. This year had also a Dictator, viz. M. Fabius, and his General of Horse Q. Servilius, not so much for fear of any War, as to prevent the Revival and observing of the Licinian Law at the choice of Consuls, and yet for all the Dictatorship, the Interest of the Nobility prov'd as weak in the Assembly for Electing of Consuls, as it was in that of Censors.

XXIII. For M. Popilius Laenas was made Consul on behalf of the Commons, as well as L. Cornelius Scipio for the Patricians. And the Commons Consul had the good fortune to prove the more Illustrious of the two. For intelligence arriving, that the Gauls with a mighty Army had entred into the Country of the Latins and lay there Encamped, Scipio at that time happening to lie dangerously sick, the Conduct of that War necessarily fell upon Popilius; who having with great diligence levied an Army, and appointed a Rendezvous of all the Youth in Arms to be held at the Temple of Mars without the Gate Capena, (the Questors being Ordered to bring thither the Standards and Ensigns out of the Treasury) after he had selected out of them 4 compleat Legions; he put all the rest of the Soldiers under the Command of P. Valerius Publicola the Pretor, and moved the Lords of the Senate, that they would cause an other Army to be Lifted for a Guard for the Common-wealth against uncertain Emergences of War. Thus all things being settled and provided, he himself set forward to meet the Enemy, whose strength that he might know, before he adventured to try it with the hazard of a Battel, on an Hill as near as he could conveniently to their Camp, he began to Entrench his Army. The Gauls a People naturally Peirce and eager of Battel, no sooner beheld afar off the Roman Ensigns, but presently they drew up in Battalia; But when they saw the Romans did not descend to encounter them, but continued in that advantageous Post, defended not only by the height of the ground, but also fortifying themselves with a Ditch and Palisado, concluded them to be dispirited with fear, and therefore thinking this the best opportunity to fall upon them, especially whilst they were were busied in the Works, and their Fortifications unfinish'd, advancing with a dreadful shout and clamour, began to charge them. Yet the Romans gave not over their Works (they were the Triarian Bands, all stout Soldiers of the Rereward, who were therein employ'd) but the Spearmen or Vanguard, and the Principes or main Body, who stood ready Arm'd to defend the Pioneers, forthwith engag'd the Enemy. Besides their valour, the Ground was no small advantage to them, for they being on a rising Hill, their Darts and Spears were not bestow'd in vain, (as often it happens when they are discharged upon a Level) but being all poiz'd with their own weight stuck fast wherever they lighted; so that the Gauls being overcharged with those Weapons either peircing through their Bodies or sticking fast in their Shields, and Incommoding them with their weight, and having put themselves out of Breath by running up the Hill, began to make an halt, as doubtful what to do; This stop both discouraged them and encouraged their Enemies, so that soon after they were beat back, and confusedly fell upon one another down the Hill, making greater havock of their own men, than the Enemy did, for in that precipitous Rout there were more trod to death and crush'd to pieces, than fell by the Sword.

XXIV. Yet still were not the Romans assured of the Victory; For as soon as they came down into the Plain, they met with fresh work; the Gauls by reason of their numbers little regarding the former loss, as if a new Army had started out of the ground, brought on a vast Body of men that had not yet at all been engag'd, to give a check to the victorious Enemy; Inomuch that the Roman Army slackning the fury of their March, would advance no further, as well because being already weary, they thought it too hazardous to venture upon a second encounter, as also for that their General the Consul feircely charging in the fore Front had his left Shoulder almost run through with a Pike, and thereupon had a little withdrawn himself out of the Battel. By this lingering, the Victory was now like to be lost, when the Consul having got his wound dressed and bound up, return'd to the foremost Ensigns and thus expostulates with his Soldiers, Why stand you still thus, Gentlemen? you have not now to deal with the Latins or the Sabines, whom after ye have Conquer'd by Arms, ye may make of Enemies, Friends and Confederates. 'Tis against savage Brutes we now draw our Swords, and you must resolve either to have their Blood, or yeild them your own; you have already routed them out of their Camp, and beat them headlong down the Hill, you stand now upon the prostrated Bodies of your Enemies, cover the Plain with their dead Carcasses, as you have done the Hill; Never look that they should fly as long as you stand still, you must advance your Ensigns and give them another rousing Charge to compleat your Victory. Encouraged with those exhortations they again fell on, and forced some of the foremost of the Gallick Troops to Retreat, then with close and pointed Battalions of Foot drawn up in the form of a Wedge, they charged through into the heart of their main Battel; whereupon the barbarous People being disordered, and having neither certain Directions to follow, nor Captains to Command, turn'd their fury upon their Fellows, and being scatter'd all over the adjacent Plains, fled clear beyond their own Tents, making towards the Alban Fort, which amongst the many Hills round about, they perceived over-top'd the rest. The Consul pursued the Chase no further than their Camp, both because his own wound was very painful to him as also because he would not put his tired Army upon further service, especially seeing the Enemy had gained the Tops of the Mountains. The whole pillage of their Camp he gave to his Men, and so led them back loaded with Victory and Gallick spoils to Rome. The Consuls wound deferred his Triumph, and also caused the Senate to desire a Dictator, that there might be some body to hold the Comitia or Assemblies for chusing of Consuls for the year ensuing, since both the present Consuls were disabled to be present by Sickness. Accordingly L. Furinus Camillus was declared Dictator, and P. Cornelius Scipio General of the Horse, who restored to the Senators their Ancient possession of the Consulship, and for that Obligation, was by their Interest chosen himself Consul, and for his Colleague he took App. Claudius Crassus.

XXV. But before these new Consuls entred into their Office, Popilius acted his Triumph over the Gauls, with mighty applauses of the Commons, who muttering amongst themselves, would often ask one another, If there were any body now that repented of having a Commoner to be Consul? At the same time reproaching the Dictator, who for violating the Licinian Law had got for his reward the Consulship, dishonour'd no less by his private seeking of it whilst by his own Power as Dictator he in effect conferr'd it upon himself, than by the publick Injury thereby done to the Commons. This Year was remarkable for many troubles and commotions, the Gauls unable to endure the severity of the Winter on the Albane Mountains, came down and ranged all over the Champian Country and Sea-Coasts, laying waste all before them. The Sea also was infested with a Navy of the Greeks, who made a descent upon the Land, and spoiled all the Maritime Coasts of Antium, and the River of Laurentum even to the very Mouth of Tyber; so that these Sea-Rovers happening to Encounter the Gallick Land-Foragers before mentioned, a very sharp Battel was Fought between them, and both sides being wearied Retreated, the Gauls to their Tents, the Greeks to their Ships, both doubtful whether they should reckon themselves to have won or lost the day. Amidst these disasters, a yet far greater Terror arose, the several Tribes of the Latins had held a Diet or General general Convention at the Ferentine Grove; and when the Romans demanded Supplies of Soldiers from them, as being their Confederates, flat answer was returned, That they would do well to forbear commanding those whose assistants they stood in need of; as for the Latines, they were resolved rather to bear Arms in defence of their own Liberties, than for the ambition of Strangers. The Senate being already involved in two Wars abroad at once, were not a little perplexed at this Revolt of their Allies, but seeing no other way, but to keep them within the bounds of their Duty by Fear, whom Faith and Loyalty could not hold, commanded their Consuls to hold a general Muster, and levy the whole strength of the State; For since the Assembly of their Associates had deserted them, they must now depend on an Army consisting wholly of their own Citizens. Therefore every where, not only in the City but in the Country and Villages, Levies are vigorously made of young Men fit to bear Arms, and in a little time Ten Legions entred in the Muster-Rolls, each Legion consisting of Four thousand and two hundred Foot, and Three hundred Horse. Such a brave new Army, as, the mighty Power of the People of Rome, (which the whole Earth is hardly able to contain) if it were contracted and united all together, upon any sudden danger from abroad, would scarce be able at this day so suddenly to raise the like, so increased we are only in Riches and Luxury, which are the only things we labor after and apply our minds unto. Amongst other sad Occurrences of this Year, Ap. Claudius, one of the Consuls, dies in the height of these preparations for War; so that the whole management of Affairs devolv'd upon Camillus: To which sole Consul, the Lords of the Senate, either in respect to his quality and worth not fit to be subjected to the absolute command of a Dictator, or else willing that he should have the Chief Command for the lucky Omen of his name, always heretofore fortunate against the Gauls, thought it not decent or honorable to adjoin any Dictator. The Consul leaving two Legions for the guard of the City, and committing part of the other eight to the Command of L. Pinarius the Prætor; mindful of his Fathers Gallantry, undertakes the Gallick War in Person, ordering the Prætor to secure the Sea-Coasts, and chase the pilfering Græcians from the Shore. Himself marching down into the Country of Pomptinum, being not willing to hazard a Battel in those Champion parts, unless he were forced thereunto, and believing that he should sufficiently quell the Enemy, if he could but keep them from Forraging, since they had nothing to live on but what they got by Plunder, he chose out a convenient Post for a standing Camp or Leaguer.

XXVI. Where whilst they pass'd their time quietly on the Guards, there came a mighty Gaul, eminent both for the bulk and stature of his Body, and the richness of his Arms; who by clattering his Spear upon his Shield, having made silence, Challenged by an Interpreter, Any one of the Romans to a single Combat: There was one M. Valerius, a Colonel of Foot, a brisk young Man, who thinking himself no less worthy of such an Honor than T. Manlius before-mentioned; after he had ask'd leave of the Consul, advanc'd forth Arm'd at all points to meet this daring Challenger. Their Conflict, as to humane Valour, was rendered less illustrious than that of Manlius, by the Interposing of a Divine Assistance from the Immortal Gods: For as the Roman was just ready to attack his Adversary, a Raven suddenly settled on the Crest of his Helmet, and turn'd full in the Face of the Enemy; which, at the very first, the Colonel took joyfully as a good Omen sent from Heaven, and afterwards devoutly prayed, That the God or Goddess, whoever it was, that sent the lucky Bird, would be propitious unto him. The Fowl (a wonder to be spoken) not only kept the place where it first lighted, but as often as the Champions grappled together in close Fight, mounting it self upon its Wings, made at the Mouth and Eyes of the Enemy with its Bill and Claws, so long, till the Gaul being terrified with the Prodigy, and extremely disordered both in his sight and mind, had his Head cut off by Valerius; and then immediately the Raven flying away towards the East, mounted out of fight. Hitherto the Guards stood quiet on either side; but as soon as the Colonel went to disarm and rifle the Body of the slain Enemy, neither could the Gauls contain themselves in their Stations, nor the Romans forbear running up to their Victorious Champion; whereupon a Skirmish began near the Body of the Gaul that there lay kill'd, presently increased into a fierce and terrible Battel: For no longer was the Dispute between a few Bands of the Out-guards, but whole Legions on either side were hotly engaged. For Camillus commanded his Soldiers to fall on, finding them already encouraged by the Colonels success, and the favorable assistance of the gods; and the more to enflame them, pointing to the Colonel enrich'd with the spoil of his Enemy, He bids them imitate that brave Gentleman, and lay whole heaps of the Gauls breathless on the ground round about their vanquish'd Champion. Neither the help of the Gods, nor the valour of Men, was wanting to the success of this Battel, which was the less doubtful, by reason of the different Impressions which the Event of the fore-going Duel had made on the Spirits of both Armies; with those that first came on, and began the Fray, there was a pretty sharp Bout, but the main Body of the Gauls took their heels, before ever they receiv'd one Volley of Darts. At first they were scattered along the Volscian and Falern Countries, but afterwards they rallied together, and betook themselves to Apulia, and the Borders of the Upper [or Adriatick] Sea. The Consul, in a Speech to his Army, having extolled extolled the Colonel with deserved praises, for a further Reward bestowed upon him ten Oxen and a Coronet of Gold. Himself being by Orders from the Senate to take charge of the War by Sea, joyned his Forces with the Prætor; where the War being like to be drill'd out to a tedious length, by reason of the Cowardise of the Greeks, who would not come into the Field or venture a Battel, by the Authority of the Senate he appointed T. Manlius Torquatus to be Dictator, to hold the Comitia or Consular Elections, which (having named A. Cornelius Cossus for General of the Horse) he held accordingly, and with the Applauses of all the People made choice of a young Man at that time absent, and not above 23 years old, but a Person every way like himself, and tracing the steps of his own named Corvus, because of the Raven that assisted him in the Combat; with whom was morable Action pass'd between Camillus and the Greeks; for neither were they good Soldiers at land, nor the Romans at Sea: At last being kept from Landing, and in great want of Necessaries, especially Fresh-water, they left the Coast of Italy. Of what particular People or Province in Greece this Navy was, is altogether uncertain; I am most apt to believe it set forth by the Tyrants of Sicily, for the further Græcia was at that time wasted and wearied with intestine Wars, and under jealous apprehensions of the growing greatness of the Macedonians.

XXVII. The Armies being disbanded, and both Peace abroad and Concord at home, by the friendly Agreement of the States, lest they should surfeit on too much happiness, a Pestilence broke out in the City, which caused the Senate to command the Decemvirs to consult the Sybilline Books; whence Directions were given to hold a Solemn Festival for appeasing the Wrath of the Gods, call'd Lectisternium [or the preparing of the Beds, because therein rich Beds, on which the Ancients were wont to eat, were set up in the Temples before the Images of the Gods, as if they had been invited to a Banquet.] The same year a Colony was drawn out from the City Antia to people Satricum, which City having been destroyed by the Latines, was now re-edified. Also at Rome a League was concluded with the Ambassadors of Carthage, who came on purpose to desire Friendship and Society. The same Tranquillity as well at home as abroad, continued the year following, when T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Plautius were the second time Consuls: The Interest of Money, which before was at One per cent, was now reduced to half so much: And for the payment of Debts, 'twas ordered, That one fourth part being presently paid down upon the nail, three years time should be given for the rest to be satisfied at three payments, by equal proportions. And though for all that, it still lay very hard upon some of the Commons, yet the Senate had more regard to see Credit kept with the Chamber of the City, than of the streights of private Persons: But things went so much the better, because having now no Wars, they forbore levying of Soldiers and collecting the Tribute. The third year after Satricum was rebuilt by the Volscians, M. Valerius Corvus, being the second time Consul, with C. Petelius, upon Advice from Latium, that Ambassadors from Antium went about to all the Tribes of that Country, soliciting them to take Arms: He was commanded to make an Expedition against the Volscians, before the Enemies Forces were too much augmented: Accordingly he advanced towards Satricum with a formidable Army; where the Antiates, and other Volscians, having long before provided Forces in readiness to oppose any Army sent from Rome, came up to meet him, and there being an inveterate hatred on either side against each other, without any delay the Battel was joined, wherein the Volscians, a Nation more forward to Rebel than hardy to Fight, and apter to begin Quarrels than able to maintain them, were routed, and fled in disorder to shelter themselves within the Walls of Satricum; which proving too weak a Sanctuary, when the Town being invested round with the Roman Bands, was just ready to be taken by Scaling and Storm, they, to the number of 4000. besides the common Rabble unfit for Service, Surrendered themselves at discretion. The Town was rased down and burnt, only they saved the Temple of Mater Matuta [or the Goddess of the Morning] from the Flames. The whole Spoil was given to the Soldiers, but therein was not comprehended the 4000. Prisoners; for those the Consul reserved to be led in Chains before his Triumphant Chariot, and afterwards by selling them for Slaves, brought in a good round sum of money into the Publick Treasury. Some Authors write, that the multitude thus sold, were only the Captive Bond-men, which is more probable, than that they should sell such as yielded themselves to mercy.

XXVIII. The next Consuls were M. Fabius Dorso, and Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus: Then began the Auruncan War, upon a sudden Invasion that they made, and a suspicion that the Act of that single City, might be by the joint consent and abettment of the whole Latine Nation; L. Furius was created Dictator, as if all Latium had been up in Arms: He chose for his General of Horse Cn. Manlius Capitolinus, and (according to the Custom in great and sudden Exigencies) levied Soldiers, without any respect of Immunity or Exemption, and withal adjourned the Terms, or proclaimed a cessation of all Courts of Law: The Legions advancing with all possible Expedition against the Auruncans, found they had the spirit spirit of Robbers rather than of Soldiers, so that in the very first Fight they were subdued, and that War dispatcht: However, since they were the Aggressors, and readily offered to bid him Battel, the Dictator, supposing there might be more danger than indeed there was, to engage the favor of the Gods, had before the Engagement vowed to Build a Temple to Juno Moneta, if he gain'd the Victory; and being charg'd to perform the same when he returned Conqueror to Rome, gave up his Dictatorship: whereupon the Senate commanded two Officers, called Duumvirs, to be Created, for the Erecting of such a Temple suitable to the Grandeur and Magnificence of the People of Rome: The place appointed and set out for it, being on the Capitol Hill, on the very plot of Ground, where sometime before stood the Dwelling-house of M. Manlius Capitolinus. The Consuls having employed the Dictators Army in the Volscian War, by a surprize took the Town Sora from the Enemy. The Temple of Moneta next year after it was Vowed, was Dedicated, C. Marcius Rutilus the third time, and T. Manlius Torquatus the second time Consuls: Immediately after this Dedication, a strange Prodigy happened, not much unlike that antient one of the Albane Hill; for it both rained Stones, and the Day seemed to be turned into Night. Whereupon the Books of the Syills being consulted (for the City was full of Superstitious fears) the Senate thought it requisite, to have a Dictator chosen for the constituting and ordering of certain Feasts and Holy-days for appeasing the Gods, and diverting the Judgments threatned: P. Valerius Publicola was the Person pitcht upon, and Q. Fabius Ambustus for his General of Horse. Order was given, that not only all the Tribes should go in Procession with their Solemn Prayers and Litànies, but also the bordering Nations; with precise Directions, upon what days each of them should make their Supplications. This year, 'tis said, the Ufers were prosecuted by the Ædiles, and severe Sentences given against them by the People; and without any notable cause that is Recorded, they came to an Inter-regency, wherein M. Valerius Corvus the third time, and A. Cornelius Cossus were chosen Consuls, both of them Patricians, which seems to have been the occasion and design of the Inter-regency.

XXIX. But hence-forwards we must advance to the Relation of greater Wars, both for the Puissance of the Enemies, and the Distance of the Regions that were the Seats of them, as also for their long Continuance: For this year the Romans took up Arms against the Samnites, a People of great Wealth and formidable Courage; which War, manag'd with doubtful Success, was scarce over, when Pyrrhus declared himself their Enemy, and after him the Carthaginians: How many Difficulties were to be surmounted? How often were our Ancestors reduced to the Extremities of Danger, before this Empire could be built up to that Grandeur, which hath now enough to do to hold its own, and seems ready to sink under its proper Weight. The Ground of the Romans Quarrel with the Samnites, arose not amongst themselves, for they were in Amity and League with each other, but happen'd from a Crisis of Forrein Affairs: The Samnites, measuring Right by their Power, unjustly invaded the Sidicins, who being weak and poor, were glad to implore the Aid of their richer Neighbors, the People of Capua. But these Companions contributed little more than the empty name of Assistance; for being Fresh-water-Soldiers, softned with Luxury, they were easily routed in the Sidicins Country by the Samnites, (a Nation hardned with long use of Arms and Military Discipline,) and so brought the whole stress of the War upon their own heads; for the Samnites, letting the Sidicins alone, attacked the Campanians, as being the principal strength of the Neighboring Nations, over whom they knew they could as easily obtain a Victory as over any of the rest, and were sure there to reap a greater Harvest both of Glory and rich Plunder: To this purpose they first made themselves Masters of the Hills near Capua, call'd Tifata [at this day Monti de Capoa] and placed there a strong Garrison; whence they march'd down in Battel-array in a square Body, and all their Carriages and Baggage with them, into the Plain between that and Capua, where a second Battel was fought, and the Campanians being worsted, forc'd to shelter themselves within their Walls. Wherefore finding the Flower of their Youth cut off, and that no Relief was to be expected near hand, they were necessitated to address themselves to the Romans for succour.

Their Ambassadors being admitted to Audience in the Senate, made an Oration to this effect. The People of Capua, most Noble Senators! have sent us to desire at your hands a firm Peace for ever, and Assistance at present. Had we sought this Amity whilst our Affairs were in a flourishing condition, it might indeed have been of an elder Date, but tyed with a weaker Knot. For then remembering that we entred into Alliance with you as upon even ground, we might perhaps have been as much your Friends, but not under such great Obligations; whereas now, endeavored by your Compassion, and defended in our Distress, we must needs more affectionately embrace and cultivate the memory of your Favors, that we may not be branded with Ingratitude, and shew our selves unworthy of any help from God or Man. That the Samnites happened before us to be your Allies and Confederates, may intitle them to a Precedency of Honor, but cannot certainly be any sufficient Bar to exclude us from your Friendship, since in your League with them there is Proviso, that you should not make what new Alliances you should think meet. You have always hitherto esteemed it a just cause of entering into Friendship, if the Party that sought the same were desirous to be your Friend; and truly we Campanians (tho our present circumstances allow us not to speak magnificently of our selves) may yet have leave to say, that as both for the grandeur of our City, and the Fertility of our Country, we come not behind any People, but your selves; so we conceive that by our joining in a strict Association with you, there may be no small Accession to your Interest and Advantages; For when ever the Æquians and Volscians (tho those eternal Enemies of your state) shall presume to incommode you, we shall by ready to fall upon their backs, and what you now shall do for our preservation, that will we always do for your Empire and Glory; Which Nations that lye between us and you being once subdued, (which both your Valour and good Fortune promise will quickly be effected) you will then extend your Dominions in a continued and uninterrupted Tract to our Neighbourhood. 'Tis grievous to us, but such is our present Ill-fortune as compels us, to acknowledge that we are reduced to that deplorable Extremity as we must be subject either to our Friends or our Enemies; If you vouchsafe to defend us, we are yours; If you abandon us, we fall under the Samnites; Consider therefore deliberately, whether you had rather that Capua, and all its Territories should be annext to your state, or encrease the power of the Samnites. Your mercy, Noble Romans! and your succour ought in equity to extend to all that are miserable; but especially to those whose good nature by yielding an helping hand (even above their power) unto others that implored their Aid, are now themselves all fallen into the same necessity; And yet, to say the truth, it was not so much for the Sidicins as for our selves that we were forc'd to take up Arms; For beholding a neighbour Nation unjustly attacked and spoiled by the Samnites, we could not be so insensible as not to foresee, that those fatal flames wherewith they wasted the Sidicins, would quickly be carried into our Territories; 'Tis not because they are offended for any Injury received, but because they are well pleased with a colourable occasion of Quarrel, that the Samnites now invade us. If this were only an angry Revenge, and not rather an opportunity laid bold on to gratifie their greedy Ambition, would it not have been enough that they twice defeated our Forces, once in the Sidicins Country, and now again at our own doors? What a strange kind of Rage is this which all the Blood of two Vanquish'd Armies cannot quench? Add hereto the wasting of our Country, carrying away our People Captive, making Booties of our Cattel, Burning our Towns, Ruinating and Destroying all before them with Fire and Sword, could not their Wrath with all this be appeased? No, no, 'tis their insatiate desire of Empire that hurries them on to attack Capua, resolv'd either utterly to destroy that most goodly City, or themselves to possess it. But may it please you, generous Romans! to gain it before by your kindness, rather than suffer them to seize it by their mischievous malice; I know I speak to a People that useth not to decline just Wars, yet if you shall but declare in our favour, I am confident your bare word will save us, and you will have no need to make use of your Arms. The Samnites high conceit of themselves and contempt of others reaches only to us, and extends not to your Power which is above it. So that the very shadow of your Assistance, O Romans! is able to protect us, and whatever we shall thereby secure, our Lands, our Goods, our Selves, ready we shall be to acknowledge all to be yours. For you shall the Campan Ground be Tilled; for your advantage shall all the Resort to, and Traffick of the City Capua be consign'd, and ever shall you be regarded by us no less than Founders, Parents, and next to the Immortal Gods; No Colony of yours shall out-vie us either in ready obedience or punctual Fidelity. Grant, O Conscript Fathers! your gracious Countenance to the disconsolate Campanians, afford us the Assistance of your invincible Name, and bid us hope that Capua shall continue safe and inviolate; With what Crouds of People of all Ranks do you think we were brought going on our Journey from thence hither? How did we leave all places fill'd with their Vows, their Prayers and their Tears? with what trembling expectations do the Senate and whole People of Capua, our Wives and our Children attend our Return? Assured I am, that the whole Multitude are thronging about the Gates, with their eyes fixt on the Road that leads from hence, impatiently waiting to know what News, what Answer you will be pleased by us to return them in this doubtful Juncture and Perplexity; One word, if favourable, is able to present them with Safety, Victory, Life, and Liberty; But if otherwise, I dread to preface the Consequences; wherefore to conclude, determine of us, either as of those that shall and will ever be your Confederates and faithful Allies, or else such as must presently be the most forlorn People upon Earth, and worse than nothing.

The Ambassadors being commanded to withdraw, the Senate having debated the matter, tho the greater part acknowledged that a City so very great and opulent, with a Country both the most fertile of all Italy, and conveniently situate near the Sea, (which might serve the Romans as a Granary or Store-house, when ever scarcity of Corn and Victuals should happen) would be of great Emolument to them; Yet they resolv'd to prefer the keeping of their Faith before all advantages; And the Consul was ordered to return this Answer. The Senate, O Campanians, conceives you very worthy of assistance; But it is fit that we so entertain your Amity, as not to violate any of our former Alliances; the Samnites, you must know, are in League with us, therefore we must deny your request of taking Arms against them, since that were first to fight with the Gods by a breach of our Oaths, and what success can we then expect in our unjust Encounters against men? But we will do for you as much as we can in Justice and Honour, viz. send Ambassadors to our Confederates and Allies, to intreat them not to offer you any violence or injury. Whereunto the principal Ambassador (according to the instructions they had brought from home) replied thus, Altho you are not pleased with just force to defend what is ours against unjust violence and outrage, yet sure you will maintain that which is your own; Behold therefore, Conscrip Fathers! Here we freely surrender into your hands, and into the Dominion of the People of Rome, the whole Nation of the Campanians, the City of Capua, with our Lands, the sacred Temples of the Gods and all other things sacred and prophane, resolved that whatever henceforwards we may suffer, we will suffer in the quality of your Subjects and voluntarily devoted Vassals. Saying which they all held up their hands to the Consul in a suppliant posture and overwhelmed with Tears fell down on their Knees at the entrance of the Senate-House. The Fathers sensibly touch'd with the Consideration of the uncertainty of humane Fortunes, to see a People so abounding in Wealth, and famous for Luxury, Superfluous Magnificence, and State, to whom their Neighbours but other day had sought for Aid, be now so dispirited, as to Resign themselves and all they hold in the World, into the power and dispose of others, concluded now, that it was a duty Incumbent on their Trust and Honour not to abandon those that were become their Subjects, or see them betray'd into Ruine; and that the Samnites, if they should Invade those Territories to which the Romans were now lawfully Intitled, should therein act unjustly and Infringe the Peace; and therefore decreed that Ambassadors should forthwith be sent thither, with instructions to represent at large to the Samnites, the request of the Campanians, the Senates Answer mindful of the Alliance they had with the Samnites, and lastly how the Surrender was made; and then to desire and request them by all the Ties of mutual Freindship, to forbear their Vassals, and not with Hostile Arms invade those Territories which were become part of the Roman Dominions; with further Order, that if they found these gentle Entreaties did not prevail, then they should solemnly in the name of the Senate and People of Rome denounce and Charge the Samnites, not to meddle with the City Capua or any part of that Country. But when the Ambassadors came to deliver their Message in the Council of the Samnites, they received not only this fierce and haughty Answer, That they would still proceed in the War, but their Magistrates going out of the Council Chamber, even in the presence of the Roman Ambassadors, called for the Captains of their Troops, and with aloud Voice Commanded them, To March forthwith into the Country of Campania to forrage there and make all the spoil they could.

XXXII. Which being reported by the Ambassadors at their return, The Senate laying aside the Care of all other Affairs sent to demand Restitution, and that being denied, solemnly proclaimed War, decreeing likewise that this matter should at the first opportunity be propounded to the People, by whose Order the two Consuls took the Field, Valerius into Campania, Cornelius into Samnium, the former pitch'd his Tents at the foot of the Hill Gaurus, the latter at Satricula. The Samnite Legions first advanced towards Valerius, for that way they thought the Brunt of the War would lye, and the rather to be reveng'd on the Campanians that had been so ready first to yeild their own and now call in other Auxiliary Forces against them. No sooner had they descri'd the Romans Camp, but in all haste they every own for his own part called lustily to their Commanders for the Signal of Battel, assuring themselves and saying plainly, That the Romans should speed just as well in their assisting the Campanians, as the Campanians had done before them in Aiding the Sidicins. Valerius after he had amused the Enemy for some few days with light skirmishes, and picqueerings to try their Mettal, resolved at last to Fight them, but first Encouraged his Men in a short Speech to this purpose. That this new War or new Enemy ought not in the least to terrifie them, for always the further off from the City they bore Arms, the more weak and cowardly People they had to cope with. That they ought not to count the Samnites stout and valiant, because they had defeated the Sidicins or Campanians, for in all Engagements one side or other must of necessity be worsted. That undoubtedly the Campanians were overcome by their own excess of Luxury and effeminate softness, more than by the courage of their Enemies; However, what were two prosperous Battels of the Samnites in so many Ages, if set in competition with so many Honourable Victories of the People of Rome, who could almost number more Triumphs than years since the Foundation of their City? who have with their Swords in their hands subdued all the Nations round them, as the Sabines, the Hetrurians, the Latins, Hernicks, Aequians, Volscians and Auruncans; And after having cut to pieces the Gauls in so many Battels, have at last made them glad to get away by Sea in a shameful flight and disorder? Besides, as every one ought to go into the Field animated with the glory of his past Warlike and Valiant Exploits, so 'tis no small encouragement to consider under whose leading and auspicious Conduct you are to venture the fortune of the day; whether he be a man that can only make brave and daring Speeches, one stout and fierce in words but unexperienced in the practice of Arms; Or whether he be one that can himself handle his Weapons, always ready to advance in Person before the Standards, and both able and willing to endure all hazards and fatigues in the heat of the Battel. 'Tis my Deeds Gentlemen Soldiers, not my Words that I would have you follow, and to receive from me not only Command, but also Example, who not by bribing or the canvassing of Factions, nor yet by Courtship and Orations (usual Arts with Noble Men) but by this right hand of mine have attained to three Consulships and the highest pitch of Glory. There was a time indeed when it might have been objected, that this was no wonderful matter but easy to one of my Birth and Quality, being a Person of Noble Blood descended from the deliverers of their Country and whose Family bore the Consulship the very first year that the City had a Consul; But

But now the Case is altered, the way unto a Consulship lies equally open to you Commoners as to us of the Nobility, for 'tis not now as heretofore, the privilege of the Gentry, but the reward of vertue and Courage, look up therefore, Gentlemen Soldiers! and aim at this Sovereign Honour; Tho' men by the approbation of the Gods have given me the Surname of Corvinus, yet have I not forget the Ancient name of Publicola appropriate to our Family; I have and ever will (as always I have done) the Commons of Rome, at all times alike, both abroad in Wars, and at home in Peace, as a private Man, and as a publick Magistrate, and no less when I was Consul than when Tribune, and the same affections I retain'd throughout all my several Consulships; as for the work in hand, come along brave Boys! and with the assistance of Heaven, purchase this day for your selves as well as me, a fresh and intire Triumph over the Samnites.

There never was a General more familiar with his Soldiers, as ready as the meanest of them to undertake any duty, and in their Military Exercises or pastimes, when they tried each others nimbleness and strength, he would often make one with a most obliging freedom, his countenance unchang'd whether he got the Mastery or were Foil'd; nor would he refuse any man for the meanness of his quality, that offer'd to try a Bout with him; In his deeds he was kind and bountiful to his power and as occasion required; In words no less mindful of others Freedom, than of his own Place and Dignity; and (which most of all renders a man acceptable to the People) the same vertues and moderation which raised him to Honours and Preferments, he always retain'd in the management and enjoyment of them. Therefore the whole Army following this exhortation of a General so beloved, with an incredible chearfulness March'd out of their Camp into the Field. Never was Battel more obstinately fought on both sides, their Hopes were like their Forces, equal; and each party charg'd full of Confidence in themselves, and yet without contempt of the Enemy. The Samnites were animated with their late successes, and double Victory but just before; The Romans on the contrary stood upon that Honour and Reputation which they had enjoyed and daily encreased for the space of 400 years, and their Conquests almost ever since the Foundation of their City; each of them appeared the more solicitous because they had a new Enemy to deal with, whom they had never tried before; The manner of the fight shew'd the stoutness of their courage, neither party for a considerable time yeilding one Foot. The Consul seeing they could not be made retreat by down right blows, thought to terrifie them by sending a party of Horse to break their Front, but the Ground was too straight for them to do any good and they had not room to Charge, whereupon the Consul returning to the Van of the Legions, leaps off his Horse, 'Tis we Footmen (quoth he) when all is done must do the work, come on then, and as ye shall see me, wherever I go, make way by dint of Sword into the Enemies Main-Battel, so do you every one down with all that oppose or stand in your way, and presently through all that Grove of Pikes and glittering Spears, you shall see, we'll make an open passage over their slain Carcasses; He had no sooner said this but the Cavalry by his Command, Charged the Enemies Wings, and made way for the Foot to come up to their Main-Body, where first and formost the Consul charged in Person, and kill'd the first man he met upon the spot; the sight whereof enflam'd his men, so that every one most manfully laid about him; The Samnites tho' they received more wounds than they gave, stood to it still most resolutely; and now the fight had continued a good while, great slaughter there was all round the Samnites Ensigns, but no flying on either side, for they had resolv'd that nothing but Death should Conquer them. The Romans therefore finding their own strength begin to decay through weariness and not much daylight left, in a transport of Rage and Fury, gave a fresh Charge all at once upon the Enemy, who then first of all began to give Ground and soon after betook themselves to flight. Then were abundance of the Samnites slain and taken Prisoners, nor had but few of them escap'd, if night coming on so fast had not interrupted the victory rather than ended the Battel. The Romans confest that they never engaged with a more resolute and stubborn Enemy; and the Samnites being demanded, what it was that after so brave a Resistance first caus'd them to fly, did affirm that the eyes of the Romans appeared to them like flames of fire, and their Looks and Countenances fierce and terrible as those of Persons mad or distracted, which sight did more daunt them than any thing else, and this dread of theirs they manifested not only by the event of the Battel, but by their dislodging of their Camp and private retreat that night, so that next morning the Romans took possession of their empty Huts, where the Campanians came crowding in Multitudes to rejoice and congratulate their victory.

But this Joy had like to have been spoil'd by a disaster in Samnium, for the other Consul Cornelius advancing from Satricula, had unwarily March'd his Army into a Forrest through which ran an hollow Valley, on the side whereof the Enemy lay in Ambuscade, nor did he discover them, till he was so far Engaged as he knew not how to Retreat with safety; But whilst the Samnites waited till he should have brought his whole Body into that deep Valley that they might have them all at the same advantage, P. Decius a Colonel of Foot spied an Hill in the Forrest that commanded the place where the Enemy lay Encamped, and no less easie to be gam'd by such as were nimble and lightly Armed, than hard to be got up to, by those that were encumber'd with heavy Arms and Baggage; therefore seeing the Consul surpriz'd and discompos'd, See you not (quoth he) O Aulus Cornelius; the top of yonder Hill above the Enemy; that's the fortress on which we must build our hopes of safety, if we can but gain it quickly, as the Samnites have left it blindly, nor do I desire you should spare me more than the Principes [those that fought with Swords] and the Spear-men of one Legion to effect it; with whom as soon as I have seized the top thereof, do you without any fear March off from hence, and doubt not but to save your self and Army, for the Enemy being under us, and subject to all our Blows and Darts, cannot stir without great loss, and for us the good Fortune of Rome, or our own valour shall bring us off. The Consul applauded his advice, who with the party he desired, Marching secretly through the Thickets, hastened to the Place, the Enemy not discovering him, till he had gain'd it; But then being all amazed, and intent only upon him, he both gain'd the Consul some time to withdraw his Army into a more open ground, and also to Post himself the most conveniently on the Top of the Hill; The Samnites turn'd their Ensigns to and fro, sometimes this way and sometimes that, uncertain what to do; whereby they lost the opportunity of doing any thing at all; for they could not pursue the Consul, but by passing the Valley and giving him the same advantage which before they had against him, nor durst they March up the Hill whereon Decius was so advantageously posted; yet being more vext at his Company that had snatch'd out of their hands the opportunity of a Victory, and considering as well the nearness of the place as the finalness of their number, they were one while in the mind to environ the Hill, and cut off Decius from joining the Consul; By and by they thought it more advisable to open them a way that when they were come down into the Valley they might more safely fall upon them. Thus whilst they lingered unresolved, the night overtook them; Decius at first was in good hopes to fight with them from the higher ground, as they clambered the Hill; but afterwards he could not but wonder why they proceeded not to charge him, or at least if disadvantage of the ground had deterr'd them from that, why they did not fortifie themselves and obstruct his passage with Intrenchments and other works. Then calling to him the Centurions, What ignorance of the Art of War (saith he) or what negligence is this? Or how came these Scoundrels to obtain a victory over the Sidicins and Campanians? you see they trifle their ensigns to and fro, sometimes they are buddled up in close Order and sometimes advanced and displayed at length, but not an hand falls to work, tho ere this we might have been hemm'd in with a circumvallation; We shall shew our selves as very Sots as they, if we linger here any longer than it is for our advantage, come on then, go with me, and before it grow too dark let us take a view where they set their Guards and which way we may most conveniently enforce our passage. Accordingly he went forth himself in a Common Soldiers Jacket, taking with him the Centurions disguis'd in like manner, that the Enemy might not take notice of him as the Commander in Chief, and so survey'd all things necessary for his purpose.

XXXV. Then having set the Watch, he commanded a Signal to be given to all the rest, that when the Trumpet Sounded to the second Watch, they should all silently repair to him in their Arms. Where being Assembled accordingly, This silence Fellow-Soldiers (saith he) you must observe whilst you hear me speak, with giving your assent by loud Acclamations, as at other times you use to do, but only when I have declared my mind, let such as approve thereof go softly on the right hand, and as the greater number of you shall like or dislike that course we will follow; Hear now my Opinion. You are here encompassed by an Enemy, but not as men either overtaken in flight or surpris'd as straglers lagging behind for sloth, the Place you won by your Courage, and by a like Courage you must make good your escape; by coming hither you have already preserv'd a brave Roman Army, by forcing a Pass from hence. Now save your selves. You that being but a few have reliev'd so many, are worthy to stand in need of no help but your own. We have to do with an Enemy that yesterday by carelessness over-slept their opportunity of cutting off our whole Army; that are so stupid that they saw not this important Hill hanging over their Heads till we were Masters of it; who being so many thousands could neither prevent us from mounting it, nor when we were here, had the prudence to secure us by a Retrenchment tho they had day-light enough to accomplish it. Those whom you so easily out-witted when they were awake and had their eyes broad open, your business now is to deceive when they are fast asleep; nay you must do so, there is no other Remedy; for at that pass we are, that I am rather to shew you in what Terms of extremity ye stand, rather than persuade you to the Execution of good Counsel; for there needs no consulting whether you shall continue here, or depart here, since besides your Arms and brave Hearts to use them, Fortune has left you nothing to trust to, so that die we must of Hunger and Thirst, if we fear the Swords point more than becomes men of Arms and Romans to do. There is but one only way of safety left, which is to make a brave Sally, and force a passage through the Enemy, this we must do either in the day, or in the night, and that doubt is soon resolv'd, for if we wait till morning how can we hope but the Enemy will surround us with an intire Dutch and Rampire, who have already encompassed and as it were Wall'd in this little Hill we lie upon, with their Bodies; Now if the night be, as undoubtedly it is, the most favourable juncture for our Irruption, this very hour is certainly of all others the fittest moment. 'Tis now a little past the second Watch, a time when men are in their soundest sleep, amidst them ye shall go, and either by silence escape undiscovered, or if they do take the Alarm, you shall astonish them by setting up a sudden outcry and dreadful Hallow; do but follow me as hitherto you have successfully done, and I will follow the same Fortune that hath guided me, but far; as many of you as think this wholesome Counsel, make no more ado but pass on to my right hand.

Which

Which every man of them did, and followed Decius, who led them through the Intervals of the Enemies Camp, where no Out-guards nor Sentinels were placed.

They were now got to the midst of the Camp, when a Soldier clambering over the Watchmens Bodies lying heavy asleep, chanc'd to stumble on a Shield, which gave such a found as awakened the Watch-man, who rais'd his next Fellow, and he starting up, gave the Alarm to others, not knowing whether these Straglers were Friends or Enemies, whether the Garrison on the Hill was breaking out, or whether the Consul was returned to surprize their Camp: However, Decius seeing they could not avoid discovery, commanded his men to set up a Shout, whereby he amazed and affrighted the Enemy yet half asleep, and so confounded them, that they could neither readily take Arms, nor make head against them, nor yet pursue them; so that whilst the Samnites were in this terror and confusion, Decius and his party slaying such of the Guards as resisted them, had an opportunity to pass on towards the Consuls Camp. It was not yet day, and now they seem'd past all danger, when Decius thus bespake his Followers: Go on, a Gods name, in this course of generous Vertue, my courageous Romans! This Expedition and brave Retreat of yours, all Ages shall extol with the highest Applauses; but broad day-light is necessary for a full view of so much Gallantry; you deserve better than that silence and darkness should hide you, in your return with so much glory to the Camp: Here therefore let us rest and wait for day. His words were readily obey'd, and at day-break he dispatch'd a Messenger afore to the Consul, and so they hastened to the Camp; where giving the Word, no sooner was the noise spread, That those were returned safe who freely expos'd themselves to such apparent hazard for the common Safety, but every one ran forth to meet them with Thanks, and Praises, and Congratulations: They call them jointly and severally their Saviours; they praise and return thanks to the Gods, and cry up Decius to the Skies. This indeed was his Camp-Triumph, through the midst of which he marched with his Armed Party, every mans eyes fix'd upon him, and paid no less Honor to the Colonel, than if he had been Consul. When he was come to the Pretorium [or Generals Tent] the Consul by found of Trumpet call'd all the Army together, and beginning a Discourse in the deserved Praises of Decius, he was by Decius himself interrupted, and at his request waved the Oration: For he advised and perswaded the Consul, That passing by all Complements, they should presently lay hold of the opportunity, and whilst the Enemy was yet in that Consternation, and lay scattered about the Hill, fall upon them; the rather, for that he believed some Parties sent out after him, might be surpris'd stragling in the Forrest. Forthwith the Legions were commanded to Arm, and being now by their Scouts better acquainted with the Forrest, march'd in a more open Road towards the Enemy, and charg'd them, suspecting no such matter, and altogether unprovided: For the Samnites Soldiers being stragling all abroad, and for the most part unarm'd, could neither Rally themselves together in order, nor get into their Trenches: They first beat the main Body into their Works, and then routing the Guards, became Masters thereof. The Cry was heard all round the Hill, and caus'd every man to fly out of his Hold, so that a great part of them took their Heels before the Enemy could come up to them: Those which fled into the Works, being in number about Thirty thousand, were all put to the Sword, and the Camp plundered.

Things being thus luckily dispatch'd, the Consul convening another Assembly, proceeded to finish the praises of Decius which he had before begun, and also amplified them with fresh commendations of this new Service; and besides other Military Rewards, presented him with a Crown of Gold, and an hundred Oxen, amongst which was an extraordinary one all white, and fat and fair above the rest, with gilded Horns. The Soldiers, who with him held the before-mentioned Hill, had sett'd upon them a double proportion of Corn for ever, and at present each of them an Ox, and two Coats apiece. After the Consul's Largess, the Legionary Soldiers, with unanimous shouts, placed on the Head of Decius a Crown of Green Grass, called Obsidionalis, because it used to be given to him that had rais'd a Siege, and so preserv'd a distressed Town or Army: Nor were his own Band wanting to Crown him with another Chaplet of like Honor for bringing them off so happily. Being thus loaded with Ensigns of Glory, he Sacrificed his before-mentioned white Ox unto Mars, and bestowed the rest of them upon the Soldiers that had accompanied him in that Service; to whom also the Legions gave a pound of Wheat Meal, and a Sextar [a Measure much about our Quart] of Wine apiece. All which was perform'd with wonderful alacrity, and seconded with Shouts and Acclamations to testify their general Assent.

A third Battel happened at Suessula, where the Samnites Army being routed by M. Valerius, they thereupon sent for all the strength they could make at home, and now resolv'd to venture all at one push. Terrible tydings hereof came to Capua, and from thence Posts were dispatch'd to advertise Valerius the Consul, and request his aid. He presently advanced, leaving the Carriages and Baggage behind with a strong Guard, and with speedy Marches came up near the Enemy, where he took a very small Plot of Ground to Encamp in; as having besides his Horses for Service, no Beasts at all for Carriage, nor any of that Rabble of Slaves and Snaplack-boys which use to follow Armies, to encumber him.

The

The Samnites, as if they were presently to engage, drew up in Battalia, and seeing none come forth to encounter them, march'd up with Banners displayed to the very Camp of the Enemy, where finding the Soldiers on the Rampire, and understanding by their Scours in how small a compass they lay, concluding thence, that they must needs be but few in number, all the Army began to mutter, That there need no more ado, but to fill up the Ditches, and cut down the Breast-work, and so presently break into their Camp. And in that rashness had the War been dispatch'd, if the Commanders had not restrained the fury of their Soldiers. But because so great a multitude as they were, could not easily be supplied with Victuals by the Convoys appointed for that purpose, and for that as well by their Defeat at Suessula, as by lying here so long without Fighting, they were reduced to a scarcity almost of all things, it was thought fit, whilst the Enemy as affrighted, kept fast within his Works, to send out the Soldiers about the Country a Foraging; well hoping, that in the mean time the Romans, who came lightly appointed, and with no more Corn than they could carry on their shoulders, besides their Arms, would have spent all, and be brought to the last Extremity. The Consul perceiving the Enemies stragling abroad over the Country, and that their Guards were slenderly mann'd, having briefly encouraged his Soldiers, leads them out to attack their Camp, which having made themselves Masters of at the first Shout and Onset, and kill'd more of the Enemy in their Tents than at the Ports or on the Rampire, he caus'd all the Ensigns he had taken to be brought together to one place, and left two Legions there for a Guard, with a strict charge to forbear all riffling and plunder until he returned; and so march'd forward in Battel-array, sending forth the Horse before, who drove the scatter'd Samnites, as Hunters do Deers into the Toils, and made a mighty slaughter of them: For frighted as they were, they knew not any Signal whereby they might rally together, nor whether they were best make towards their Camp, or betake themselves to a further flight; so great was their Rout and Consternation, that there were pick'd up and brought to the Consul Forty thousand Shields (though there were not so many Men slain) and of Ensigns, with those taken in the Camp, the number of One hundred and seventy. Then returned he to the Enemies Tents, and bestow'd the whole Pillage there upon the Soldiers.

The Fortune of this Battel brought the Faliscans who were yet upon a Truce, to sue unto the Senate for a League of Peace; and also diverted the Latines, who had already levied Forces against the Romans, to imploy them against the Peligni. Nor was the Fame of this Victory confin'd within the Bounds of Italy, but even the Carthaginians sent Ambassadors to Rome, to congratulate that Success, and make them a Present of a Golden Crown of five and twenty pounds weight, to be laid up in the Vestry of Jupiter's Temple. Both the Consuls triumph'd over the Samnites, Decius following them, illustrious for those Marks of Honor and Praises conferr'd upon him: The name of the Colonel being no less celebrated by the Soldiers in their merry Catches and blunt Military Joques, than that of either of the Consuls. After this, the Ambassadors of Capua and the Suessians had Audience; and their Request granted, That a standing Garrison should be sent to Winter therefor preventing the IncurSIONS of the Samnites. Capua was even then so long ago fatal to Military Discipline; for having infected the Soldiers with a taste of all sorts of Pleasures and Voluptuousness, it soon alienated their minds from the memory of their Country and Honor: For those in that Garrison began to contrive a Design to take Capua from the Campanians, by the same wicked Practice [of a Massacre] as they first got it from the Ancient Inhabitants, saying, It would be but Justice to turn their own sword Example upon their Heads: And what reason was there, that the base Campanians should be Masters of the most plentiful Country in all Italy, and of a City worthy of such a Country, when they were not able to defend either it or themselves; more suitable it were, that the same Victorious Army should enjoy it, who with their Blood and Sweat rescued it out of the hands of the Samnites? Or was it fit, that a company of Sots, who had yielded themselves to be their Vassals, should surfeit on so much Pleasure and Plenty, whilst they themselves, worn out with the Fatigues of War, must still struggle with an unwholesome Air, and barren Soil round about the City of Rome, or within it, languish under that inveterate Plague of Usury, wherewith they were daily more and more oppressed. These Consultations, manag'd in private Cabals, and not yet publickly communicated, by some means came to the Ears of C. Marcius Rutilus, to whose charge the Province of Campania fell by Lot, leaving his Colleague Q. Servilius at home in the City; who having pump't out of the Officers, all the particulars of the Design, being a wise Man, both for his Age and long Experience in Publick Affairs (for he was now the fourth time Consul, and had been both Censor and Dictator) he thought it best to dissemble the Matter, and to frustrate the present Heat of the Soldiers by prolonging their hopes, that they might put their Plot in execution when they pleas'd hereafter upon some better opportunity. To which purpose he caus'd a Report to be spread, That the Garrisons should all Winter in the same Towns the Winter following. For they were divided into sundry Cities of Campania, and the Web of Conspiracy begun at Capua, was spread from thence through all the Forces. This scope being given them to berhink them-themselves, and advise further of these matters, the Publick Peace was preserv'd, and all things for the present quiet.

But when in the Summer the Consul took the Field, he resolv'd (seeing the Samnites did not appear in any condition to engage with him) to purge his Army, by cashiering the most busie and dangerous of those turbulent Spirits, which he effected under several fair and colourable Pretences, telling some of them, That they had already served as long as the Law required: Others, That they were grown old, or weak and unhealthy, and therefore he would dispense with their Service; and so they had their Furlows and were sent home: And others were dispatch'd in Parties for Convoys to fetch in Provisions from parts remote, where afterwards they were detain'd: This, at first, was practis'd by singling out one by one at a time, but afterwards upon some whole Companies, as a favour, because their Winter-quarters had been so far from their Dwellings and private Concerns; likewise under colour of Military Services and Imployments, whilst some of them were dispatch'd one way, and some another, the greatest part of the Conspirators were dispersed and kept away from the Army, upon various pretences and devised causes of delay. The truth is, at first, before they smelt out the Trick, they were not a little glad to visit home; but when they observ'd, That neither those that were first sent off, return'd again to their Colours, nor that scarce any others were discharg'd but such as had Winter'd in Campania, and of those especially the Authors of the Conspiracy; at first they wonder'd at such odd proceedings; but on second thoughts began to be afraid in earnest, That their Plot had taken wind, and then presently terrible Ideas fill their Heads, of Examinations and Tortures, Arraignments and Judgments, how they should be severally executed apart, and suffer all that the insolent and cruel Tyranny of the Consuls and Senate could invent and inflict. These things were secretly muttered through the Army, when they saw the Ring-leaders of the Conspiracy so finely removed and dis-membred from the Army by the Consuls policy. One Regiment, or Cohort [that is to say, the Tenth part of a Legion] that was Quartered not far from Ansur, possessed themselves of a narrow Pass at Lantula, between the Sea and the Mountains, where they intercepted and stop't such as the Consul sent out upon such and such pretended Services as aforesaid. They soon got together a notable Force, and nothing was wanting to give them the Reputation of a compleat Army, but a Commander in Chief: disorder'd therefore as they were, they went Plundering along as far as the Alban Country, where, under the Ridge of the Mountain called Alba longa, they encamp'd and fortified themselves. And when their Works were finish'd, spent the rest of the day in consultation touching the choice of a General. There was none of their own Company that they could confide in as sufficient for that Charge: And whom (say they) can we send for from Rome? Is there any man, either Senator or Commoner, that will wittingly and willingly expose himself to so great an hazard as to run our Fortune? Or to whom the Cause of the Army, enraged by the Injuries they have received, may in Prudence be safely trusted? The next day, whilst they were still debating this Point, some of the stragling Foragers brought in Advice, that T. Quintius was retired into the Country, and held a Farm in Tusculanum, where he employed himself in Husbandry, minding neither the City nor its Honors. This Gentleman was of Noble Birth, and had serv'd with great Credit and Renown in the Wars, till happening to be Lamed by a Wound in one of his Feet, resign'd his Command, and resolv'd to spend the rest of his days in the Country, far from Ambition and the turmoils of State. They no sooner heard his Name, but they knew the Man, and acknowledged his Merit, and, in a good hour, unanimously agreed he should be sent for; Small hopes they had that he would willingly meddle, and therefore concluded to use Force, and bring him to it by Fear. So, in the dead of Night, a Party of them came to his House and got in, where finding Quintius fast asleep, they awaken him, propound being their General, or if he refuse it, present Death, and thus carry'd him away by force to their Camp; where immediately he is saluted Lord General, and had the Insignia or Ornaments of that Command put upon him, whilst he was yet amaz'd at the suddenness of the thing, as if all had been Dream or Miracle. Then they require him to Lead them to Rome, and accordingly having advanced their Standards in an Heady Fit of their own, rather than by the Advice of their new Commander, they march'd in a Warlike Posture, till they came within eight miles of the City, on the Causey or High-road, now called the Appian-way; and had immediately come up to the City, but that they heard there was an Army advancing to oppose them, under the conduct of M. Valerius, surnamed Corvus, created Dictator on this occasion, and L. Aemilius Mamercinus, his General of Horse.

As soon as ever they came within view of each other, and took notice of the same Ensigns on either side, the remembrance of their Native Country began to work upon them all, and allay and mitigate their Heats; for they were not yet so desperate as to embrew their Swords in the Blood of their Fellow-Citizens; nor had they known any Wars but with Foreigners, their greatest madness at home had hitherto proceeded but to a Secession or sullen going by themselves for a while. Therefore, as well the Generals as Soldiers, on either side, were desirous that a Meeting might be appointed for a Parley. Whereupon Quintius (who was long since weary of bearing Arms for his Country, much more against it) and Corvus (than whom none could be more affectionately tender of all his Fellow-Citizens, especially Soldiers; and above all others, of those of his own Army) advanced to confer together: Corvus spoke first, and as soon as he came so near as to be known, had no less Reverence paid him by the Enemy, than respectful Audience from those of his own Party. When I march'd (saith he) now forth of the City to meet you, O Soldiers! I heartily implor'd the Immortal Gods, as well those that are common to us all, as the particular Patrons of my Family, that they would vouchsafe me not a Victory, but rather the Glory of reducing you to Terms of Concord and Unity. There have, and ever will be, occasions enough wherein we may win Honor by Arms, but here nothing is so passionately to be desired as Peace. That which so devoutly, and with solemn Vows I requested of the Gods, it lies in your Power to make me happy in; If you will but remember, That you are not now in Samnium, nor amongst the Volscians, but Encamp'd upon Roman Ground; That those are the Hills of your dear Native Soil, which you behold; That this Army consists of your own Countrymen and Fellow-Citizens; That I my self am that Consul under whose auspicious Conduct, you twice last year defeated the Samnite Legions, and twice with down-right blows beat them out of their Camp. I am, Sirs, that M. Valerius Corvus, of whose Nobility you have had proof and experience, not by any Injuries offered, but good Offices and Benefits always readily conferr'd upon you; Never was I the Promoter of any insolent Law against you, or of any harsh Act of the Senate, but in all my Government and Commands have been more rigorous to my self, than severe to you. If great Parentage, or approved Valour; if Authority or Honor may swell and elevate any mans Spirit, of such Progenitors am I descended, such proofs of Courage and Vertue have I given, so early did I attain to the Consular Dignity, that being but yet Three and twenty years old, I might have been formidable not only to the Commons, but even to the Senate it self. Yet I challenge any man to name one Word, one Act, said or done by me when a Consul, more haughty or grievous than when I was but a Tribune; with the same moderation did I manage my two following Consulships, such and no other will I also shew my self in this supreme and lofty Office of Dictator: Nor will I be more kind and gentle to these that are mine and my Countries Soldiers, than to you whom I abhor to call Enemies. You shall therefore first draw your Swords upon me, before I will draw upon you. From your side let the Trumpets first sound a Charge, thence let the Shoutings and Onset begin, if needs we must go to it and Fight. Now find in your hearts (if you can) to do that which neither your Fathers, nor your Grand-fathers could endure, neither these when they retreated into the Mount Sacer, nor those who afterwards placed themselves upon, and held the Aventine-Hill: Wait a while, till your Mothers and Wives with dishevel'd Hair come forth of the City to meet each of you, as heretofore they did Coriolanus. With that sight the Volscian Legions were stop'd and pacified, because they had one Roman for their Leader: And will not you, being all an Army of Romans, desist from so impious and unnatural a War? As for you, T. Quintius, howsoever you came there, whether with or against your will, if there be no remedy but we must come to Blows, I would advise thee to retire into the Rear, and shroud thy self amongst the hindermost; nay, 'twill be far more Honorable for thee fairly to run away, than to fight against thy Country. But at present, thou standest well and opportunely in the Front, as ready to accommodate all Differences, and be the Interpreter of this Friendly Conference for the good of us all. Demand any reasonable Conditions, and you shall have them; though in truth we were better yield even to unequal Terms, than impiously to Murder one another.

XLI.

T. Quintius, with Tears in his Eyes, turning about to those that followed him: I also, O Soldiers! (quoth he) if in any thing I can do you Service, am like to prove a far better Leader of you towards Peace, than to War. The Words you heard but now, proceeded not from a Samnite or a Volscian, but were spoken by a Roman, your Consul, Gentlemen! and your own General; be not so mad as to desire to try his successful Conduct against your selves, and to your destruction, which you have so often experienc'd and admired in your Preservation. The Senate had other Commanders, who might have attacked you with more rancour and fierceness, but they chose rather to imploy him who would be most favorable to, and sparing of you his Soldiers; and in whom, as being your General, you might repose most confidence. Thus you see, They that can easily vanquish you, do yet seek for Peace: Is it not then high time for us to desire it too? Why then do we not lay aside our peevish Anger, and fantastick Hopes (which are both treacherous Counsellors) and wholly refer our selves, and all our Concerns, to a Person of such approved Faith and Integrity? A General shout approv'd this Speech, and T. Quintius advancing before the Standards in the Front, declared the whole Army to be under the Command and Power of the Dictator, beseeching him, that he would undertake the Cause of poor and wretched Citizens, and having taken the same into his care, to manage and protect the same, with the same Justice and Uprightness as he was wont to administer the Affairs of the Commonwealth. That for his own particular part, he would make no Conditions, nor build his Hopes on any thing but Innocency: But the Soldiers desired, they might be secured to have the same favour, as the Senate had once before granted to the Commons, and a second time to the Legions, viz. That this their Revolt might not be charged upon them hereafter to their prejudice. The Dictator gave Quintius thanks and and commendations for his prudent Conduct, and bid all the rest be of good cheer, and immediately rode Post back to the City, where with the approbation of the Senate, he preferr'd to the People in the Petiline Grove a Bill of Indemnity, That no Soldier should be called in question for that Insurrection: He also prevail'd further, To have it Enacted, That no man should either in jest or earnest be upbraided or reproached therewith. At the same time pass'd a sacred Military Law, That no Soldiers name, once enter'd in the Muster-masters Book, should be razed out against his Will; with a Clause annexed, That none that had been a Tribune [or Colonel] should afterwards have the leading of Bands, or be a Centurion. This was required by the Mutineers, out of a particular pique to P. Salinius, who almost every other Year was a Tribune, and a Prime Centurion, whom they now call Primipili [Leaders of the Vanguard] against him they had a spight, because he had always oppos'd their Seditious Projects, and would not joyn with them in their Revolt at Lantula. This Branch therefore, the Senate in favour to Salinius refused to grant, whereupon he himself Petition'd them, not to regard his Honor more than the Concord and Unity of the whole City, and so got it allow'd. Another outrageous Demand they made, was, to have the Horse-mens Pay (which then was three times as much as that of the Foot) Retrench'd, for that they

Moreover, I find in some Authors, That L. Genucius, Tribune of the Commons, preferr'd a Law, To make Usury altogether unlawful. And that by another Ordinance of the Commons, It was provided, That none should be capable of bearing the same Office twice in ten Years space; nor any hold two Offices in the same year: As also, That it might be lawful to Create both the Consuls out of the Commons; which if they were all granted, shews to what an height this Insurrection was grown. In other Annals it is Recorded, That neither Valerius was made Dictator, but that the whole Affair was manag'd by the Consuls, nor yet that they broke out into Rebellion before they came to Rome, but there took Arms. As also, That their coming by Night was not into the Country Farm of T. Quintius, but into the House of C. Manlius, and that he was seiz'd by the Conspirators to be their General: And that thence they went and Encamped but four Miles off the City. That the Treaty for Peace was not first motion'd by the Captains, but that when both Armies came to face each other in Battalia, the Soldiers lovingly saluted one another, and began to shake hands, and mutually embrace with Tears; and therefore the Consuls seeing them so averse from Engaging, were forced to move the Senate for an Accommodation; so that amongst ancient Writers there is little certainty, save only, that a Sedition there was, and the same happily compos'd: However, the noise of these Disturbances, together with the fierce War undertaken with the Samnites, occasion'd some Nations to withdraw from their Alliances with the Romans; for besides the wavering of the Latines, whose Friendship had a long time been doubtful and not to be trusted, the Privernates, with sudden Incurfions, invaded and plundered Norba and Setia, two Neighboring Colonies of the Romans.

4. 5. The Latines, with the Campanians Revolt, and by Ambassadors to the Senate, demand to have one of the Consuls chosen from amongst the Latines. 6. Annius their Praetor going from his Audience, catches a fall from the Capitol, whereof he dies. 7. T. Manlius causes his own Son to be Beheaded for Fighting, though successfully against the Latines, contrary to Orders. 9. The Romans being shrewdly put to't, P. Decius devotes himself for the Army, and setting spurs to his Horse, Charges into the midst of the Enemy, and is slain, and the Romans get the day. 11. The Latines submit themselves. 12. T. Manlius returning to the City, none of the Youth would go out to meet him. 15. Minucia, a Vestal Virgin, condemn'd for Incest. 16. The Ausonians overcome, and a Colony planted at Cales. 18. Divers Roman Matrons convicted of Poisoning, and forced to drink off their own Preparations, whereof they died. A Law then first made touching Poisoning. 21. The Privernates, after they had rebell'd, get to be made free Denizens of Rome. 25. The Palapoltians vanquish'd and besieg'd, submit. 26. Q. Publilius, who first besieg'd them, is continued in Command, and allow'd to Triumph. 28. The Commons freed from the Tyranny of their Creditors, by reason of the filthy Lust of Lucius Papirius who would have ravish'd C. Publilius his Debtor. 30. Whilst L. Papirius the Dictator was gone from the Army to Rome to repeat the Sacrifices, Q. Fabius General of the Horse, invited by an occasional advantage, fights with the Samnites contrary to his Edict, and woris them, for which the Dictator goes about to punish him. 33. Fabius flies to Rome. 35. And when his cause would not hold water at Law, by the Peoples intreaty he obtains a Pardon. 36. This Book contains the prosperous proceedings against the Samnites.

THE Consuls now were C. Plantius the second time, and L. Æmilius Mamercus, when the Setines and Norbans sent advice to Rome that the Privernates had Revolted, with Complaints of damages by them sustained. Intelligence also arriv'd, That an Army of Volsians, under the Conduct of the Antiates, were Encamp'd at Satricum. The management of both these Wars fell to Plantius's Lot, who advancing first to Privernum, presently gave them Battel: The Enemy was easily vanquish'd, the Town taken, but restored, only a strong Garrison placed in it, and two parts of their Lands taken away from them. Thence the Victorious Army march'd to Satricum against the Antiates, where a cruel Battel was fought with great slaughter on both sides, and when a Tempest had parted them, before either could lay claim to the Victory, the Romans, nothing wearied with that so doubtful Conflict, made preparations to renew the Encounter in the Morning; But the Volsians, having taken an Account of what Men they had lost, had not so much mind to repeat the Danger: For in the Night (thereby confessing themselves beaten) they dislodged, and in fear and confusion went their ways towards Antium, leaving their wounded Men, and part of their Baggage, behind them. A power of Arms were found amongst the Dead, and in their Camp, which the Consul promis'd to Dedicate to the Goddess, called Mother Lua [thought to signify the Earth, which after Blood-shed was to be appeas'd with Offerings and Lustrations] after which, he forrag'd and spoil'd the Enemies Country as far as the Sea-Coast. Æmilius, the other Consul, made an Inroad into the Sabellian Territories, but neither were the Samnites in the Field, nor did their Legions offer to oppose him: On the contrary, as he was destroying all before him with Fire and Sword, they sent Ambassadors to him, desiring Peace, whom he refer'd to the Senate, where having obtain'd Audience, their haughty stomachs being come down, They requested the Romans to grant them Peace, and leave to prosecute their War against the Sidicins, which they alledged they might with the more Justice and Equity desire, since as they had fought and enter'd into Amity with the People of Rome in their highest Prosperity, and not as the Campanians, enforced by necessity; so the Arms they desired to bear was against the Sidicins, always their Enemies, and never Friends to the Romans: A Nation, who neither in Peace (as the Samnites) ever desired any Alliance with the Romans; nor yet, in time of War, had (like the Campanians) requested any Assistance from thence, and could not pretend to be under the protection of, or in subjection to the People of Rome.

II.

When touching these Demands of the Samnites, Tib. Æmilius the Prætor had consulted the Senate, and they had thought fit to renew the League, he returned them this Answer, That as it was not the fault of the People of Rome, that the Friendship heretofore concluded between them, was not perpetual; so since they now seem'd to be weary of the War, of which themselves were the occasion, the Romans would not oppose the Renewing of the League, and settling of the Ancient Amity. But as to the Sidicins, they should not interpose, but leave the Samnites to their Liberty of making Peace and War, as they should think best. The League being ratified, they return'd home, and forthwith the Roman Army was recall'd, having got a years Pay, and Corn for three months, according to the Capitulation made with the Consul for granting them a Truce till their Ambassadors came back. The Samnites now employ'd all their Forces against the Sidicins, and doubted not but in little time to be Masters of their City. Then first of all, the Sidicins made an offer to yield up themselves, and become Subjects to the Romans; but the Senate rejected the same, as coming too late, and wrested as it were from them perforce in their last Extremity: Whereupon they tendered the same to the Latines, who already of their own accord had revolted and taken Arms; nor were the Campanians wanting to join in the same Association, so much fresher in their minds was the memory of the Injuries offered them by the Samnites, than of the good Offices done them by the Romans. Out of so many several Nations confederated together, a vast Army was raised, which under the Conduct of the Latines invaded the Borders of the Samnites, and slew more in Forraging and Plundering than by fair Fighting: And though the Latines seem'd to have the better on't in several Skirmishes, yet they were well content, for avoiding frequent Encounters, to retreat out of the Enemies Territories. Then had the Samnites time to send Ambassadors to Rome, who made complaint to the Senate, That they suffered as hard measure now they were Confederates, as they did before whilst they were Enemies, and therefore did humbly request, That the Romans would be satisfied with that Victory which they snatch'd out of the Samnites hands over the Campanians and Sidicins, and not suffer them now to be trampled under foot by united multitudes of base and cowardly people. That if the Latines and Campanians were Subjects to the People of Rome, they would by their Authority restrain them from Insesting the Samnites Country, and if they refuse, that then they would by force of Arms compel them to forbear. Hereunto the Senate fram'd a doubtful Answer: For on the one side they were ashamed to say, that the Latines were not now under their Dominion; and on the other side afraid, that if they should go about to ruffle with them, it might alienate them the more, and cause them to break out into open Hostility; therefore they told the Ambassadors, That as to the Campanians they were united not by League, but by absolute Surrender, and therefore whether they would or no,

III.

no, they would make them be quiet: But in their League with the Latines, there was no Article whereby they should be prohibited from making War against whomsoever they thought fit. This Answer, as it sent away the Samnites altogether uncertain what measures the Romans would take, so it wholly estranged the Campanians for fear, and at the same time rendred the Latines more stout and daring, as if the Romans would now yield to any thing rather than displease them. Therefore under a colour of making Preparations against the Samnites, they summoned and held frequent Councils one after another, where the chief Persons secretly amongst themselves, in all their Consultations, mainly intended the settling and adjusting a War against the Romans, wherein the Campanians consented to joyn as well as the rest, and bear Arms against Those who so lately had preserv'd and protected them. Now although these Councils were industriously concealed, because they were desirous to have utterly cut off the Samnites behind them, before the Romans should take the Alarm; yet the Plot was discovered, and some hints thereof given at Rome by some amongst them, who were obliged to the Romans for private Kindnesses, and hospitable Entertainment. Hereupon the Consuls were commanded to resign their Office before the usual time, that new ones might the sooner be created, to make Preparations against the eminent danger threaten'd; but here a scruple of Conscience arose, whether it might not be ominous, if the Assembly for Election should be held by those whose Government was thus abridged, therefore they rather chose to have an Inter-reign; and two Inter-regents there were one after another, M. Valerius, and M. Fabius, the later created Consuls, T. Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P. Decius Mus. That year Alexander King of the Epirots, arriv'd in Italy with a Navy, and had his first attempts met with success, would, no doubt, have push'd forwards his Fortune, and at last have involv'd the Romans in War: In the same Age his Sisters Son, Alexander the Great, flourish'd, who whilst in another part of the World he shew'd himself Invincible by Arms, was in the prime of his years conquer'd by death.

As for the Romans, although they plainly perceived the Revolt of their Associates, and all the Tribes of the Latins, yet they thought it best to dissemble the matter, and make shew as if they were only concerned for the Samnites, and not for themselves: To which purpose they sent for ten of the Principal Persons amongst the Latins to come to Rome, pretending to give them in Charge, what their pleasure was to have done. The Latines at that time had for their two Prætors, L. Amnius of Setia, and L. Numicius of Circeia, both Roman Colonies; by whose means, not only Signia and Velitre, two other Colonies of Rome, but the Volsians also, were excited to take Arms and joyn in the Confederacy. These two Gentlemen therefore it was thought fit to summon by Name, nor could they be ignorant what it was they were sent for about: However they presently call a Council, to whom they Declare how they were cited to Rome, and what Treatment they expected, desiring the Advice of that Assembly what answer they should make.

IV.

After one had given his Opinion this way, and another that, Amnius stands up and says, Although I my self moved you to consult of an Answer, yet I conceive it more concerns the main Interest of our State, to determine what to do, than what to say: For when we are once come to a Resolution how to conduct our Affairs, it will not be difficult to accommodate Words to our purpose. For if even now already under the umbrage of an equal Alliance, we can be content tamely to suffer Slavery, what hinders, but that betraying the Sidicins, we truckle to all the Commands not only of the Romans, but the Samnites too, and fairly tell the Romans that we will lay down our Arms, whenever they please to nod us into Obedience. But if at length the Natural desire of Liberty make any Impression upon our Hearts, or can set an edge upon our Spirits; If in truth there be a League between us, and if Association ought to be nothing else but an equal Fruition of the same Liberty and Priviledges; If we may now glory (what heretofore we were ashamed to own) that we are Kinsmen to the Romans, and of their own Blood: If that be indeed an Associated Army which they have, by whose Accession they double their Strength, and which their Consuls in beginning or ending their proper Wars, will never separate from their own: Why is there not an Equality in all things else? Why is not one of the Consuls chosen by the Latins? Where there is part of the Burthen, why is there not part of the Government? Nor would this in it self be any great matter of Honor to us, since thereby we shall acknowledge Rome to be the Head of Latium; but by our remissness hitherto. and truckling wholly under them with patience so long, we have made it seem to be an Honorable Demand, and worthy to be insisted upon. But if ever you wish'd to see the Day wherein you might participate in the Government, and assert your Rights and Liberties, Behold! That time is now presented to you, by your own Courage and the Gracious favor of the Gods; you try'd their patience by denying to levy Soldiers at their Command: who can doubt but they were mad at heart, when we brake that Custom which had pass'd uncontroul'd above 200. years? yet they calmly pocketed the Affront. We waged War against the Peligni in our own Names, yet They who heretofore would not allow us a Right to defend our own Borders, never Interpos'd: That we had taken the Sidicins into our Protection: That the Campanians were revolted from them to us: That we were raising Forces against the Samnites, their own Confederates; all this they heard and knew well enough, yet still they stirr'd not once out of their City. How come they to be thus modest and quiet? Can

it proceed from anything but a Consciousness of our Puissance, and their own weakness? I have it from very good hands, That when lately the Samnites made their Complaints against us, the Roman Senate returned such a cold Answer, as plainly shew'd, That they themselves pretended not to require that Latium should be under the Roman Empire. You have nothing to do but assume and lay Claim to that which they already tacitly yield unto you. If any be afraid to be the Speaker, Behold here am I, who not only in the Hearing of the People of Rome, and their Senate, but of Jupiter himself who resides in the Capitol, am ready to tell them plainly, That if they expect we should continue in League and Amity with them, They must from us receive one of their Consuls, and part of the Senate. All that were present, hearing him not only persuade, but promise to undertake this, with so great a Spirit and Resolution, signified their Approbation with a Shout, and consented, That he should do and say whatsoever he thought expedient for the welfare of the Latine Nation, and suitable to the Trust reposed in him.

V. When he, with the rest, came to Rome, the Senate appointed to give them Audience in the Capitol; where when T. Manlius the Consul, by the Direction and Authority of the Senators, pressed them earnestly, Not to make War on the Samnites, who were now the Allies of the People of Rome. Annus, as if he had been a Conqueror that had taken the Capitol by force of Arms, and not an Ambassador, protected only by the Law of Nations to deliver his Errand, began thus to Hector: "It was now certainly time, O Titus Manlius, and you Senators of Rome! to have left off your domineering, and to treat us not in a Commanding fashion, as if we were your Vassals, when we cannot but see Latium, through the favour of the Gods, flourishing both in Men and Arms, as having vanquish'd the Samnites by dint of Sword, taken the Sidicini and Campanians into Confederacy, wherein the Volscians are also joyned, and even your own Colonies chuse to be our Subjects rather than yours: But since you are still so loth to put an end to your proud and outrageous Tyranny, although we could easily by Arms restore Latium to her Ancient intire Freedom; yet for Kindreds-sake, we are content to offer Terms of Peace fair and equal to both Parties, since it hath pleas'd the Immortal Gods to make us equal in Strength and Power. It is therefore necessary, That of the two Consuls, one be chosen a Roman, the other a Latine: That the number of Senators be equally Elect-ed out of one Nation as well as the other: That both Nations to all intents and purposes, be United and Incorporated into one People and Commonwealth. And since there must be one Imperial Seat, and one Common Name to all, wherein one part must of necessity yield to the other, we are content, and may it be lucky to Both: That this your Country have the Precedency, and let us all be call'd by the name of Romans. It happened by chance, that the Romans to match him, had at this time a Consul altogether as stout and hot; viz. T. Manlius, who was so unable to conceal his Resentments, as he openly declared, That if the Senators should be so mad as to receive Laws from a Fellow of Setin, he would come into the Senate-House with his Sword by his side, and whomsoever he should see there in Council of the Latines, he would not fail to Kill them with his own hand upon the Spot. And then turning to the Image of Jupiter: Hear, O Jupiter! (quoth he) this Wickedness and Indignity. Hear you, O Justice and Piety! Wilt thou, O Jupiter! as if thou wast Conquer'd and made a Captive, endure to behold strange Consuls, and a Senate of Foreigners in thy Holy Consecrated Temple? Are these, you Latines! the Covenants which Tullus King of Rome made with the Albans your Ancestors? Or which L. Tarquin, afterwards concluded with you? Do you not remember the Battel at the Regillian Lake? Or have you altogether forgot your Old Defeats, as well as the New Benefits we have conferr'd upon you?

VI. This generous Speech of the Consul, rais'd the general Indignation of the Senate against the Latines; and 'tis said, That whilst the Consuls did often Invoke the Gods as Witnesses of those Ancient Leagues, Annus was heard to Joke at and despise the Power and God-head of the Roman Jupiter: This is certain, that as in a Fury he went hastily from the Porch of the Temple, he fell down the Stairs, and hurt his Head so grievously against the Pavement, that he swooned away: But whether he dyed out-right, since all Authors are not agreed in that Point, I must leave it doubtful as I find it. As likewise that other Tradition, That whilst they were thus upbraiding the Latines with breach of Faith, a violent Storm happened on a sudden, with mighty Thunder-claps. For as these things may perhaps be true, so 'tis not possible but they may be handsomely devised, on purpose to represent more fitly the Vengeance of the Gods? Torquatus being sent by the Senate to dismiss the Ambassadors, when he saw Annus thus lying along, cry'd out with a Voice so loud, that both the Senate and People might hear him: 'Tis well, it became you, O ye Gods, to begin so Pious a War! Surely there is a Divine Power and Deity in Heaven! Thou art no Phantasm, O mighty Jupiter! Nor in vain have we Hallowed thee in this Temple, as the Father both of Gods and Men! Why delay ye then, O Romans and Conscript Fathers! to take Arms, when you see the Gods themselves are your Leaders: So will I lay flat and sprawling the Latine Legions, as now you behold their Ambassador lying at the stairs foot. These Words of the Consul made such Impressions on the People, That the Latine Ambassadors, if it had not been more for the care of those Officers that were appointed to attend them, than respect to the Law of Nations, would scarce have escap'd the violence

lence and fury of the Rabble. The Senate also agreed the War, and the Consuls having levied two Armies, march'd through the Country of the Marsians and Pelignians; and having joyn'd the Forces of the Samnites, Encamp'd themselves before Capua, where the Latines and their Confederates had already drawn their Troops to a general Rendezvous. There, as the Story goes, both the Consuls in their sleep saw an Apparition in the shape of a Man, but much greater and more stately, which told them, That of the two Armies now facing each other, The General of the one, and the whole Body of the other, must be a Sacrifice or Tribute to the Infernal Spirits, and Mother Earth; and which soever of the opposite Generals should Devote to those Infernal Spirits, his Enemies, and with them himself, That Party and People should win the day. The Consuls communicating these Night-Visions one to another, thought fit, that for appeasing the Anger of the Gods, Sacrifices should be kill'd, to the end, that if in their Entrails, inspected according to Art, the same things were found to be portended as in the Dream, then one or other of the Consuls should answer the expectation of the Destinies. The Answers of the Sooth-sayers [or Priests that were wont for Divination to view the Bowels of the Sacrifices] agreed very much with that Superstitious Conceit which the Dreams had implanted in the Consuls minds; whereupon they call'd together the Commissary-Generals of the Senate that attended the Army, and the Colonels, and plainly declaring to them the pleasure of the Gods (that the voluntary Death of one of the Generals unexpected, might not affright or discompose the Army in the Field) They agreed between themselves, That on which part soever the Roman Batalions should begin first to shrink, or give Ground, the Consul that Commanded there should presently Devote himself for the good of the People of Rome. At the same Council it was also debated, That if ever at any time before, any War had been manag'd with strict and severe Government, it would now be necessary to advance that ancient rigorous Discipline. That which sharpen'd their Care and Caution in that behalf, was because they were now to engage with a Nation agreeing with themselves in Language, Manners, Weapons, Customs, and especially in the same Arts and Methods of War: For of these two Armies, Soldier with Soldier, Centurion with Centurion, Tribune with Tribune were well acquainted, and had been oft Comrades in the same Garrisons, and mix'd in the very same Band or Company, therefore that the Soldiers might not fall into any Error, the Consuls made Proclamation through the Camp: That no man should fight with the Enemy out of his Rank, or without Command.

It happen'd, that amongst other Captains of Horse who were sent out every way to discover the Posture of the Enemy, young T. Manlius the Consul Son, was got with his Troop beyond the Enemies, so that he was almost within a Bows-shot of one of their Corps-du-Guard; where was a Party of Tusculane Horse, commanded by Geminus Metius, a Person famous in his Country both for his high Birth and approved Gallantry. He seeing the Roman Horse, and the Consul Son very brave in the Head of them (for all the Persons of Quality on both sides were well known one to another) called to him: What (quoth he) will you Romans manage the War with the Latines, and all their Confederates, with one single Troop? How shall your Consul, and your two Consular Armies in the mean time employ themselves? They (replies Manlius) will be with you time enough, and with them He that is much more powerful and strong, I mean, Jupiter himself, the Witness of those Leagues which you have violated. And as at the Lake Regillus we gave you your Bellies full of Fighting; so never doubt it, but before you go hence, we shall quite put you out of conceit with display'd Banners and pitch'd Battels. With that, says Geminus, advancing as he was on Horse-back a little from his Troop: In the mean time, till that terrible day come when you will do such Wonders with your two Armies, Wilt thou try one Bout with me, that by the Event between us two, the World may see how much a Latine Cavalier does surpass a Roman? The brave young Mans Blood boil'd in his Veins, whether out of Rage and Indignation to be thus upbraided, or that for shame he could not decline so fair a Challenge, or whether it were the unavoidable power of his Destiny that hurried him on: So it was, That unmindful of his Fathers Command, and the express Edict of the Consuls, he rashly accepted the Fatal Combat, wherein the difference was not much, whether he overcame or were vanquish'd. The rest of the Horse-men, of both Parties, retreating to give them room, as if they had been to see a Prize; in the void space of the plain Field that lay between, they set Spurs to their Horses, and charg'd each other with the sharp points of their Spears: Manlius, with his Lance aloft, raz'd the Head-piece of his Enemy, and that of Metius lightly touch'd and pass'd by the Horses neck: Then bringing about their Horses again, Manlius rais'd himself in the Saddle to Charge first, and thrust the others Horse in between the Ears, who with the smart of the Wound, rear'd his Fore-feet, and violently shaking his Head, cast his Rider: And as he was leaning upon his Spear and Shield to get up again, Manlius ran him into the Throat, so that the Spear-head came out at his Ribs, and nail'd him fast to the ground, and then disarming him, rode up to his Troop, who attended him as in Triumph to the Camp, and so directly to his Fathers Pavilion, little considering the quality of the Fact, and its future dismal Consequence, and ignorant whether he had deserv'd Praise, or was become obnoxious to punishment: Father (saith he) to shew the World that I am truly your Son,

VII.

Son, and derive not my self from your Blood in vain, I bring here the Spoils of a Gentleman of the Enemies Camp, that defied and challeng'd me, whom I fairly slew in single Combat. The Consul had scarce heard him, when turning away his Face, he commanded an Assembly to be summoned by sound of Trumpet; which being met, he thus in the presence of them all speaks to his Son: "Forasmuch as thou, O T. Manlius, regarding neither the Consular Authority, nor Reverencing the Majesty of thy Father, hast presum'd without Command, and disorderly, to Fight the Enemy against our Edict and express Command, and as much as in thee lay, hast dissolv'd and broken that Discipline of War, which hitherto hath been the principal Pillar to support the Roman State; and hast reduc'd me to the necessity of this sad Choice, That either I must forget my Duty to the Republick, or my natural Affection to my self and mine: We will undergo the punishment of our own Transgression, rather than that the whole State, to its mighty prejudice and damage, shall pay for our rashness and folly. A sad Example I confels 'twill be, but very profitable to the Youth of After-ages: As for me, as well the in-bred Affection which all Fathers bear to their Children, as the present proof thou hast given of thy Courage (though deceived with a false appearance of Honor) cause no small Emotion in my Breast: Yet since there is a Necessity, That either by thy Death the Consuls Commands be ratified, or for ever slighted and disannull'd by the Impunity of thy Disobedience, I cannot think, but if thou hast in thee any of my Blood, thou wilt readily yield to re-establish the Military Discipline which thou hast violated, by a cheerful Submission to the punishment. Go, Marshal! and bind him to the Stake. All were amaz'd at the severity of this Sentence, as much as if they had seen the edge of the Hatchet levell'd at their own Throats, and 'twas out of Fear, rather than Modesty, that they did fall into a Mutiny. Having a little recover'd their Spirits dissipat'd with wonder, they had not long stood silent when his Head being chop'd off, the Blood gush'd forth before them, and their Tongues as freely pour'd out Complaints, and mix'd Curses with their Lamentations. The Youths Body they cover'd with his own Victorious Spoils; they erected a Funeral Pile without the Camp whercon to burn it, and celebrated his Obsequies with as much Affection and Honor as ever was paid by Soldiers to the memory of their greatest Commanders: And the Manlian Commands were not only dreadful for the present, but gave a terrible precedent to all Posterity.

VIII. However, the rigor of this Punishment made the Soldiers more obedient; and besides, rendering the Guards and Sentinels more vigilant, did much good in the extremity of the Battel that soon after ensued; for their Fight was much like a Civil War, the Latines differing from the Roman Commonwealth in nothing almost but Courage. Formerly, they used long large Roman Shields; afterwards, becoming Stipendiaries and taking pay, they wore instead thereof shorter Targets: And whereas afore-time they drew up close and thick together, like the Macedonian Phalanges; afterwards they rang'd their Battel into Bands more loosely and distinctly, and at last came to be divided into thinner and more numerous Ranks and Squadrons, each Squadron containing sixty Soldiers, two Centurions, and an Ensign-Bearer; their Van consisted of fifteen Companies (placed a small distance from each other) of Spear-men, or rather Javelyners, called Hastati; each Company having twenty Light-arm'd Soldiers, and the rest a sort of Targeteers: They call'd those Light-arm'd, who carried only Spears or Javelins to fight with at hand, and a small sort of Darts to throw at a distance. In this Fore-front were placed the Flower of the Youths that grew up as Apprentices to the Art of War. Then came as many more Companies of those of riper and more manly Age, which were called Principes: In the next place thirty Companies of Targeteers, all with very brave and extraordinary Armor, and these were called Antepilani, because they were followed by fifteen Squadrons more, each of which contained three Divisions, and each first Division, being that next to the Standard, was called Pilum, and consisted of three Colours or Companies, every one of which contained 186 Men; the first Company was of old Soldiers of approved Courage, call'd Triarii; the second of men of less Force and Experience, call'd Rorarii; and the third of raw Fellows new list'd to fill up the Muster-Rolls, call'd Accensi, who being of small account, always march'd in the Rear.

When the Army was thus drawn up in Battalia, the Hastati or Javelyners began the Battel, and if they were not able to Rout the Enemy, they softly and in order Retreated, and fell back into the Intervals between the Squadrons of the Principes, who receiv'd them, and then advanced themselves to Charge the Enemy, and were therein seconded by the said Hastati: the Triarii all this while abiding firm about their Ensigns, setting out their left Legs before them at length, their Targets on their shoulders, and their short Pikes or Javelins stuck into the Ground, at the wrong end sloping, and with their Heads bending forwards, so that they seem'd Fortified with Palisado's. Now if the Principes also prov'd unsuccessful, and could not break the Enemy, then they orderly by little and little retired from the Fore-front back to the Triarii; (whence grew the Proverb, when a thing was at a dead lift, to say, ad Triarios redisse, that it was come to the Triarii, or last pinch) then the Triarii at once rising up, as soon as they had received the Principes and Hastati into the void spaces between their Files, suddenly drew to a close Order, and shut up as it were all Passages and Entrance, and so with one joint close Body of the whole Army, there being now no further reserve or hope left, resolutely advanc'd to Charge the Enemy; who were herewith most surpriz'd and disheartened, when thinking to Chase those that they seem'd to have vanquish'd, they saw a new Battel of fresh Men starting up, and the same more numerous. The Romans commonly levied for their Army four Legions, each consisting of 5000. Foot and 300. Horse, to whom were wont to be added just as many more Auxiliaries furnish'd by the Latines; but they now were Enemies, and had Marshal'd their Army exactly in the same manner; so that they knew well enough before-hand, not only that they were to encounter Ensign with Ensign, all the Pikes and Javelins with Pikes and Javelins, and Principes with Principes, but also one Centurion with another, if the Armies were not disordered. In each Army there was a Primipilus, Chief Centurion or Leader of the Triarii: The Roman, but of a weak and slender Body, but otherwise a Man of Courage and Conduct: The Latine, a mighty stout Fellow, and a Devilish Fighter: They knew one another well enough, as having always equal Charges heretofore, when the Roman and Latine Forces used to be united: The Roman not greatly trusting to his own strength, had got leave of the Consuls before they march'd out of Rome, to choose whom he would to be his Deputy Centurion, who might be his Second, and defend him from this one designed Enemy. And it fell out, that the young Man by him made choice of, in the heat of the Battel engaged the Latine Centurion, and slew him. The Battel was fought not far from the Foot of the Mountain Vesuvius in the Road to Veseris.

The Roman Consuls, before they put their Army into Battalia, having severally killed their Beasts for Sacrifice, the Aruspex [or Bowel-prying Sooth-sayer] is said to have observed in Decius's, the head of the Liver to be wounded, but in all other respects an acceptable Sacrifice: But as for Manlius, in his there appeared as good tokens as could be wish'd; whereupon (quoth Decius) 'tis well enough, since my Brother Consul has the favor of the Gods. The Army being drawn up, as before related, they march'd into the Field, Manlius commanding the Right Wing, and Decius the Left. At first they fought on both sides with equal Courage as well as Forces: But after a while, the Roman Hastati of the Left Wing, no longer able to bear the violent Shock of the Latines, retreated to their Principes; in which disorder Decius calls aloud to M. Valerius, I see, O Valerius! we have need of the Assistance of the Gods; Let the publick High Priest of the People of Rome come and pronounce the Solemn Words, with which I am to devote my self for our Army, that I may say them after him. The Priest ordered him to put on a long Purple Robe embroidered before, call'd Prætexta, to cover his Head, and put forth his hand under the said Robe at his Chin, and standing upon a Javelin with both his Feet, to say after him, as follows: O Janus, Jupiter, Father Mars, Bellona, you Household Deities, Novensiles and Indigetes! you Gods likewise who have special Power over us and our Enemies, and all you Infernal Gods, you I invoke, you I adore, your pardon and leave I implore, and your favor I require, That you would prosper Power and Victory unto the People of Rome, and strike their Enemies with Dread, and Terror, and Slaughter: And as I have solemnly call'd upon you by Name, so for the Weal-Publick of the People of Rome, and Quirites, their Legions and Auxiliaries, I here do Devote the Army of the Enemies, and all their Aids, together with my self, to Tellus and the Infernal Gods. As soon as he had recited this Prayer, he dispatch'd a Lictor [or one of the Provost Marshals] to T. Manlius, to advertise him, That his Colleague had seasonably Devoted himself for the Army: And then tucking up his Gown after the Gabine Fashion [that is, one part thrown under his right Arm, and the same Lappet back again over the left Shoulder, a posture the Gabii were wont to Sacrifice in; and being once surprized at their Devotions by an Enemy, Charg'd them in that posture, and obtain'd the Victory, whence for Luck's sake the Roman Consuls used it, when they denounced War] he mounted his Horse, Arm'd at all Points, and so spurr'd into the thickest of the Enemy. To both Armies he seem'd to carry a Presence full of Majesty, and something more than Humane. As he sent from Heaven to Atone all the Wrath of the Gods, and divert their Vengeance from his own People to the Enemy; where-ever he came he carried Dread and Terror, first he put the Latines Front into Confusion, then Charg'd through into their main Body. This was evident, that where-ever his Horse carried him, they all round trembled and were astonish'd, as if they had been Planet-struck. And when at last he fell oppress'd with a Storm of Darts, from that moment the Latine Regiments were generally in a Consternation, and every where began to give Ground: As on the other side, the Romans discharg'd of their Superstitious Fears, as if they had but just now began the Fight, fell upon the Enemy with redoubled Courage; for the Rorarii ran forwards amongst the Ranks of the Antepilani, thereby reinforcing both the Hastati and the Principes, whilst the Triarii kneeling on their right Knee, waited for the Word of Command from the Consul, when to rise and fall on.

In the progress of the Conflict, when the Latines by reason of their Numbers seem'd in some places to prevail, the Consul Manlius, having receiv'd the news of his Colleagues gallant death, and paid thereunto (as Piety required) a just Tribute of Tears and Praise, was once about to bring on the Triarii; but upon second thoughts concluded it better to reserve them till the last push; and in their stead commanded the Squadron call'd Accensi, to advance from the Rear to the Van before the Standards. The Latines mistook these for the Triarii, and presently raised their own Triarii to encounter them. Who having fought a good while very smartly, and both wearied themselves, and either broken or blunted the points of their Spears and Javelins, but yet by mere force beat back their Enemies, thinking now all had been done, and that they were sure of the Victory. All of a sudden the Consul steps to his Triarii, Rise now (saith he) you that are yet fresh, against an Enemy already tyred: Remember your Country and your Parents, your Wives and your Children; and especially remember your noble Consul, who to purchase you Victory, frankly embraced death. The Triarii thus starting up fresh and lusty, with glittering Arms, a new Conflict and unexpected was begun: For they receiving the Antepilani into the Intervals of their Files, with a mighty Halloo charge and disorder the Van of the Latines; and having cut to pieces their formost and stoutest Men, press'd on through the rest of their Troops, with almost as little resistance as if they had been all unarm'd, and broke in with their close Wedge-like Battalions, with so much fury and slaughter, that scarce a fourth part of the Enemy escaped; whose terror was the more increased, by seeing the Sammites at a distance under the Mountain, advancing in good order to the Romans assistance. But amongst all, either Citizens or Allies, the Glory of that days Service belongs to the Consuls; one of them taking upon himself alone, all the Wrath and threaten'd Vengeance of the Gods both Celestial and Infernal; the other shewing such Valour and Conduct, that 'tis agreed by all Historians, whether Romans or Latines mentioning this Fight, That on which side soever Manlius had been General, theirs undoubtedly would have been the Victory. The Latines, after their Defeat, retreated to Minturnæ: Their Camp, immediately after the Fight, was taken, and therein many surprized, and endeavoring to escape, run over one another, and were trod to pieces, especially of the Campanians. The Corps of Decius could not be discovered that Day, because the Night came on so fast, but next Morning it was found cover'd with Darts and Javelins, amongst an heap of slain Enemies: His Funerals were celebrated by his Colleague with all possible Honor and Solemnity, suitable to the gallantry of his Death.

It may here fitly be noted, That it was lawful for the Consul, Dictator, or Prator, when they devoted or gave their Enemies to the Devil, not to devote himself, but any Citizen whom he list, provided he were one enroled in one of the Roman Legions: Concerning whom the Law was thus; "If the person so Devoted were slain, then all was well; but if he escap'd, then they made an Image of him greater than the life, seven Foot high or more, which they buried in the Ground, and Sacrificed a Bullock as a propitiation in his stead: But where-ever that Image was so Inter'd, it was not lawful for any Roman Magistrate to approach. On the other side, if a Man would Devote himself, as here Decius did, if he were not kill'd, he might not afterwards be admitted to perform any Divine Service, publick or private, until he had pass'd an Expiation, which he might do by offering his Arms to Vulcan, or any other God, or by a Sacrifice, or other Offering as he pleaseth. It is not lawful to suffer the Enemy to seize that Weapon; if they do, a Propitiatory Sacrifice must be offered to Mars, viz. a Swine, a Sheep, and a Bull. These things, though now grown obsolete, and scarce mention'd in any Records of Sacred or Civil Ceremonies, since an humor has prevail'd of preferring New and Foreign Rites, before those Ancient Ones of our own Country; yet I thought it not amiss to transmit them to Posterity, in those very words wherein they were enjoyn'd and pronounc'd.

- XI. Some Authors tell us, That the Sammites came not in to the Romans Aid till some time after the Battel, politickly waiting to take their Measures as the Success thereof should happen. As also, that there was Assistance coming to the Latines from Lavinium, but that they spent so much time in Consultation, that the Latines were first beaten, and that the formost Ensigns, and part of their Forces, being but just march'd out of their own Gates, Intelligence arriv'd of the Latines being defeated, whereupon they returned into the City; whereupon Millonius their Prator told them, That as little a way as they had march'd, they must expect the Romans would make them pay a dear Rate for it. Those of the Latines that escap'd in the Battel, being scattered several ways, Rallied together, and took up their Quarters in the City Vesica; there in a Council of War, their General Numisus affirmed, That the business was but a drawn Game, as many being lost on one side as on t'other, and that the Romans indeed pleas'd themselves with the noise and bare name of a Victory, but Fortune had handled them as roughly as if they had been beaten: That the Pavilions of both their Consuls were defiled and full of Funeral Mournings; one by the Murder and Parricide of his only Son; the other, by the death of the Consul that Devoted himself: That the greater part of their Forces were slain, their Hastati and Principes generally cut off, a mighty Slaughter made both before and behind their Standards, only at last the Triarii did a little repair their Fortune. But suppose the Latines had lost as many men as they, yet I hope Latium, or the Volscians, are somewhat nearer than Rome to re-inforce us with Supplies: therefore if they thought good, he would instantly raise all the Youth of the Latine and Volscian Nations, and return with a fresh and formidable Army to Capua, where he did not doubt, by his unexpected Arrival, to surprize and defeat the Romans that dream'd of nothing less than a second Battel. So by dispatching Sham-Letters through all the Latine and Volscian Territories, which those that were not present at the Fight were too apt rashly to credit, he had quickly levyed and drawn together a Tumultuary Army. But Torquatus the Consul met with them at Tifanum, a place between Sinuessæ and Minturnæ, before they were Encamp'd: Therefore both Parties being stowing their Baggage in heaps out of the way, as well as they could, presently fell to Fighting, and concluded the War. For the strength of the Enemy was there so shattered, and surrendered up themselves and their Country at Discretion; and the Latines yielded, like: both Latium and Capua were punish'd with the Forfeiture of all their Lands: those of the Latines, together with the Country of the Privernates, and the Falerii (a People of Campania) as far as the River Vulturis, being divided amongst the Commons of Rome; two Acres a man being allotted them in Latium, and if there were not Land enough, three fourth parts of the Privernates Ground should go to make it up. And three Acres and a quarter to a Man in the Territories of the Falerii, because that lay further off: But the Inhabitants of Laurentum in Latium, and the Campanian Cavalry, escap'd this punishment, because they had never revolted: Therefore the old League with the Laurentines was Ratified, and thenceforwards yearly renewed after the tenth day of the Latine Holy-days of Rome, for a Monument whereof they set up a Brazen Table there in the Temple of Castor. And for their Maintinance the people of Capua were enjoyned to pay every one of them (and they were One thousand and six hundred in all) the sum of Four hundred and fifty Denarii [which is almost fifteen pounds apiece, and for the whole, 24000 l. sterling per annum. But some Copies read only 45 Denarii, which is not full bable for those times.]

The War being thus happily dispatch'd, and Rewards bestowed, and Punishments inflicted according to every Mans merit, T. Manlius returns to Rome. But 'tis certain, only XII. the Old People went forth to meet and congratulate him; for the Youth, both then, and all his Life long, hated and curs'd him for his Cruelty to his Son. The Antiates made Incursions into the Territories of Hestia, Ardea, and Solone. The Consul Manlius being disabled by Sickness to manage that War, nominated L. Papirius Crassus, who was then Prator, to be Dictator, who chose L. Papirius Cursor his General of the Horse. This Dictator kept the Field, and had his Summers Quarters for some Months in the Antiates Country, but no remarkable Action happened.

After this Year, renowned as well for the Victory over so many potent Nations, as for the noble Death of one of the Consuls, and the memorable, though rigorous Government of the other, there succeeded in the Consulship T. Emilius Mamercinus, and Q. Publilius Philo, who as they met not with so active a Scene of Grand Affairs, so they seem'd more intent upon their own private Interests and Factions in the Commonwealth, than solicitous to advance the Publick State of their Country. Yet they routed the Latines in the Plains of Feneſta, and drove them out of their Camp, when for madness at the loss of their Lands, they fell into Rebellion. And Publilius (by whose Conduct that Victory was obtain'd) remaining there a while to receive the Submissions of the Latines, Emilius advanced with the Army against Pedum, whose Inhabitants were buoy'd up by the assistance of the Tiburines, Prænestines, and Veliternians; as also some Auxiliaries from Lavinium and Antium: where, though the Romans had the better on't in several Skirmishes, and that the whole Service was now reduced to the taking in of the City Pedum itself, and the Camp of the Confederates which sheltered is self under the Walls, yet the Consul hearing finish'd, hastens to Rome, and importunately demanded a Triumph, before he had compleated his Victory: Which the Senate justly offended with his unseasonable Ambition, flatly denyed, unless he first either took Pedum by Storm, or forc'd it to a Surrender. Emilius hereupon took such a Spleen against the Senators, that thenceforwards he behaved himself more like a seditious Tribune, than a Consul. For as long as he continued in Office, he never ceased to accuse the Nobles before the People, pretending they had not justly and fairly distributed the before-mentioned Latian and Falernian Lands, wherein it could not be expected his Partner should oppose him, since he was himself a Commoner. The Senate, desirous to shorten the Consuls Government, Decreed, That a Dictator should be Created against the Latine Rebels, but Emilius was too cunning for them; for happening, according to his Turn, to have the Fasces or Ensigns of Government in his hands, he declared his Brother Consul, Dictator, who chose Junius Brutus Master of the Horse. This Dictatorship was altogether suited to the humour of the Mobile, and full of Invectives against the Senate: During which, these three Laws were establish'd in favour of the Commons, and very much to the prejudice of the Nobility. 1. That whatever Ordinances pass'd the Commons, should bind all the Quirites or Citizens of Rome. 2. That when Laws were proposed to be Enacted in the Comitial Centuries, the Senate should pass them first, before the Scrutiny begin and the Suffrages be gathered. [Laws that pass'd in the Comitia, or Guild-Hall Assemblies of the People, before this time were not Authentick till the Senate had approv'd them: But now the Senate was to give their Sentiment first, and the last Decision of Ratifying or Rejecting was to be in the People.] 3. That whereas they had already obtained, That both the Censors might be of the Commons: Now one Censor at the least should always be a Commoner of necessity. So that in the opinion of the Nobles, the Majesty of the State was much more impaired this Year at home by these Consuls and Dictator, than it was augmented by their Victory or War-like Achievements abroad.

XIII.

The Year following, L. Furius Camillus, and C. Menius being Consuls, That Amilius the late Consul might more notably be reproach'd and expos'd for his negligence, the Senate insisted, That the City Pedum should by all means possible be attack'd, and utterly destroyed and razed to the Ground; so that the new Consuls being forced to postpone all others Affairs, advanced thither with all Expedition. The Latines were now reduced to that odd pass, that they could neither endure War, nor Peace: To maintain the former, they wanted Forces; and yet disdain'd to hear of the latter, ever since their Lands were taken from them. So they resolv'd to hold a middle Course, viz. To contain themselves within their own Garrisons, that the Romans might take no occasion to quarrel with them; and if they receiv'd Intelligence of any Towns being Beleagu'd, that all the Confederates should endeavor to Relieve it: yet the Inhabitants found assistance but from very few. The Tiburtines and Prænestines, whose Countries lay nearest, did indeed come up thither: But as for the Aricins, Lavinians and Veliternians, although they had joyn'd their Forces with the Antiates and Volscians, yet being unexpectedly encountred by Menius on the Banks of the River Astura, they were all defeated and scatter'd. Nor did Camillus with less success, though with more difficulty (as having to do with a stouter and more formidable Enemy) engage the Pedans and Tiburtines: For the Townsfolk making a brisk Sally in the heat of the Fight, put him into some pain and hazard; but in the end, he not only beat them back, but the same day having vanquish'd both them and their Auxiliaries, scaled the Walls and took the Town. This Encouragement, and some fresh Recruits, spurr'd the two Consuls on to march their Army quite through the Latine Territories; nor did they rest, till they had either taken by Force, or compell'd to a Surrender all its Principal Towns, and intirely subdued the whole Country; wherein having placed necessary Garrisons, they return'd to Rome, worthy in all mens esteem of a Triumph: To which, for greater Honor was added by the Senate, That their Statues on Horse-back (a rare thing in those days) should be set up in the Forum [the Publick Market-place, or Hall, wherein the Courts of Judicature were held.] Before the time came for choosing of Consuls for the ensuing Year, Camillus made a motion to the Senate touching the Latines, and Discour'd them to this effect: "My Lords, What was to be done in Latium by Arms, is now, by the favor of the Gods, and the valour of your Soldiers, accomplished: The Enemies Armies at Pedum and Astura are cut off: All the Latine Towns and strong Holds storm'd or yielded; as also Antium, a City of the Volscians, and are now possess'd by your Garrisons. But since they daily give us trouble by fresh Rebellions, it remains now only to Consider of some proper Expedient whereby we may keep them in continual Peace. For resolving which Question, the Gods have left it wholly in your hands, whether or no Latium shall any longer be a Nation. So that you may at your pleasure secure your selves of an Eternal Peace from them, either by rooting them utterly out, or by Pardoning and Indulging them. Will ye take harsh Measures against those that have yielded themselves, and whom you have Vanquish'd? You may indeed blot out the Memory of Latium from the face of the Earth, and lay all those Regions solitary and waste, whence you were wont to raise brave social Armies in all your greatest Wars: Or will ye rather, imitating your Ancestors, augment the Roman Republick, by receiving those you have Conquer'd into the number of your Citizens? This will afford you an encrease both of Strength and Glory: For certainly, that Government is most secure and durable, where Subjects obey willingly and with delight. Whatever you resolve on, Expedition is absolutely necessary; you hold divers Nations suspended between Hopes and Fears: 'Tis fit you should discharge your selves as soon as you can of that Care they put you to, and whilst their minds are yet amus'd with Expectation, prevent them either by Obligations, or Severity from taking new Measures. 'Twas our Work and Duty as your Servants, to bring Affairs to that pass, that you might dispose of them as you please: It is now your Business to determine what may be best for your selves and the Common-weal.

XIV.

The chief of the Senate commended what the Consul had propos'd, but because some of the People concern'd, were under very different Circumstances from others, it was thought good that each might have right done, to determine of them one by one, and by Name. Whereupon it was Decreed, 1. That the Lavinians should be Enfranchis'd, or made free Citizens of Rome, and enjoy their own Religion and Ceremonies, with this

Proviso,

Proviso, That the Temple and Grove of Juno the Hospitable, be common to the Burgeßes of Lavinium and People of Rome. Secondly, That the Aricins, Nomentanes, and Pedans, shall be accepted for Citizens, and enjoy the same Priviledges as the Lavinians. Thirdly, That the Tusculanes should still retain their Freedom which they now enjoy'd, and the Crime of Rebellion be charg'd only on some of the prime Ring-leaders, without endamaging the whole Community. Fourthly, The Veliternians being Ancient Roman Citizens, and so oft guilty of Revolts and Rebellion, were more severely to be chastiz'd; their City was dismantled, their Senators banish'd and confin'd to dwell beyond the Tyber, upon Penalty, That if any of them were found on this side the Water, it might be lawful for any Man to seize, and hold him to the Ransom of 1000 Asles, and to detain him in Irons till he paid the money: And into the Lands of these Senators there were Colonies [Tenants or Farmers] sent, who being settled, Velure seem'd as Populous as ever it was. Fifthly, The People of Antium were made Free of Rome, but had all their principal Ships taken away, and were forbidden to use the Sea: A new Colony was also sent thither, but the Inhabitants had leave, if they pleas'd to Enroll themselves, to continue there. Sixthly, The Tiburtines and Prænestines had their Lands taken from them, not so much for this new Rebellion, common with the rest of the Latines, but because to shake off the Roman Government, they had heretofore associated themselves with that fierce and cruel Nation the Gauls. Seventhly, From the rest of the Latine Cities and States, they took away the privilege of Marrying, of Commerce, and of holding of Councils by themselves without License first obtain'd. Eighthly, The Campain Gentlemen, that serv'd on Horse-back, because they scorn'd to joyn in the Revolt; and the Inhabitants of Fundum and Formia, because they always allow'd the Romans free and safe passage through their Countries, had the Honor to be made Free Denizens of Rome, but without Right of Voicing. And lastly, The People of Camæ and Suessula, were to remain in the same state and condition as those of Capua. The Ships taken from Antium, were some of them laid up in the Docks at Rome, and the rest of them burnt, and with their Stems or Brazen Beaks it was thought fit to adorn the Publick Pulpits or Pleading-place in the Forum, which thence was called Rostra.

In the Consulship of C. Sulpicius Longus and P. Ælius Pætus, whilst all things were in a desirable Peace; to which the late kindness and beneficence of the Romans had contributed no less, than the Power of their Arms: A Quarrel happened between the Sidicins and Auruncans, which latter having heretofore yielded up themselves to Manlius the Consul, and ever since strictly kept their Faith, without being inveigled into any of the Revolts, had a very fair Plea to crave Assistance from the Romans. But though the Senate had ordered, That they should be reliev'd, yet before the Consuls were march'd out of the City, news came, that the Auruncans had for fear desert'd their Town, and fled with their Wives and Children to Suessula (which at this day is call'd Aurunca) where they had Fortified themselves, and that their Old City and its Walls, were demolish'd and destroyed by the Sidicins. The Senate being offended at the Consuls, by whose delays their Allies were betray'd, order'd a Dictator to be appointed, who was C. Claudius Regillensis, and C. Claudius Hortator his General of the Cavalry. But some Superstitious scruples arising about the Legality of the Choice, and the Augurs declaring the Election not to be right, they both resign'd their Places. The same Year Madam Minutia, a Vestal Nun, being first suspected of Wantonness, because of her Garb and Dress thought too fine and curious for one of her Profession; and afterwards positively charged before the High Priests, by one of her Bond-men that turn'd Informer against her: She was first enjoyn'd to abstain from her Office, and assisting at Divine Service, and not to Manumize [or set free] any of her Servants, [for then, being Free-men, they could not have been put to the Question or Tortured, to make them confess and give evidence against her] and afterwards, on further sifting of the matter, she was Sentenc'd to be Buried alive, which was Executed accordingly at the Gate Collina, on the paved Causeway on the Right hand in the Field, which, I suppose, from her Incest and filthy Crime took the Name, and is ever since called, Sceleratus, The Execrable or Polluted Field. The same Year Q. Publius Philo was chosen Prætor, the first Commoner that ever enjoy'd that Office; and this too, notwithstanding the Opposition of Sulpicius the Consul, who said he would not admit him to be put in Nomination: But, it seems, the Senators having been already baffled in the greater Dignities, were less intent upon securing the Prætorship to those of their Rank.

The next Year, under the Consulship of L. Papirius Crassus, and Cæso Duellius, was remarkable for a War with the Ansonians, in regard rather of its Novelty, than either its Greatness or Danger. This People dwelt in a Town called Cales, and had joyn'd their Forces with their Neighbors the Sidicins: But one Battel, and that too none of the most memorable, defeated the United Strength of these two petty Nations, whose being near home both invited them to run, and made their flight the safer. However, the Senate thought fit to prosecute that War further, since these Sidicins had so often Rebelled themselves, or assisted those that did, or at least been the occasion of Troubles. Therefore they used all their Interest to make that gallant Commander, M. Valerius Corvus, in this Juncture the fourth time Consul, with whom was joined M. Atilius Regulus. And that Fortune might not prevent their Intentions, the Consuls were desired that Corvus might undertake the Charge of the Sidicini Province, without putting it to the Lot: Who receiving the Command of a Victorious Army from the former Consuls, march'd thither with to Cales (the Spring-head of the War) and having at the first Charge routed the Enemy, still trembling with the thoughts of their last Defeat, he began to attack the Walls, and so eager were the Soldiers, as they would presently have mounted their Scaling-Ladders; but that being matter of hazard, Corvus was willing they should take a little more pains, rather than run so great a hazard: He therefore caus'd them to make a Platform, or Gallery, and other Works, to batter down the Wall: But a lucky opportunity prevented their being us'd; for M. Fabius, a Roman Prisoner in the Town, taking the advantage of his Keepers negligence when they were merry on a Holy-day, got off his Irons, and by a Rope fastned to a Battlement of the Wall, let himself down by the Hands into the Roman Works, and perswaded the General to Storm the Town immediately, whilst the Enemies were generally asleep and over-charged with Wine and good Cheer; nor proved it any more difficulty to take the City, than it had been to rout them in the Field. A vast Booty was taken there, and a Garrison plac'd in the Town: Then the Legions march'd back to Rome, and the Consul Triumph'd by a Decree of the Senate. And that his Partner Atilius might not be without his share of Glory, both the Consuls were commanded to lead the Army against the Sidicini, L. Aemilius Mamercinus being first made Dictator, to hold the Election for the Consuls ensuing, whose General of the Horse was Q. Publilius Philo; and the Consuls then chosen, T. Veturius, and Sp. Postumius: These Gentlemen, though the War with the Sidicini was not yet quite ended, to gratifie the Commons, by doing them a kindness before they ask'd it, obtained an Act for the sending of a Colony of Two thousand and five hundred Persons to Cales; and to carry them thither, and divide the Lands amongst them a Triumviate was appointed, viz. Cesio Dullius, T. Quintius, and M. Fabius.

XVII. The new Consuls having received the Army from the old, entred the Enemies Country, and destroy'd all before them, up to the very Walls of their City. But then, forasmuch as the Sidicini had levyed a mighty Army, and push'd on by Extremity, seem'd resolv'd to hazard all at one Blow, and fight it out to the last; and for that it was reported that the Sammites were ready to rise in Arms, the Consuls, by the Authority of the Senate, thought fit to Create P. Cornelius Rufinus, Dictator, and M. Antonius Master of the Horse. But here again, a Superstitious Freak took them in the Head that they were not duly Created, and so they hung up their Offices: And because a Pestilence happened to ensue, as if the Fortune of all their Elections of Magistrates had been tainted with the same default, matters came to an Inter-reign; and at last, by the fifth Inter-regent, M. Valerius Corvus, Consuls were chosen, L. Cornelius the second time, and Cn. Domitius. And now though all things were in actual Peace, a mere rumor of a War like to happen with the Gauls, occasion'd the naming of a Dictator, viz. M. Papirius Crassus, and P. Valerius Publicola General of the Horse: Whilst they were intent upon their Levies, which were carried on with greater diligence than needed for any Neighboring War, the Scouts that had been sent out, return'd with Intelligence, That the Gauls were all quiet, and no danger to be apprehended from that Quarter. But it was suspected, that the Sammites this second Year were brewing some Ill-designs, therefore the Roman Army was not withdrawn out of the Sidicini Country: But the truth was, the Sammites were diverted by the Invasion which Alexander King of Epire made upon the Lucanians, with whom the Sammites joyning, gave him Battel near Pæstus: But Alexander worsted them, and made a League with the Romans, which how well he would have kept, if his Success had continued, is a Question. The same Year there was a general Cense, or numbering of the People, with a valuation of their Estates, and the new-made Citizens were Enroll'd and Entred into the Subsidy-Books. And by reason of their Numbers, two new Tribes, Mæcia, and Scaptia, were added by the Censors Q. Publilius Philo, and Sp. Posthumus: Likewise the Acerrans were by a Law prefer'd by L. Papirius the Prator made free Romans, but without right of Suffrages. These were the Transactions of this Year, both as to War abroad, and the Civil State at home.

XVIII. Infamous was the next Year, whether it happen'd by the distemperature of the Heavens, or through humane Villany, I know not: M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Valerius, were then Consuls; which last, I find in some Annals to have the Surname of Flaccus, and in others, Potius; it matters not much which is the Right. But I heartily wish, that were false (nor do all Authors mention it) which is related of many Persons being made away by Poison, whose sudden death rendred this Year infamous for a Pestilence. But as the matter is delivered, I shall not omit it, lest I should seem to detract from the Credit of any of the Authors of the Story. It happening, that divers chief Men of the City, and Persons of prime Quality, dyed of a like Disease, and almost all in the same manner: A certain Chamber-maid address'd her self to Q. Fabius Maximus (being at that time Ædile of State) offering to discover the Cause of this publick Plague, if he would engage that she should should not thereby come to any harm or trouble: Fabius presently acquaints the Consuls, and they the Senate, by whom such assurance was given as she desired. Then did she declare, That it was by the wickedness of certain Women that the City was thus afflicted: That several Ladies did prepare these Poisons, and that if they would instantly go along with her, they might be taken in the manner. They followed her accordingly, and found some Women as they were boiling their Venomous Medicaments, and other Poisonous Confections ready made up they found hid in secret places; which being all brought into the Forum (or Justice-Hall) and about twenty of those Matrons, with whom they were found, brought thither by a Sergeant: Two of them, Cornelia and Sergia, both descended of Noble Families, insisted, That they were good and wholesome Medicines: The Discoverer urg'd then, That they might be enjoy'd to drink them up, and thereby convince her of inventing a lye, and giving false Evidence against them. Whereupon they desired to confer together, and the People being withdrawn, these two proposing the matter to the rest, they all consented, drank off their Doses, and all perish'd by their own mischievous Practice. Their Accomplices were forthwith apprehended, who discover'd a great number of other Matrons concern'd, of whom 170. were condemned. Never before that time was there any Process made at Rome against any for Poisoning; and the thing was now look'd upon as a Prodigy, and thought to be done by People distracted and bewitch'd, rather than having a Murderous Intent: And therefore finding in old Chronicles, That once upon a time, when the Commons in a frantick fit withdrew themselves and went out of the City, they were brought to their Wits again by the piacular Ceremony of the Dictators driving and fixing a Nail or Spike [of Brass or Iron, in the back-wall of Minerva's, or of Jupiter's Temple] the Senate resolv'd they would have a Dictator for performing this Ceremony, and Cn. Quintilius was chosen, with L. Valerius Master of the Horse, who as soon as they had in due form driven the Nail, laid down their Offices.

L. Papirius Crassus was chosen Consul the second time, and L. Plantius Verno, in the beginning of their Year, Ambassadors came from Frabateria and Lucania, two Cities of the Volscians, requesting to be taken into protection, and promising, That if they might be defended from the Violence of the Sammites, they would become Loyal and Obedient Subjects to the People of Rome. The Senate dispatch'd Ambassadors, to require the Sammites to forbear invading these People; and the same prov'd effectual, not that the Sammites desired Peace, but because they were not yet ready for a War. This Year began the War with the Privernates, with whom were joined the Fundans, and their General one of that Nation, called Vitruvius Vaccus, a Man famous, not only in his own Country, but also at Rome, where he had an House in Mount Palatine, which being since pull'd down, and the Ground confiscated, is now called Vacciprata. Against this Person, Forraging and Spoiling the Countries, all about Serim, Norba and Cora, L. Papirius march'd forth, and posted himself very near their Camp. Vitruvius had neither the Prudence to keep his Men within their Works, when he saw he had to deal with an Enemy too strong for him, nor the Courage to fight far from their Fortifications. He had scarce drawn the Body of his Army out of the Port of their Camp (who were solicitous which way they should secure themselves in their Retreat, rather than mindful of the Battel or the Enemy) when with as little Conduct as Valor he began the Fight, and as with little ado he was very undeniably beaten; so by reason of the incareness and easie Retreat into their Camp, he preserv'd his Men well enough, there being scarce one of them kill'd in the Skirmish, and only some few in the Rout of the hindmost, as they were huddling into their Camp: But thinking it more safe to trust themselves to the Protection of a Wall, than of a Trench, as soon as it was dark, with a timorous March, they stole away towards Privernum. Round which, the other Consul Plantius, had spoiled all the Country, and was now march'd into the Territories of the Fundans, whose Senate met him on the Borders, saying, They came not to mediate for Vitruvius and his Gang, but for the People of Funda, who were altogether innocent and unconcern'd in the War, as even Vitruvius himself had plainly shew'd, in that he chose rather to shelter himself in Privernum, than in Funda his Native Country. That therefore at Privernum it was, that the Enemies of the People of Rome were to be sought for, who unmindful of both their Countries, had revolted as well from the Fundans as the Romans. That as for the Inhabitants of Funda, they desired nothing so much as Peace, and not forgetting the Honor they had lately receiv'd of being made free Denizens, should always be Romans in their Affections as well as Title. They therefore did beseech his Excellency, to forbear prosecuting an harmless People, avowing, That their Lands, their City, their own Bodies, and those of their Wives and Children, were and should ever be at the Devotion of the People of Rome. The Consul commending their Modesty, and having dispatch'd away Advice to the Senate of their Obedience, turn'd his March to Privernum: But first call'd the Principal Conspirators to account, of whom (as Claudius writes) Three hundred and fifty were sent Prisoners to Rome; and that the Senate would not accept of the aforesaid Submission, as looking upon it to be but a Whining Sham.

Privernum being now beleaguere'd with two Consular Armies, one of the Consuls was call'd home to hold the Courts for the Election of Magistrates. This Year the Barriers, or Lifts for the Horse, and Chariot-Races, were first set up in the Circus. Before the War with the Privermates was over, another false Alarm was rais'd, that the Gauls were preparing to invade the Romans. These were a People that the Senate always stood in fear of, and therefore the new Consuls, L. Aemilius Mamercinus, and C. Plautius, on the first of July, the very day they entred upon their Office, were ordered to make choice of their respective Provinces: The management of the Gallie War fell upon Mamercinus, who immediately applyed himself to the levying of an Army, allowing no Exemptions; nay 'tis said, poor Handicrafts-men, Artists, Shop-keepers, and the like, though very unfit for Military Service, were press'd and forc'd to bear Arms in this supposed necessity. Hereby a vast Army was Rendezvous'd at Veij, that thence they might advance to Encounter the Gauls; nor was it thought advisable to go further forward, for fear the Enemy taking another way, should give them the slip, and in their absence surprize the City. But within few days these fears were over-blown, and they were satisfied that the Gauls had no design to trouble them, so then all the Forces were bent against Privernum, which some say was taken by Storm, and Vitruvius apprehended alive: Other Authors relate, That before it came to that Extremity, they sent out Ambassadors carrying a Caduceus, (or Mercury's Wand in token of Peace) before them, and of their own accord surrendered to the Consul, and that Vitruvius was delivered up by his own Party. The Senate being consulted upon this Affair, ordered the Consul Plautius to dismantle the City of Privernum, and place in it a strong Garrison, and sent for him home to receive the Honor of a Triumph. They also Decreed, that Vitruvius should in the mean time be kept close Prisoner, and then be first publicly whip'd, and afterwards put to death; his Dwelling-house to be demolish'd, his Goods dedicated to their God, called Simon Sangus, and that what money could be made thereof, should be bestowed in making of Brazen Globes to be placed for Ornament in the Chappel of the said Sangus, towards the Temple of Quirinus. And touching the Senate of Privernum they pass'd this Order, That whoever was a Senator there, at any time since their defection, should be confined to dwell on the other side the Tiber, in the same manner as was Enacted in the case of the Veluternians. And as for the common People there was yet no mention made of them; but after the Consul had Triumph'd, and Vitruvius and several of his Accomplices put to death, the Consul thought he might safely move the Senate in their favor: Since the Authors (saith he) of this Revolt have receiv'd their due Reward from the Gods and you, Conscript Fathers! What is your further pleasure touching the Innocent Multitude? For my own part, though 'tis my duty to demand your Opinions, rather than deliver my own, yet seeing the Privermates are next Neighbors to the Samnites, with whom we have but a very uncertain Peace, I should think it our Interest to oblige them, and give them as little occasion for Rancour and Animosity against us as may be.

XXI.

As the matter it self was doubtful, some advising to rigour, and others to clemency, according to every ones Inclination, so it was rendered more perplex'd and difficult by one of the Privermates own Ambassadors, who being ask'd by one of the Senators (that had spoken sharply against them) what punishment he thought in his own Conscience the Privermates worthy of; being more mindful of that State wherein he was born, than of their present necessity, replyed, Marry such punishment as they deserve, who think themselves worthy of Freedom. The Consul perceiving those that were before against the Privermates, more exasperated by this stout answer, endeavor'd by a gentle Question to draw from him some more modest and submissive Language: Suppose (saith he) we should wholly remit your punishment, what kind of Peace may we then expect with you? To which the other briefly return'd, If you afford us a good and equal Peace, you shall find it on our part faithfully observ'd forever; but if you impose hard Conditions, you must not expect we should keep them long. At this some of the Senators cry'd out, That this was plain threatening, and the only way to stir up quiet People to Rebellion; but the more Judicious gave a more favorable Construction, saying, It was a Speech becoming a Man, and one Free-born: For is it credible (say they) that any State, or indeed any Mortal, will endure a bad and uneasy Condition any longer than they needs must? That Peace only can be sure and stable, that is voluntarily entred into: Nor can we hope to find Fidelity, where we impose Slavery. But especially the Consul brought over many to Vote in their favor, by repeating these words several times so loud as they might be heard by the whole House: That those, and those only, were worthy to be made Citizens of Rome, who esteem'd nothing in the World so much as Liberty. Thus they gain'd their Point in the Senate, and obtained a Law from the People to be made Free Denizens. This Year a Colony of Three hundred persons was sent to Anxur, where each received two Acres of Ground.

XXII.

The following Year, wherein P. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula were Consuls, was memorable in no respect for Affairs Domestick or Military, save only a Colony planted at Fregelle (which sometime was in the Territories of the Sidicins, and afterwards of the Volscians.) And a publick Dole, or distribution of Raw Flesh, given to the People by M. Plavius at the Funeral of his Mother: There were some that thought, be under this this pretence of Honoring his Mother, took an opportunity to discharge his Obligations to the People, and Reward them for acquitting him when he was lately Arraigned by the Ediles for ravishing a certain married Woman. But if the Treat were bestow'd for a Favor past, it got him Honor for the future, for at the next Election of a Tribune of the Commons, he, though absent, was prefer'd before all that stood for't.

The City Palæpolis was situate not far from the place where Naples now standeth, the same People Inhabited both Towns, descended from the Cumani, who deriv'd their Original from Chalcis in Eubœia; with that Fleet wherein they Sail'd from their own Country, they were able to do much at Sea, and became formidable through those Coasts, Landing first in the Islands Anaria and Pitheculæ, but afterwards seated themselves on the Main Continent. These People relying as well upon their own strength, as the private and treacherous ill will which they knew the Samnites bore to the Romans, or perhaps encourag'd by the news of a Pestilence, which was reported to have visited Rome, had broke out into many Hostilities against the new Roman Colonies in Campania and Falerum. Therefore in the second Consulship of L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publilius Philo, Heralds were sent to Palæpolis, to demand Restitution and Satisfaction, who bringing back an haughty Answer from the Greeks, as being a Nation more stout with their Tongues than their Hands, the Senate resolv'd to make War upon them. The management of which happened by Lot upon Publilius, whilst Cornelius with another Army was appointed to observe the Motions of the Samnites: For the Report went, that they expecting an Insurrection of the Campanians, had a Design to joyn with them. Both the Consuls sent advice to the Senate, that there was no relying upon the Samnites fidelity: And Publilius added, That 2000. Soldiers from Nola, and 1000. Samnites, were lately received into Palæpolis to Reinforce that Garrison, rather at their own Importunity, than on any request of the Greeks.

At Rome they had certain Intelligence, That in Samnum Levies were made by the Magistrates, and that the whole Country, and divers Neighboring Nations, were all in Arms; and also that the Privermates, Fundans and Formians, had been tampered with, and solicited to Rebel. However, before a Declaration of War, it was thought fit to dispatch Ambassadors to Treat and Expostulate with the Samnites, who appear'd very resolute in their Answers: On the one side, charging the Romans, That they had done them divers Injuries; and on the other, justifying themselves, and denying stoutly all that was objected: That neither the Greeks were aided by any publick Advice or Assistance of theirs; nor had they courted the People of Funda or Formiæ to any Intrigues, for if they had a mind to a War, they saw no reason to despair but their own Forces might be sufficient to manage it. That they could not dissemble, but must avow the Samnite-State could not but resent it ill, That when they had Conquered the Town Fregellæ from the Volscians, and demolish'd it, the Romans should come and not only Rebuild it, but plant there a Colony in the heart of the Samnites Country: That this Injury and Reproach they were resolv'd to rid themselves of, unless those that did it would of their own accord redress it. And when the Roman Ambassador proposed to refer the Matters in difference to the Decision of their Common Friends and Allies, The Samnites replyed, To what purpose shall we perplex our selves and them? The Quarrels between us, O ye Romans! are not to be concluded by the smooth Words of Ambassadors, nor by any Mans Arbitration: It is the Campaign Field, and Dint of Sword, and Fortune of War, that must determine them. Let us therefore meet between Capua and Suessula with our Armed Legions on either side, and there resolve, Whether the Samnites or the Romans shall be Lords of Italy. The Roman Legates only rejoyn'd, That they were not to hearken to the Assignations of their Enemies, but should readily march where-ever their own Generals should lead them. Publilius having secured a convenient Pass between Palæpolis and Naples, had already cut off their Communicating of mutual Succors, wherewith they had design'd to relieve each other in any Exigency. The Election-day was now coming on, and it not being thought fit to recal Publius who was before the Enemies Walls, from the fair hopes of taking the City: The Tribunes were prevail'd with to propose an Ordinance to the People, That after the Expiration of his Year, he should continue in Command as Pro-Consul, until the War with the Greeks were fully ended. Neither was it judg'd convenient to take off L. Cornelius, who was already advanc'd into the Samnites Country, from the heat of the War, but rather to write to him to appoint a Dictator for holding the Elections, who nominated M. Claudius Marcellus, with whom Sp. Posthumius was General of the Horse. Yet he did not proceed to the Election, because a doubt arose whether or no he were duly Created, which the Augurs resolv'd in the Negative. But this their Sentence was oppos'd and scandalized by the Tribunes, alledging, That it was no case matter to assign any such Error, since the Consul nominated the Dictator in the beginning of the still Night (according to Custom) neither had the Consul publicly or privately written to any Person about that Affair: Nor was there any Mortal that could say he had seen or heard any thing that might frustrate the Auspices: Nor yet was it possible, that the Augurs sitting at Rome, should Divine what Error happened to the Consul in the Camp so far off: And therefore who cannot see through the fuggle, and that the only fault was, because the Dictator Elest was a Commoner? These, and other the like Objections, were made by the the Tribunes, but without effect, for the business occasion'd an Inter-reign, and the Elections on one pretence or other delay'd, until the fourteenth Inter-regent L. Amilius created Consuls, C. Petilius and L. Papirius, surnamed Mugillanus, or Curfor, as I find it in other Chronicles.

XXIV. In that Year 'tis said the City Alexandria in Egypt was Founded, and Alexander King of Epirus slain by a Renegado Lucanian, whereby the Oracle of Jupiter Dodoneus was verified: For when this Prince was invited into Italy by the Tarentines, he had warning given him to take heed of the Acherusian Water, and the City Pandosia; for there it was his Destiny to end his days. This prompted him to make the more speed into Italy, that he might get as far off as he could from the City Pandosia in Epirus, and the River Acheron, which flowing out of the Province Molossis into the lower Lakes, empties it self into the Thesprotian Gulph. But (as 'tis often seen, Men by seeking to avoid their Fate, plunge themselves into it) after several signal Successes, as Routing divers times the Brutian and Lucanian Troops, the taking of Heraclea a Colony of the Tarentines, and Consentia from the Lucanians; as also Sipontum, and Acerina a Plantation of the Brutii, and many other Towns both of the Messapians and Lucans, and sending away Captive 300. Noble Families into Epirus to be kept as Hostages, He happened to Encamp his Army upon three small Hills not far from Pandosia, a City situate near the Borders of the Lucanians and Brutians, having there a conveniency to make Excursions into any part of the Enemies Country. He had commonly about him 200 banish'd Lucanians, whom he entrusted as his Guard, but they (as 'tis common for such kind of People) were apt to make their Fidelity as mutable as the Fortune of those they depended upon. Continual Rains causing an Inundation, prevented correspondence between the three Camps, by which means two of them, by an unexpected Attack, were cut off by the Enemy, who next advanced to surround the King, whom the Exil'd Lucanians, by secret Intelligence, had promised to betray and deliver up alive or dead into their hands. But the King, with a select Party broke through the Enemy, and kill'd the Lucanian General with his own hands: Then, rallying his scattered Troops, he came to a River, which by the fresh ruines of a broken Bridge, carry'd away by the violence of the Stream, gave some hopes of a Passage. Where, whilst his Soldiers were getting over at a blind dangerous Ford, one of them wearied with the fatigues of the Day, and dismay'd at the present hazard, Cursing the unlucky name of the River, chanc'd to say, Thou hast not thy name Acheron [that is, sad and joyless] for nought: which the King overhearing, it presently put him in mind of his foretold Destiny, and stop'd in a deep suspense, whether he should venture over or not: Till Sotimus, one of his Servants, ask'd his Majesty, Why he made delays when he was in such imminent danger? and withal, shew'd him, That the treacherous Lucanians were endeavoring to intercept his passage. The King turning his Head, saw them at a distance advancing in a full Body after him; whereupon, drawing his Sword, he clap'd spurs to his Horse, took the River, and rode through the midst of it; but being ready to Land on the other side, one of the banish'd Lucanians lanced a Dart after him, and struck him quite through the Body, which, with the Weapon sticking in it, being carry'd down by the Current as far as the Enemies Guard, was there most shamefully and barbarously mangled: For cutting his Corps to pieces in the middle, they sent one part to Consentia, and kept the other to gratify their brutish spleen and sporting Cruelty. But as they were pelting it with Darts and Stones, and raging beyond any thing that can be believed of Humanity, a Woman begg'd of them to forbear a while, and then as one half drown'd in Tears, told them, That her Husband and Children were Prisoners in the hands of the Enemy, and that she hoped to get them Released in exchange for the Kings Body, though it were so much mutilated and mangled. This put a stop to their Out-rage, and by this good Womans care, so much of the Royal Corpse as was left, was burnt at Consentia, but his Bones returned to his own Subjects at Metapontum, and thence conveyed into Epire to his Wife Cleopatra, and Sister Olympias; the latter the Mother, the former the Sister of Alexander the Great. This brief account I thought fit to give of the disastrous end of Alexander King of Epire, since Italy was the Scene whereon the same was acted, though Fortune prevented him from engaging actually against the Romans.

XXV. This Year was observ'd that Solemn Humiliation call'd Lectisternium, the fifth that ever had been kept since the Building of Rome, and for appeasing the same Gods as heretofore. The new Consuls, having by the Ordinance of the People sent the Heralds to denounce War against the Sammites, both themselves made greater preparations for the same, than for that with the Greeks, and also had new and unexpected Auxiliaries. For the Lucanians and Apulians (Nations which never before held any Correspondence with the Romans) now voluntarily offered their Friendship, and to levy Men and Arms towards the War. At the same time Affairs in Sammium were carry'd on with Success; three Towns, Allife, Callife, and Ruffrium, surrendred, and the rest of the Country was all over Forrag'd upon the first arrival of the Consuls. This War being so luckily dispatch'd, that with the Greeks who were besieg'd, did also draw nigh to a Period: For not only the several parties of the Enemy were cut off from all Communication with each other, by Forts rais'd between them, but even within their own Walls they endured greater Miseries than could be threatned to them them from the Enemy without: For as if they were become absolute Captives to their Garrison-Soldiers, whom they had entertain'd for their Defence, they suffer'd all kind of Indignities and Outrages from them, and even as great Extremities as could befall Cities taken by Storm. Therefore when Intelligence was brought of more Auxiliaries coming from Tarentum and Sammium, they thought they had got too many Sammites amongst them already; but gladly expected the Tarentines, as being also Grecians, and hoping that by their aid they might as well withstand the Outrages of the Sammites and Nolanians within their Walls, as the Force of the Romans their profess'd Enemies without. In fine, amongst the several Inconveniencies they had to grapple with, the most tolerable seem'd to be to submit themselves to the Romans. To this purpose Charilaus and Nymphius, two principal Men of the City, having consulted together, undertook each of them a several part to be acted for accomplishing it, viz. One to fly away to the Roman General; the other to remain and find some opportunity to render the City according to their delignment. Charilaus was the Man that presented himself to Philo, and spake to this effect, I am come, Sir! (to the good Fortune both of the Palæopolitans, and People of Rome be it spoken) with a resolution to deliver up the City into your hands; by which Action, whether I shall seem to have betray'd, or sav'd my Country, depends wholly on the Roman Honor and Fidelity. For my own particular, I scorn to make any Bargain, or so much as desire any thing at all: But on the publick behalf, though I will not stand to Capitulate, yet with all humble earnestness I do request, That if this Enterprize succeed, the People of Rome would be pleas'd to consider with what affection and hazard we return again to their Amity, rather than with what folly and rashness we deserted it, and revolted from our Duty. He was wellcom'd and commended by the General, and a Detachment of 3000 men, under the Conduct of Colonel L. Quintius, was ordered towards that Quarter of the City where the Sammites were Posted.

At the same time Nymphius was not wanting to play his part, but by Address wheedled XXVI. with the Prætor of the Sammites, desiring, That since all the Roman Forces were now drawn out either before Palæopolis, or into Samnium, he would therefore (for a diversion) be pleas'd to give him leave with the Fleet to scour about the Roman Coasts, and doubted not but to plunder and lay waste, not only the Maritime parts, but even almost up to the Walls of Rome. But to effect this (quoth he) without the Enemies taking notice, 'tis absolutely necessary that we Sail forth of the Haven in the Night, and therefore the Ships must presently be Launch'd and got ready. Which that it might the sooner be done, all the Sammite Youth were drawn down to the Shoar, and there in the dark, and a throng hindering one another, whilst Nymphius with variety of impertinent Commands, employs and keeps them very busie: Charilaus, according to agreement, was let into the City by the Confederates, and when he had fill'd the highest parts thereof with Roman Soldiers, commanded them to set up a general Shout; of which the Greeks, upon a secret Token given them by their Commanders, took no notice. The Nolans escap'd out at the back-side of the Town, by the High-road that leads to Nola: But the Sammites being shut out of the City, as they had thereby a safer opportunity to save themselves by flight for the present; so after they were got out of danger, it redounded to their greater shame and disgrace: For being without Arms, and all their Goods and Baggage seiz'd by the Enemy, they return'd home spoil'd, and poor as Church-Mice, a laughing-stock not only to Strangers, but even to their Neighbors and Country-men. I am not ignorant that there is another Opinion, mentioning the Sammites to be the Authors of this Surrender. But as I have followed the most credible Authors, so I am the rather confirm'd herein by the League with the Neopolitans (which place soon after became the chief Seat of the Greeks in Italy;) for that makes it more probable, that they of their own accord sought, and by this means obtained, the ancient Allies to be renewed. Unto Publius the Senate granted the Honor of a Triumph, esteeming it enough, that by his Valour and Conduct during the Siege, the Enemy was so far streightned, as to be reduced to a voluntary Submission. Two singular and special Favors were conferr'd upon this Gentleman, viz. The continuing him in Command never before granted to any, and allowing him a Triumph after his Magistracy was expired.

Another War happened soon after with Greeks of another Province: For the Tarentines XXVII. having long fed the Palæopolitans with vain hopes of Relief, when they heard the Romans were become Masters of that City, as if they had been deserted, when indeed themselves were the Men that left the others in the lurch, began to reproach the Palæopolitans, and rage with Envy and Malice against the Romans; and so much the more, because they were inform'd, That the Lucanians and Apulians had put themselves under the Romans Protection (for which both those Nations strict Alliances were this Year concluded) Behold (say they) the Encroachments of their Power are come up almost even to our doors: Things are brought to that pass, that we must either look upon these Romans as our Enemies, or accept them for our Lords and Masters. The Fortune of our State depends upon the Event of the Sammite War, which Nation alone (and that too, much weakened) is left to make Head against these common Invaders; since the Lucanians are revolted unto their Society, though it were very possible to bring them back again and dissolve that Confederacy, if discreet Art were used to blow the Coals and raise Divisions between them. These Counsels prevailing with such as were willing to Embark in new Commotions, certain Lucanian Youths, of more esteem with their Country-men for their Birth and Quality, than Vertue or Honesty, being suborn'd and hired for a sum of Money, whip'd one another severally with Rods, and so naked, and with their Bodies all bloody came running into the City, crying out, That meerly because they ventured in curiosity to visit the Roman Camp, they had been thus cruelly scourged by the Consul, and narrowly escaped the losing of their Heads. So odious a spectacle wherein the Injury seem'd apparent, and nothing of a Trick was suspected, set all the People in a Flame, who by their Clamours force the Magistrates immediately to summon the Senate; where some surrounding the Council-House, set up Out-cries for a War against the Romans; others run up and down to raise the Rabble and those in the Country to Arms: In this uproar, enough to amaze the firmest minds, a Decree pass'd, That the League with the Samnites should be renewed, and Ambassadors dispatch'd thither for that purpose. This sudden Overture, as it seem'd to have no ground, so the Samnites gave it no credit, but for their own security insisted, That the Lucanians should give Hostages, and admit Garrisons into their Fortified Towns; and so blinded were they with fury, and the before-mentioned fraud, as they refus'd no conditions in hopes to gratify their Revenge. The Cheat indeed began not long after to appear, when the Broachers of those Stories retired to Tarentum, but the Lucanian State had already engaged too far to retreat, the Samnites were in effect become their Masters, and they had nothing left but a too late Repentance.

XXVIII. The same Year the Commons of Rome obtain'd as it were another beginning of Liberty, by being discharg'd of that Thralldom which they call'd Nexus [a kind of Obligation, whereby Persons that owed Money were bound to their Creditors to be their Slaves, and work wholly for them till the Debt were paid] the Law in this point being altered, by reason of the filthy Lust, and no less detestable Cruelty of a particular Usurer, L. Papirius by name, to whom C. Publicus having for a Debt of his Fathers, bound himself after that fashion, that Youth and Beauty which ought to have moved Compassion, enflam'd his mind to Lust and Villany: Therefore reckoning the flower of his Youth should pay the Interest of the Debt, he first endeavored to debauch the Lad with filthy Speeches, and inveigle him with flatteries to consent; but finding his modest Ears abhor'd the proposal of such Lewdness, he proceeded to terrify him with Threats, and ever and anon to put him in mind of his Fortune; and at last, seeing that he still regarded his Honor and the freedom of his Birth, much more than his present wretched condition, and scorn'd to fully the former in hopes of amending the latter, the savage Usurer caus'd the poor Youth to be stript naked, and lamentably whip'd, who ran forth into the open street with his Body torn and mangled, and set up an Out-cry against the Lust and Cruelty of his Inhumane Creditor: A power of People were presently got together, and being sensibly touch'd as well with Commiseration of his tender Age, as with abhorrence at the Indignity of the thing, and a sympathizing respect of what might befall themselves or their Children, they crowd'd into the Forum, and thence in a full Body to the Council-Chamber. The Consuls upon this sudden Tumult were glad to call a Senate, and as the Fathers entred into the House, the People falling down at their Feet, shew'd them the young Mans mangled and bloody Back: Thus for the outrageous Injury of one Person, was that mighty Publick Bond this day Cancelled, and for ever annulled. The Consuls being ordered to propose a Law to be pass'd by the People, That from that time forwards, no Person should be kept in Irons or Cords, unless such as had committed some heinous Crime that deserved it, and that too, no longer than till he had suffered the punishment inflicted by Law: And that only the Estate and Goods, and not the Body of any Debtor, should for the future be chargeable for Monys owing. Thus all that were at present enslav'd on that account, were discharged, and provision made, That none should be liable to the like Thralldom for the time to come.

XXIX. The same Year, whilst the Samnites War of it self alone, besides the late Revolt of the Lucanians, and the Tarentines, Contrivers of that Defection, was enough to employ all the care of the Senate, it happened as an increase to their Troubles, that the Vesfine Nation, join'd in Confederacy also with the Samnites: But as that Affair proceeded little further for this Year, than to administer matter of Discourse to the People, so the Consuls of the Year following, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Junius Brutus Scæva, thought it a matter of that Importance, as in the first place to consult the Senate about it, who scarce could resolve, whether there would be greater danger in attempting, or neglecting it, lest on the one side their Insolence should be increased by Impunity; or on the other side, the apprehension of an approaching War cast the Neighboring Nations into a common Confederacy for mutual safety. Each of which by themselves were no less formidable than the Samnites, as the Marsians, the Pelignians, and the Marrucines. But that Party in the Council prevailed, which for the present seem'd to have more of Courage than Prudence, though the Event shew'd, That Fortune assists the Daring and the Brave. The People, with the approbation of the Senate, declare War against the Vesfines, which Province fell by Lot to the Charge of Brutus, as Samnium to the Conduct of Camillus. Armies were drawn to both Places, and such diligence used in securing of Passes on the Fron-

Frontiers, that the Enemies were prevented from joining their Forces. One of the Consuls, L. Furius, on whom the greatest stress of the War lay, falling dangerously ill, was ordered to nominate a Dictator to proceed in it; who made choice of L. Papirius Cursus, one of the greatest Captains of that Age, and by him was Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus appointed General of the Horse; a couple Renowned for the Achievements of that Campaign, but yet more famous for the Quarrel which happened between them, which mis'd but little of coming to all the Extremities of a Mortal Fend. The other Consul manag'd the War against the Vesfines various ways, but always with a like prosperous Success: For first, He Foraged their Country, and afterwards by burning their Houses and Corn every where upon the Ground, forced them against their Inclinations, to take the Field; where in one Battel (but not without considerable loss of his own Men) he so weakened and shattered them, that they not only fled to their Camp, but not trusting to their Trenches and Fortifications, stole away thence into the Towns, to shelter themselves by the Natural Conveniency of their situation, and strength of their Walls; but the Consul attack'd them there too, and first of all by the rage and fury of his Soldiers (greedy of Revenge for the Wounds they had receiv'd in the late Battel, where few of them escap'd without some mark of Honor) he took the City Cutina by Storm; and after that Cingilia, giving the Plunder of both to his Soldiers, whose Courage neither the Enemies Gates nor Walls could resist.

XXX. The Expedition into Samnium was undertaken by the Dictator with doubtful Auspices, which default had not its ill-influence on the main event of the War (for that happen'd well enough) but seem'd to portend the Heats and Contention that happened between the two Chief Commanders: For Papirius the Dictator, upon the admonishment of the Sooth-sayer that tended the Sacred Chicken, by whose feeding they were wont to Divine, returning back to Rome to take the Auspice (or Tokens of Good-luck) more authentickly, gave positive Command to his General of the Horse, to remain in the same Quarters, and by no means to engage the Enemy during his absence. But Fabius, after his departure, understanding by his Scouts, that the Enemy liv'd as secure and careless as if there had been never a Roman in all the Province of Samnium, whether, being a very stout young Gentleman as he was, he took it in Disdain, that all things should seem to depend upon the Dictator; or whether only induced by so fair an opportunity of performing some signal Service, so it was, that having put his Army into good Order, he speedily advanc'd to Imbrinium (so the Place was call'd) and there gave the Samnites Battel, with such Success, as if the Dictator himself had been present it could not have been manag'd better: For neither the Captain fail'd his Soldiers, nor the Soldiers their Captain. The Horse under the Command of Colonel L. Cominius, having once and again given brisk Charges, without being able to break through the Enemy, flung away their Horses, Bridles, and then spurring them on, and laying about with both Hands, came up with so much fury, that no strength was able to bear the shock, such havoc, such a lane they made all about, over Armor and Men; nor were the Infantry less ready to second the Charge, but advanc'd their Ensigns into the midst of the Enemies, and put them into disorder; of whom, 'tis said, there were that day slain no less than Twenty thousand men. Some Authors relate, That he fought twice in the Dictators absence, and both times with gallant Success. But the most Antient Writers mention but one Battel, and in some Annals the whole Story is omitted. The General of the Horse having got abundance of Booty, as must needs happen in so great a Slaughter, caus'd all the Enemies Armor to be pil'd up in one vast heap, and putting Fire underneath, burnt them; whether he had made such a Vow to any of the Gods, or if we may rather credit Fabius the Historian, to the end, That the Dictator might not reap the Glory of his Victory, by Inscribing his Name thereon, or carrying them in Triumph: As likewise, his directing his Letters that gave an account of the success to the Senate, and not to the Dictator, was an Argument how unwilling he was to admit him to any share in the Honor of that day. At least the Dictator took it so, and whilst all others were overjoy'd for the Victory, nothing was to be read in his face, but anger and discontent. Therefore dismissing the Senate on a sudden, he flung out of the Court, saying, That the Majesty of the Dictators Office, and all Military Discipline, would be no less overthrown and vanquish'd by the Master of the Horse, than the Samnites Legions, if he should be suffered to disobey express Commands with Impunity. Full of Rage and Menaces he hastens towards the Camp, but though he took long Stages, yet he could not get there before the Rumor of his coming: For some posted away before out of the City to give Intelligence, that the Dictator was coming full of Revenge, and resolutions of the utmost Severity, applauding, almost at every other word, the late Exemplary Justice of T. Manlius.

Fabius drawing the Army to a Rendezvous, makes a Speech at the Head of them, beseeching the Soldiers, That with the same Gallantry wherewith they had defended the Commonwealth from its most mortal Enemies, they would protect him, under whose Conduct and good Fortune they had obtained so glorious a Victory, against the Outragious Cruelty of the Dictator, who was now coming, almost besides himself for meer Envy, offended at other Mens Courage and Happiness, raging, because in his absence we have sped well; and if he could change the course XXXI.

of Fortune, had much rather have had the Samnites Victorious, than the Romans. He talks indeed of disobeying his Command, as if he had not forbid us fighting with the same base mind, wherewith he now grieves that we have fought successfully: For as then his Design was out of Envy to suppress all the sparks of Valour in others from flaming out to a glorious height, lest they might seem to out-lustre himself, and went about to take away their Arms who were most willing to use them, by enjoining them not to stir in his absence; so now his Madness is, That the Soldiers were not all dis-arm'd and maim'd, whilst L. Papirius is not with them, and that Q. Fabius remembred himself to be General of the Horse, and not one of Mr. Dictators Lacuies: What (in the name of Wonder) would this Man have done, if (as it often happens in the doubtful Chance of War) we had lost the Day, who now whilst we have Conquered the Enemy for him, and secured the Commonwealth in so brave a manner as he himself (singular as he is in his own Conceit) could not have perform'd it either more Honorably or Effectually, doth yet threaten Death and Destruction to the General of the Horse, for being guilty of a Victory? Nor is he offended only with the General of the Horse, his sight is no less against the Colonels, the Captains, the Soldiers in general: If his Power were equal to his Will, they should all be cut off; but since he is not able to do that, he endeavors to discharge his spleen upon one; and as Envy, like Fire, always mounts and aims at the Highest, so he falls upon the Chief Author of this happy Counsel, your Leader in this glorious Enterprize: That when he should have destroyed him, together with the glory of this gallant Service, then as Conqueror over the vanquish'd Army, whatever he should be suffered to put in execution against the General of the Horse, to be sure he would attempt and practise upon private Soldiers, therefore it did concern them in his Cause, to affect their Common Rights and Liberties. That if once the Dictator shall find there is the same unanimous Resolution in the Army to justify their Victory, as there was to obtain it, and that the safety and preservation of each One is the care of All, it will bring down his haughty mind to more mild and just Sentiments. In fine, That for his own part, he intirely committed his Life and Fortunes to the protection of their approved Faith and Courage.

XXXII. This Oration was entertain'd with an unanimous Shout by the whole Army, bidding him, Have a good heart, for none should offer him any Violence, as long as the Roman Legions had a Being. Soon after came the Dictator, and presently by sound of Trumpet summon'd the Army to a general Assembly. Then the publick Cryer having commanded Silence, call'd Q. Fabius, General of the Horse, who removing from a lower place, came before the Tribunal, and the Dictator spake as follows. I demand of thee, O Q. Fabius, since the Dictator is vested with a Sovereign Power, and Authority Paramount, which even the Consuls, those Royal Officers of State, and the Prætors created with no less Solemn Ceremonies, do both obey: Whether or no thou thinkest it just and fit, that a General of the Horse should be obliged to observe his Commands? I demand further: Whether after I came to understand, that I march'd from home with doubtful Auspices, I ought to have hazarded the State against the Order of these Religious Observations; and not rather take new Auspices, that I might attempt nothing so long as I stood in doubt of the favor of the Gods? And withal I ask thee, Whether the General of the Horse could possibly be free from that Religious Obligation and Scruple, which justly hindred the Dictator from Engaging the Enemy? But what need I make these Queries? If I had left the Army without saying one word, yet you ought to have govern'd your self according to the best Interpretation that could be made of my Will and Pleasure: But answer me if thou canst? Did I not expressly forbid thee to attempt any thing during my absence? Did I not charge thee not to fight the Enemy? By what Authority then, Contemning such my Command, whilst our Auspices were uncertain, in violation of our Religious Rites, and no less against the Rules and Customs of War, and the wholesome Discipline of our Ancestors, than in defiance to the Gods, didst thou dare presume to hazard a Battel with them? To these Interrogatories answer directly, and upon peril of your Life not a word besides: Come Marshal! attend to perform your Office, To these several Articles, Fabius could not readily answer in Order, but complain'd, How unreasonable it was, that the same Person should be both his Accuser in a matter that touch'd his Life, and also his Judge. And sometimes he cry'd out, That his Life might sooner be taken from him, than the Glory of his Victory; and at once endeavor'd to justify himself, and blacken his Adversary. Whereupon, Papirius more enraged than before, commanded, That the General of the Horse should forthwith be stript, and the Rods and Axes got ready. But Fabius imploring protection from the Soldiers, and charging them with their promise for his Safety; whilst the Officers were tearing his Clothes from his back, made shift to get away into the Ranks of the Triarian Bands, who already began to make a Tumult in the Assembly. And now a general Clamor runs through all the Company; in some places you might hear Intreaties, in others terrible menaces: Those that happened to stand next the Tribunal, being under the Generals Eye, and easily known, did humbly pray him to spare the Gentleman, and not with him condemn the whole Army: But those that were farther off, and especially the Troops about Fabius, exclaim'd against the Cruelty of the Dictator, and were just ready to Mutiny. Even the Tribunal it self was not quiet: The Commissary Generals standing about the Chair of State, besought the Dictator to Adjourn the business, to respite his anger, and take some time to advise what was fittest to be done: That the rash Youth of Fabius was already sufficiently check'd and chastised, his Victory enough disgrac'd: They begg'd of him not to proceed to Extremities, not to brand so brave a young Gentleman, the only Son of a most Illustrious Father, and all the Noble Family of the Fabii, with such a Mark of Eternal Infamy. But finding, that neither upon the merits of the Cause, nor the Interest of their Intercession, they could any thing prevail: They wish'd him at least to have regard to the uproar that the Army was in, That it would not become a person of his Age and Prudence to add more Fuel to that Combustion, and administer more occasion for a Mutiny: For whatever mischief should happen, none would impute the blame to Q. Fabius, who was ready to ask Pardon for his Misdemeanor, but every Body would lay it at the Dictators door, if blinded with Passion, he should in a wilful perverseness provoke the outrageous Multitude against himself. Finally, they told him, That he should not think they were thus urgent for any particular respects they had for Fabius, but were ready to make Oath, That they believ'd in their Consciences, it would not be safe for the State and Common-weal, that he should at this juncture proceed with such rigour against Q. Fabius.

But by these Remonstrances they more exasperated the Dictator against themselves, than pacified him towards the General of the Horse, and were commanded down from the Tribunal. In vain the Cryer endeavor'd to command silence, for so great was the noise and tumult, that neither the voice of the Dictator himself, nor of any of his Officers could be heard: And in this Confusion they continued, till Night, as in a Battel, put a present period to their Contest. The General of the Horse being commanded to appear again next day, all Men concluded, that Papirius would then proceed more violently, being further enraged by the opposition he had met with, Fabius therefore thought it safest to retire privately out of the Camp, and fled to Rome: Where, by the Interest of his Father M. Fabius, a Man that had already been thrice Consul, and Dictator as often, the Senate was immediately Assembled; to whom, as he was complaining of the Violence and Injury offered to his Son by the Dictator, on a sudden a great noise was heard in the Lobby of the Dictors, making way through the Croud: For the Dictator himself was got to the Door all in a Fume, having with a Troop of Light-Horse pursued Fabius, as soon as he had notice of his being retreated from the Camp. Then began the Broil to be repeated, Papirius commanded young Fabius to be taken into Custody; and though the Chief of the Nobility, and the whole Body of the Senate interposed themselves in his Favor; yet so implacable was the Dictator, that nothing could divert him from his cruel Resolutions. Then M. Fabius the Father stepping forth, Since neither the Authority of the Senate (said he) nor respect to my old Age, whom you seek to make Childless, nor the Nobility and Valour of that General of the Horse whom you your self made choice of, nor humble Prayers, which have often appeased the rage of Enemies, and been able to pacifie the wrath even of the incensed Gods, have with you no power to prevail, I implore the lawful aid of the Tribunes, and appeal to the whole Body of the People of Rome; since you reject the Judgment both of your own Army and of the Senate, I challenge you before a Judge, which I am sure is greater and more mighty than your Dictatorship, and we shall see, whether you will yield to this Appeal, to which Tullius Hostilius King of Rome readily submitted. Out of the Council-House they went to the Common-Hall, the Dictator, with a small attendance, but the General of the Horse with a vast Troop of the principal Persons in the City: Papirius commanded that he should come down from the Rostra, or pleading Pulpits, and stand in a lower place amongst the People. His Father following him, 'Tis very well done (quoth he to the Dictator) that you have ordered us to be brought hither, whence we may be allowed freedom of Speech though we were but mere private Commoners. At first there passed no continued Speeches, but frequent Interruptions and Wranglings: Till at last the loud voice and indignation of old Fabius, drowned all the other Din, and enveigh'd against the Pride and Cruelty of Papirius, in these Terms: What Sirs! (said he) I also have been a Dictator of Rome my self, and yet never was there so much as one poor Commoner, one Centurion, or private Soldier by me wronged or misus'd: But Papirius seeks a Victory and Triumph over a Roman General, no less eagerly than over the Commanders of the Enemy. How vast a difference may we observe between the moderation of our Renowned Ancestors, and this new starch'd Pride and Cruelty. Quintus Cincinnatus the Dictator, when he was forc'd to relieve the Consul, L. Minutius, from being besieg'd in his own Camp through his ill Conduct, proceeded no farther than to remove him from the Consulship, leaving him still a Commissary General in the Army. Marcus Furius Camillus, not only so far moderated his present displeasure against L. Furius, who in contempt of his Age and Authority, had fought the Enemy, and that with great loss and dishonor, as not to write any thing amiss of him to the People or Senate, but also when he was come home, made choice of him of all the Consular Tribunes to be his Colleague and Partner in Command. Nor did the People, whose Power is Sovereign over all, ever extend their Resentments against such, as through rashness and want of Conduct, have lost whole Armies, any further than to punish them with a pecuniary Fine. That a General should be questioned for his Life for the miscarriage of a Battel, was until this day never heard of: But now we behold Rods and Axes, Whippings and Beheadings prepared for the Commanders of the People of Rome, even when Victorious and most justly deserving Triumphs, which by no Law could be inflicted, were they never so shamefully vanquish'd: What else could my Son have suffer'd if he had lost his Army? If he had been routed, put to flight, and clean beaten out of the Field, Field, Could the Wrath and Violence of the Dictator have done any more than scourge and put him to Death? Consider how suitable it will be, and what a comely spectacle, whilst all the City is in the highest Follies for Q. Fabius's Victory, and busy in Thanksgivings to the Gods, and mutual Congratulations, to see that very Man, for whose sake the Temples of the Gods are opened, and the Altars smook with Sacrifices and Oblations, stand bound and strip'd, and bemangled with stripes in the sight of the People of Rome, looking up to the Capitol, and those Gods whom in two Battels he had invoc'd and not in vain? How will the Army that obtain'd so noble a Victory under his Conduct and good Fortune, resent such ungrateful and barbarous usage? What Lamentation must it needs occasion in the Roman Camp, and what rejoicing and exultation amongst our Enemies? Thus spake the good old Man, sometimes up-braiding, sometimes complaining, imploring the help of Gods and Men, and all the while embracing his Son with abundance of Tears.

XXXIV. The Countenance of the Senate, the Favour of the People, the Assistance of the Tribunes, and Regards to the absent Army, all made for Him and his Sons cause. But on the other side was Objected, "The Sacredness of the Romans Government; the necessity of keeping Military Discipline; the weight of a Dictators Edict always hitherto reverenc'd as an Oracle; the great and fresh Example of Manlius, who postpon'd his Natural Affection to his Son, to the Zeal he had for the Publick Welfare. It was likewise urg'd, That the Gallant Brutus, the Founder of the Roman Liberties, had practis'd the same severity long before on two of his own Children. But now fond Fathers and indulgent old Men, making nothing of Disobedience to Commands, and conniving at Youth therein, prepare the way for the utter subversion of all wholesom Military Discipline. However (quoth Papirius) I will still persist in my just and necessary Resolutions, nor shall remit any thing of that punishment which he deserves, who hath presumed to fight against my Orders, and in contempt of Religion. Nor can I prevail with my self to do any thing which may hinder the Majesty of the Roman Government from being everlasting: It shall never be said, That L. Papirius did diminish one Jot of its Authority. I heartily wish, That neither the Tribunes (whose Power is inviolable) may by their interposing in this Case, violate the Majesty of the Government; nor the People of Rome, by opposing me their present Dictator, extinguish the Rites of the Dictatorship for ever: Which if should happen, Posterity should have no cause to blame Papirius, but must accuse (though then in vain) the depraved Judgment of the People, when the Golden Bands of Military Discipline being once slackned and let loose, neither the Soldier will obey his Centurion, nor the Centurion his Tribune, nor the Tribune the Commissary, nor the Commissary the Consul, nor the General of the Horse the Dictator. But all Reverence either of Men or Gods being abandon'd, neither any Edicts of the Commanders in Chief will be regarded, nor the Sacred Rites be any longer observ'd. The Soldiers without Passports will wander where they list, either in their own Quarters, or amongst the Enemy; and slighting their Military Oath, may desert the Service, and run away from their Colours when they please; they need not assemble when summon'd to a Rendezvous, nor matter whether they fight by Night or by Day, on advantageous or disadvantageous Ground, or with, or without the Command of their General: They will neither observe the Word, nor keep their Ranks and Orders, but a blind confused inconsiderate Violence, no better than that of Thieves and High-way Men, shall come in the place of that solemn and sacred Art Military, which hitherto hath supported our Empire. Of all these odious Crimes and absurd Inconveniences, you, O Tribunes! offer your selves to be Authors and Promoters, and must therewith stand charged to all Generations: Engage and forfeit (if you please) your own Heads to excuse the Extravagance and Disobedience of Q. Fabius.

XXXV. The Tribunes were startled, and began now to be more solicitous for their own Safety, than his for whom their help was desired: But they were put out of that pain by the general consent of the People of Rome now turn'd to Prayers and Intreaty, requesting the Dictator, for their sakes to remit the Punishment, and proceed no further against the General of the Horse. The Tribunes finding all inclinable to that submissive Method as the only Expedient, join'd with the rest, in beseeching the Dictator to pardon Humane Frailty, to impute this Miscarriage to his Youth, who for the same had now been enough chastiz'd. Then too, the young Man himself and his Father, laying aside all Debate, cast themselves at the Dictators Feet, and besought him to lay by his Displeasure. Whereupon the Dictator commanded silence, and told them, "This is well, and as it should be, O Quirites! at last the Military Discipline and Majesty of the Government have got the Victory which before lay a Bleeding, and were in danger not to have surviv'd this very Day. Q. Fabius is not acquitted of his offence in fighting against Orders, but Convicted, and his Life given to the People of Rome, and the Tribunitial Power suing for it precariously, and not demanding it as of Right. Live, Quintus Fabius, more happy in this general Consent of the City to save thee, than in that Victory on which ere-while thou so much valued thy self. Live, I say, Thou who hast been so bold as to commit a Fact, which thine own Father here, if he had been in L. Papirius's place, would never have pardon'd. To me thou mayest reconcile thy self, and and shalt have any favour lies in my Power, when thou pleasest: But to the People of Rome, to whom thou owest thy Life, you can do no greater Service, than that the Example of this days work may for ever be a warning to thee, both in War and Peace, to obey all the Lawful Commands of thy Superiors. Then dismissing the General of the Horse, and going himself out of the Court, the joyful Senate and People, more over-returning Thanks to the Dictator on the one side, and Reverence to Military Discipline was no less corroborated by this danger (only) of young Fabius, than it was by the actual Execution of young Manlius. It happened afterwards that year, as oft as the Dictator was absent from the Army, the Enemy would be busy, and doing of some mischief in Samnum: But M. Valerius the Commissary-General, who was then Commander in Chief, remembered this fresh Example too well to attack them; for he dreaded the Dictators anger, no less than the force of the Enemy: Therefore when some Parties sent out to bring in Corn to the Camp, were entrap'd in a disadvantageous Pass, and all cut to pieces, it was commonly believed, the Commissary might have reliev'd and sav'd them, had it not been for fear of these grim and terrible Edicts. The Dictator also lost the Hearts of the Soldiers (who before were male-content) because he was so implacable to Q. Fabius, and particularly for his having resolutely deny'd to Pardon him upon their most earnest Intreaties, which yet afterwards he granted at the request of the People.

The Dictator placed L. Papirius Crassus as General of the Horse in the City (having forbidden Q. Fabius to intermeddle any more with that Command) and so returned to the Camp; but neither was his coming matter of joy to his own Men, nor of terror to the Enemy: For the very next day, whether they were ignorant of his arrival, or whether they valued not whether he were absent or present, they came up in good Order close to the Camp. And had the good will of the Soldiers seconded the Conduct of Papirius, that day, 'tis believ'd, had put an end to the War with the Sammites, so opportunely he posted his Army, and strengthened it with Reserves, and all kind of Warlike skill and policy: But the Soldiers went on coldly, and on purpose hindered the Victory to discredit ed. The Dictator, like a prudent and experienced Commander, easily perceived where the matter stuck, and found it necessary to moderate the harshness of his temper, and allay that Severity with a mixture of Courtesie: therefore taking with him the Commissary-Generals he himself went to visit the Wounded Men, thrusting his Head into their Tents, asking them severally how they did? and charging the Commissaries, Tribunes and Prefects, to take particular care of every one of them by Name: this being a thing in is self Popular, he manag'd so dexterously, that by curing their Bodies, he also healed the rancour of their Minds, and won their Hearts: Nor did any thing contribute more to the speedy Recovery of their Health, than the pleasure they took to see his care and diligence to procure it. Having thus refresh'd his Army, he once again encountred the Enemy, with an assured hope both in himself and his Soldiers, to Vanquish them; which he perform'd so effectually, that the same was the last day they durst look him in the Face. Thence-forwards he march'd his Victorious Army, which way soever the hopes of Booty invited, and as they over-ran all the Enemies Country, met with no Resistance, neither of open Force, nor yet so much as any attempt by Ambuscade. The more to encourage the Soldiers, the Dictator had ordered all the Plunder to be divided amongst them, so that private Advantage spur'd them on, as well as the publick Quarrel. At last, the Sammites were so cow'd and brought down, that they became Suppliants to the Dictator for Peace, offering to new Cloath all his Soldiers, and give them a Years pay; but being referred to the Senate, answered, That they would follow him, and submit their Cause wholly to his Vertue and Goodness, to do with and for them as he thought fit.

The Dictator entered the City in Triumph, and before he laid down his Office, by the Order of the Senate, Created new Consuls, C. Sulpicius Longus the second time, and Q. Emilius Cereanus. The Sammites had not yet concluded Peace (for the Articles were still under Debate) but had obtained a Truce from Year to Year, which yet they did not honestly observe; for when they heard that Papirius was out of Command, their fingers itch'd to be again in Arms. But besides their playing fast and loose, a War broke out with the Apulians, the management of which latter fell to the share of Emilius, as that against the Sammites to Sulpicius. There are some Authors who write, That the War was not against the Apulians, but in defence of some of their Allies that were Invaded by the Sammites. But the low Condition of the Sammites at that time, scarce able to defend themselves, makes it more probable that they did not Attack the Apulians, but rather the Romans quarrel'd with both the Nations at the same time, because they had Confederated with each other against them: However, there happened no remarkable Action: The Country of Apulia and Samnum Forraged, but no Enemy either here or there to be met with. At Rome there happened one Night a strange and unaccountable Pannick fear, which on a sudden rais'd the whole City out of their Beds, so that the Capitol, the Castle, Castle, the Walls, and the Gates were fill'd with Armed Men: And after there had been every where evast concourse of People, and a general Cry, Arm! Arm! at Break of Day no Author, or cause of all this Fear and Distraction could be discovered. This Year the Inhabitants of Tusculum were proceeded against, upon the prosecution of M. Flavius, Tribune of the Commons, who proposed, That they might be punish'd, for having by their Counsel and Assistance excited the Veliternians and Privernates to War against the Romans. The People of Tusculum, with their Wives and Children, resorted to Rome, and having changed their Apparel, in despicable habit like Prisoners at the Bar, went about from Tribe to Tribe (before they gave their Suffrages) falling down to every Man on their knees to beg favour, whereby Pity prevail'd more to Pardon them, than the goodness of their Cause to purge their Guilt: Insomuch, that all the Tribes, except that called Politia, Voted to repeal the Law that had been prefer'd against them. But the Sentence of the Politian Tribe was, That all the Men of fourteen Years of Age, or upwards, should be scourg'd and put to death: And their Wives and Children, by Martial Law, to be sold for Slaves. Which cruel Doom has stuck in the stomach of the Tusculanians even to the last Age, and so great an Antipathy they have always had to the Authors thereof and their Posterity: That scarce ever any Man of the Tribe Politia, when he stood Candidate for an Office, could get the Voices of the Tribe Papiria (into which the Tusculans were cast) but in regard of this old Fend, they would, right or wrong, oppose his Pretensions.

The Year following, Q. Fabius, and L. Fulvius Consuls, A. Cornelius Arvina Dictator, and M. Fabius Ambustus General of the Horse, upon apprehensions of a smarter War in Samnium (because they were reported to have hired Auxiliaries from the Neighboring Nations) there was a greater Levy of Soldiers than ordinary, and a gallant Army advanc'd thither, but encamp'd carelessly in the Enemies Country, as if no Enemy had been near them. When on a sudden, the Samnites Legions came on so bravely, that they carry'd up their Trenches to the Romans Out-guards, and if not hindred by the approach of Night, would have fallen upon their Camp, which they resolv'd to Attack early next Morning. The Dictator seeing he was like to be oblig'd to a Battel sooner than he expected, lest the disadvantage of the Ground should baulk the Courage of his Men, leaving Fires thick burning in his Camp to amuse the Enemy, silently dislodges and draws off his Troops; but being so very near, could not avoid being discovered. The Horse presently pursued him in the Rere, and press'd hard upon the Army in their March, yet so, as they would not Fight before it was Light; nor indeed did the Foot advance out of their Camp till Break of day: But then the Horse began to charge upon the Romans, and what with Skirmishing continually with the Rere, and falling sometimes upon their Flanks in streight and disadvantageous Passes, hindred their March till their own Foot came up; so as now the Samnites, with all their Forces, were ready to Attack them. The Dictator seeing he could not March on without great loss and hazard, Commanded his Men to fortifie the Ground they stood on, but the Enemies Light-Horse were skirting round about upon them, so that they could not go out to provide Stakes for a Palizade, nor with any safety begin their Trenches. When therefore he found, that he could neither go on, nor abide there without disadvantage, he resolv'd to venture the fortune of a Battel, and removing his Baggage out of the way, drew up in Battalia. The Enemy did the like, being inferior to them neither in numbers or courage; and the more heartned on, because not knowing that the true Cause of the Romans Retreat, was the Inconveniency of the place, they ascrib'd it to fear, and imagined them affrighted, and themselves that pursued them to be very terrible in their Eyes. This held the Fight a good while in equal Ballance, whereas for a long time before, the Samnites were wont scarce to endure the Romans first Charge. But verily, that Day from nine a Clock in the Morning, till five in the Afternoon, the Fortune of the Field continued so doubtful, that after the first On-set, there was never a second Shout given on either side, nor were the Ensigns either advanc'd or retreated, but stood fix'd in the same place: Nor did the Soldiers any where flinch one Foot, but every one in his Rank pressing forwards with their Shields, continued obstinately Fighting, without any Intermissions for Breathing-times, or the least looking back: The same murmuring Fierceness was heard on either side, and the same Resolution to Conquer or Dye shew'd; that the Battel was likely to continue till the extremity of Weariness, or Night should part them. They had now fought so long, that the Men had scarce any strength left, their Weapons were blunted with continual hacking at one another, and the Commanders were to seek for Counsel what to do next; when on a sudden it happened, That the Samnites Horse having Intelligence, that the Romans Carriages and Baggage, attended only with one Troop, were gone a good way off from their Army, and stood there without any other Guard or Fortification: They being greedy of the Spoil, hastned thither and let upon them. A trembling Messenger giving notice of this to the Dictator: Let them alone (quoth he) let them encumber themselves a Gods name with the Booty: Soon after, others came running one after another, Crying out, That they were ransacking every where, and all the Soldiers Goods would be lost. Then lending for the General of the Horse, Look you (saith he) M. Fabius, do you not see that the Enemies Cavalry

Cavalry have abandon'd the Battel? They are now all busie in rifling our Carriages, Charge them therefore now, whilst they are scattered and in disorder, as a Multitude intent upon Pil-lage must needs always be; you shall, no doubt, find few of them Mounted, or with their Arms in their hands, whilst they are loading their Horses with Spoil, you may easily kill them unarm'd, and make it a bloody Booty to them: Let me alone with the Charge of the Legions and Foot-men, Take you the Honor of the Horse-Service.

Immediately the Cavalry in most excellent Order advanc'd and rush'd in upon the Enemy. XXXIX. They were in Confusion rummaging up and down, and over-clog'd with the Plunder they had got: There they made a mighty Slaughter, for being (as they were) amongst Packs and Fardles, which they suddenly cast from them, and now lay against their Feet to stumble on as they fled, and in their Horses way, they were not in this Surprise well able either to fight or fly, but for the most part, cut to pieces on the place. The Enemies Horse being thus defeated, and almost all destroyed, M. Fabius wheeling about, return'd and fell upon the back of their Infantry, with a great Shout, which both terrified the Samnites and encouraged the Romans; for the Dictator hearing it, and withal, perceiving the Enemies Front ever and anon to look back, their Ensigns disordered, and their main Body in a kind of Confusion, made use of all his Skill and Rhetorick to raise the spirits of his Men, calling upon the several Colonels, Captains, and other Officers by name, to follow him briskly in a new Charge, and so with a repeated Shout, advanc'd; but the nearer they came on, the more disordered they perceiv'd the Enemy to be. By this time their own Horse making way through the midst of the Enemy, appear'd in sight; and the Dictator, with his Voice as loud as he could, and with signs, gave his Men notice of it, shewing them the Ensigns and Targets of their Fellow-Soldiers. This added new Life and Spirits to them, so that forgetting the Fatigues of the whole Day past, and not at all regarding their Wounds, as if they had just then come fresh into the Field, they flew upon the Enemy, who no longer able to endure the Impressions of the Horse behind, and the Violence of the Foot before, were a great part of them kill'd in the middle, and the rest put to flight; such as stood to it being cut off by the Foot, and those that ran away slaughtered by the Horse: Amongst the rest, their General himself lost his Life.

This Defeat, above all others, did so weaken and daunt the Hearts of the Samnites, That in all their Assemblies and Councils, they muttered and grumbled one to another, That 'twas no wonder their Success was bad, when their Quarrel it self was naught, and the War impiouly undertaken, contrary to a Covenant of Truce: It was not likely they should prosper, who had made the Gods no less their Enemies than Men: That a War so unjust, must needs cost some mighty Overthrow, and was not to be Expiated without some notable Satisfaction: But the Question was, Whether Vengeance ought not to be taken of the Guilty Blood of some few, rather than of the Guileless Blood of all. And now some durst nominate those that had been the Authors and chief Promoters of this War, but especially they cry'd out against one Brutulus Papius, a Noble Man of great Interest in the State, and who without question had a principal hand in breaking the last Truce: Against him a Decree pass'd, That he should be delivered up to the Romans, and that with him, whatever Booty or Prisoners had been taken from them, should be sent to Rome; and restitution made of all Goods which the Romans had demanded in pursuance of the former Treaty. Accordingly Heralds were sent to Rome with the dead Body of Brutulus, for he, to avoid the shame and punishment, had made away himself; with his Corps they thought fit also to send all his Goods: But the Romans would accept of none of these things, save only the Prisoners, and so much of the Spoils as any Man could justly own and lay claim to, the offer of the rest was rejected. A Triumph was award-ed to the Dictator by an Act of the Senate for this signal Service.

Pet some Write, that this War was manag'd by the Consuls, and that they werethe Men that Triumph'd over the Samnites: As also that Fabius March'd into Apulia, and brought from thence mighty Booties. Not but that 'tis beyond all Controversie, that A. Cornelius was in that Year Dictator; but the doubt lies here, Whether he were made so for carrying on the War, or only to manage the publick Roman Games, to give the Signal when the Chariots should be let out of the Barriers to run their Races, because L. Plautius the Prætor (whose business that was) happen'd to be sick. And that having dispatch'd that petty Affair (scarce worth while to be remembred under the name of so great a Charge) he should give up his Dictatorship. The Authors on both sides are so equal, both in number, and credit, and confidence in telling their Stories, that 'tis no easie matter to know which to prefer. For my own part, I conceive the Memoirs of those Times much depraved by those Encomiastick Orations used at Funerals, and counterfeit Titles of Statues, whilst every Family, by some colourable Untruth, sought to draw to it self the Glory of brave Exploits and antient Dignities. Thus certainly both the Deeds of particular Men, and the Publick Records of the Common-wealths Affairs, are become confus'd: Nor is there extant any one Writer, that lived near those Times, upon whom we may sufficiently depend as a true and certain Author.

DECADE I. BOOK IX.

E P I T O M E.

2, 3. The Consuls, Veturius and Posthumius, with their Army, being pounded up in the Straights of Caudium, are forc'd to compound for their Lives with the Samnites, promising, That the People of Rome should grant them Peace, and for performance thereof, gave 600 Horsemen as Hostages; and so they and the rest of their Army march'd away sub Jugo [that is shamefully without Arms, and under a thing erected like a Yoke or Gallows.] 8, 9, &c. The Consuls, Tribunes, and all that subscrib'd this dishonorable agreement, are upon the motion of Sp. Posthumius the Consul himself, sent back Prisoners to the Samnites, to discharge the City from any Obligation to stand to it; but the Samnites would not accept them. 14. Not long after, Papirius Cursor routs the Samnites, makes them pass under the Gallows, recovers the 600 Hostages, and so wipes off the stain of the former Miscarriage. 20. Two new Tribes added. 29. Appius Claudius being Censor, furnish'd the City with a new Water-course, and paved an High-way, which from him were called, The Claudian Conduit, and the Appian Cautway. He also admitted the Sons of Libertines (or Enfranchis'd Bond-men) to be Members of the Senate: But the Consuls next year looking upon the Honor of the House to be sullied by Persons of such base Birth, remov'd them. 31. This Book likewise contains the Military Successes against the Apulians, Tuscans, Umbrians, Maritians, Pelignians, Æquians and Samnites, with whom the Ancient League was at last renewed. 46. Flavius the Notary, whose Father was but a Bond-man Enfranchis'd, is made Ædile of State, by a Faction of the Rabble, who growing very turbulent and too strong in all Elections of Magistrates, Q. Fabius the Censor reduc'd them into four Tribes by themselves; which good Service got him the Surname of Maximus, or Fabius the Most Great. Furthermore in this Book, having occasionally mentioned Alexander the Great, who at that time flourish'd, the Author digresses into a Comparison of his strength with the Romans, and thence infers, That if he had happened to cope with them, he would scarce have met with such easie Victories, as he did over those Eastern Nations whom he subdued.

NOW followed the Claudian Treaty, so memorable for the Romans dishonor, under the Consulship of T. Veturius Calvinus, and Sp. Posthumius. The Samnites General that year happen'd to be Cains Pontius, the Son of Herennius a most prudent Father, and himself an excellent Soldier and Captain. This Gentleman, when their Ambassadors that were sent to Rome to make restitution of the Goods that had been taken, were returned, without being able to obtain a Peace, spake as follows in the Senate: Let us not however, Sirs! imagine that this Embassy is altogether fruitless: We have thereby Expiated the anger of the Celestial Powers against us, for violating the Truce, and now engag'd them in our Favor. For sure I am, those Gods, whoever they were, that thought fit to reduce us to the necessity of restoring what was demanded in pursuance of the Treaty, are nothing pleas'd with this surly pride of the Romans, in refusing to accept our tender of satisfaction: What could there be done to pacify the Gods, or reconcile Men, more than we have perform'd? The Enemies Goods taken in War (which by the Law of Arms we seem'd rightly intitled unto) we have returned: The Authors of the War, because we could not send them living, we have delivered up dead; and with their Bodies, their Goods we carry'd to Rome: That no Contagion of their Guilt might on us remain. What more, O Roman! canst thou pretend that I owe either to thee, or the League, or those Gods that were invoc'd to be the Guarantees thereof? Whom shall we have to be judge of your Demands, or of our Amends? For our parts we refuse none, be it either Nation, or private Person. And if nothing of Right amongst Men be left to the Weak, when he has to do with those that are too Strong and Mighty for him, yet let us address to the Gods, who are the proper Avengers of haughty Injustice and intolerable Insolence: Those Divine Powers I will implore, to turn the fury of their Displeasure on those whom neither the Restitution of their own Goods, nor the rendering of other Mens withal to boot will content, whose raging Cruelty is not to be appeased, either by the Death of the Guilty, nor the Delivery up of their breathless Bodies, nor the surrender of their Goods, together with the Owners Carcasses; whom indeed nothing can satisfy, unless we part with our heart-blood, and suffer them to tear out our very Bowels: That War, O Samnites! must needs be Just, which is absolutely Necessary, and Pious their Arms, who but by Force of Arms can no longer subsist; since therefore in all humane Affairs nothing is of greater Importance, than to have the Gods propitious or adverse unto our Enterprises, you may be assured, That as we undertook our last War, rather against the Gods than Men, so in this which we now engage in, we shall have the Gods themselves for our Leaders and Assistants.

II. These pleasing Promises the Event rendred Propheticall, for drawing out his Army near Caudium, he encamp'd with the greatest privacy in the World; and having Advice that the Roman Consuls and their Army lay quartered about Calatia, he sent out half a score Souldiers in Shepherds habit, and ordered them severally to feed their Flocks, one here, and another there, near the Roman Out-guards, who being taken by the Scouts, did all relate for certain, That the Samnite Legions were got into Apulia, besieging the City Luceria with all their Forces, and doubted not but to take it very shortly by Storm. Such a flying report had before been industriously broach'd, and these Prisoners all agreeing in a Tale, fully confirm'd it. No Man doubted but the Romans ought to relieve the Lucerns, as well because they were their good and faithful Allies, as to prevent all the rest of Apulia from revolting to the Enemy, upon the present dread they were under: The only thing in debate was, Which way they should march thither? For you must note, there were two Roads to Luceria, one broad and open, along the Coast of the Adriatick Sea; but as 'twas the safer, so 'twas much the further about: The other, was through the Straights of Caudium, much the nearer Cut, but the place situate thus; There are two deep narrow Woody Forrests or Dales joyned to one another, by continual Ridges of steep Mountains that surround them, but between these two Straights lies enclosed a good large Plain, or Meadow, pleasantly green and grassy, but somewhat waterish, and a kind of Morass: Through the midst of which the Road lies; but before you get thither, you must pass the first Straights, and then either return the same way you got in; or if you proceed forwards, you must pass another such a kind of Streight, but narrower and more intricate and difficult than the former. Into this Plain, the Roman Army was advanc'd through the first mentioned streight Pass, down an hollow Rock; but when they came to the other Pass beyond it, they found it Blockaded with Trees fell'd down and laid cross one another, and vast heaps of Stones pil'd thereupon. No sooner had they discovered this stratagem of the Enemies, but they also espied a power of them in Arms on the tops of the Hills to make good the Pass against them. Then presently they face about, and with all speed march back, endeavoring to get out the same way they came in; but when they came there, they found that also stop'd and dam'd up, and guarded in like manner; whereupon, without waiting for any Word of Command, they made an Halt; and as their minds were astonish'd, so a chill Numness seiz'd their Bodies, and rendred every Limb almost useles, gazing one upon another (each Man thinking his Comrade might be wiser or more capable of giving Advice than himself) they stood a long time immoveable as Statues, and said not a word: But when at last they saw the Consuls Pavilions going to be set up, and some preparing things necessary for Entrenching themselves, though they well enough perceiv'd, that (in this desperate case, past all hopes of retrieve) all their pains must prove vain and ridiculous: Yet not to encrease their danger by their own default, and add negligence to their Misfortune; every Man without any direction from his Leader, betook himself to work, and fortified their Camp along the Water-side; though at the same time, besides the Enemies insolent jeering and hooting at them, they themselves could not but miserably acknowledge that all their toil was to no purpose: The Consuls half distracted with grief, summon'd no Council of War (for, alas! there was no room either for Advice or Hope) but the Commissaries and Colonels waited upon them of their own accord, and the poor Soldiers turning their Eyes towards their Generals Tents, begg'd of them Comfort and Succor, which (under those Circumstances) the Immortal Gods themselves were scarce able to afford.

III. Whilst they were making their moans to each other, rather than consulting, the Night came on; each Man according to his humor muttered out his Verdict: One cry'd, Let's break through the Blockade, and force our passage along the Road; Let's (says another) march over the Mountain-tops, and through the Woods, any way that we can carry our Arms, so we may but come at the Enemy, an Enemy whom we have continually beaten almost these thirty years: Talk not of disadvantages of the Ground, all will be plain and easie to us Romans, fighting against these pittifull perfidious Samnites. Tush, (says a third) Whither should we go? or which way? Are we going about to shoulder Mountains out of their places? As long as these steep Hills hang over our Heads, which way is it possible we should come at the Enemy? Arm'd or unarm'd, valiant or cowards, all's a case, entrapt we are, and all undone; the Enemy will not so much as afford us their Swords whereon we might die like men of Honor, but sitting still they'll vanquish us, and end this War with their hands in their Pockets. Bandyng such kind of Discourses to and fro, they pass'd over the night, unmindful either of Food or Sleep.

Nay, even the Samnites themselves were at a loss in this excess of good Fortune, what they were best to do; and therefore they all concluded to send to Herennius Pontius, their Generals Father, for his Advice. He being now very aged, had withdrawn himself not only from the toils of War, but also from the burthen and disquiets of Civil Affairs; yet in that weak Body, he had a strong vigorous Mind, and a notable Head-piece for Counsel. He being acquainted how the Roman Army was pounded between the two Caudine Straights, and his Advice desired by his Sons Messenger; gave his Opinion, That they should all be forthwith dismiss'd untouch'd: Which the Officers not liking, but returning back the Messenger for some other Answer, he then sent word, That they should put every Man of them to the Sword. These Answers so vastly disagreeing, as if they had proceeded from a doubtful Oracle; though his Son himself one of the first, did suspect that the old Gentlemans Intellectuals began to sympathize with his enfeebled Body, yet he was by the rest prevailed upon, to send for him thither, to declare his meaning by word of Mouth. Nor did the old man think much on't, to be brought (as 'tis said) to the Camp in a Cart, where in the Council, he persisted in the very same Directions; only added the Grounds thereof, viz. That he gave the first Advice, because he thought it the best course to establish a firm Peace and Friendship with a mighty and most Warlike People, by so vast a Kindness and Obligation. That by the second, he design'd to Adjourn the War for some Ages to come, since after the intire loss of two such Armies, the Romans could not easily, or in haste, recover strength enough to disturb the Repose of their Neighbors: But as for any third Advice to give them, he had none at all. His Son, and other Principal Officers, continuing the Discourse by demanding, What if they should take a middle Course, so as to dismiss them with their Lives, but impose Conditions upon them as vanquish'd by the Law of Arms? That indeed, replies he, is such a Method, as will neither gain you Friends, nor secure you of your Enemies; save them, whom you have once affronted with the utmost Disgrace, and see what you'll get by't; such is the stout Nature of the Romans, that they will never sit down patiently under the Dishonor of a Defeat; whatever Impressions of shame the present force shall make, will always be boiling in their Breasts, and never let them rest, till they have glutted themselves with a multiplied Revenge.

IV. Neither of these his Counsels being accepted, Herennius is carry'd home: And in the Roman Camp (after several Efforts used in vain to break through) there being now a general want of all Provisions, compell'd by Necessity, they sent Messengers, who were ordered first to desire a fair and indifferent Peace; and if they could not obtain that, then to challenge them to a Battel. But Pontius roundly told them, That the Field was already won, and since, although vanquish'd and as good as taken Captive, they had not the Wit to be sensible of their Condition, he was resolv'd they should surrender their Arms, and all pass, sub Jugo [under an Ignominious Frame set up for that purpose, like a pair of Gallows, consisting of two Spears set upright, and a third tyed across at their tops, which they call'd Jugum, the Yoke.] As for other Conditions, he would allow them such as were fit to be expected by the Vanquish'd at the hands of their Conquerors: That they should depart out of the Samnites Territories, and withdraw their Colonies, and so both the Samnite and Roman live in equal Alliance henceforwards, under their own respective Laws and Customs: That upon these Terms he was ready to strike up a League with the Consuls, but if they boggled at any of these Conditions, he charged the Messengers not to repair to him any more at their peril. When Relation of this Answer was made in the Camp, there was presently set up such a general Lamentation, and in every face appeared such marks of a most profound grief and anguish of Soul, that it seem'd they could not have taken it more grievously, if word had been brought them, that they were all immediately to be put to the sword upon the Spot. After a long silence (the Consuls not knowing how to speak a word either for a Composition so Dishonorable, or against it, since it was absolutely necessary) L. Lentulus, who both for Courage and Dignities was the Chief of all the Commissary-Generals, steps forth: "I have often heard (said he) my Father relate, That he was the only Man in the Capitol, that perswaded the Senate not to Ransom the City with Gold from the Gauls, since they were surrounded neither with a Trench, nor Rampire, by the Enemy (a People very negligent in such kind of works) so that they might break their way through, if not without great hazard, yet without any apparent Destruction. Were the case so now, that as they then, might in Arms have rush'd down from the Capitol upon their Enemies (as not seldom the Besieged make such Sallies out upon those that invest them) so had we any kind of opportunity of Engaging the Enemy, on any ground whatsoever, though never so disadvantageous, I carry so much of my Fathers Blood in my Veins, as not to be wanting to give you the like courageous Counsel. I grant, there is nothing more brave than to dye for our Country; and I am ready to Devote my self as a Sacrifice to present Death, and fling my self amongst the thickest of our Enemies, to preserve the People of Rome, and their gallant Legions: But, alas! here I behold our Country; here I see all the Roman Legions that are in the World, who unless they will madly run upon Death, for their own sakes, What is there that by their Death they can preserve? The Houses, you'll say, and the Walls, and the multitude that inhabit the City: Nay rather, if this Army miscarry and be cut off, all those are utterly betray'd into the Enemies hand, not preserved: For who shall defend them? perhaps, the weak and undisciplin'd unarmed Rabble? Yes, forsooth, as bravely as they did when the Gauls attack'd it: Or shall they send to the Veii for an Army, and importune the help of Captain Camillus? Away with such Dreams and Fancies! upon this Spot of Ground is all our hope, all our strength; by preserving which, we preserve our Country, but in exposing our selves to Death, betray and destroy it. But 'tis a base and shameful thing thus to yield up our selves: Well, be it so, such is our Affection to our Country, that we ought to preserve it when there is occasion, with our Disgrace, as well as with our Death. Let us therefore undergo this Indignity, how foul soever it be, and obey Necessity which the Gods themselves cannot overcome: Go, O ye Consuls! and preserve that City by parting with your Arms, which your Ancestors saved by parting with their Gold.

V. The Consuls going forth to Parley with Pontius, when he began to discourse of a League, acquainted him, That no League could be made without the Privy and Authority of the whole People,

People, nor without the Heralds, and other Solemn Ceremonies. So that this Caudine Agreement, was not (as is commonly believed, and as Claudius also writes) made in way of a formal League, or absolute Covenant, but by way of Stipulation and Promise: For what need is there of Sureties or Hostages in an absolute League, when the matter is transacted in this Form, Which soever People shall be the occasion of violating these Agreements, or by whose Default the said Articles shall be infringed, we wish that Jupiter would so smite him, as the Swine is here smitten by the Herald [and so they kill'd a Swine to compleat the Ceremony.] The Persons that were the Sureties for the ratifying of this Agreement, and Subscribed it, were the Consuls, the Commissary-Generals, the Questors or Treasurers, and the Colonels, whose Names are extant; whereas if the Business had been a League, there would have been only the Names of the two Heralds to it: Also by reason of the necessary delay before the Business could be concluded in Form of a League, there were required 600 Horsemen to be delivered as Hostages, who were to lose their Heads, if the Capitulations were not made good; and a time was agreed on for delivering the said Hostages, and disarming the Army. But the coming back of the Consuls, renewed again the universal Lamentation in the Camp, and they could scarce hold their hands from those, by whose Rashness they were brought into that cursed Place, and by whose Cowardize they were like to go thence far more shamefully than they came in; upbraiding them, That they had not so much as a Guide to direct them, nor a Scout abroad to descry the Enemy, but like Brutes, ran blindfold into the Pit-fall. The Soldiers star'd at one another, and look'd wistfully on their Arms, which presently they were to take their leave of, they conceited already their Right hands without a Weapon to defend them, their Bodies naked exposed to the mercy of the Enemy, they fancied to themselves the Gallows prepared for them, and the upbraiding Scoffs of the Victor, his proud and disdainful Looks, how they, disarmed, must trudge along between the Ranks of their Armed and Insulting Foe; then afterwards, what a wretched march they should have with their baffled Army, how shameful their return by the Cities of their Allies, home to their Country and Parents, where both themselves and their Ancestors had often marched Triumphant: We (say they) are the only Army in the World that ever was vanquish'd without a Wound receiv'd, without a Battel, without a Sword drawn; who were beat and routed, and yet never could get near our Adversary; who wore Arms, only to surrender them up peaceably to our Mortal Enemies; who had strength in vain, and courage to no purpose, but to render us more pungently sensible of our dishonor. Whilst they were bawling out these Complaints, the fatal Hour of their Reproach was come, which really rendred all Circumstances more grievous and intolerable, than they had been able to form them before in their Imaginations. Now were they commanded to march out of their Entrenchments unarm'd, and having on but each Man one single Garment. And first the Hostages were delivered and led away in Custody: Then the Consuls dismiss'd their Lictors from attending them, and their own rich Robes of State being pull'd off their shoulders, rais'd such compassion, even in those who but just before were cursing and banning them, and voting them worthy to be torn to pieces; that every one forgetting his own sad condition, was much more affected with theirs, and turn'd away his eyes from that disfigurement of Majesty, as from a spectacle of the greatest Impiety and Horror.

VI. First and formost the Consuls, almost half naked, were put under the Gallows, and after them every one according to his Quality and Decree, was prefer'd to the like Ignominy, and then the Legions one after another; the Enemy brisk and gay in their Armor encompassing them, and upbraiding and jeering them as they pass'd: Many had Swords set to their Breasts, not a few wounded, and some kill'd outright, whose stern Countenances, or grim Looks (fill'd with Indignation) offended the insulting Conqueror. Thus were they dragg'd under the Gallows, and (which rendered it more grievous than the thing it self) in the sight too of all their Enemies; when they were got out of the fatal hollow Way, as if they had been pluck'd out of Infernal Darkness, they then first of all seem'd to behold the Light, and yet the Light it self was worse to them than any kind of Death, when it shew'd them the Ill-favored prospect of their wretched Army. Therefore, though they could have got to Capua before Night, yet being doubtful of the Fidelity of their Allies, after such a Misfortune, and besides ashamed to be seen in such a pickle, they took up their Quarters not far from that City on the bare ground, utterly destitute of all Provisions and Accommodations. News whereof arriving at Capua, a just compassion of their Friends and Confederates, out-balance'd the Pride which is almost natural to those People, so that forthwith they courteously sent the Consuls the Insignia, Robes and Ornaments belonging to their Quality, Rods, Lictors, Arms, Horses, and plentifully furnish'd the Common Soldiers with Cloaths and Victuals. And when they came to Capua, the whole Senate and People went forth to meet them, and welcom'd them with all the kind offices of Friendship and Hospitality publick and private. Yet could not this Civility of their Friends, their kind Looks and obliging Discourses, draw a Word from them; nay, scarce would they lift up their Eyes to behold them, so much did shame, more than grief, make them shun all Conversation and Society: So that next day, when several of the young Nobility that had been to bring them going on their march as far as their their Territories extended, came back, and were call'd into the Court, and ask'd by the Grave Seniors, How the Romans behav'd themselves, they told them, That they now seem'd more dejected than ever, so silently did the Army march, as if it had been altogether compos'd of Mutes; That the noble Roman Bravery was now cow'd and dash'd, and their Spirits lost with their Arms; That they were not able to return them a Salute; That not one of them durst open his mouth for fear, but look'd as sneakingly, as if the Book under which they pass'd, were still over their Heads; That the Samnites had got not only an eminent Victory, but one that was perpetual; for though they had not taken Rome, as once the Gauls did, yet they had done what was much more Noble and Warlike, subdued for ever the Roman Courage and Fierceness.

VII. Whil'st these things were affirm'd, and Audience given thereunto so far, that most, even in that Council of their Allies, began to look upon the Roman Name as desperate, and their former Glories past Recovery; one Ofilius Calavius, the Son of Ovius, is reported to have told them, That there was a quite different Judgment to be made of the matter, for that obstinate Silence, those down-cast Looks, Ears deaf to all Questions, and shame of beholding the Light, did but argue the grand Emotions they felt within, and how deeply their Desires and Resolutions of Revenge were fix'd in their Souls, so that they had no leisure to attend any other thoughts; That either he was a stranger to the Natural Genius of the Romans, or this odd stubborn silence, would ere long cost the Samnites many a mournful Out-cry and loud Groans. That remembrance of this Caudine Treaty would be a great deal more doleful to the Samnites, than to the Romans; For as for the latter, they would quickly find their old Courage again whenever they came to Engage, but the Samnites would not every where meet with the Caudian Straights for their purpose.

By this time news of this shameful Disaster arriv'd at Rome: They had before received Intelligence of their being surrounded by the Enemy, but these Tidings of their scandalous accord and escape, were more grievous than the report of their Danger. Upon the Rumor of their being hem'd in, a new Levy of Soldiers was begun, but all preparations of Auxiliaries to relieve them laid aside, as soon as 'twas understood what a dishonorable Submission they had made; and presently, without any Command from Authority, the whole City put it self into Mourning, and omitted nothing that might express the greatness of their general Grief: The Shops round the Great Market-place were all shut up: The Courts of Justice adjourn'd, and all Proceedings at Law ceased of their own accord, before Proclamation made for that purpose: The Purple and Scarlet Robes, and Rich Embroideries were left off by the Senators: The Ladies laid by their Gold Rings, and the City every where appeared no less afflicted than the Army it self: Nor were the People only enraged against the Chief Officers and Undertakers for the Peace, but mad with the poor innocent Soldiers too, and said, They deserv'd not to be suffered to come into the City, or be allow'd any Quarters. But these Heats, the first arrival of the Army did quite allay, and turn'd their Anger into Pity; for they came not as Soldiers returning into their Country unexpectedly escap'd safe from an eminent danger, but with the garb and countenance of Captives; late at Night they march'd into the City, and every one stole home, and so hid up themselves in their own Houses, that on the Morrow, and for some Days after, not one of them was to be seen abroad in the Streets. The Consuls themselves kept in like private Men, and would exercise no function of their Office, but what they were forc'd unto by an Act of the Senate, namely, To nominate a Dictator to preside at the Election of the next Consuls; so they appointed Q. Fabius Ambustus Dictator, and P. Aelius Paetus General of the Horse: But there being some defect in the Ceremonies of their Creation, M. Aemilius Papus, and L. Valerius Flaccus, were nominated in their Rooms, but neither did they hold the Assemblies for Election, for the People being out of conceit with all the Magistrates of that Year as unlucky, the business came to an Inter-Regency: And Inter-Regents there were Q. Fabius Maximus, and M. Valerius Corvus; which latter created Consuls, Q. Publius Philo, and L. Papirius Curfor the second time: A Choice highly approved by the whole City, there being not two braver Generals in that Age.

VIII. The very Day they were Created, they entred upon their Office, for so the Senate had expressly ordered; and after the solemn and ordinary Acts touching Religion were pass'd according to Custom, They propos'd the matter of the Caudine Agreement to be taken into Consideration: And Publius, who had the chief Authority that day, commanded Spurius Posthumius to speak to that Point, who rising up with looks altogether as sad and dejected, as when he went under the Gallows: "I am not ignorant (said he) O ye Consuls! that 'tis not for Honor-sake, but for greater Ignominy that I am called forth, and that I am command'd to speak at this time not as a Senator, but as a Criminal, guilty both of an unfortunate ill-manag'd War, and a most unworthy dishonorable Peace. But since you have not been pleas'd to put the Question touching either our Guilt or Punishment, I shall omit all Apology and Defence; which yet it were not difficult to make before Persons that are not ignorant of Humane Chances, the variable Accidents of War, and those Necessities whereunto men are often driven, rather by their Destinies than Default. Waving all that, I say, I shall briefly declare my Opinion in the matter by you propos'd, which I hope will shew whether it was for my own sake, or to preserve your

Legions,

Legions, that I oblig'd my self in that Stipulation, call it either base or necessary, which you please; sure I am, 'tis such as being made without the privacy or order of the People, the State of Rome is thereby no ways bound: Nor is there any thing from thence due to the Samnites, but only the Bodies of us who were the Sponsors therein; let us, naked and in chains, be delivered up to them by the Heralds; let us discharge the People of those Religious ties, if in any we have intangled them, that so without the least violation of any Law, Divine or Humane, the War may be begun afresh. In the mean time, let the Consuls Levy, Arm, and Muster an Army, but not enter a step into the Enemies Country, till all the Ceremonies of our Rendition be legally performed. And you, O Immortal Gods! I beseech and implore, that if it were your pleasure not to grant the Consuls Sp. Posthumius and T. Veturius, success against the Samnites, yet at least you would be satisfisd to have seen us dragg'd under the Gallows, to have seen us oblig'd in an Infamous Sponson, and for the same to have beheld us deliver'd strip'd and bound into the hands of the Enemy, ready to receive upon our Heads, even with the loss of our Lives, all their rage and spight. Be pleas'd to accept this as a sufficient Expiation, and vouchsafe to grant, That the new Consuls and Roman Legions under their Conduct, may so manage the present War against the Samnites, as all other Wars against them were wont to be managed before our unhappy Consulship. This generous Speech rais'd at once so great an Admiration and Compassion in the Breasts of all the Senators, That they could scarce believe it to be the same Sp. Posthumius, who had been the Promoter of so dishonorable a Treaty; and then they were sensibly touch'd with pity, that so brave a man should suffer extraordinary Tortures above others at the Enemies hands, for perswading the Reverfal of that Peace for the Cities Honor, which he made for its Safety. However all applauded him, and approv'd of his Motion; only there was a little opposition made by L. Livius, and Q. Maelius, the Tribunes of the Commons, who alledged, That neither could the People be absolv'd from the Religious Obligations of that Treaty, unless all were restored to the Samnites, and every thing put into the same state as at Caudium: Nor yet could they acknowledge, that by consenting to an Agreement which preserv'd a whole Army of Romans, they had incur'd any Crime, or deserv'd any Punishment. And lastly, since their Persons by virtue of their Office were Sacred and Inviolable, could not by Law be given up to the Enemy, or expos'd to any Out-rage.

IX. Posthumius reply'd, "In the mean time surrender us the Prophane, whom without injuring Religion ye may; and afterwards deliver these Sacred Gentlemen as soon as ever they are out of their Office: But if you will be rul'd by me, let them first be soundly scourg'd here publicly in the Common-Hall, that they may pay some Interest for this delay of their Punishment: As for their denying, that our Rendition will discharge the People, who is so ignorant in the Heralds-Law as not to see, that they do it rather to save their own Bacon, than that they themselves can believe it so to be? I do not deny, Grave Fathers! that bare Promises and Stipulations, as well as Leagues, are to be accounted Sacred, and observ'd by all that have any regard to Faith towards Men, or Piety towards the Gods: But this I resolutely deny, That any thing done without the Peoples consent, is Obligatory to them. Suppose the Samnites in the same fit of Pride whereby they extorted from us this Promise, had insisted and compell'd us to pronounce the solemn Form of Words which those use who surrender up the Propriety and Dominion of Cities, would you, My Lords the Tribunes, yield the People of Rome were thereby become Vassals, and this City, its Temples, Chappels, Bounds and Waters, presently vest'd in the Samnites? But to wave speaking of a Surrender, since 'tis only a Stipulation that is here in question, What, I pray, if we had undertook and promis'd, that the People of Rome should forsake and abandon this City? or set Fire to it, or no longer to have Magistrates, Senate, or Laws? or to be again Govern'd by Kings? God forbid that, I say you. Well, but pray then observe, 'tis not the Indignity of things that discharges the Obligation of a Promise: If the People without their own consent can be bound to one thing, they may be bound to all; nor does that (which perhaps some may think material) at all alter the case, whether it be the Consul, or the Dictator, or the Prator, that enters into the Promise and becomes Surety: And this was the judgment of the Samnites themselves, as appears in that they thought it not enough to take the Consuls word, but made the Commissaries, Treasurers and Colonels of the Army also to joyn therein. Nor let any ask me why I would enter into this Engagement, being a thing not incident to the Consuls Office? Neither could I promise them a Peace, which was not in my power to grant, nor undertake for you, who had given me no such Commission? All I can say, Grave Fathers! is, That nothing was transacted at Caudium according to the usual Measures of Humane Prudence: The Immortal Gods had Infatuated both Yours, and the Enemies Generals; neither were we cautious enough in the Conduct of the War, nor they in making the Peace; but as they got the Victory badly, they lost the benefit of it as fililly, whil't they hardly trusted the strength of those places, by means whereof they gain'd the advantage of us; and were so eager on any terms to disarm Men, whom they knew born and bred to the use of Arms; If they had had their Wits about them, might

'not they in the same time they spent in bringing old Men in Carts for their Advice, have sent Ambassadors to Rome, and treated with the Senate and the People concerning a Peace or a League? It was but three days Journeys for Men well Horfed, and in the mean time there might have been a Cessation till their Ambassadors should have brought them back either a certain Victory, or an assured Peace? That indeed would have been a firm Stipulation and good in Law, when we had entered into it by the Peoples approbation? But neither would you have consented to, nor would we then have executed any such dishonorable League: It was the Will of Heaven that things should come to this indifferent Issue, That they should be deluded, as it were, with a pleasant Dream, and be Drunk for a while with an over-flowing Joy, greater than their weak Heads could bear; and at the same time, that Chance and Blind Fortune, which had so far entangled your Army, should also extricate it, and that a vain Victory should be frustrated with a vainer Peace, concluded by Persons that had no Authority to Treat, and which could bind none but the unqualified Undertakers themselves: For was there, Noble Senators! any application to you? Were the People of Rome ever so much as consulted about it? Who can challenge you? Who can pretend you have deceiv'd or dealt falsely with him? the Enemy, or any of our own Citizens? To the Enemy you have promised nothing, nor have ye empowered any Citizen to engage for you, or in your Names. You have therefore nothing to do with us, to whom you gave no Orders, and as little with the Samnites, who never Treated with you. We are the Undertakers, the Pledges and the Sureties to the Samnites, if we cannot make good our Bargain, we are however able to pay the Penalty, and will be answerable, as far as the strictest Justice can require, viz. with our Bodies and our Lives; on them let them exercise their Rage, and whet their Swords, and satiate their Fury. As for the Tribunes of the Commons, your Lordships may consider, whether they shall presently be delivered, or reserved till out of their places: But in the mean time, O Veturius! and you the rest, Let us freely resign these wretched Heads of ours, to discharge the Stipulation we entered into, and by our Punishment expiate the Roman Arms, and render them free to advance their Ensigns, without the least violation of Faith or Religion against the Enemy.

X. Both the Cause it self, and the Advocate, had so powerful an Ascendant over the Senate, that it prevailed not only with them, but with the rest concern'd, and even the Tribunes of the Commons themselves so far, as they declared themselves to be at the Senates dispose, resign'd their Offices, and with the rest were delivered to the Heralds to be carried to Caudium. This Act had no sooner pass'd the Senate, but the City seem'd to enjoy a new Light and Life. Every Body applauded Posthumius, and extoll'd him to the Heavens, equalling his Merits with those of Decius, or any other the most glorious Enterprizes of past Ages, saying, That by his advice and pains, the City was delivered from the Chains of a servile and unworthy Treaty, who had freely resign'd himself to all the Rage and Tortures of the Enemy, to be a Peace-offering for the People of Rome, and rescue them with Honor from the Inconveniencies of an ignominious Peace. Nothing now was minded but War, and Arms, and every one cry'd out, O for the day when we may come to Encounter these Rascallion Samnites with our Swords in our Hands: so inflamed was the City with Indignation, that an Army was soon Levyed, almost all Volunteers, the old Soldiers freely lifting themselves again, in hopes of Revenge, and so advanc'd towards Caudium. But the Heralds march'd before, and when they were come to the Gate, commanded all those that had signed the aforesaid Treaty to be strip'd, and their Hands pinnion'd behind their Backs. The Officer, out of respect to Posthumius, binding him but slightly, Draw harder (saith he) the Cord, that our Rendition may be in all Points as the Law of Nations requires: Being arriv'd at the Assembly of the Samnites, and before the Tribunal of Pontius, A. Cornelius Arvina, one of the Heralds, spake these words: Since these Persons, without any Commission from the People of Rome, have of their own Heads undertaken and promised, That a League and Peace should be made with you, and in so doing, are become guilty of a great Offence against the State; Therefore, that the People of Rome may be discharged from any share in their impious Crime, I here deliver up the self-same Men into your Hands. Whilst the Herald was pronouncing these Words, Posthumius struck him on the Thigh as hard as ever he could, and said aloud, I am now a Citizen of the Samnites, the Herald, contrary to the Law of Nations, I have assaulted and violated, so much the more justly therefore may the Romans now proceed in the War.

XI. Pontius then declared himself in these Terms: "Neither do I accept of this sham-Rendition, nor will the Samnites ever ratifie it: But rather, O Sp. Posthumius! if thou dost indeed believe there are any Gods, either render our whole Treaty null and void, or else stand to and make good thy Promise. For by all right, either the Samnites ought to have not only you, but all those that were once in their Power return'd, or else a firm Peace established in lieu of them, that being the Condition on which we parted with them. But why do I challenge thee, who being taken, hast again rendred thy self Prisoner to the Conqueror with all the Faith and Loyalty thou canst?" 'Tis the People of Rome that I accuse, who if they do repent of the Articles concluded by their Generals at

'at Caudium; Let them bring their Legions again into the same Pass where they were Entron'd; Let's have no tricks put upon us on either side; Let all proceedings be void for want of that Power you talk of, and every thing as it was; Let them take their Arms again, which upon the Articles they delivered up; Let them return again into their Camp, and have whatever they had the day before the Treaty: Then let them talk big, and reject, if they please, all Overtures of Peace; Let us manage the War with the same Fortune, and in the same Posts, as before there was any mention of Peace, and then need neither the People of Rome complain of their Consuls Treaty, nor we of the Romans Faith. Will there never be a Pretext wanting why you should not keep your words? You gave Hostages to King Porfena, and afterwards stole them away; you redeem'd the City from the Gauls for such a sum of Gold, and whilst they were receiving it, you treacherously cut them to pieces; Peace you have Covenanted with us, on condition we would release your captiv'd Legions: This Peace you now would cancel, and have evermore some pretences of Law to cover your fraud: Do not the Roman Folks like it, that their Army is saved by a Peace, that, forsooth, intrenches upon their Honor? Well, Let the Peace go whether it will, but let them restore the Imprison'd Legions to the Conqueror: But is this your Faith? Are these your Covenants? Was this worthy the ceremonies of your Heralds? That you indeed, according to the Agreement, should have so many thousands of your Citizens safe return'd; but I have nothing of that Peace, in consideration whereof I remitted them? Is this the right, O A. Cornelius! Is this the Law and Equity, O ye Heralds! which you teach and prescribe to Nations? I neither accept those you pretend to surrender, nor look upon them as such; nor will I hinder them from returning home loaded with all the threaten'd vengeance of the Gods, whose names you have eluded by this notorious violation of your Treaty and Agreement. Justly and bravely, no doubt, may ye make War upon us now, since Sp. Posthumius has struck your Ambassador the Herald upon his Knece: The Gods, I'll warrant you, will easily believe Posthumius to be a Citizen of Samnium, and no Roman; they will resent it heinously, that this Samnite has violated a Roman Envoy, and they will esteem this certainly a wonderful just Cause for you to make War upon us: Are you not ashamed thus to mock Religion? Do you not blush to let the World see how impiously you trifle in the most solemn and sacred Affairs? whilst being grave old Personages, and such as have been Consuls, you seek out little tricks and devices, scarce fit to be used by Boys and Children, and all to shift off and falsifie your Faith and Contract. Go Lictor! unbind those Romans, and let none hinder them from departing hence, or going whithersoever they list. So they, having by this tender discharged perhaps the Publick Faith, but without question cancell'd their own private Obligations, went back untouch'd from Caudium to the Roman Camp.

The Samnites seeing now that the proud and unreasonable terms of Peace which they insisted on, had occasion'd the renewal of a War more fierce and cruel than ever, did already not only fore-cast in their Minds, but behold as it were with their Eyes, all the Calamities which afterwards happen'd; and then in vain, because too late, they began to commend both parts of wise old Pontius's advice; whereas by neglecting the same, and running a middle course, they had exchange'd the possession of a certain Victory, for the shadow of an uncertain Peace, lost the opportunity both of gratifying and dammifying the Romans, and must now fight with those, whom they might for ever either have made their Friends, or cut off being Enemies. So strangely altered were the Spirits of both Parties after this Caudine Treaty, even before ever they were weakned by any new Battel, that the offer of surrendering himself, got Posthumius more glory amongst the Romans, than the gaining of that unbloody Victory did Pontius amongst the Samnites: The Romans look'd upon the gaining of a right to renew the War as good as an assured Victory, and the Samnites verily believed, That for the Romans to make War again, was all one as to Conquer them. In the mean time the Satricans revolted to the Samnites, and the Roman Colony at Fregellæ was unexpectedly assaulted by the Samnites, with whom 'tis certain the Satricans then were joyn'd: They were got into the Town in the Night, but fear on both sides kept them quiet till 'twas Light, and then the Fight began, which continued a good while very fierce and equal, the Fregellanes within making their part good with them, both because they fought for Church and Chimney (as the saying is) all they had in the World was at stake; as also because the Women and Rabble, unfit to bear Arms, did them good service in pelting the Enemy from the tops of the Houses: But treachery and credulity undid them, for suffering a Crier of the Samnites to make Proclamation, That whoever would lay down Arms, should have Quarter, and leave to depart with Bag and Baggage. The hopes thereof took off their minds from the Battel, and many began to fling down their Arms. But the stouter part still Armed, forc'd their Passage out at a back Gate, whose courage prov'd more safe than the others timorous credulity: For the Samnites surrounded them with Fire, and though they call'd upon the Gods for help, and to the Enemy for performance of their promise, burn'd them all to ashes. The Consuls divided the Provinces between them, Papirius march'd into Apulia to Luceria, where the Roman Horse given for Hostages at Caudium were detained in custody: Publius staid in Samnium to observe the Enemies motions, who by that means were distracted and knew not what to do; for if they march'd to relieve Luceria, the Romans here would fall upon their backs; and if they did not march thither, Luceria would be lost: at last they resolv'd to commit themselves to Fortune, and hazard a Battel with Publius, and in order thereunto drew up in Battalia.

XIII. Publius before he went on, thought to have made a Speech to his Soldiers, and ordered them to come together for that purpose: But as with mighty joy they flock'd round about his Pavilion, so by reason of their Shouts, and Out-crys for leave to fall on, not a word he said could be heard: The memory of the late affront and disgrace fresh in every Mans mind, was spur enough, and there needed no other exhortation. Thus in a running march they advanc'd to Battel, pushing forwards the Ensign-bearers, as if they were afraid they should not come soon enough to cope with the Enemy. And not to lose time in lancing their Darts and Javelins first, and afterwards drawing their Swords, they all at once, as if they had had a Signal so to do, threw those away, and with their Swords in their hands rush'd upon the Enemy: Here was little of the Generals skill to be seen in ranging the Battalions or appointing the Reserves, but a Military fury bore down all before it with an impetuous Violence; so that the Enemy was not only routed, but durst not for fear of hindring their flight, retreat to their own Camp, but took their heels, scattered as they were, towards Apulia, and with much ado rallied at Luceria. The same rage which had carry'd the Romans through the midst of the Enemies Army, did also break in to their Camp, where there was more blood and slaughter than in the Field, and most part of the Spoil in pure spight destroyed.

The other Army, under the command of the Consul Papirius, march'd all along the Seacoast as far as Arpi, and found all the People peaceable and friendly, more out of hatred to the Samnites, than for any good will or obligations they had to the Romans: But the Samnites dwelling in those days in Villages upon Mountains, contemning the People of the Champian Country as weak and effeminate, were wont to forrage and plunder them at their pleasure; whereas, had those parts been true to the Samnites, they might either have hindred the Romans from coming to Arpi, or when they were there, if they had denyed to supply them with Provisions, being at such a distance from Rome, might have ruined them: For after they march'd thence, and lay before Luceria, scarcity afflicted the besiegers, no less than the besieged: The Romans had all their Victuals from Arpi, but in such petty quantities, that whilst the Foot were upon Duty in the Leaguer, the Horse were sent out in Parties to Arpi to bring Corn from thence in sacks, and being often intercepted by the Enemy, were forc'd to fling off their burthen to defend themselves more nimbly: As for those in the Town, before the other Consul came up with his victorious Army, they had got in some promissions, and additional Forces too, from the Mountains of Samnium. But the arrival of Publius streightned them more than ever; for committing the particular management of the Siege to his Colleague, he was at leisure to scour the Neighboring Countries, and prevent the Enemy of all relief. The Samnites at last, seeing there was no hopes that those in the Town could longer hold out for want of Necessaries, gathering together all the Forces they could make, resolve to fight Papirius.

Both sides preparing for the Encounter, certain Ambassadors came from Tarentum, who charged both the Samnites and the Romans to desist, declaring, That which party soever should refuse to give over the War, against them they would fight in favor of the others. Papirius having received this Message, as if he had been much concern'd at it, told them, he must advise with his Colleague before he could return an answer. Having sent for the other Consul, and in the interim prepared all things necessary, they talk'd a while together, for there needed no long Consultation, the matter being already resolv'd, and so hung out to their Soldiers the signal of Battel [A Scarlet Tunick display'd on the point of a Spear o'th' top of the Generals Pavilion] The Consuls being busie to dispatch the Sacred Ceremonies, usual at such times, and giving the necessary Orders, up come the Tarentine Ambassadors expecting their Answer: To whom, says Papirius, We have consulted the Chicken-Master, and he tells us, The Birds feed right; and besides, That our Sacrifices by all signs and tokens are good and acceptable; you cannot blame us therefore, if when the Gods give us such Encouragement, we are going as you see to charge the Enemy: and with that commanded the Standards to advance, and led on his Army, joking at the egregious vanity of a People that were not able well to manage their own affairs, by reason of the Jars and Factions they had at home, and yet would take upon them to prescribe Laws of Peace and War to other Nations. The Samnites on the other side, having remitted their care and provision for a Battel, as either desiring Peace in earnest, or seeming to do so, to engage the Tarentines to their Party, when they saw the Romans so suddenly in array, began to baul, That they rest'd in the authority of the Tarentines, and would not come into the Field, nor put themselves in Arms out of their Fortifications, chusing rather to run all hazards, than slight the Tarentines, who had so courteously interposed as Mediators for Peace. The Consuls told them, They were glad on't, and look'd upon it as a good Omen of Success, and for their parts, wish'd the Enemy might might also be in the mind not so much as to defend their Entrenchments. Then dividing their Forces, they march'd up to the Enemies Works, and storm'd them fiercely on every side; some fill'd up the Trenches, others pull'd down the Rampire, and flung the Bank and all down into the Ditches under their feet: Besides, their Natural Courage, spight, and desire of revenge for the late disgrace had so enflam'd them, that they made nothing to break into the Camp, every one crying out, Here are no Sireights, no Caudium, no Woods unpassable, where fraud and treachery too insolently triumph'd over error, but here's true Roman Courage, which no Trenches, no Bulwarks can withstand. They cut to pieces those that made resistance, and those that endeavor'd to escape; the arm'd and the unarm'd, Bond-slaves, Free-men, grown People and Children, Men and Beasts; nor had there one living Creature been left alive, if the Consuls had not given the signal for a Retreat, and partly by Commands, and partly by Threats, drove the Soldiers greedy of slaughter out of the Enemies Camp. And therefore presently, whilst they were yet mad and angry, for being interrupted in the sweetness of their Revenge, a Speech was made, informing them, That the Consuls neither were, nor ever would be behind-hand with any Soldier there, in hatred to the Enemy, but as they were their Conductors in War, so they would be their Leaders to a just Revenge, and the extremity of Execution, did not regard to the 600 Horse Prisoners in Luceria at present withhold their hands, lest despair of Quarter should hurry the Enemy in a blind fit of fury, to put them all to the Sword, as thinking it some satisfaction to murder them, before they were kill'd themselves: The Soldiers highly approv'd of this prudent tenderness, and rejoic'd that a stop was put to their fury, declaring, That they were willing to suffer any thing, rather than endanger the lives of so many brave young Gentlemen, and most of them of the best Families in Rome.

This Audience being dismiss'd, a Council of War was call'd to consult, Whether with all their Forces they should carry on sharply the Siege of Luceria; or part of them, with one of the Consuls, take a turn into Apulia and thereabouts, those People having always hitherto born but little good will or sincere affections to the Romans. Publius undertook this service, march'd all over Apulia, and in one Expedition secured several Nations, either subdued by Arms, or received upon Terms into Alliance and Society: Nor did Papirius, that staid to besiege Luceria, make long work on't; for having beset all the ways by which Provisions could be brought out of Samnium, the Garison in the Town were compell'd by Famine, to send out Propositions to the Roman Consul, desiring him to accept the Horse that lay there as Hostages, and had been the cause of the War, and to give over the Siege. Papirius thus answered, That they ought to have consulted Pontius the Son of Herennius, by whom the Romans were put under the Gallows, what punishment he thought due to the Conquered. But since they had rather have their Enemies do them right, than impose what is but equal upon themselves, He thought fit to let them know, it was his pleasure, That leaving all their Arms, Baggage, Cattel and People, unfit to bear Arms within the Walls, the whole Garison, strip'd to their shirts, should be put under the Gallows and so dismiss'd; wherein he should not inflict upon them any new Ignominy or Reproach, but revenge an old one which themselves before had offered. They refused nothing, seven thousand Soldiers march'd away in Querpo through the Gallows, and a vast Booty taken in the Town: All the Ensigns and Arms regain'd that had been lost at Caudium; and that which Crown'd their Joy, the Horse that were delivered as Hostages, were now safe restored. Scarce ever had the Romans a Victory more Illustrious for a sudden turn of Fortune; especially if it be true (as some Annals record) That Pontius himself, the Samnite General, to expiate the Consuls disgrace, was put under the Gallows with the rest. But I do not so much wonder that this is left uncertain, as that 'tis by some made a doubt, Whether Lucius Cornelius the Dictator, with L. Papirius Cursor General of the Horse, perform'd these brave Exploits first at Caudium, and then afterwards at Luceria, and being the chief Avenger of that scandal to the Roman name, did Triumph more deservedly, I think, than ever any Man before him, except Furius Camillus? Or whether the chief Honor of these Services do of right belong to Papirius as Consul? This Error is attended with another, making it a question, Whether Papirius Cursor, for his good service at Luceria, were at the next Election continued in his Magistracy, and made the third time Consul, with Q. Aemilius Carretanus the second time? or, Whether it were L. Papirius Mugillanus, and the mistake happen'd in the Surname?

'Tis agreed on all hands, that the rest of these Wars hence-forwards, were finish'd by Consuls, Aemilius in one Battel wholly subdued the Ferentanes, and had the City whereinto they fled surrendred to him upon Conditions, and Hostages given for performance: With like good Success did the other Consul proceed against the Satricanes, who being accepted as free Citizens of Rome, did after the misfortune at Caudium, revolt to the Samnites, and admitted a Garison of theirs into the City: For having drawn his Army before the Walls, they sent to the Consul, begging Peace with earnest Prayers: but he returned them this heavy answer, That unless they did immediately put the Samnite Garison to the Sword, or surrender them to him, they should not presume to come again into his presence. That word struck greater terror into the Colony than all his Arms; and when the Messengers went on to demand of the Consul, By what means he could believe they that were but few and weak, could be too hard for such a strong and well-arm'd Garison? He bid them ask Counsel of those by whose persuasions they first entertain'd them; and scarce would he grant them leave to consult with their Senate, and bring him their Answer. Their Senate was divided into two Factions; one that had been the Authors of the Revolt from the Romans, the other Loyal Citizens; yet both endeavor'd, That by all means the Consul might grant them Peace: One party (since the Samnite-Garison, was to march away next night, being no longer able to endure the Siege for want of Provision) thought it enough to acquaint the Consul, at what hour, and at which Gate they were to go out, and what way they intended to march: But the others, who had always oppos'd the joining with the Samnites, did also the same Night open another Gate to the Consul, and secretly received abundance of Arm'd Men into the City: Thus by a double Treachery, both the Samnite Garison was unexpectedly cut off by Ambuscades laid in the Woods as they pass'd, and at the same time a Shout set up in the City, that was full of the Enemy, so that in one minute the Samnite was destroyed, the Satrican taken, and all at the Devotion of the Consul, who having made Inquisition who they were that caus'd the Revolt, such as were found guilty he caus'd to be beheaded, disarm'd the Town, and plac'd therein a lusty Garison. From hence Papirius Cursor return'd to Rome to Triumph (as they write who say, that by his Conduct Luceria was recovered, and the Samnites put under the Gallows.) And indeed, he was a Person worthy of all commendations for a brave Commander in the Wars, and excellent not only for the vigor of his mind, but also for the natural strength of his Body; nimble and light of foot almost to a Miracle, whence he had his Surname, Cursor, or the excellent Runner; for 'tis reported, he could out-run any Man of that Age: And whether by the vigor of his constitution, or by reason of much exercise, a stout and mighty Eater he was, and drank as liberally to his Meat, and could carry it off as well. Never had the Soldiers, Foot or Horse, smarter Service under a General, being himself Master of a Body that could endure all Fatigues. The Cavalry once were so bold, as to Petition him, that in consideration of some handson exploit they had done, he would be pleas'd to ease them a little of their ordinary pains and hard duty: Yes, quoth he, that you may not complain that you have no easement at all, I will henceforward ease you of this pains, That when ye alight from your Horses, you shall not need any more to stroke their Shoulders or Buttocks. He was besides, a Person severe, and kept both his own Citizens, and their Allies and Confederates, in mighty awe of him: The Prætor of Præneste happened once for fear to be a little slow in bringing up a Reserve which he commanded, into the Front, Cursor immediately caus'd him to be sent for, as he was walking before his Tent; and withal, order'd the Lictor to get ready his Hatchet, which being done, and the Prænestin half dead with terror, expecting nothing but present Death, Come hither, Lictor, (says the General) cut me up this stump of a Tree, which hinders my walk; and so having sufficiently terrified the Fellow, and set a small Fine upon him, dismiss'd him. Without doubt in that Age, which yielded as great plenty of gallant Captains as any, there was not a Person on whom the State of Rome did more rely and depend, in so much, as some Writers have concluded, that he would have been an equal match to the Great Alexander, if after the Conquest of Asia, he had bent his Arms against Europe.

XVII. Now although from the beginning of this Work it may sufficiently appear, that I have sought nothing less than Digressions from the just order and series of the Story; nor have at all endeavor'd, by extravagant Varieties, to garnish it, or with pleasant Sallies to divert the Reader and refresh my self; yet happening upon the mention of so great a King, and so renowned a Captain, I could not but be moved to disclose and set down those thoughts which have oft occur'd to my mind, and inquire a little, What event would probably have succeeded to the Roman Affairs, had they happened to have been engaged with this illustrious Conqueror. Those things that are of greatest consideration, and seem to have the Ascendant in all Wars, are, the number of Soldiers, and withal, their natural Courage; the sufficiency and dexterity of the Commanders: and lastly, Fortune, which as in all humane Affairs it bears a great stroke, so in War molt of all. He that shall narrowly weigh all these, either jointly or severally, may reasonably conclude, That as the Roman State bore up against other Kings and Nations, so it might have prov'd to him also Invincible. To begin with ballancing the Commanders one against another, I do not deny but Alexander was an excellent Leader, but that which enhaunc'd his Fame, was, That he was a sole and Sovereign Commander; a young Man, his Sails always full blown with prosperous Gales, and one who dyed before ever he had labored under any of the frowns of Fortune. For to omit other glorious Princes and renowned Captains, illustrious Examples of the uncertainty of Humane Grandeur: What was it that expos'd Cyrus (whom the Greeks so highly magnifie) or our great Pompey of late, to the turning Wheel of Fortune, but only this, That they lived long? On the other side, Let us take a review of the Roman Commanders, I mean not through all Ages, but such as being Consuls or Dictators about those times, Alexander must have engag'd with, if he had spread his Ensigns this way, there were M. Valerius Corvinus, M. Marcius Rutilus, C. Sulpicius, T. Manlius Torquatus, Q. Publilius Philo, L. Papirius Cursor, Q. Fabius Maximus, the two Decii, L. Volturnus, Manius Curius, besides besides abundance of prodigious Warriors that succeeded afterwards; if he had first set upon the Carthaginians [as he was resolv'd to have done, if he had not been prevented by Death] and so had arriv'd in Italy when well stricken in years. Each one of these was master of as good Parts and natural Abilities, as Alexander, and had the advantage of being train'd up in an incomparable Military Discipline, which having been delivered from hand to hand ever since the foundation of their City, was now by continual Precepts arriv'd to the perfection of an Art. For so after one and the same course did our Kings of old manage their Wars; so after them the Funii and Valerii, the banishers of Kings; so consequently the Fabii, the Quintii, the Cornelii; so Furius Camillus, whom in his Age two of those Romans with whom Alexander must have encountred, [Manlius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus] had seen when they were Youths. And whereas Alexander often hazarded his Person, and underwent all Military toils and dangers (which was one thing that not a little added to his Glory: ) Can it be thought, that if Manlius Torquatus, or Valerius Corvinus, had chanc'd to meet him at the head of his Troops, either of them would not have prov'd a Match for him, who were both of them famous for stout Soldiers before ever they had Commands? Would the Decii, that rush'd with devoted Bodies into the midst of the Enemy, have been afraid of him? Would Papirius Cursor, that mighty Man both for strength of Body and gallantry of Mind, have declined to cope with him? Was it likely that a single young Gentleman should out-wit or manage his Affairs with greater prudence than that Senate, which he only, whoever he was, had a right Idæa of, that said, It consisted altogether of Kings? Here, forsooth, was the danger, lest he should more advantageously choose his Ground to Encamp on, provide Victuals more carefully, prevent Surprizes and Stratagems more warily, know better when to venture a Battel, range his Army more Soldier-like, or strengthen it with Reserves and Recruits, better than any of those whom I have named knew how to do: Alas! in all these matters, he would have confess'd he had not to deal with a Darius, over whom, being attended with a vast Train of Women and Eunuchs, softned with wearing Gold and Purple, and clogg'd with the superfluous Furniture of his luxurious Fortune, he did indeed obtain an unbloody Victory, meeting rather with a Booty than an Enemy, and had only this to boast of, That he durst handsonly condemn such an abundance of Vanity. He would have had another kind of prospect in Italy than in India, through which he march'd at his ease with a drunken Army, Feasting and Revelling all the way: But here he must have met with the thick woody Forrest, and almost unpassable Streights of Apulia; the lofty Mountains of Lucania, and fresh Tokens of a late Defeat that happen'd to his own Name and Family, where his Uncle Alexander, King of the Epirotes, was hewn to pieces.

We speak hitherto of Alexander, not yet debauch'd with excess of good Fortune, where- XVIII. in never any Man had less command of himself than he: But if we consider him in his new Habit, and that new Nature, (if I may call it so) which he took up after he had a while been flush'd with Victories, we may avow he would have come into Italy, more like a Darius than an Alexander, and brought with him a bastard Army, altogether degenerated from the Macedonian courage and manners, into the debauches and effeminacies of the Persians. I am asham'd, in so great a Monarch as he was, to relate his proud humors of changing so oft his Garb; his excessive vain-glory, in expecting that Men should adore him by casting themselves prostrate at his feet, when-ever they approach'd him; a base servile flattery, which must have been uneasy to the Macedonians though they had been Conquer'd, much less to be endured now they were Conquerors; his barbarous Cruelties and Butcheries of his nearest Friends amongst his Cups and Banquets, and that ridiculous Vanity of forging a Divine Pedigree, and boasting himself the Son of Jupiter. Nay more, since his Drunkenness and Greediness of Wine, his savage Passions and cholerick Phrenesies did every day increase (I report nothing but what all Authors agree in) shall we not think that his Abilities, as a General, must quickly have decayed and been wonderfully impaired? But here perhaps was the danger (which some little trifling Greeks who would cry up the glory even of the Parthians, to depress the Roman name, are often wont to alledge) That the People of Rome would never have been able to endure the very Majesty and dread of Alexander's Name (whom indeed I am apt to think they then scarce ever heard of: ) And that though in Athens, a City weakned by the Macedonian Arms, and beholding so near hand the yet smoaking ruines of Thebes, there were Men that durst very smartly load him with Invectives (as appears by their Orations still extant) yet amongst so many Roman Hero's, not one would have been found of so much Courage, as to speak a word against him frankly and boldly. Let us conceit as magnificently as may be of this Prince, yet still it will be but the Grandeur of one Man, acquir'd in little more than twelve Years continued Felicity; and whereas some extol it highly upon this Account, That the Romans, though never worsted in any War, have yet been defeated in divers Battels, whereas Fortune was never wanting to Alexander in any one encounter, they do not consider that they are comparing the Exploits of one particular Man, and he too but a Youth, with the Achievements of a People that have now been involv'd in Wars eight hundred years; since therefore on this side there are numbred more Ages than Years on the other, is it any any wonder if there have happen'd a little more variety of Fortune in so long a space, than in a term of thirteen Years? You ought rather to compare Man with Man, Captain with Captain, and then the Fortune of one with the other. How many Roman Generals may I name, that never suffered a Repulse in their days? We can run over whole Pages in the Annals of our Magistrates, full of Consuls and Dictators, whose Success as well as Virtue, was such, as they never gave the Common-wealth so much as one days grief or discontentment. And that which makes them yet to be more admired than Alexander, or any other King in the World; some of them held their Office of Dictator not above ten or twenty days, and none the Consulship beyond a Year: Their Levies were often obstructed by the Tribunes of the Commons, so that they set forth too late; and sometimes for holding the Court for Elections, they were sent for home too soon: In the hurry of Affairs the Year was apt to be wheel'd about, and then they must leave all to new Instruments; now the rashness, another time the dishonesty of a Colleague, was either a great hindrance to their Success, or perhaps occasion'd a mischief. Many times they succeeded after the defeat of their Predecessors, or receiv'd a raw and undisciplin'd Army: From all which inconveniences Kings are not only free, but absolute Masters both of their Enterprizes, and the times and means they will take to accomplish them, leading all things by their Councils, and not following them. Had therefore this unconquered Alexander been engaged against these unconquered Captains, he would have hazarded all those past pleasures of Fortunes favor; nay, in this the danger would have been greater, that the Macedonians had but one Alexander, and he not only obnoxious to many Casualties, but voluntarily exposing himself to frequent Dangers. But the Romans had many that were Alexanders equals, both for Glory and the grandeur of their Achievements, each of whom, might according to his peculiar Fate, either live or dye, without at all endangering the Publick.

XIX.

It remains now to ballance the Forces on each side, and that either in respect of numbers, quality of the Soldiers, or the multitude of their Allies and Auxiliaries. There were numbered of Romans in the Surveys taken by the Censors of that Age, Two hundred and fifty thousand Polls; and therefore in all the revolts of the Latines, they were able to levy Ten Legions, and that too almost wholly in the City; and frequently in those times, four or five distinct Armies were kept on foot at once, which maintained Wars in Etruria, in Umbria, with the Gauls, (Confederates with the Enemy) in Samnum and in Lucania: Besides all these, Alexander would have found, the whole Latine Nation, with the Sabines, and Volscians, and Aequians, and all Campania, a great part of Umbria and Tuscany, with the Picentes, and Marsians, and Pelignians, and Vestins, and Apulians, all the adjacent Coast of the Greeks along the Tyrrhen Sea, from the Thurians to Naple and Cumes, and from thence the Samnites as far as Antium and Hofia; all these, I say, he should have found either fast Friends to the Romans, or Enemies so weakened as they could not hurt them. On the other side, he must have cross'd the Sea, having of old Macedonian Bands not above Thirty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, and those most of them Thessalians; for this was the total of his Force when he appeared most formidable. If he should have added to these, Persians, Indians, or others out of his new Conquests, they would but more encumber rather than assist him: Then the Romans had Supplies at hand to reinforce them presently from home upon any accident; whereas Alexander (as it happened afterwards to Annibal) Warring in a remote foreign Country, his Army would have mouldered away apace, and could not readily have Recruits. The Macedonians had for their Arms, a Shield and a Spear like a Pike; the Romans a large Target that skreen'd almost the whole Body, and a Javelin, a Weapon not a little more serviceable than the Spear, both to strike and push with, near hand, and also to be lanced at a distance. The Soldiers of each side were wont to stand firm, and keep their Ranks; the Macedonian Phalanx was immoveable and uniform; but the Roman Battalions more distinct, and consisting of several Divisions, was more ready to separate and close again upon any occasion. To speak now of labor and travel, What Soldier is comparable to the Roman? Who better able to hold out and endure all the fatigues of War? Alexander worsted in one Battel had been utterly undone: But what Power could have broken the Romans courage, whom neither the shameful disgrace at Caudium, nor the fatal defeat at Cannæ, could in the least daunt or dispirit? Undoubtedly Alexander, although his first attempts should have prov'd prosperous, would often here have missed his Persians and his Indians; he would have wish'd to have been dealing again with the soft and cowardly Nations of Asia, and confess, That before he only fought with Women, as King Alexander of Epirus is reported to have said, when he had here received his Deaths wound, reflecting upon those easie Occurrents of War, which this young Prince (his Nephew) met with in Asia, in respect of those difficulties he himself had to struggle with in Italy. And truly, when I consider that the Engagements at Sea between the Romans and Carthaginians in the first Punic War, took up no less than four and twenty years space; I am inclinable to conjecture, that the whole age of Alexander would not have been enough to have finish'd a War with either a one of those States. And since by ancient Leagues they were then at Amity and in Alliance with each other, 'tis probable an equal apprehension of danger might have united them against this common Enemy: And what less could he then expect but but to have been utterly overwhelm'd and crush'd by the joint Arms of two the most potent Republicks in the World? The Romans, though not indeed in the days of Alexander, or when the Macedonian Power was at height, have yet since try'd the courage of the Macedonians, under the Conduct of Antiochus, Philip, and Perseus, and came off not only without loss, but even without any danger or hazard. It may seem a proud word, but without arrogancy it is spoken, Let there be no Civil Wars amongst us; never can we be distressed by any Enemy, Horse or Foot; never in set Battel, never in plain equal ground, or places disadvantageous, out-done in Courage or Resolution. The Soldier I confess in heavy Armor, may be apprehensive of the Enemies Cavalry in a Champion Country, or be incommoded with Arrows shot from a distance, or embarrass'd in unpassable Woods, or Quarters where provisions cannot be brought to them; but still let there be a thousand Armies greater and stronger than that of Alexander and his Macedonians, so long as we hold together, and continue that love of Peace, and prudent care of civil Concord, wherein we live at this day, we are able, and ever shall be, to rout and put them all to flight.

M. Fossius Flaccinator, and L. Plautius Venno were now made Consuls: That year Ambassadors from several Cities of the Samnites, having on their knees begg'd Peace of the Senate, were refer'd to the People: Nor did their Prayers there altogether prevail; for as for a League, that was flatly deny'd; but at last having continued their Importunities for several days together, they obtain'd a Truce for two years. In Apulia the Theanenses and Canusines, wearied with the spoils made upon their Territories, submitted themselves to L. Plautius the Consul, and gave Hostages. The same year began Praefects or Provosts to be first establish'd at Capua, and certain Laws prescribed by L. Furius the Praetor, the Inhabitants having desired the same, as a remedy for their languishing State greatly embroil'd in civil Discords. At Rome, two new Tribes were added, the Ufentine and Falerine. The Affairs of Apulia were now declining, therefore the Theatines being of that Country, sent to the new Consuls C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Aemilius Barbula, to desire a Peace, offering to bring the whole Province of Apulia into the same: Upon which fair promise they obtain'd it, yet was not the League indifferent and upon equal terms, but on condition that they should be in subjection to the Romans. Apulia thus subdued (for Junius had also taken the strong Town of Acheront) they march'd against the Lucanians, where by the sudden arrival of Aemilius the Consul, the Town of Nerulum was taken by storm. It being noised abroad how well the Affairs of Capua were settled and established by the Roman Discipline, the Antiates came and complain'd, That they were without any certain Laws and Magistrates; whereupon certain Commissioners were appointed by the Senate to ordain Statutes for that Colony, so that now the Roman Laws, as well as their Arms, began to extend themselves and grow into great request.

When the former Consuls at the end of the year went out of their Office, they did not deliver up the Army to the Consuls by them Created, Sp. Nautius and M. Popilius, but to L. Aemilius the Dictator, who together with L. Fulvius his General of the Horse, laying siege to Saticula, gave occasion to the Samnites to rebel: Here the Romans were press'd with a double danger; on the one side, the Samnites with a mighty Army coming to relieve their Associates, encamp'd hard by them; and on the other, the Saticulans made a sudden sally, and with great Bravery set upon their Out-guards: And each of these Parties depending rather on the others Assistance than their own Strength, did for a while smartly engage the Romans; but though the Fight were sharp and doubtful, yet the Dictator was pretty safe on either side: For as he had posted himself in a place, where 'twas not easie to hem him in, so he had divided his Army back to back to make head against each of the Assailants, but directed the hotter Charge to be made against those that sallied out of the Town, and without much ado, beat them back again within their Walls: Then being at leisure, he turned the whole brunt of the Battel upon the Samnites, with whom there was a smarter tug; but the Victory, though long first, was neither doubtful nor variable. The Samnites beat into their Trenches, having in the night put out all their Fires, privately march'd off, and in despair of relieving Saticula, to pay the Enemy in their own Coyn, set down before Plisfia, a Town confederate with the Romans.

The year having finish'd its resolution, the War was carried on by the Dictator Q. Fabius; the new Consuls, like the former, remaining still at Rome. Fabius coming to receive the Army from Aemilius at Saticula, brought with him new Recruits; for the Samnites, not continuing long at Plisfia, had reinforced themselves with a multitude of new Soldiers from home, and being encamp'd as before, challenging the Romans to a Battel, endeavored to divert them from the Siege. But so much the more briskly did the Dictator assault the Enemies walls, judging the taking of the Town to be of the greatest importance to the War, and troubled himself no further with the Samnites, than to set out Guards to prevent their falling upon his Camp, which so far provoked them, that they were always skirmishing about the Out-works, and would never let them be at quiet: One day, being just ready to break into the Ports of the Camp, the General of the Horse, Q. Aemilius Carvetanus, without consulting the Dictator, advancing with all his Troops, beat off the Enemy, and though the Encounter was but short, yet it was very sharp, and not only great great numbers of common Soldiers, but both the Leaders slain: For first, the Samnites General taking it in disdain to see Emilius charge so fiercely, and that himself was forced to retreat; with much pains, and encouraging his Troops, rallied them to a second Charge; but as he was bravely leading up his Men, the Roman General of the Cavalry galloping up to him, with one push of his Spear tumbled him dead from his Horse; yet was not the rest of the Troop (as commonly it happens) at all daunted with the death of their Chief, but rather exasperated: Those that were next, charged Emilius stoutly as he rode through their Troops, but left to their Generals Brother the peculiar honor of revenging his death, who full of grief and rage, pluck'd the General of the Cavalry from his Horse, and slew him upon the Spot, whose Body falling amongst them, the Samnites were very like to have got possession of, had not the Roman Horse alighted, whom the Samnites imitated, and so a fierce encounter happened between them about the Corps of their Generals, wherein the Romans had indisputably the better on't; and having recovered the Body of Emilius, triumphantly carry'd it with a Joy intermix'd with Sorrow, unto their own Camp: The Samnites having lost their General, and made trial of their Fortune in this Skirmish, quitted all thoughts of relieving Saticula, and returned to the Siege of Plifia: And within few days after Saticula surrendered to the Romans, and the Samnites by storm made themselves Masters of Plifia.

XXIII. Now the Seat of War is chang'd, the Legions led from Samnium and Apulia, unto Sora, a Town that had revolted to the Samnites, and Massacred all the Roman Colony planted there. The Roman Army first hastned thither with speedy marches to revonge the Murder of their Citizens, and recover the Colony, but were alarm'd by their Scouts, that the Samnite Legions were in the rear of them, and at no great distance; whereupon they faced about to meet them, and near Lantula was fought a doubtful Battel, for neither the slaughter nor flight of either Party, but Night determined it, whilst each side was yet doubtful, whether they had the best or worst on't: Some Authors relate, that the Romans lost the day, and that Q. Emilius General of the Cavalry, here lost his life. In whose place C. Fabius being chosen, was dispatch'd from Rome with a fresh Army, and having by Messengers sent before, consulted the Dictator where he should halt, and when, and on which side he should Attack the Enemy, put himself in a close Ambuscade. The Dictator having for several days after the Fight, kept himself in his Trenches, rather like one besieg'd, than a Besieger of others, on a sudden set up the Signal of Battel, and thinking it a better whet to valiant minds to let them have no hope, but what sprung from their own Courage, concealed from his Soldiers the arrival of the new Master of Horse with Auxiliaries: And as if there had been no way for their Escape, but by breaking through the midst of their Enemies, thus bespeaks them: We are here, Gentlemen Soldiers! surrounded, and can expect no passage, unless we cut it out with our Swords; our present Quarters are safe enough by the Entrenchments and Fortifications, but will be rendred untenable by scarcity; for all things near us are eaten up, or else those that should supply us are revolted, and suppose the People were willing, the Avenues are block'd up; I will therefore no longer defer your good Fortune, by confining you to your Tents, into which you may at any time, if you should miss of a Victory, retreat and secure your selves as you did the other day. But 'tis fit our Fortifications should be defended by Arms, rather than our Arms sheltered by our Works; let them have a Camp well fortified to retire to, that have a mind to spin out a War; We, for our parts, will voluntarily deprive our selves of all hopes but that of Victory. Advance therefore your Ensigns upon the Enemy, and as soon as the Army is got beyond the Works, let those that are appointed set fire on the Camp; your Losses, brave Soldiers! shall be sufficiently recompens'd with the Plunder of all the Nations round about that have revolted. With this Speech of the Dictator's intimating no less than the last necessity, the Soldiers incens'd, warmly fell upon the Enemy, and the seeing their Tents flaming behind them (though it were only the foremost that were ordered to be burn'd) added not a little to their Fury, with a violent Charge they disordered the Enemies Front, and presently after, upon view of the Tents burning (which was the Signal agreed on) the General of the Horse comes up, and fell upon the Enemy in the Rear. The Samnites being thus environ'd, were glad every Man to shift for himself as well as he could: A vast multitude of them shuffling together for fear in an heap, and hindering one another in that confusion from making any Defence, were cut to pieces: The Camp of the Enemy seiz'd and ransack'd, loaded with whose Spoils the Romans returned to their Camp, and yet scarce so much pleased with their Victory, as overjoyed to find (beyond all expectation) their Tents safe and sound, save only a small part on the skirts of the Camp, a little disfigured and ruined by the Fire.

XXIV. From thence they returned to the Siege of Sora, where the new Consuls M. Paelius and C. Sulpicius, receiv'd the Army from the Dictator Fabius, many of the old Soldiers being discharged, and new Regiments list'd for supplies. But whilst they found the Town so fortified by its situation, as to be too strong for an attack by Storm, and that to starve it, would take up too much time; it happened a Renegado privately got out, and desiring the Roman Out-guards to carry him to the Consuls, promised to betray the place; and upon examination, finding his Overture probable, he prevailed with them to remove their their Camp (which was now just under the Walls) six miles off, by means whereof the Enemies Corps-du-guard by day, and their Watch by night, would be more negligent. And he himself the next night, having laid some Companies in Ambuscade in a Wood, carries with him Ten select Soldiers up the steep and almost unpassable Hill, by winding ways unto a Fort which had then no Soldiers in it, as thinking it secure enough since the Enemy was retreated. These men carry'd with them more Darts and Lances, than so small a number could well use: Besides, there were abundance of Stones both naturally lying there, and heap'd up by the Townsmen to render the place more defensible: When he had here planted his Men, he shewed them a narrow steep foot-path, leading out of the Town to that Tower: From getting up here (says he) Three men well arm'd, may keep off never so great a multitude: Now you are ten in number, and, which is more, Romans, and of Romans the stoutest and most valiant. Both the place will make for your advantage, and the time; for the night renders all things that are uncertain and not well known, much greater and more terrible to those that are already afraid; let me alone to fill the Town with dread and amazement; Do you but diligently keep possession of the Fort. Then down he runs with the greatest noise and tumult he could make, crying out, Arm! Arm! Arm! Where's your Faith, fellow Citizens? Where's your Courage? The Fort is taken by the Enemy, hasten to defend your selves, or presently all your Throats will be cut. This news, thumping at the chief Persons doors, he told, and to all he met, running out into the Streets upon the hurry he made. The alarm and fear was presently spread throughout the City; the trembling Magistrates send Scouts to the Fort, who bringing back word that the same was possess'd by Armed men, whom they multiply'd to a vast number; they gave over all hopes of recovering it, but every one shifts for himself, the Gates by people scarce half Armed, and not quite awake, are broke open to make their escape: at one of which, the Roman Ambuscade rushes in with a mighty shout, and kill all they meet with. Thus was Sora taken, and the Consuls arriving in the Morning, those that were left alive yielded up themselves at discretion; of whom 225, that were by general consent declared Guilty of Contriving and promoting both the Revolt of the Town, and the murder of the Colony, were carry'd in Chains to Rome; therest of the Inhabitants were suffered to continue there under a Garison: All those sent to Rome, were first whip'd in the Market-place, and then had their Heads cut off, to the great joy of the People, whose especial Interest it was, to have those secured who were sent out into remote Colonies.

The Consuls removing from Sora, carry'd the War into the Territories of the Ausonians; XXV. for upon the advance of the Samnites and the Battel at Lantula, Conspiracies were set on foot throughout all Campania; nor was Capua guiltless: nay, in Rome it felt ill Blood was breeding, and a wary eye kept upon some persons of the first Quality; but the whole Nation of the Ausonians were easily reduced, their chief Towns being betrayed, as Sora was, by some of their own, that is to say, The Cities of Ausona, Minturnæ, and Vesuvia, from whence there came twelve young Noblemen to the Consuls, acquainting them, How those places had long wish'd for the Samnites coming, and that as soon as they heard of the Battel at Lantula, they reckoned the Romans beaten, and had assisted the Samnites both with Men and Arms; but since the Samnites were routed, they made shew of living in Peace, which they would continue no longer than they had an opportunity to break it: That indeed they had not shut their Gates upon the Romans, for fear of bringing a War upon their own Heads, but that they were resolv'd to shut them if any Army should approach towards them: And that in this wavering posture they might easily be surprized. Upon this Advice the Army march'd nearer, and at one and the same time particular parties were dispatch'd towards all the three Cities, some in Armor to lye in Ambuscade near the Walls, others with Swords hid under their Cloaths, who at break of day, as soon as the Gates were open, went into the City, and at once fell upon the Watch, and gave the signal to the rest to come up, and so seizing the Ports, made themselves masters of all the three Towns at one and the same hour: But by reason of the Consuls being absent, there was no moderation observ'd in the Slaughter, so that almost the whole Ausonian Nation, upon but a bare suspicion of a design to Revolt, was cut to pieces and destroyed, as fiercely as if they had been in the most open and desperate Rebellion.

The same Year Luceria fell into the Samnites hands, the Roman Garison being betray'd, XXVI. but the Traitors went not long without their reward; for the Roman Army was near, and the City lying in a Plain, was recovered by them upon the very first assault. The Lucerines and Samnites were every Mothers child slain, and so enraged the Senate was, that when they came to debate touching sending a new Colony thither, many were for having the City utterly destroy'd and demolish'd: For besides the hatred they had against a place that had twice Revolted, they could not but abhor sending of Citizens so far off, to live as in Banishment amongst those cruel and barbarous Nations. However in the end it was concluded, That a Colony should be sent, and 2500 persons were dispatch'd accordingly. That Year, whilst the Romans met with nothing but Treachery and Falshood on all sides, discovery was made of a Conspiracy at Capua, carried on by some of the chief of that City: The Senate being consulted, considered it as a thing by no means to be neglected, and not only ordered, That the persons suspected should be put to the Question, or tortured to find out the truth, but also that a Dictator should be created to take the Examinations; C. Mænius was the Man pitch'd upon for that Office, who appointed M. Fostius his General of the Horse. Great was the terror of that Magistracy, and therefore whether it were for dread thereof, or out of consciousness of their own guilt; the principal Conspirators, viz. The Calavii, and Ovius, and Novius, before they were cited to appear before the Dictator, made away themselves, and by their Death prevented his Judgment. By which means, all occasion for executing his Commission of Inquiry, at Capua being removed, the same was by Interpretation transferred to Rome, saying, That he had good warrant to proceed by way of Inquisition against all such, as not only at Capua, but any where else, had held secret Meetings, or plotted against the State; and that all Conventicles, and indirect Courses for obtaining of Honors and Offices, were directly against the Commonwealth. So that the Commission enlarged both in respect of Persons and Crimes, the Dictator not refusing to take cognizance of any Offence whatsoever. Divers of the Nobility being accused, appealed to the Tribunes, but they declined to interpose in their favor, and so the Presentment was taken against them. Whereupon the Nobles, not only those that were particularly charged, but all of them in general, Declared, That it was not the true ancient Nobility indeed that was concerned in these Crimes, since if it were not for indirect courses, they would have easie and open access unto Places of Dignity and Preferment; but they were a company of Upstarts, and Gentlemen of the first Head who used these sinister practices, to get themselves into Offices, wherein the Dictator and Master of the Horse were as guilty as any, and so they should be made to know as soon as they were out of their Places. This made Mænius bestir himself, who regarding his Reputation more than his High Dignity, went up into the common Assembly before all the People, and spake as follows: "Although the knowledge which you all, Worthy Citizens of Rome! have had of the whole course of my Life past, as well as the Honor now lately conferr'd upon me, may be a sufficient evidence of my Innocence. For 'twas not here, as often it has happened when the Affairs of the State so required, That he that was the best Soldier, or the greatest Captain, but such an one as has ever been most free from ambitious Intrigues and unlawful Cabals, was the man most fit to be chosen Dictator for managing these Inquisitions; yet since some of the Nobility, (for what Reasons, it will be more proper for you to guess, than for me being a Magistrate to speak without certain proof) have with all their might and main endeavored first to set aside the Inquisitions altogether, and when they were not able to do that, chose, though they were Patricians, to fly for shelter to their old Adversaries the Commons, and implore the protection of the Tribunes, rather than to justify themselves and abide a legal Trial: And at last, having there too met with a repulse, thinking all means safer than to stand upon their Innocency, they have fallen upon us with unjust Calumnies, and not blush'd, being private Men, to arraign your Dictator. Therefore, that God and the World may see, That as they in vain endeavor to avoid the giving an account of their own undue Practices, so I am frankly ready to meet their Charge, and expose myself to the strictest scrutiny of my Enemies, I do here resign my Dictatorship, and do request you, My Lords, the Consuls! if the Senate shall commit this Affair to your management, That you would begin with me first, and this Gentleman M. Fostius, that it may appear, how we, through our own Innocency alone, and not by the privilege of our Offices, are protected and safe from these Slanders and pretended Crimes. Then forthwith he gave over his Dictatorship, and immediately after Fostius did the same with his Generalship of the Horse. And these two were the first that were proceeded against before the Consuls (for to them the executing of the aforesaid Commission was awarded by the Senate) but notwithstanding all the Prosecution and Depositions of the Nobility, they came off with Honor. Likewise Publius Philo, though he had so often pass'd through the highest Offices, and perform'd so many gallant Services both at home and abroad, being much envied by the Nobility, was forced to take his Tryal, and acquitted. But this Inquisition into the actions of Persons of Quality, was quickly over, descending first to meaner People; and at last, by the same Cabals and Factions which it intended to remedy and punish, it was wholly overthrown.

XXVII.

The report of these Jars at home, and especially the hopes of the revolt of Campania, as was design'd, recall'd the Samnites, who before seem'd altogether intent upon Apulia, back to Caudium, that so being near at hand, if any disturbances should administer opportunity, they might take Capua from the Romans. The Consuls march'd thither with a formidable Army, and lingred a while about the Passes and Streights, being not able either way with safety to come at the Enemy, who at last fetching a compass through the open ways, came down into the Plains of Campania, and there first both sides came to have a fight of each others Camp; after which, they exercised each other with petty Skirmishes, especially between the Horse: Nor had the Romans any cause to complain of the success of those Encounters, nor of the delay and spinning out of the War; but the Samnites Generals found, that their Forces were diminish'd every day, and much weakened by this tedious work, and therefore resolve upon a Battel, placing their Horse in the two Wings, but with express charge charge to have a strict eye towards the Camp to prevent any mischief there, and not so much to engage themselves in the Battel, which would be safe enough with the Infantry. Sulpitius the Consul led on the Right Wing, and Pætelius the Left. The Right Wing was ranged more wide and open, and with thinner Ranks and Files, because the Samnites had done the like on that side, with a design either to surround the Enemy, or prevent being enclosed themselves. The Left, besides that it was in closer Order, happened to be reinforced by the sudden policy of Pætelius, causing the subsidiary Legions which were planted in the Rear for Reserves, to march up to the Front, and so with all his Forces at once charging the Enemy, made them retreat: The Samnites Cavalry seeing their Foot worsted, prepared to relieve them; but as they rode cross between the two Armies, the Roman Horse gallop'd up to flank them, and put both Horse and Foot into Confusion, so far, that all that part of the Enemies Army was routed. On that Wing there was now not only Pætelius, but Sulpitius too, to encourage the Soldiers; for he had strayed from his own Party before they joyn'd Battel, upon the extraordinary shout given by the Left Wing at their first Charge, and seeing on that part undoubted Victory, hasten'd back to his own Charge, accompanied with Twelve hundred Men, but found things there in a quite contrary posture; the Romans retreating, and the Victorious Enemy marching full upon them with Ensigns displaid. However, the lucky coming in of the Consul, presently altered the Scene; for as his Men were encouraged at the sight of him, so the party he brought with him, being very stout Men, yielded them a more effectual assistance than might be expected from so small a number. This, and the news of the other Wings success, renewed the Fight, and thenceforwards the Romans bore all before them, and the Samnites giving over all defence, were every where either cut to pieces, or taken Prisoners, except those who escap'd to Maleventum, a Town that has since changed its name, and is now call'd Beneventum. 'Tis Recorded, That Thirty thousand Samnites were that Day killed or taken.

After this glorious Victory, the Consuls led their Legions to besiege Bovianum, and took up their Winter-Quarters before the Town, till C. Pætelius made Dictator by the new Consuls, L. Papirius Cursus the fifth time, and C. Junius Bubulcus the second, came down with M. Fostius General of the Horse, and received the charge of the Army: He being advertiz'd, that the Samnites had taken the Fort at Fregellæ, left Bovianum, march'd thither, but the Samnites fled away by night, so that he recovered the place without a blow struck; and having placed there a strong Garrison, return'd into Campania, with a particular design to take the City of Nola by force of Arms, within whose Walls all the Peasants thereabouts, and a vast multitude of Samnites, sheltered themselves. The Dictator having taken a view of the place, that he might have the more open access to the Walls, set all the Houses on Fire that were in the Suburbs along the Counterscarp (and there they stood thick and were well inhabited) and not long after that Town was taken, whether by Pætelius the Dictator, or C. Junius the Consul, I know not, for it is reported of the one as well as the other: Those that ascribe the Honor on't to the Consul, add, That he also took Atina and Calatia: And that Pætelius was created Dictator only for the Ceremony of driving the Nail or Spike, for appeasing the Wrath of the Gods by reason the Plague was broke out. That Year Colonies were sent to Suessa and Pontia; the former a Town of the Auruncans; the latter, an Island of the Volsicians, situate within sight of their own shoar. A Decree also pass'd the Senate, for sending other Colonies to Interamna and Cassinum; but the same was not done till the time of the next Consuls, M. Valerius and P. Decius, who created Triumvirs to manage that Affair, and sent Four thousand to people those places.

The Samnite War was now pretty well dispatch'd, but before the Senate was quite free from the care thereof, reports were spread of a War with the Tuscans: Nor was there at that time any Nation (setting the Gauls aside) whose Arms were more terrible, as well because their Country lay so near, as because 'twas so exceeding populous. Therefore whilst one of the Consuls was concluding the War in Samnium, the other who staid behind sick at Rome, created C. Junius Bubulcus Dictator: Who according to the urgency of the occasion, caused all the younger sort to take the Military Oath, and with the greatest diligence provides Arms and all other Necessaries; yet was not with all these Preparations putt up to be the Aggressor, but well content, no doubt, to be quiet, if the Tuscans of their own accord should not begin the War. The Tuscans took the very same Measures, so that neither of them stir'd out of their own Bounds. This Year was the notable Censorship of Appius Claudius, and C. Plautius: But the name of Appius became more memorable of the two to Posterity, for the Cawsey he made, and the Channel of Fresh-water which he brought to the City; which Works he all alone accomplish'd: For his Colleague, ashamed of the infamous and envied Choice that he had made of certain base-born Senators, voluntarily renounced his Office. But Appius, according to the high Spirit and obstinacy that was all along natural to his Family, continued the Censorship. This Appius caused the Porcii (to whose Family it had time out of mind, belong'd to exercise the Priestly Function at the great Altar of Hercules) to teach certain publick Servants the Solemn Rites of that Sacred Ministry, that they might make use of their Assistants as Delegates therein; whereupon a wonderful thing is reported to have ensued, and which may be a warning to all not to innovate Religion, or alter the State of Sacred Rites: viz. That though there were indeed Twelve Families of these Potitii at that time in being, and in them about Thirty Persons of Mans estate, yet before the year came about, they were every one dead; and not only the name of the Potitii extinct, but that Appius the Censor, by the memorable Judgment of the revenging Gods, was in few Years after struck Blind.

The next Years Consuls, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Emilius Barbula the second; as soon as they came into their Office, put up a Complaint to the People, That the order of the Senate was disturb'd and violated by an irregular Election, and divers worthy Members omitted, declaring, That for their parts they would not observe or regard such a Choice, which was made without any respect to merit, but carry'd wholly at the Lust of the Censor, and to gratify those of his Faction: And therefore they presently call'd over the Senate, in the same order as the former Censors had left it. Two Commands, both Military, were this Year first of all conferr'd and dispos'd of by the Commons: One, That sixteen Colonels for the four Legions should thenceforward be Created by the People, which before were almost altogether the favors of the Dictators and Consuls bestow'd as they thought fit, the Peoples suffrages being very rarely expected therein. The other was a Law prefer'd by L. Attilius and C. Martius, Tribunes of the Commons: That the People should have the power of Creating two Naval Commissioners, whose peculiar Office it should be to take care of the Rigging, Equipping and Repairing the Fleet; which Act of the Commons was especially promoted by M. Decius one of their Tribunes. One accident of this Year I should pass over as trivial, and scarce worth relating, did it not seem to appertain to Religion. The Musicians that plaid upon the Flutes and Haut-boies, being forbid by the last Censors to have their good Cheer and Banquets any more in Jupiters Temple, according to their old Custom and Tradition, took such snuff, that they all troop'd away at once to Tybur, so that there was not one of them left in Rome to sing and pipe before the Pomp of Sacrifices on the Holy-days; And the Senate were so Religious as to take notice thereof, and sent Messengers to Tybur to use means that these Blades might be restored. The Tyburines answered very courteously, That they would by no means detain them, and sending for them into the Court, advise them to go home; but the Fellows were so stout, that no Entreaties could prevail with them: whereupon they bethought them of a stratagem very suitable to the tempers of such people. Upon an Holy-day, under colour of Feasting and diverting themselves, one invites one of these Fiddlers, and another sends for another, and plyed them so with Wine (which Men of their profession are generally greedy of) that they drank till they began to wink, and wink'd so long till they fell fast asleep, and then the Tyburines gently put them to bed in Carts, and so drove them away to Rome: Nor did they perceive any thing, till next Morning they found themselves in the midst of the Forum, where the People came flocking about them, and prevailed with them to stay, giving them leave for three days space every Year to go in Masquerade through the City, singing and playing, after that licentious manner now us'd; and their old privilege, that such as plaid at the Sacrifices might eat in the Temple, was restored. This ridiculous diversion happen'd amidst the solicitous preparations for two mighty Wars.

XXXI.

The Consuls divided the Provinces; to Junius the Samnites; to Emilius happen'd that conduct of the new War in Etruria. The Samnites had besieged Cluvia a Roman Garrison, and not being able to storm it, lay before it so long, till Famine inforc'd a surrender, and then they most barbarously whip'd to death all the Soldiers; Junius enrag'd at that cruelty, minded nothing so much as the recovery of that place, which he regain'd the very same day that he came before it, and put all that were of Age to the Sword. In this train of Victory he proceeded against Bovianum, the head City of the Pentrian Samnites, a place exceeding rich, and well furnish'd both with Men and Arms: The Soldiers sharp set for the Pillage, soon made themselves Masters of it, but having here no such particular cause of Revenge, were less severe to the People. The Booty gain'd here was almost as much as in all Samnium besides, and was all freely given to the Soldiers. Nor could any pitch'd Field, any City or Fort afterwards, put the least stop to the Victorious Roman Army: All that the Princes of Samnium could do, was to lie at catch for some advantage by Ambuscades, to circumvent or cut off Parties when they happened to venture out too negligently as they were foraging, certain Renegado Peasants and Prisoners, some taken by chance, and some on purpose offering themselves to be seized; upon their examinations before the Consuls, agreeing all in a tale (which also was a truth) That there was a power of Sheep and other Cattel driven together, and kept in a By-Forrest out of the way, not very far off: He wanting Provisions, resolv'd to lead thither those Legions that were lightest-arm'd to get this Booty. The Samnites to receive them, had privately drawn in thither a mighty Army, and laid Ambuscades all along the narrow Passes, so that when they saw the Romans were got in a pretty way, on a sudden they start up round about with mighty shouts and tumults, and began to Charge them very unexpectedly: The surprize at first put the Romans into some consternation, whilst they were getting their Arms in order, and laying their their Snap-sacks and Baggage together on an heap: But after every Man had disburthen'd himself, and got on his Armor, they rallied on all sides every one to his Colours; and being all old train'd and excellently well disciplin'd Soldiers, put themselves of their own accord into Battalia, without troubling their General; who perceiving himself like to be very dangerously Engaged, alighted from his Horse, and solemnly protested before Jupiter and Mars, and other Gods whom he call'd to witness, That he came not into that Place to get glory to himself by any Enterprize, but merely to seek for Booty and Provisions for his Army; and that as no other fault could be imputed to him, but too great a desire to enrich his Soldiers with the spoils of the Enemy; so nothing but his Soldiers courage could now secure him from the scandal of ill Conduct; but if they would all as one Man fall gallantly on, the work could not be difficult, since the Enemy was already routed in the Field, beat out of their Camp, and were now trying their last hopes by little tricks and stratagems, and rely'd upon the advantage of the Place, more than on their Arms: But what place is there (quoth he) now inaccessible to the Roman Courage? and withal, put them in mind of the Castle of Fregellæ, of Sora, and divers other places difficultly situate, which they had easily made themselves Masters of. The Soldiers animated by these Encouragements, undervaluing all difficulties, advanc'd apace up towards the Enemy that were, as 'twere, over their Heads; 'twas an hard task to get up the ridge of the Hill; but when once that was gain'd, and that the foremost Ensigns found they were upon level Ground, the terror was then all turn'd upon the Assailants, who being scattered, and flinging away their Arms, fled as fast as they could to those lurking holes where before they had hid themselves: But the uncase access of those places which they had fraudulently sought out to entrap the Enemy, now embarrass'd themselves, for very few could find the way out; Twenty thousand were slain, and the Victorious Romans then freely seiz'd that Booty of Cattel which was first presented them only as a Bait by the Enemy.

During these Occurrences in Samnium, all Etruria, except the Arctines, were up in Arms, XXXII. beginning a mighty War with the Siege of Sutrium, a City in Alliance with the Romans and the Barriers, as it were of all Tuscany. Thither the other Consul Emilius hastned with his Army, and being come before the Town, was courteously furnish'd with Provisions by the Inhabitants: For the Tuscans were drawn off to one side, and spent a whole day in Consultation, Whether they should hasten or protract the War? But it seems the Officers were more for Expedition, than safer Councils; and therefore next Morning, as soon as the Sun was up, hung up the signal of Battel, and drew compleatly Arm'd into the Field; of which the Consul having Intelligence, he presently gives out the Word, and orders all his Army to take their Dinners, and as soon as they had refresh'd themselves, to betake them to their Arms; which being done accordingly, he drew them up in Battalia not far from the Enemy: They stood a good while on both sides, wistly looking at each other, and expecting which should first fall on, so that 'twas past Noon before one Blow was struck; but then, that they might not meet to no purpose, the Tuscans began to set up a Shout, to sound a Charge, and advance forwards; nor were the Romans less ready to meet them. Thus they Charg'd each other with great animosity and fury, the Enemy was superior in number, but the Roman in courage; the Battel was dubious, abundance cut off on both sides, and especially the stoutest and bravest Men: Nor was there any advantage gain'd, till the Romans fresh reserves were brought up to the Front to succeed in the place of their slaughtered or wearied Fellows. But then the Tuscans having none to relieve them, began to drop apace round about their Standards: Never in any Fight had there been less of running away, or more Bloodshed, if the Night had not sheltered the Tuscans when they seem'd resolute to dye on the Spot, so that the Victors gave over before the Vanquish'd; for after Sun-set a Retreat was sound'd, and both Sides retired to their Camps: Nor was there any further Action worth notice that Year at Sutrium, for almost the whole Main-body of the Enemy was slain in that one Battel; and the Subsidiary Legions that were left, were scarce strong enough to secure their Camp: And also the Romans were so maul'd, That more of them dyed after the Fight of their Wounds, than were slain outright in the Field.

Q. Fabius, the Consul of the ensuing Year, undertook the War at Sutrium, whose Col-XXXIII. league was C. Marcus Rutilus. Both Fabius brought a supply of fresh Forces from Rome, and the Tuscans too were reinforc'd with a new Army raised in their Country. No brangles for many Years had happen'd between the Patrician Magistrates and the Tribunes of the Commons, but now occasion of contention is administered by that Family which seems to have been in those Times fatal, and born to do mischief both to the Tribunes and the Commons. Appius Claudius the Censor, though the eighteen Months (which by the Emilian Law was the full term of holding that Office) were expired; and although his Colleague C. Plautius had resign'd his Place, could by no means be prevail'd with, to give over that Magistracy and yield to a new Election. Whereupon P. Sempronius one of the Tribunes of the Commons, undertook to prosecute him for not quitting the Censorship according to Law; an Action no less popular than just and acceptable, as well to the Graver Patriots as to the Mobile. This Gentleman making a Speech to the People in their Assembly, after he had often cited the Emilian Law, and highly applauded its Author

Mamercus

Mamercus Æmilius the Dictator, who finding the Censorship, which then was an Office of five Years, apt to render those that held it by reason of their long continuance in Power, too Lordly and assuming, reduced and limited the same to a Year and an half; having, I say, much commended this wholesome Statute, he then turns to Appius Claudius: Come on! says he, O Appius Claudius! Answer and tell us, What would you have done, if you had been Censor in the room of C. Furius and M. Geganius the Censors when that Law was made? Appius answered, That this Question of the Tribunes was impertinent; for although the Æmilian Law might oblige those Censors in whose time it was made, yet since the People after that Law did create Censors, and in their Choice using the solemn Words, Optimo Jure, or with the Highest Right, did thereby Invest them with as full Power as any former Censors had: And since that is good Law, which the People have last done and ordained, it follows, That neither I, nor any others created Censors after that Law, could or ought to be bound thereby.

XXXIV. Whilst Appius thus cavill'd upon a Quirk of Law, and no Man took his part or assented to his odd Interpretation, Sempronius thus proceeded: "Behold, Worthy Citizens! the right Progeny of that Appius, who having got to be Decemvir for one Year, Elected himself again the next, and the third Year, though neither chosen by himself nor any body else, yet continued the place, and all the Ensigns of Authority belonging to it; nor would he part with it, till such his ill-got, ill-manag'd, and ill-continued Government broke his own neck and utterly ruin'd him. This, Gentlemen, is the same Family, by whose violence and oppressions, you were forc'd like People banish'd to abandon your native City, and retire to the Holy Mount; the very same, against whose Injuries you were glad to shelter your selves under the help and protection of Tribunes; the very same who put you upon the necessity of securing your selves with two Armies on the Aventine Hill; the same Lineage that always withstood the Statutes devised against excessive Usury, always oppos'd the good Laws for dividing waste and conquered Lands amongst the People; that interrupted so long all Inter-marriages between the Nobles and the Commoners, and so long excluded the Commons from bearing any Dignities of the Chair, and Offices of State; in fine, this is that House whose Name is more pernicious to your Liberties, than that of the Tarquins. And is it so at last, O Appius Claudius! That in all these hundred Years space since Mamercus Æmilius the Dictator, wherein there have been so many most noble and valiant Gentlemen enjoying the Office of Censors, no one of them ever read the twelve Tables? No one of them was so skilful as to know that to be Law which the People last establishes? Yes verily, they all knew it very well, and therefore knew also that it was their duty to obey the Æmilian Law, rather than the old Ordinances whereby the Censors Office was erected, because this was later than they; and that where-ever there are two contrary Laws, the new one abrogates the old. Is it this you say, O Appius! that the People are not bound by the Law Æmilia? or rather that they are obliged, but your good self alone exempt from all Law? Sure I am, the Æmilian Law was able to bridle those haughty and violent Censors, C. Furius and M. Geganius, who were themselves sufficient instances how prejudicial that Magistracy, if not duly regulated, might prove to the Commonwealth, when for madness that their term was shortned, they disfranchiz'd the said Æmilius, the bravest Man of that Age both for War and Peace, and made him incapable of giving his Vote at any Election, or receiving any pay from the State. The same Law was obeyed by all the succeeding Censors for an hundred years, and is now submitted unto by your Colleague C. Plautius, who was created with the same solemn Ceremonies, and Words altogether as ample as your self. Did not the People (I pray) when they Created him, use the common formal Words, That he should be Censor, Optimo Jure, with as good a Right, and with as full and large Authority, as any Censor could or ought to be? Are not the same Words used of course in divers other Offices? Are you the only privileged Person to whom this singular pre-eminence belongs? When you Create the King-Sacrificer, shall he, having got the Title of a King, and with those very extensive Words, take upon him in earnest to be King of Rome, and challenge all the Prerogatives of her antient ejected Monarchs? At this rate, who would be content with a Dictatorship of six Months, or an Inter-regency of five days and no more? Whom shall we venture to trust with the Dictatorship for driving the Spike, or regulating the Races? What Sots and Drones not understanding their own Rites, would you represent all those gallant Men, who having in less then twenty days finish'd most glorious Wars, have presently withdrawn and quitted the Dictature? Or who, upon some defect in the Ceremonies of their Creator (though the Words Optimo Jure were not forgot) have voluntarily resign'd it? What need I recite old presidents? of late, even within these ten Years, C. Maenius the Dictator, exercising his Commission of Enquiry more severely than stood with the safety of some Grandees, and thereupon being himself charged by his Enemies with the same Crimes he was taxing in them, that he might in a private capacity take a Trial, and purge himself, he frankly renounced his Office. I as little desire as expect this modesty in you, That you may not seem to degenerate from your most haughty and imperious Race, part not with your place one day, one hour, before you needs must; but

but see withal you exceed not the time limited by Law; at least, one would think it might be enough to add a day, or a month or so, to your Censorship: A month! What tell you me of a month (crys he) I will hold my Censorship three Years and six months longer than I ought in spite of the Æmilian Law; nay, and I will hold and exercise it single all alone by my self too: Bravely spoken! and much as if he were already settled in the Throne of Royalty, and had quite subdued our Commonwealth and all its Laws. But perhaps you will substitute to your self a Colleague in the room of the other? How can that be, when even such substitution or new choice to supply the Place is not lawful, even where one of the Censors is taken off by Death; but the Survivors Office immediately ceaseth, and two new ones must be Elected. You think it not enough, it seems, such a Religious Censor you are, that you have prophaned that most ancient Sacred Solemnity, instituted by no less than that God to whom it is celebrated, by conferring the Function of his most Noble Chaplains, upon Slaves and Varlets; not enough that along of you and your Censorship, a Family more antient than the Foundations of this City, and reverend for their Hospitality to the Immortal Gods, is wholly cut off and extinct, unless you also involve the whole State in an Impiety, the consequences whereof I tremble to Prefigure. Nor are our Apprehensions groundless, 'tis well known this City of Rome was taken by the Gauls in that very Lustrum [or term of five Years] wherein the Censor L. Papirius Cursor, that he might not go out of his Place upon the decease of his Partner C. Julius, did substitute or cause M. Cornelius Maluginensis to be chosen his Colleague to serve out the rest of the time: And yet how much more modest was his Ambition, O Appius! than yours? He neither held the Censorship alone, nor beyond the term that was lawful; yet he found none so bold to imitate him in that Act, but all Censors ever since, upon the Death of their Colleague, have relinquish'd their Place. But neither the Expiration of your term, nor your Partners going out, nor Law, nor shame, is able to restrain your Insolence; as if you thought that Vertue consists in Impudence, and an haughty contempt both of Gods and Men. For my own part, I have that deference and respect to the Majesty of the Place you have born, that I would not willingly treat you with any rough Language, much less lay violent hands upon your Person: But as your Pride and Obstinacy have extorted from me these just Reprimands, so I must tell you, that unless you obey the Æmilian Law, I will command you to be taken into Custody: For since the Wisdom of our Ancestors has been so cautious as to provide, That in the Election of Censors, if both have not their full Complement of Votes, he that had them cannot be returned, but all is void, and they must proceed to a new Scrutiny; it shall never be said, That I will suffer you to exercise alone by your self the Censorship, who could not alone have been so much as Elected to it. After these and the like Remonstrances, he ordered the Censor to be seized and clap'd up, and six of his Fellow-Tribunes join'd with him and approv'd his proceedings: But three others, upon application made to them by Appius, protect'd him, and so with the highest envy and discontent of all States and Degrees, he continued and held the Dictatorship alone without any Colleague.

Whilst this bustle was at Rome, Sutrium was still beleaguered by the *Tuscan*s, who as the XXXV. Consul was leading some Forces about the foot of the Hills to relieve the Town, and break, if he could, through the Enemies Works, met with him with a compleat Army, but discovering their vast multitudes in the Plain, he thought it best to supply the smallness of his number, as much as he could, with the advantages of the Ground, and therefore wheel'd up towards the tops of the Hills (which were rough craggy places full of Stones) and then drew up and fac'd the Enemy; who regarding nothing so much as their numbers, hastned to the Battel with such greediness, that they cast away their Lances, that they might sooner come to handy-blows, and advanc'd with only their Swords in their hands: The Romans on the contrary, pelted them lustily with Darts and Stones (which the ground plentifully furnish'd them with) these lighting upon their Shields and Head-pieces, incommoded those untowardly whom they did not wound: And as the Enemy could not come up to close with them, so neither had they Darts or Javelins to lance at them from a distance, so that whilst they stood expos'd to whole showers of Weapons and Stones, without any thing that could sufficiently cover or defend them, and some began to flinch, and their whole Army was in a waving uncertain posture, the Roman Hastati and Principes, with a fresh shout, rush'd down upon them with their Swords in their hands, whose impetuous Shock the *Tuscan*s being not able to endure, turn'd their Ensigns, and fled in disorder towards their Camp, but were there intercepted by the Roman Horse, who having fetch'd a compass through the Plains, were got before them; then not being able to reach their Camp, they turn'd towards the Mountains; and having for the most part flung away their Arms, and abundance of them wounded, they at last took shelter in the great Wood or Forrest Ciminia: The Romans having slain many thousands of the *Tuscan*s, and taken Eight and thirty Colours, made themselves Masters also of their Camp, and therein of a mighty Booty. Then a Council of War was held about pursuing the Enemy.

XXXVI. The Ciminian Wood was in those days more impassable and dreaded, than the German Thickets in later times; for never till that day had it been frequented or travell'd through so much as by Merchants; nor had any one scarce, but the General himself, the courage to advise a march into it; the rest had not yet forgot the Caudian Disaster. Whereupon, amongst the Officers present, the Consuls Brother (some call him M. Fabius Cæso; others, C. Claudius, and say, he was the Consuls Brother only by the Mothers side) offered himself to go out as a Scout or Spy, and in short time to bring them a full account of all things necessary to be known. He had in his Youth been bred up with some Friends to his Family, at Cære, where he was taught the Tuscan Learning, and spoke readily their Language: Some Authors I have met with, that tell us, The Roman Children were wont to be instructed in the Tuscan Letters in those days, as they are now in the Greek. But 'tis more probable that this Gentleman had some special Accomplishment, or else he would not in so bold a manner have hazarded himself amongst the Enemy. His only Companion is said to have been a Servant that had been bred up with him, and so not ignorant of the Language. In their Journey they made it their main business, to get in a summary superficial way, the nature of the Province they were going into, and the names of the chief Persons therein, that when they fell into Discourse, they might not be taken tardy in any gross Ignorance or mistake. They went in Shepherds habit, arm'd with the usual Weapons of Country Boors, each of them with a Faulchion, and two Javelins; yet was it not their Tongue, their Garb, or their Arms, that kept them from being known, so much as that presumption the Enemy had, That no Stranger would be so mad as to venture into the Ciminian Woods. Well! forwards they went (by report) as far as to the Cæmertes in Umbria, where the Roman adventured to discover who they were; and being admitted into the Senate, treated with them, as from the Consul, about an Alliance: They were civilly entertain'd, and ordered to acquaint him, That if he would march that way, they would furnish his Army with a Months Provision; and also, That their Youth should be ready to be lifted in their Service. These tidings being brought back to the Consul, he sent away the Baggage before at the beginning of the Night, and after them the Infantry: Himself staying behind with the Horse, as soon as it was Day, began to skirmish with the Enemies Guards, that were planted without the Woods; and having amused them as long as he thought fit, returns to his Camp, and marching out at another Port before Night, overtook his Army; and the day following, by break of Day, was got upon the top of the Hill Ciminus: From whence having a full prospect of the rich Plains of Etruria, he sent out Parties to Forrage and bring in Prizes; but by that time they had got together a brave Booty, certain tumultuary Troops of the Etrurian Peasants, suddenly raised by the Princes of that Country who had taken the Alarm, began to make Head against them, but in such a disorderly fashion, that whilst they came to rescue the Booty, they had very like to have become a Prey themselves: They being slain, or put to flight, the now victorious Roman Army, plundered and wasted the Country all round at their pleasure, and so with great Riches and plenty of all things returned to their Camp; where by that time were arrived five Commissaries, and two Tribunes of the Commons, with peremptory Orders from the Senate to the Consul, That he should not offer to pass through the Ciminian Forrest: Glad they were that they came too late to hinder his Victory, and with the joyful news thereof hastned back to Rome.

XXXVII. By this Expedition the War was encreased, and its flames further spread rather than extinguish'd; for all that Tract bordering on the foot of the Ciminian Mountains, felt the smart of this Invasion, which fill'd not only the Tuscans, but all the Marches of Umbria with Indignation and desires of Revenge; so that a greater Force than ever came up to Sutrium, and not only advanc'd their Camp out of the Woods, but for eagerness of Fighting, drew up as fast as they could in the plain Field, leaving the Enemy a convenient space to put themselves in Array over against them; but finding them decline an Engagement, came up and Bearded them almost at their very Trench and Rampire; and then observing further, that the Enemy had also withdrawn all their Out-guards into their Works, the Soldiers clamour'd to their Generals to send for their allowance of Victuals, that they might eat it there, for they would continue in their Arms; and either in the Night, or else as soon as ever it was Day, fall upon the Enemy. The Roman Army was no less impatient than they, but at the Generals Command kept in; it was now well near four of the Clock in the After-noon, when he ordered them to take their Refection, and then to be ready in their Arms whenever he should give the Signal: In the mean time he made a short Speech, extolling to them the Samnites Courage, and debasing the Tuscans, saying, There was no comparison either of this Enemy to that, or in their numbers; besides, that he had another Engine at work, which in due time they should be acquainted with, in the interim it was fit to be concealed: By this dark intimation he made shew as if the Enemy were betrayed by some of their own, thereby to keep up his Mens Spirits, lest they should be discouraged at their multitudes; and this pretence seem'd the more probable, because they lay unfortified. The Soldiers after supper betook themselves to their Rest, and being raised about the fourth Watch [that is, between two and three a clock in the Morning] without any tumult, stood to their Arms. The snapack-boys and rabble that followed the Camp, had pick-axes and shovels distributed amongst them, to cast down the Rampire and fill up the Trenches with the Bank, whilst the Army was drawn up within the Circuit of the Works: The selected Regiments were placed at the entrance of the Ports, and all things being in readiness, the Signal was given a little before Day, (which in Summer Nights is the time at once, and charg'd the Enemy on all sides, as they lay along scattered upon the Ground; some before they were stirring, others in their Tents scarce half awake, and the greatest part hastning in that sudden fright to get on their Arms, were surpriz'd and cut to pieces; some few had put on their Armor, but having neither Leaders, nor any certain Command to follow, were easily routed and pursued by the Horse, some towards their Camp, and others to the Woods, which of the two prov'd the safer refuge: For the Camp in the Field was that Day over-run, what Gold or Silver found, ordered to be brought in to the Consul, the rest of the Spoil allow'd to the Soldiers. Here was slain and taken of the Enemy to the number of Sixty thousand. Some Authors will have this eminent Battel to be fought at Perusia, beyond the Ciminian Woods, and that the City of Rome was in no little pain, for fear their Army intercepted in those dangerous Forrests, should have been cut off by the united Forces of the Tuscans and Umbrians: Wheresoever it was, 'tis certain the Romans had the glory of the Day; so that soon after there came Ambassadors suing to the Romans for Peace and Alliance, who obtained a Truce for the term of Thirty Years.

Whilst these Exploits were acted in Etruria, the other Consul C. Marcius Rutilus won the Town Allifas from the Samnites, and reduc'd several other Castles and Villages, either demolish'd by storm, or surrendred intire. Likewise at the same time the Roman Fleet, under P. Cornelius, whom the Senate had made Admiral, set Sail for Campania, and being arriv'd at Pompeii, the Sea-men made a descent on Land to forage the Territories about Nuceria; and having plundered the Neighboring places, whence they might safely return to their Ships; allured with the sweetness of Spoil (as usually it falls out) they rambled further, and gave an Alarm to the Enemy, and might every one have easily been cut off as they were stragling about the Fields, but it happened no body met with them there; only in their return in a disorderly march, not far from their Ships, the Boors of the Country fell upon them, eas'd them of all their Booty, kill'd part of them, and the rest secur'd themselves aboard.

The advance of Q. Fabius beyond the Ciminian Woods, as at first it terrified Rome, overjoy'd the Samnites; they had it reported, That the Roman Army was surrounded and besieged: They fancied, that the Defeat at the Caudian Passes was to be acted over again; That the same rapaciousness had inveigled that People which was always incroaching on their Neighbors, into those unpassable Woods, where, no doubt, they would be environed and destroyed, not so much by their Enemies Arms, as the disadvantages of the Place. Nor was this rejoycing without a kind of Envy, that Fortune had turn'd the glory of conquering the Romans from the Samnites, and cast it upon the less deserving Tuscans. Therefore they raised Men and Arms amain in all parts, to crush to pieces the Consul C. Marcius, resolv'd if he would not stand a Battel, to advance directly through the Marsians and Sabines to joyn the Etrurians. But the Consul met them by the way, where a fierce Battel was fought between them, with uncertain event; and though it were indeed but a drawn Game, yet the rumor went that the Romans were worsted, because several Persons of Quality, and Colonels, and one Commissary-General of their side were slain, and especially, for that the Consul himself was wounded. Fame, which always makes bad News worse, had so augmented the loss, that the Senate were in no little pain and perplexity, and resolv'd to have a Dictator chosen; nor did any Man doubt but Papirius Cursor, the greatest Warrior of that Age, ought to be the Man; but neither knew they how with safety to send a Currier into Samnium, nor were they certain that the Consul Marcius was living to chuse him. And as for the other Consul Fabius, they knew he had a private pique and mortal Grudge against Papirius; [upon the Controversie mention'd in the last Book] which Quarrel, lest it should hinder the Publick Service, they Decreed to send to him certain Persons of Quality, such as had been Consuls, who not only in the Name of the State, but by their private Influence should perswade him, That he would for his Countries sake remit all those old Animosities. When they came to him, and had shewed him the Senates Order, and used what Arguments they thought most suitable; the Consul all the while fixing his Eyes upon the Ground, went away without speaking a word, leaving them altogether doubtful what he would do: But in the dead time of the Night following (as the manner is) he nominated L. Papirius Dictator; when the Messengers came to return him thanks for over-ruling so worthily his private Resentments, he continued still his obstinate silence, and without uttering a syllable, dismiss'd them, that it might appear with how great a Stomach, and against the grain, he comply'd with the Senates Command. Papirius appointed C. Junius Bubulcius General of the Cavalry; and whilst he was proposing a Law for the Ratifying of his Command, Command, an ill Omen happened, that caus'd him to adjourn the Proceedings, for the Ward Fauca happened by Lot to have the first place in delivering their Suffrages, which was noted for unlucky, for two former Years when they began the Poll, in one of which the City was taken, and in the other the Caudine Agreement made: Besides, Macer Licinius had made that Ward of ill presage, by a third Defeat receiv'd at Cremora.

XXXIX. However, next day repeating the Auspices, the Dictator settled his Commission, and march'd away with the new raised Forces to Longula; and having receiv'd the old Legions from the Consul Marcus, drew out into the Field, that he might not seem afraid of the Enemy: But as they stood in Array, neither side offering to fall on, the Night approach'd and oblig'd them to retire to their respective Camps, where they continued quiet for some days, neither diffident of their own strength, nor slighting their Enemies. In this interim some Action happened in Etruria, for a Battel was fought with an Army of the Umbrians, but the Enemy rather chafed away, than much Blood shed, for though they Charg'd pretty briskly at first, they did not stand to it. Smarter Work there was at Vadimon Lake, where the *Tuscan*s had levy'd a new Army according to their Sacred Law, whereby one Man chose another for his Comrade, and all were sworn to live and dye together; so that not only their Numbers, but their Courage was greater than ever before; the Charge manag'd with such fury, that neither side stood to make use of their Darts and Lances at a distance, but came presently to hacking one another with their Swords; and as they began the Conflict most fiercely, so their rage seem'd to be encreas'd by its continuance; for a long time the fortune of the Day was doubtful, as if they had not been engaged with *Tuscan*s, but some new and stouter Enemy: There was no use made of their Heels on either side, those before the Ensigns were laid dead upon the Ground, and that their Colours might not be without a Guard, the second Battalions came up to supply the places of the first; and so still new Reserves till the Subsidiary Forces in the Rear were brought up to the Van. At last it came to that extremity of danger and fatigue, that the Roman Horse were forced to dismount, and get over the scattered Armor and dead Bodies, to reinforce their Foot in the Front, which then appearing as a fresh Battalion, first of all discouraged and disorder'd the *Tuscan*s, and the rest of the Legionary Soldiers, weak and weary as they were, following their successful Charge, broke through at last the Enemies Ranks: Now the Tuscan obstinacy began to yield, first some particular Bands to shrink, and by and by all of them that were left, betook themselves to a plain Run. From this Day may be calculated the ruine of the *Tuscan*s, who had so long flourish'd in Wealth and Power; their main strength being cut off in this Battel, and their Camp in the same Heat taken and plundered.

XI. With equal hazard, but at last with the like glorious Success was the War in Samnium carried on; where besides other ordinary Furniture, the Enemy to render themselves more formidable, had made their Armor shine with a new kind of garnishing: For having divided their Forces into two Bodies, the one had laid their Shields with Gold, the other with Silver, the fashion whereof was thus: The upper part that cover'd the breast and shoulders, was broader, the head even, and the nether end pointed like a Wedge, that it might be wielded the more nimbly; their breast was covered with a sort of Sponge, which Weapons would not easily pierce; the left Leg arm'd with an Iron boot, their Head-pieces contriv'd with lofty Crests, to make them seem so much the taller; the Soldiers, with the Gold-colour'd Shields, wore Coats of divers colours; the others with Silvered Arms, were all in white Linnen, these had the Right Wing, the others the Left. The Romans had notice before what brave Armor they had provided, and were taught by their Officers, That a Soldier was then truly terrible, not when he was trickt up in Gold and Silver, but when he trusted to good hard Iron and Steel, and withal a good heart and undaunted courage; That these shining Accoutrements, which look'd so gay before the Fight, would soon lose their Beauty amongst Blood and Wounds, that they were pitiful Armor, but would prove good Booty; That Valor was the Soldiers only Ornament; That all these five things would follow the Victory, and that a rich Enemy is but the better reward to a poor Conqueror. With such Encouragements Curio led on his Men to the Battel, himself in the Right Wing, and his General of the Horse in the Left. Both sides charg'd at one and the same instant, and as the Conflict was extream sharp with the Enemy, so no less emulation was there between the Dictator and the Master of the Horse, which should begin the Victory: But so it happened, that Junius with a rousing Salute from his Left Wing, first disorder'd the Enemies Right, Crying out, That he did but Offer up to the Devil, those Soldiers of theirs whom they had already, after the Samnite fashion, Devoted to him, and deck'd up accordingly in Garments and Arms of a colour suitable for Sacrifices. The Dictator perceiving Junius had made them give Ground: What, says he in a rage, shall Victory begin from the Left Wing? And shall the Right, where your Dictator commands in Person, lacquey after anothers Fortune, and not carry away the greatest Honor of the Day? Thus he encourag'd his Men; nor did the Horse give place to the Foot for bravery, or the inferior Officers to the Commanders in Chief; M. Valerius from the Right Wing, and P. Decius from the Left, both Persons of Consular Dignity, rode up to the Cavalry placed on the respective Wings, calling upon them to take a share with them in the glory of the Field, by Charging the Enemy on the Flanks: This new terror invading the Enemy on either side, and at the same time the Infantry pushing on with repeated shouts, utterly disorder'd the Samnites and put them to flight: Now were the Fields covered with the Bodies of the slain, and strew'd thick with the Armor, which ere-while was so brave and glorious. At first they took shelter in their Camp, but that was too hot to hold them, for before Night 'twas taken, plundered, and made a Bonfire of. The Dictator, by a Decree of the Senate Triumph'd, where the Armor taken from the Enemy made the best part of the show, and seem'd so magnificent, that the guilt Shields were divided amongst the Wardens of the Goldsmiths Company, therewith to beautifie the publick Market-place: And hence, they say, began the Custom of the Ædiles to adorn the City-buildings in their solemn Processions, when the Sacred Images and Relicks were carry'd about for Pomp in Silver Chariots. Thus the Romans indeed employ'd these gay Arms of their Enemies to the honor of their Gods; but the Campanians out of Pride, and inveterate hatred to the Samnites, were wont to Arm their Sword-players (which was part of the Entertainment at their great Feasts) with this attire, and then in joke, call them Samnites. The same Year the Consul Fabius fought with the rest of the *Tuscan*s at Perusia, which City had broken the Truce, where he obtain'd without much difficulty, an indisputable Victory, and had taken the Town itself by storm (for he was come up Victorious to the very Walls) if they had not sent out Commissioners to surrender it. Having plac'd there a strong Garison, and referr'd to the Senate the Agents that came from the rest of Etruria to supplicate for Peace: He made his entry into Rome in Triumph, for a more solid Victory than that of the Dictator himself. Nor was a small share of the Honor obtain'd by the Samnites Conquest ascrib'd to the Commissary-Generals, P. Decius, and M. Valerius, whom therefore at the next Election the People unanimously prefer'd, the one to be Consul, the other Pretor.

The other Consul was Fabius, he being still continued in that Honor for his excellent Service in subduing of Tuscany: But upon the Lot Samnium this Year fell to his Charge, and Tuscany to Decius. The former, march'd against the City call'd Nuceria Alfaterna [one of the furthest Cities of Campania, beyond Vesuvius, to this day call'd Nocera] and though they begg'd for Peace, he would not grant it, because they had refused it formerly when 'twas offer'd, so that they were forced to surrender themselves at Discretion. With the Samnites he fought a pitch'd Battel, but the Enemy was soon put to the rout; nor would 'tis like the memory of that Field have been left upon Record, but because it was there that the Marsians first appear'd in Arms against the Romans: The Pelignians followed the Marsians both in their Revolt and their Fortune. No less favorable was the Die of War to Decius the other Consul, for he compell'd the Tarquiniens for fear of his Arms, to find his Soldiers Corn, and beg for a Truce of forty Years. He took divers Castles from the Volturnians, of which some he demolish'd, that they might not harbor the Enemy; By carrying the War round about against all that made any resistance, he rendered himself so terrible, that the whole Tuscan Nation made humble Addresses to him for Peace, but could obtain nothing thereof; all that he would vouchsafe them, was a Truce from Year to Year, and for that favor he made them pay off his Army for that Year, and give all his Soldiers two Coats apiece. The Affairs of Tuscany being thus settled, were again embroil'd by the sudden revolt of the Umbrians, a People that had not yet tasted the Calamities of War, any further than some small damage sustained by the Roman Armies march through their Country. They having raised all their own Youth in Arms, and solicited a great part of the *Tuscan*s to Rebel, had got together to great an Army, that they began to speak very magnificently of themselves, and no less contemptibly of the Romans, boasting, That they would leave Decius behind them in Etruria, and march to rights to Rome, and attack the City. The Consul Decius having intelligence of this Design, quits Tuscany, and with long Marches hastens towards the City, till he came into the small Province Pupinia [not above eight miles from Rome] where he waited the Enemies motions. Nor had they at Rome slight apprehensions of this Umbrian Invasion, but were somewhat frighted with their menaces, as having experienced by the mischiefs the Gauls did them, how unsafe and indefensible their City was against a Potent Enemy; therefore the Senate dispatch'd away Orders to the other Consul Fabius, That if without too great a prejudice to Affairs he could spare any time from the Samnites War, he would speedily advance with his Army into Umbria. The Consul readily obey'd, and with long and weary Marches comes up to Mevania, where the Umbrian Forces then quartered. His unexpected arrival (whom they thought far enough off, and sufficiently embarras'd with the other War in Samnium) put the Umbrians into such Consternation, that some advis'd to retire to their fortified Towns; others, to relinquish the War altogether. But one small Canton or tract of their Country (which they call Materina) not only continued all the rest in Arms, but spurr'd them on to a present Battel, so that they began to assault Fabius as he was entrencing his Army: who seeing them come on so fast, call'd off his Men from their work, and as well as the time and ground would permit, marshall'd them in order; and having recounted their gallant Services as well in Tuscany as Samnium, He bids them now go on, at one blow to compleat their Triumphs, and put an end to this little Appendix of the Etrurian War, and especially not to forget to revenge those impious and audacious Speeches, whereby they had threatened to attack and plunder the City of Rome. The Soldiers received these Commands with such cheerfulness, that their loud Acclamations interrupted his Harangue; and even before the signal given by the sound of Trumpets and Cornets, they ran amain upon the Enemy, as if they had had to do only with Women or Children; for, wonderful it is to relate! how at the very first they flew in amongst the thickest of them, and wrested by main strength the Standards out of the hands of those that carried them, and afterwards carried the Standard-Bearers themselves Prisoners to the Consul; how they pull'd and hurried whole droves of armed Men (as if they had been Sheep or Calves) out of one Army into t'other; and where-ever there was any resistance made, the business was done, not so much with their Swords as with their Bucklers, thumping the Enemies shoulders with the Bosses of their Shields they tumbled them down before them; abundance more were taken Prisoners than kill'd, and the general cry throughout the Field, was, Down with your Arms, so that in the very heat of the Skirmish, most of the principal Authors of the War yielded up themselves; and on the morrow, and the days following, the rest of the People of Umbria likewise made their submissions; only the Inhabitants of Otriculum (a Frontier Town towards the Samnites) were received into Friendship upon their Parole, and giving of Hostages.

XLII. Fabius thus a Conqueror in anothers Province, returns again to his own Charge in Samnium; and for his good Services as last Year the People continued him in the Consulship, so this Year when Ap. Claudius and L. Volturnius were Consuls, the Senate continued his Command of the Army, notwithstanding all the opposition that Appius could make against it. In some Annals I find, that when this Appius put in to be Consul, his Election was obstructed by L. Furius, a Tribune of the Commons, till such time as he had resign'd his Office of Cenfor. However, having at last got to be Consul, the War with the Salernitines (then newly declared Enemies) falling by Lot to his Colleague, he remain'd at Rome, busie to encrease his Fortune by the management of Civil Affairs, since the Honor of the Wars was confer'd upon others. Nor had Volturnius any cause to repent of his Province, for he fought many fortunate Battels, and took several of the Enemies Cities by Storm: He was a free bestower of the Spoil amongst his Soldiers, and this Bounty, which of its self is an attractive and winning Quality, he rendred yet more charming by his natural Courtesie and familiar obliging Behavior; by which Arts, as he gain'd the affections of his Soldiers, so he rendred them willing to run any hazards, or endure any Toil. Q. Fabius on the other part, in Quality of Pro-Consul, had an Engagement with the Samnites near the City Allifas, where the work was not long a doing, the Enemy was routed and beat into their Camp, nor could they have held that if there had been Day-light enough to attack it; however they were hem'd in before 'twas dark, and Guards kept all Night that none might escape. In the Morning they began to capitulate, and it was granted, That all the Samnites amongst them should be let go, passing under the Gallows only with a single Garment on. But for their Confederates there was no such provision made, so that they all, to the number of 7000, were sold for Slaves: Such as allerdg'd themselves to be Hernicks, were set apart, and sent to Rome to be disposed of by the Senate, who ordered them to be secured in several places amongst the Latines, till enquiry might be made, Whether they came as Volunteers, or were press'd to serve the Samnites against the Romans; which whole matter the new Consuls P. Cornelius Arvina, and Q. Marcius Tremulus, were ordered to examine and report to the Senate. But this strict Proceeding was very ill resented by the Hernicks, who met in a general Dyet or Convention at Anagnia, where all the Tribes of the Hernicks, except the Alatines, Ferentines and Verulanes, proclaim'd War against the Romans.

XLIII. New Insurrections also happened in Samnium, (for Fabius was gone thence) the Towns Galatia and Sora, and the Roman Garisons therein, being not only assaulted and put to the Sword, but odious Cruelties exercised on the Bodies of such as were taken alive: To revenge which Insolence, P. Cornelius was dispatch'd thither with an Army, and Marcus appointed to march against the new Enemies, for by this time War was declared against the Anagnians and other Hernicks. In the first place, the Enemy seized all the Passes between the two Consuls, and cut off all Intelligence, so that they remain'd for several days together utterly ignorant of, and solicitous about each others condition: The same apprehensions spread throughout Rome to that degree, that all fit to bear Arms [that is, from 17 Years of Age to 47] were obliged to take the Military Oath, and two Armies list'd to be ready upon any sudden emergency. But after all, this Hernick War did not prove answerable either to the present Terror, or the ancient Glory of that Nation; for having attempted nothing worth relating, and being thrice one after another, in a very few days space, beat out of the places where they had Posted themselves, they desired thirty Days truce, that during that time they might send to treat with the Senate; in consideration of which, they yielded to raise the Roman Army two Months pay and Corn, and allow every Soldier a new Tunick. The Senate referr'd them back again to Martius, arm'd with a special Commission to treat with them, who received them to Mercy upon an absolute submission submission of the whole Nation. The other Consul in Samnium, though he continued superior in strength to the Enemy, yet was shrewdly incommoded by the disadvantages of the Country; for the Enemy had block'd up all the Roads, and possessed themselves of all convenient Passes to cut off all Provisions; nor could he, though he every day challeng'd them to a pitch'd Field, provoke them to it; for 'twas plain, That neither could the Samnites endure a present Battel, nor the Romans any long spinning out of the War. But the approach of Marcus, after his quelling the Hernicks, to the aid of his Colleague, put the Enemy upon a necessity of engaging, considering, that whereas they could scarce look upon themselves as a Match for one single Army, if they should suffer both Armies to join, they must needs be ruined: Hereupon, they advanc'd to meet Marcus, and set up on his Forces on a sudden, in the disorder necessarily attending an hasty March; however, he caus'd his Soldiers presently to dispose of their Baggage, and make ready to Charge. At the first Encounter the Shout was heard into the other Consuls Camps, and by and by the Clouds of Dust seen at a distance gave him further notice, who immediately commanded his Soldiers to their Arms, and leading them on in a running March, charges in upon the flank of the Enemy; whilst they were in the heat of the former Engagement, Crying out to his Men, That it would be the greatest cowardize and disgrace in the World, if they suffered the other Army to carry away a double Victory, and should not assume to themselves the Honor of that War which was their proper task. Thus where-ever he Charg'd he broke in, and having pierc'd through the midst of the Enemies Battalions into their Camp, which he found unguarded, he set the same on fire: As soon as Marcus's Troops saw those flames before them, and the Samnites perceiv'd the same behind them, 'twas time for the Samnites to betake them to their heels, but in vain; they could not with safety escape on either side, a vast slaughter was made in every place; until after Thirty thousand of them slain, the Consuls founded a Retreat, and joyn'd their Forces, congratulating each other for the Victory, when, behold, at a distance, they discovered certain fresh Regiments of Samnites, new raised, and coming to reinforce the former Army, but indeed serv'd only to compleat the Slaughter. For without waiting for any word of Command, the Romans made at them, Crying out, They would welcome them with an ill handsel: The Consuls conniving at their forwardness, knowing these new raw Troops, terrified with the disaster of their old experienc'd Soldiers, would never be able to stand before them; nor were they deceived, for all the Samnites Forces that were left, old and new, fled as fast as they could to the Mountains; whither the Romans advancing after them, the poor Wretches found no place strong enough to shelter them, for even on the tops and cliffs of the highest Mountains where they had posted themselves, they were attack'd, beat down, and destroyed. And now they all with one voice supplicate for Peace, and upon conditions of bringing in so much Corn to the Army, giving them a Years pay, and every Soldier a new Coat; they had Quarter, and leave to send Ambassadors to the Senate. Cornelius continuing in Samnium, Marcus returns to Rome to Triumph over the Hernicks, and his Statue on Horse-back was by a Decree of the Senate erected in the Forum, just before the Temple of Castor. To the three States of the Hernicks that were unconcern'd in the War, viz. The Alatines, Verulanes, and Ferentines, liberty was granted to continue their own Laws (because they chose that, rather than to be made free of Rome) and to Marry amongst themselves, those of one City with the Inhabitants of another, which Privilege, they only of all the Hernicks enjoy'd for a good while after. As for the Anagnians, and the rest that began the War, they were admitted to be Enfranchized, without right of Voting: But their holding of General Assemblies or Councils, and Marrying out of one Nation into another, or having any Magistrates of their own (save only in relation to their Religion and Sacrifices) were prohibited. The same Year the Temple of Safety was begun to be built by C. Junius Bubulcus, now Cenfor, which when he was Consul he had vowed to erect if he prospered in the Samnites War; and by order from him and his Colleague M. Valerius Maximus, great High-ways and Cawseys were made through the Fields round the City, at the charge of the Publick: Also the League with the Carthaginians the third time renewed; their Ambassadors that came for that purpose being very civilly treated, and Presents made to them.

The same Year had likewise a Dictator, P. Cornelius Scipio, with P. Decius Mus, Master of the Horse, who held the Assemblies for Elections, being the only business for which they were Created, because both the Consuls were absent in the Wars. The Consuls chosen were L. Posthumus and Tib. Minucius. But Piso makes these to succeed next after Q. Fabius and P. Decius, omitting those two Years wherein Claudius with Volturnius, and Cornelius with Marcus serv'd that Office: whether he were mistaken in digesting his Year-books, or whether he pass'd by those two pair of Consuls on purpose, as not thinking them truly such, is uncertain. This Year the Samnites made Incursions into the Lands of Stella, belonging to Campania, therefore both Consuls were sent into Samnium, but advancing several ways; for Posthumus march'd to Tifernum, and Minucius to Bovianum. The first Battel happened under the Conduct of Posthumus at Tifernum, the success variously reported; some Authors relate, That the Samnites were notably beaten, and Thirty thousand of

of them taken Prisoners; others say that 'twas a drawn Game, neither side Victor in the Field; as also, that in the Night Posthumius making shew as if he were afraid, privately retired to the Mountains, and the Enemies followed them two Miles, and then they also Encamped. That the Consul, to the end he might be thought to have taken up safe and well-furnish'd Quarters, after he strongly fortified his Camp, and supply'd it with necessaries, leaving a sufficient Guard, did about mid-night draw out the Legions, least encumbered with heavy Armor and Baggage, and marches then directly towards his Colleague, who was facing another party of the Enemy, and by advice, persuades him to engage them; which he did accordingly, and the Dispute remaining doubtful till the day was far spent, Posthumius arrives, claps on his fresh Battalions, and presently changed the posture of Affairs, and the Enemy already almost quite spent, and what with wounds and weariness unable to fly, were generally slain, and One and twenty Colours taken. That from hence they return'd to Posthumius's Camp, where the two Victorious Armies setting upon the Enemy, whom the news of their Companions overthrow had rendred heartless, easily defeated and routed them, got Six and twenty Colours more, took the Samnites General, Statius Gellius, and many others Prisoners, and had the pillage of both Camps. And the next day laying Siege to Bovianum, soon took it. And that both Consuls triumph'd with much Glory for these signal Services. Yet there are some that write, that the Consul Minucius was brought into the Camp grievously wounded, and there dyed, and that M. Fulvius was made Consul in his stead, and that it was he who being sent to Minucius's Army, took Bovianum. The same Year Sora Arpinum, and Censennia, were recover'd from the Samnites, and the great Image of Hercules erected in the Capitol, and consecrated.

XLV. In the Consulship of P. Sulpicius Saverrio, and P. Sempronius Sophus, the Samnites desiring either a final end of the War, or at least to delay it, sent Ambassadors to Rome touching a Peace, who having in very humble terms told their Errand, the Senate gave them this Answer: That if the Samnites had not so often treated for Peace, when they were altogether preparing for War, they might upon conference and due terms, have answered their desires; but since always hitherto their Words had prov'd vain, they would now trust to nothing but Deeds. That Sempronius the Consul would shortly be with the Army in Samnium, who being upon the Place, would be best able to judge whether in earnest they intended Peace or War, and as he found the state of Affairs, would make Report to the Senate; and therefore when he returned from thence, their Agents might follow him. Accordingly, after the Army had peaceably march'd through all Samnium, every where courteously supplied with all sorts of Provisions, Peace was restored to that People, and the ancient League renewed.

The Roman Arms were now turned against the Aequians, old Enemies, though for many Years under the colour of a perfidious Peace they had been somewhat quiet. The particular Quarrel now with them was, because whilst the Hernicks were in a good condition, they joyning with them, had furnish'd the Samnites with Auxiliaries; and after the Hernicks were reduc'd, almost that whole Nation had revolted unto and took part with the Enemy; and especially for that when the Romans after Peace concluded with the Samnites, had sent Heralds to these Aequians to demand satisfaction for those past Injuries, They gave out that this was but a tempting them, to see if for fear of a War they would be content to become Romans; which how great an happiness it is, and how much to be desired, we may learn from the Hernicks, of whom, as many as could, chose rather to be governed by their own Laws, than by those of Rome; and for the rest, the making of them free Denizens of Rome, was impos'd upon them as a punishment. For such kind of Expressions used in their Councils, the Romans resolv'd to make War upon them, and both Consuls being ordered to manage it, advanced within four miles of the Enemy. Whose Army (as being a People to whom for many Years War had been a stranger) having been tumultuously raised, and without good Commanders and Discipline, began presently to be afraid, and divided in their Councils; some were for venturing a Battel, others for standing on the defensive only, and making good their Camp; but most of them were much concerned to think of the wasting of all their Country, and the destruction of their Towns which were now left poorly guarded; therefore amongst many Opinions, one at last generally prevail'd, which was to abandon the care of the Publick, and every man to regard the saving of his own private Fortune, and to that purpose at the first Watch to go every Body his way, and convey all their Goods into their Cities, and there defend themselves. The Enemy having thus disperst themselves, as soon as 'twas light the Romans put themselves in Battalia, and seeing none come out to oppose them, march up in a full Body towards the adverse Camp; but when they found there, neither Out-guards placed before the Ports, nor saw any Man appear upon the Rampire, nor could hear the usual murmur and noise of a Leaguer, started with this unwonted silence, and fearing some Stratagem or Ambuscade, they made an Hault for a while; afterwards getting over the Works, and seeing all abandoned, they endeavored to follow the Enemy by the Track; but then meeting with Foot-steps tending every way, as having scattered themselves, at the first they wandred to no purpose, but afterwards understanding the truth by their Scouts, applyed themselves to attack the several Cities, and in the space of two months, took One and forty Towns by storm, most of which they demolish'd and burnt, whereby the whole Nation of the Aequians was in a manner destroyed. Over whom a Triumph was celebrated, and terrified by their fate; the Marrucines, Marsians, Pelignians, and Frentanes, sent their Agents to Rome to treat for Peace and Amity, which was accordingly granted.

This Year C. Flavius, a Clerk or Notary of very mean Parentage, for his Father had been a Bondman, but by some means obtaining a Freedom, got to be an Aedile of State; for he was a Man Crafty and Eloquent. In some Records I find, that when he appear'd at the Election, and found his own Tribe willing to Vote for him to be Aedile, but that his name could not be received amongst the Candidates, because he was a Mechanick, and got his Living by Writing; he flung away his Papers, and took an Oath, That he would no longer follow that Employment. But Macer Licinius avers, that he had left off his Pen-craft a good while before, having been Tribune, and born two Triumphships, one for the Night-guard for preventing of Fires, and the other for transplanting and settling a Colony. However all agree, that with great stoutness he made head against the Nobility that disdain'd his low Birth: He first publish'd the Civil Law, which till then had been lock'd up in the Cabinets of the Pontiffs; and set up Tables in the Grand Guild-hall, like Kalendars, whereby People might know the Holy-days, and when the Courts held Pleas, and when not. He consecrated the Temple of Concord in Vulcan's Court, and though Cornelius Barbatus the Arch-Priest, insisted, That by the ancient Law and Customs of their Fore-fathers, none could Dedicate a Temple but a Consul, or the General of an Army; yet he was forc'd by the general consent of the People, to comply, and pronounce the solemn words which the Aedile was to say after him, according to the custom in such cases; which thing was highly resented by the Nobility, and therefore a Law was exhibited from the Senate to the People, That thence-forwards none should Dedicate either Temple or Altar, without leave first obtained from the Senate, or the major part of the Tribunes. I may add here a passage in it self scarce worth Memoir, but as 'tis an evidence of the fewds between Plebeian Liberty, and the Insolency of the Nobles: This Flavius coming to visit his Colleague when he lay sick, some young Noblemen that were there agreed before hand, that to affront him, they would not rise up when he came into the Room, whereupon he commanded his Ivory Chair of State to be fetch'd thither, and placing himself in that Seat of Honor, beheld with contempt the envy of his Enemies. The truth is, this Flavius was chosen Aedile by that Factionous Rabble, that was first encouraged by Ap. Claudius in the time of his Censorship, who having stain'd the Dignity of the Senate by bringing in thither the Sons of Libertines; and afterwards perceiving that such his Choice was generally condemn'd, and that in the Curia or Assembly of the Wards, he had not so many Abettors of his doings as he desired: He intermix'd and admitted many of the scum of the Mobile into the several Tribes, thereby debauching both the Forum and Campus Martius, in all Elections there held. And indeed, this Election of Flavius was look'd upon as such an Affront, that most of the Nobles left off wearing their Rings and Horse-trappings, (the peculiar Marks of their Quality.) The City thence-forwards being divided into two Factions, one consisting of worthy honest Men, the encouragers of the Good and the Brave; the other of the Ruff-raff rabble manag'd by ambitious Upstarts to promote their Designs, and so it continued until Q. Fabius and P. Decius came to be Censors: For Fabius, as well to re-establish Amity and Concord, as to prevent the choice of Magistrates from falling into indigent and inconsiderable hands, retrench'd this over-grown multitude, took them out of the several Tribes wherein they bore sway, and cast them into four distinct Tribes by themselves, calling them The City-Tribes, because they had no Lands in the Country as the others had. Which Contrivance of his, 'tis said, was so acceptable, and gratefully receiv'd, that it gain'd him the Surname of Maximus [or Most Great] which was more than all his Victories could obtain. By him also it was Ordain'd, That all the Knights of Rome should every Year, on the fifteenth of July, appear in a General Muster before the Censor.

TWO Colonies Planted; one at Sora, the other at Alba. 3. The Marsians of Carleola submit to the Roman Government. 6. The College of Augurs increased to the number of Nine, who before were but Four. 9. A Law for Appeals to be made to the People, was now the third time Confirm'd, being put up by Valerius the Consul. Two new Tribes added; The Anian, and the Tarentine. 12, &c. War Proclaim'd against the Samnites, and several Victories obtain'd over them. 38, &c. In a Battel with the United Forces of the Tuscans, Umbrians, Samnites and Gauls, where P. Decius, and Q. Fabius were Generals, the Roman Army being hard put to't, and endanger'd, P. Decius following the Example of his Father, Devotes himself, and by his Death gains them a Victory. Papirius Cursor routs an Army of Samnites, who had bound themselves with a Solemn Oath, not to quit the Field without Victory. 47. A Censé being held, and the number taken of the Citizens, there appeared to be 262322. Polls.

U. C. 450. IN the Consulship of Lucius Genucius, and Ser. Cornelius, there being a Vacation almost from all Wars abroad, the Romans had leisure to Plant Colonies at Sora and Alba: To the latter, were sent six thousand to keep under the Aequians: The former, was part of the Volscian Territories, but of late possess'd by the Samnites; thither were carry'd Four thousand. The Inhabitants of Arpinum and Trebula obtain'd this Year the favour of being made Free-Denizens of Rome. The Frusinates were sentenced to lose one third part of their Lands, because it was found out they had solicited the Hernicks to Rebellion. Also the Consuls having, according to an Order of the Senate in that behalf, thoroughly inquired into the whole matter relating to that Insurrection, the Principal Officers thereof were first Scourged, and then Beheaded. Yet that the Year might not pass altogether void of Military Action, an Expedition (such as it was) is undertaken into Umbria, upon Advice of Incursions that were made by certain Men in Arms out of a kind of a Cave, by whom the Parts adjacent were much annoy'd and plunder'd. Into this Den, or hollow Passage between the Rocks, the Romans entred with Banners displayed; and by reason of the obscurity of the Place, many of them were shrewdly wounded, especially by Stones flung at them; until such time as they found out the other mouth of the Hole (for it was a Thorow-fare) but then, piling up heaps of Wood at both ends, they set Fire to it, the smoke and heat of which, those within being no longer able to endure, did at last, hoping to break through and escape, rush into the very Flames, and so were smothered and burnt, to the number of about 2000 Armed Men. The next Year, M. Livius Dentor, and C. Emilius being Consuls, the Aequian War broke out again, for they not abiding the Colony planted amongst them, looking upon it as a Garrison placed on their Frontiers on purpose to bridle them, gathered together, and with all their might endeavored to storm it; but the Colony bravely defended it self, and without any help beat them off: However, it so much startled those at Rome, because they could not think, the Aequians already so much crush'd, would alone of themselves make an Insurrection without some more Potent Allies to back them: That by means of this Hubbub C. Junius Bubulcus was made Dictator, who with M. Titinius General of the Horse, marching thither, at the very first Conflict sufficiently chastised the Aequians, and on the eighth Day return'd triumphant into Rome, and then that Temple of Concord, which he vow'd when he was Consul, and began to Build whilst he was Censor, he now Dedicated during his Dictatorship.

II. That Year a Grecian Fleet, under the Conduct of Cleonymus a Lacedæmonian, arriv'd upon the Coasts of Italy, and surprized Thuria a City of the Salentines. Against whom the Consul Emilius being sent forth, in the first Encounter beat them back into their Ships, restored the Town to its Inhabitants, and Peace to all the Salentine Territories. Yet in some Annals I read, that Junius Bubulcus the Dictator made an Expedition against the Salentines themselves, and that Cleonymus had quitted Italy, before the Romans could come up to engage him: who having doubled the Cape of Brundisium, Sail'd with a direct Wind through the middle of the Adriaticque Gulf, declining the Coasts of Italy on the Larbord-side, because there were no Ports or Havens to put in at, and afraid of those Nations towards the Star-bord side, the Ilirians, Liburnians and Isirians, since they were great Sea-Rovers, and infamous for Cruelty and Piracy. At length he arriv'd upon the Venetian Coast, and having Landed a few Men to discover the Country; they gave an account, that the strand that lay before them was but narrow, which having pass'd, there were certain Plashes over-flow'd with the Sea-tides; That next, and not far off, they could see Pasture-

Pasture-fields, and further off a ridge of Hills, whence they discover'd the Mouth of a very deep River (the name of it was Meduacus) into which they thought the Ships might be brought about, and ride at Anchor as in a safe Harbor; whereupon he directed his Course thither, and gave Orders to Sail up the River: But the Channel was not deep enough to bear his biggest Vessels, therefore the Soldiers were put aboard the Barques and Pinaces, and so Landed in a Country well Inhabited, as belonging to three Maritime Villages of Padua: These they set upon, take the People Captive, get great store of Plunder, and then set the Houses on Fire; and enticed with the sweetness of these Spoils, march up further from their Ships (with which they had left but a very slender Guard.) Tidings of this Invasion was soon carry'd to Padua, (a Place always in Arms, and upon their Guard for fear of their ill Neighbors, the Gauls;) who presently sent out two Parties, one up into the Country where they were playing their Plundering pranks; the other by a By-way directly to the Harbor where their Ships lay (which was about fifteen Miles off from that City:) And having cut to pieces the small Guard that was there, endeavor'd to Board the Vessels; but the affrighted Mariners got them over to the other side of the River. No less successful were they on Land against the stragling Rovers, who flying back to their Ships were intercepted, surrounded, and all either kill'd or taken; some of the Prisoners discovered whence their Fleet was, and that their King Cleonymus was but three Miles lower: Therefore having secured them in the next Village, the Patavins, some of them Man'd out their Flat-bottom'd Boats, fitted to pass the Shallows; others Imbarqu'd in the Pinaces taken from the Enemy, and so hastning down, beset the main Fleet, which was Riding at Anchor little dreaming of any danger, and fearing not so much an Enemy as the unknown Coasts, who being thus surprized made no resistance, but made all the Sail they could towards the Sea, being pursued as far as the Mouth of the River; several of their Ships that for fear and hast run upon the Flats, were taken and burnt; so that Cleonymus was glad to be gone, having scarce a fifth part of his Fleet left, and without Success in attempting to Land in any Coast of the Adriatique, returned home. The Stems of the Ships, and other Spoils of the Lacedæmonians here taken, were set up in the old Temple of Juno, and there be many yet alive who have seen them. The Memorial of this Victory is yearly celebrated (on the same day) at Padua, by a solem Skirmish of Ships, upon the River that runs through the middle of that City.

This Year a League was concluded at Rome with the Vestines at their Request: Soon after arriv'd Troublesom Intelligence from several parts, that Hetruria was in an Up-roar, occasion'd by the seditious and civil Broils of the Aretines, who envying the Riches of the Cilnii, a very Potent Family amongst them, would needs expel them by force of Arms. Also, that the Marsians stood out and defended their Territories against the Colony of 4000 Men that was sent to Carleoli. By reason of these Tumults, M. Valerius Maximus was created Dictator, who chose for his General of the Horse M. Emilius Paulus; for that I rather credit, than that it was (as others relate) Q. Fabius; it being improbable that a Person of his Age, and who had born the highest Honors, would serve under Valerius. The Dictator advancing with his Army, in one Battel routed the Marsians, and having driven them into their Fortified Cities, Milionia, Plestina, and Fresilia; in few days space took all those Places, and having for their further punishment taken away part of their Lands, received them again into the Ancient League. Then was the War turn'd upon the Tuscans; but whilst the Dictator was gone to consult the Sooth-sayers, and take anew his Auspices, or tokens of good Luck, the Master of the Horse being abroad a Foraging, fell into an Ambuscade, lost several Colours, and was beat into the Camp, after a foul Slaughter, and shameful flight of his Men. Now 'tis not probable that Fabius should be guilty of such a Miscarriage, both because, if for any commendable Qualities he deserved his Sir-name of Most Great, it was especially for his Courage and excellent skill in Military Affairs; as also, for that he must needs too well remember Papirius's severe prosecution against him heretofore, to be induc'd by any means to fight again in the absence of the Dictator.

The noise of this Loss at Rome terrified them more than the thing deserved: For as if the whole Army had been destroy'd, a Cessation of all proceedings at Law was Proclaimed, Guards set at the Gates, Watches in every Street, Arms and Darts placed on the Walls, and all the younger fort List'd to be in readiness: And forthwith the Dictator was dispatch'd away to the Army, who found all things there in a better posture than he could expect, and very well compos'd by the careful diligence of the General of the Horse: The Camp removed to a place of more strength and safety; those Companies who had lost their Colours, left on the bare Earth without the Works, and allowed neither Tents or Coverts, for a punishment of their Cowardize; and the whole Army eager for a Battel, that they might the sooner wipe off the stain of the late Disgrace. Therefore he forthwith advanc'd with them into the Country of Rosella, whither the Enemy followed: And though their late Success had rais'd them to a confidence that they could deal well enough with the Romans by plain force in a fair Field, yet they were willing to use some Art and Stratagem, which they had found so advantagious. There happened to be not far from the Roman Camp, a parcel of Houses half ruined, belonging to a Village that was burnt when the Country was over-run; there having hid a Party, they drove some Cattel within view of the Corps-du-Guard, Commanded by Cn. Fulvius, a Commissary-General; but none of them coming out of their station upon this Bait, one of the pretended Herdsmen came up almost to their Works, and called aloud to the rest (that seem'd for fear to drive but slowly by the Ruines of the aforesaid Village) asking, What they staid for? since they might safe enough drive their Beasts clean through the Romans Camp. Which words some Cervites that were present, Interpreting to the Commissary, fill'd all the several Bands with Indignation to be thus affronted, and their fingers itch'd to be at them, but durst not stir a step without Command: Fulvius bid those that were skilful in the Language, observe, Whether the Speech of the Herdsmen were Country-like, or sounded after a City Dialect? who acquainted him, That to them they seem'd both by their Language and their Looks, to be more neat and better bred than Peasants or Country Clowns: Then go your ways (quoth he) to them, and bid them discover their Ambush, which in vain they have hid; That the Romans understand all their tricks, and can now be circumvented by their Fraud, no more than vanquish'd by their Force. This being related to those that lay in wait, presently they start out of their Coverts, and advanc'd their Ensigns all abroad in the open Field: The Commissary finding them too numerous for his Guard alone to deal with, immediately sent to advertise the Dictator, and desire some assistance; whilst in the mean time he bore the brunt of the Enemies Charge.

V. Upon this Advice, the Dictator commanded the Soldiers to Arm and march; they were ready almost as soon as his Orders could be pronounc'd, and scarce could they be kept from running, being spur'd on as well by desires to revenge their late loss, as by hearing the shouts of their Fellows that were engag'd, redoubled thicker and thicker as the Conflict encreas'd. Therefore they push one another, and call to the Standard-bearers to mend their pace: But the faster they march'd, the more earnest was the Dictator to have them go softly. The Tuscans in the mean time, taking the Alarm from the aforesaid Parties beginning the Fight, had brought down all their Forces, which by one Messenger after another was told the Dictator; and, That it was impossible for that small Party of his to resist them, if he did not hasten to their Aid, and he himself from a little Hill might see in what danger they were. But as he was confident the Commissary was yet able to maintain the Dispute, so considering himself was so near to preserve him from any danger, he was desirous to have the Enemy tir'd out as much as might be, that with his fresh Forces he might fall upon them already almost spent. Though they march'd thus slow, they were come near enough for the Horse to take their carier for a Charge: However, that the Enemy might not expect any such sudden Attack, he caus'd the Foot to march before, but with spaces between their Files, through which the Cavalry might with ease advance. The Front had no sooner set up an Halloo, but the Horse gallop'd out three quarters speed upon the Enemy, who being not prepared to entertain a Charge from Horse, as not expecting any such thing, they were amazed and presently disorder'd. Thus though he came late to assist his Party, almost quite hemm'd in, yet as soon as he came, he eas'd them of all further Toil; for the fresh Men undertook the whole weight of the Conflict, which neither lasted long, nor was very dangerous: For the Enemy being worsted, fly to their Works, and as the Romans with Banners displayed press hard upon them, quitted their Posts there too, and huddled themselves up in an heap at the further side of their Camp, and endeavoring all to fly at once, wedge in one another, and stuck fast in the narrow Passages of the Ports: A great part of them then got up upon the Rampire, either the better to defend themselves by the height of the place, or hoping to get over somewhere: It happen'd at one place, the Mount being not well ramm'd, surcharged with the weight of those that stood on it, broke down and fell into the Trench, whereupon they cry'd out, The Gods had opened them a passage for their escape; and by that means indeed they saved themselves, but most of them were glad to leave their Arms behind them. By this overthrow both the Forces of the Tuscans, and their Spirits, were abated; so that agreeing to give the Army a Years pay, and Corn for two Months, they were permitted by the Dictator to send Ambassadors to Rome to negotiate a Peace, which would not be granted, but a Truce they obtained for two Years: The Dictator return'd to the City in Triumph. I have some Authors, that affirm he reduced Etruria without any memorable Battel, having only compos'd the Aretines Distractions, by making a Reconciliation between the House of the Cilnii, and the Commons. M. Valerius was made Consul upon his Dictatorship, though some say he was so far from seeking that Honor, that 'twas conferr'd in his absence, and that this Election was held by an Inter-regent; but 'tis without dispute that Apulcius Panfa was his Colleague.

VI. During their time, all was pretty quiet abroad; the Truce, and especially their ill success in the late War, kept the Tuscans in order. The Sammites had suffered so many overthrows for several Years past, that they were not yet weary of the new League: And at Rome, the drawing out of Multitudes of the poorer sort, and planting them in good Colonies abroad, where they had Lands and Houses for nothing, pleas'd the Commons very well; well; yet that this Tranquillity might not be every where intire and perfect, a Quarrel was started between the chief of the City, Patricians of the one side, and Commoners of the other, fomented by the two Ogulnii, Tribunes of the Commons, who hunting for all occasions to expose and accuse the Nobility, and render them odious to the Commons; after several other projects had prov'd ineffectual, undertook at length an action that they knew would not fail to enflame, not only the Rabble, but the Heads of the Commons, Men that had born Consulships and rod in Triumphant Chariots, who now wanted no Offices or Honors, but those of Priest-hood, which the Nobles had hitherto kept wholly to themselves, and not suffered the same to be promiscuously enjoy'd by any others: What did they do therefore but propose a Law, That since there were at that time but four Augurs or Soothsayers, and as many Pontiffs or Chief Priests, and it was thought fit that the number of Priests should be encreas'd, therefore four Pontiffs and five Augurs might henceforwards be chosen out of the Commons, to be added to those in being. How this Colledge of Augurs came to be reduced to the number of Four, unless by the death of some of them, I do not understand, since 'twas a Rule amongst the Augurs that their number ought to be odd; that the three Ancient Tribes, Ramnes, Titenses, and Luces, might each have its Augur; or if there need-ed more, they should multiply them equally; as here five being added to four, makes nine, that is, three for each Tribe. But that which nettled the Nobles, was, That these new ones were to be chosen out of the Commonalty, which they resented no less than when they saw the Consulship first fall into Plebeian hands; yet they shrouded their Envy under a cloak of Piety, alledging, That the Gods were much more concern'd in the business than they, who would best determine, whether or no their Sacred Mysteries were polluted; as for themselves, all they could do, was, to wish well, and pray that no severe Judgment or Calamity might for this befall the Common-wealth. But though they were inwardly vex'd, yet they made the less earnest opposition publickly, because in such Disputes they were now used to be overborn, and have it carry'd against them, and saw their Competitors the Commons did not only aspire to great Honors, which in former times they durst not hope for, but were already in possession of all the Highest Dignities which had been so long controverted; viz. a multitude of Consulats, Censorships and Triumphs.

The Debate, 'tis said, touching this Law pro and con, was chiefly managed between Appius Claudius, and Publius Decius Mus, who having on either side alledged and musterd up much the same Argument touching the Rights both of Lords and Commons, as were heretofore used for and against the Licinian Law, when the matter was first started, that Commoners might be Consuls: For a close of the Debate, Decius is reported to have represented in a very lively Description, the resemblance of his Father, such as many present had seen him in his Gown in the Gabine Tuck, and standing over his Javelin, in which Habit he Devoted himself for the People and Legions of Rome, Publius Decius the Commoner Consul (quoth he) was then as pure and Religious in the sight of the Immortal Gods, and altogether as acceptable as if T. Manlius his Collague (a Patrician) had been devoted: and can we imagine that the same man might not rightly have been chosen, to officiate the Publick Divine Services of the People of Rome? Is this the Doubt, that the Gods should not as readily bear his Prayers, as they would those of Appius Claudius? Is the latter more pure in his private Devotions, or does he serve the Gods more religiously than the former? What cause is there to repent of the Vows made by so many Plebeian Consuls and Dictators, either when they first set out with their Armies, or in the very heat of Battels? Let us number the Commanders in Chief ever since Affairs begun to fall under the management of Commoners, and reckon up the several Triumphs, it will appear, the Commons have no cause to blush at their own Nobility. This I am sure of, whenever any mighty dangerous War happens, the Senate and People of Rome do not repose more confidence in their Patritian, than in their Plebeian Commanders: Since this is so, how can it seem an indignity to God or Man, if to those great and illustrious Personages, whom you have dignified with Ivory Chairs of State, with Robes of Honor of all sorts, with Triumphant Crowns and Laurels; and whose Houses are above others rendred Glorious with the affix'd spoils of Enemies, you shall also add the Sacred Accoutrements of Pontiffs and Augurs? He that hath already been deck'd in the Ornaments of Almighty Jupiter, and being drawn through the City in a Chariot of Gold, hath mounted the Capitol, who can think it too much to see the same Person that hath thus appear'd as a God to Men, to shew himself an humble Suppliant to the Gods? to hold in Triumphant Hands the Sacred Cup, or Holy-water-pot, and the Divining Wand, or Crozier Staff? and with a veiled Head to kill the Sacrifices, or take the lucky Auguries for the Publick? When Posterity shall read the stile of some brave Man upon his Statue, and find there so many Consulats, Censorships, and Triumphs, Will they think you be frighted, if you shall have added thereunto an Augurship, or the Pontifical Dignity? For my part, I verily hope of Rome we are now such, as by our Quality may bring as much Credit and Honor to the Priestly Function, as we shall derive from it: And that we desire it more in respect of the Service of the Gods, than for any Interest of our own, That whom we have hitherto reverenc'd privately, we may henceforth have opportunities publickly to Worship.

But why plead I all this while, as if the Patricians alone were intirely Invested with the Priviledge of Sacerdotal Dignities? and as if we were not already in possession of one Honorable and most Principal Priesthood? We see the Decemvirs appointed for Celebration of Sacrifices, and Interpreting the Sibylline Verses, for reading the Destinies of our Nation; the same Persons being Chief Ministers at the Sacred Rites of Apollo, and other Ceremonies, are Commoners. And as no Injury was done the Patritii, when in favor of the Commons the number of the Duumviri or Superintendents of the aforesaid Mysteries, was augmented to Ten; so neither have they now any greater cause to complain, if the Tribune, a worthy and brave Man, hath added five places more of Augurs and four of Pontiffs, unto which Commoners may be nominated: Not to dispossess you, Appius, but that Commoners may be assistant to you in Sacred Things, who are so highly helpful to you in Civils. Be not ashamed, O Appius! to have the same Person your Collegue in the Priesthood, who might fitly be your Companion in a Censor or Consulship: To whom being Dictator, you might be Master of the Horse, as well as he Master of the Horse when you happen to be Dictator. The Patritii of Old refus'd not to admit into their Rank a Sabine Stranger, Appius Claudius, or Claudius (I know not which his Name was) the very Top of your Kindred, you must not think much then to accept Us into the number of the Priests, who bring with us not a few Marks of Honor, nay, even all that you can boast of: You tell us, That the first Commoner that was made a Consul, was L. Sextius; the first Master of the Horse, Caius Licinius Stolo, the first both Dictator and Censor, C. Marcius Rutilus; we have heard you repeating a thousand times the same thredbare Allegations; That to you, forsooth alone, belongs the taking of the Auspicia; that you only are Gentlemen; that you, and none but you, ought to have the Chief management of Affairs both at home and abroad: Yet still I must tell you, the Commoners have always been as prosperous hitherto as the Nobles, in any brave or difficult Undertaking, and I doubt not but they ever will be so. Did you never hear that the Patritii, did not drop down from Heaven, but were at first establish'd by Humane Policy, being composed of such as were able to name their Father, that is to say, Honest Free-men, and no more? I my self can already nominate my Father to have been a Consul, and shortly my Son will be able to alledge his Grandfather of that Quality. The bottom of the Business is only this, That every thing must be denyed us, and nothing obtained without tugging: The Patritians Design is only to maintain a Faction, and contend, and regard not greatly what the end of the Dispute is. It is therefore my Vote, That (to the good of you all, and the Weal-Publick) this Law be passed and established.

IX. The People presently commanded the Tribes to be call'd to a Scrutiny, and it appeared, That without all doubt the Law would be accepted; but that day was lost by the Interposition and Negative of some of the Tribunes: But on the Morrow, they were afraid to oppose it, and then it pass'd unanimously, and the New additional Pontiffs then Created were, the Promoter of the Law P. Decius Mus, P. Sempronius Sophus, C. Marcius Rutilus, and M. Livius Dentor: The five Plebeian Augurs, C. Genutius, P. Aelius Pætus, M. Minucius Fessus, C. Marcius, and T. Publilius; thus the number of the Pontiffs came to be Eight, and of the Augurs Nine. The same Year M. Valerius the Consul, procured the Law, Touching Appeals to the People, to be confirm'd. This was the third time since the expulsion of Kings, that Law had been establish'd, and always by the same Family: The Cause of renewing it so oft, I conceive might be, because the power of a few of the Grandees and Nobles was apt to be too hard for the Liberties of the Commons. The Porcian Law seems Enacted only to save the Romans skins, imposing a grievous punishment on any that should Kill or Scourge a Citizen of Rome. The Valerian Law, which prohibited any man to be Whipt or Beheaded, that made his Appeal, had no expresse Penalty, but only declared, That whoever should act contrary, the same would be naughtily done, that seeming then as I believe (such was the Modesty and Reverence of those Times) a sufficient Obligation and Restraint, whereas now a days, if a Man should threaten but his Slave at such a rate, he would despise it. The same Consul manag'd the War against the Æquians, who were broke out in Rebellion, but there was little remarkable in it, for they had nothing left of their Antient Fortune, but the stoutness of their Stomachs. The other Consul Apuleius, besieged the City Nequinum in Umbria, a place difficult of Access, as being situate high, and on the one side was a steep Precipice, where now the River Narnia is, so that it could not be taken either by Assault or Mining; but the Service uneffected, was resign'd over to the new Consuls, M. Fulvius Pætus, and T. Manlius Torquatus. 'Tis related by Macer Licinius, and Tubero, That all the Wards having chosen that year Q. Fabius, although he did not pretend to it, He desired them to excuse him till a year when there were more Wars on foot, for at present he could do the Commonwealth better Service, by bearing some Civil Office in the City: Thereby not concealing what he aim'd at, nor yet expressly desiring it, and so he was made Ædile of State, together with L. Papirius Cursor. But I dare not avouch this for a certain truth, because Piso, a more antient Annalist, saith, That the Ædiles of the Chair that year were C. Domitius, Cn. F. Calvinus, and Sp. Carvilius Q. F. Maximus, which surname of Maximus might, as I conceive, give occasion to the Error, whereupon followed a Tale suitable to that Error, jumbling the Elections of Ædiles and Consuls together. The same year was a Lustrum, that is a general survey and purging of the City

by Sacrifices, held by P. Sempronius Sophus, and P. Sulpitius Averrio, and two Tribes more were added to the rest, Anienis and Tarentina. Thus much for the Affairs at Rome.

Much time had now been spent in a lingering Siege of the before-mentioned Town Nequinum, but at last two of the Inhabitants, whose Houses join'd to the Wall, undermined the Ground as far as the Roman Out-guards, where coming forth, they desired to be carryed before the Consul, whom they do assure, That they were ready to let in a party of Armed Men, if he pleas'd, into the City. This was an Overture not to be slighted, nor yet to be credited without Caution. With one of these Renegado's (for the other was detain'd as an Hostage) two Scouts were sent by the same Mine to discover the Passage; and upon their return the Attempt appearing feasible, Three hundred Soldiers led by the Renegado into the City, seiz'd in the Night the Gate that was next, break it open, and let in the Consul and Roman Army without any resistance. Nequinum being thus reduced to the Roman Obedience, a Colony, called Narnia from the Rivers name, was Planted there, to serve as a Frontier against the Umbrians: And the Army return'd to Rome with a good Booty.

The same Year the Tuscans were contriving to violate their Truce, but whilst they were hammering several projects, they were for a while diverted by a vast Army of the Gauls making an Incurfion into their Country, but with Money, (whereof they had good store) they endeavor'd not only to make the Gauls their Friends, but draw them in to assist them against the Romans. This Alliance the Barbarians seeming not to refuse, they treat about the Sum, which being agreed and paid, when all other preparations for the War were ready, and the Tuscans desired them to March, they peremptorily denyed, that they contract-ed for any reward concerning a War against the Romans; whatever they received, the same was allowed them only in consideration of their forbearing to plunder the Tuscans Country, and not committing any Acts of Hostility upon the People: Yet if the Tuscans were so minded, they should still be ready to serve them, but upon no other Terms, but being admitted into part of their Territories, that at last they might have some certain abode, and place of settlement. The People of Etruria had several Diets or Councils about this Affair, but nothing was done in it, not so much that they were loth to part with their Lands, as because every body abhorred to have people of a such a Savage Race for their Neighbors. So the Gauls being dismis'd, carryed home a power of Money, got without either labor or hazard: However, they at Rome were startled at the noise of this Conjunction like to have been between the Gauls and the Tuscans, and therefore were the nimbler in clapping up a Peace with the People of Picenum.

T. Manlius the Consul had the charge of the Tuscan War allotted to him, who was scarce entred their Borders, when as he was exercising his Cavalry, turning his Horse suddenly in a full career, he was thrown off with a grievous Fall, whereof three days after he dyed. The Tuscans took heart at this Accident as a good Omen for their side, That the Gods had begun this War in their favour. At Rome 'twas sad news, as well for the loss of so brave a General, as for the unseasonableness of the time when it fell out, so that the Votes of the first Wards, which the rest followed, discharged the Senate from nominating a Dictator to hold the Election for a new Consul, and would needs bestow it themselves; and all of them pitch'd upon M. Valerius, who was the very Man that the Senate would have Created Dictator. This Gentleman is ordered forthwith to repair into Etruria to the Legions, and his coming kept the Tuscans in such awe, that none of them durst budge out of their Works, their condition being no better than a Siege; nor could the new Consul provoke them to a Battel, though he wasted their Country, and burnt their Habitations where-ever he came, so that not only their small Villages, but Well-peopled Towns were all in flames, or yet smoaking in Ruines. Whilst this War prov'd more tedious than was expected, there came the Report of another, which considering the mutual losses of both sides, was justly more terrible: For the Romans had Intelligence privately given them by the Picenes their new Allies: That the Samnites were upon a design to take Arms and Rebel, and had tampered with them to join therein. The Picenes had the thanks of the Senate returned for this Discovery, which diverted a great part of the Fathers cares from Tuscan towards the Samnites: Besides, the City was afflicted with a Dearth of Corn and Provisions; nay, as those Write who will have Fabius Maximus to be Ædile that year, it had been reduced to the last Extremity of Want, if that Gentleman had not prevented it, by his care in providing, and prudence in disposing of Corn, shewing himself as diligent and useful now at home in dispensing of Victuals, as he had often been abroad in the Conduct of their Arms. The same year there was an Inter-regency, but on what occasion does not appear; the Regents were Appius Claudius, and after him P. Sulpicius, who held the Elections, and Created L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Fulvius, Consuls.

To these new Consuls, at their beginning of the very Year, Ambassadors from the Lucanes addrest themselves, complaining, That the Samnites, because they could not on any Terms inveigle them into an Association against the Romans, had with a formidable Army invaded and laid waste their Country, and intended by Arms to force them to take Arms as they would have them: But though the People of Lucania had heretofore too much fail'd in that respect, they were

were now fully resolv'd to run all hazards and extremities, rather than offend the Roman name: Therefore they did humbly request the Fathers to take them into Protection, and to defend them from the force and outrages of the Samnites; That though their standing out a War with the Samnites, had already laid them under a necessity of being true and firmly Loyal to the Romans, yet they were further ready, if it should be required, to give Hostages for their Fidelity. The Senate, after a short debate, unanimously resolv'd to continue their League with the Lucanians, and send Heralds to the Samnites, to demand satisfaction, and require them to depart, and withdraw their Arms out of the Territories of the Lucanians, Allies and Confederates of the People of Rome. But as they were on their way, Messengers from the Samnites met them, declaring, That if they offered to address themselves to any of the Samnites Councils or Assemblies, they should not expect to depart again in safety, and therefore let them proceed at their peril. This was no sooner heard at Rome, but the Senate Voted, and the People Decreed a War against the Samnites. The Consuls divided the Provinces, Tuscany fell to Scipio's share, and the Samnites to Fulvius, and each of them departed to his Charge. Scipio expected a slow lingering Work on't, like last Years Campaign; but on the contrary, the Enemy in Battel-array meets him near Volaterra, where they fought the better part of the Day with great slaughter on both sides, and Night parted them before either could tell which had the best on't; but next Day declared the Victory, and which Party was vanquish'd, for the Tuscans taking the advantage of the Night were march'd off: The Romans being drawn up, and perceiving that the Victory was yielded them by the Enemies retreat, advance to their Camp, and find it, though empty of Men, yet not of Booty, for they had quitted it in such fear, as to leave much of their Baggage behind them. Then he retired with his Army into the Faliscan Territories, and leaving his Carriages at Falerii with a competent Guard, marches with a flying Army to Forrage the Country, and destroy it with Fire and Sword; vast Booties are got from all Parts, and he left not only their Fields wast and desart, but burnt down their Castles and Borough-Towns: As for the greater and better fortified Cities, into which fear had driven the Tuscans by heaps, he did not stand to Invest them, because he would not lose so much time as the Formalities of so many Sieges would require. The other Consul Fulvius, fought a gallant Battel with the Samnites near Bovianum, wherein he was Conqueror beyond dispute; after which, he attack'd Bovianum first, and then Ausidena, and took them both by Storm.

XIII.

The same Year a Colony was carry'd to Carsoli, to have an Eye over the Territories of the Aequicolæ. Fulvius the Consul Triumphs over the Samnites. About the time of Elections, Intelligence arriv'd, That the Tuscans and Samnites were making mighty Levies; That in all their Diets or Councils the Chiefs of the Tuscans were reproved for not engaging the Gauls in the War, whatever it had cost them: Nor were the Magistrates of the Samnites less blam'd for exposing to the fury of the Romans that Army which they had provided against the Lucanians, whom they ought first to have cut off, whereas now the Romans having their Assistance, as well as their own Forces, would be so much the harder to be dealt with. Now though there were several other gallant Persons put in for the Consulship, yet this new Alarm turned all the Peoples eyes upon Q. Fabius Maximus, so far from ambitioning that Honor, that as soon as he perceived their Inclinations, he openly refused it, asking, What they meant to trouble him that was now an old Man, and had already gone through both all sorts of Labors and Fatigues for the Publick, and also all the Honors and glorious Rewards which are wont to sweeten those toils and dangers to Youthful minds? That the vigor either of the Body or Mind could not always continue the same; and besides, he had jealous apprehensions of Fortune her self, lest some of the Gods should think her too partial, and more constantly kind to him than the common course, and necessary vicissitudes of Humane Affairs will allow of; That he was now grown up equal to the glories of his Ancestors, and should gladly behold others aspiring and mounting up to the same illustrious Height; That as Rome had always sufficient Encouragements and Honors for brave and valiant Men, so she never wanted excellent Persons fit for the greatest Charges and Preferments. This modesty added a greater edge to their Desires, which he thinking to rebate by the Authority of the Law, caused that Ordinance to be read, which Provides, That no Man that has served Consul, shall within the space of ten Years after, be chosen again to the same Office. But the same could scarce be heard for the noise of the People; and the Tribunes of the Commons, cryed out, That should be no Impediment, for they would presently prefer a Bill, That he should be exempted and dispensed with: Yet still he persisted in his refusal, demanding, To what purpose is it then to make Laws, when they shall be eluded by those very Persons that make them? This is not to be rul'd by Laws, but to over-rule and govern the Laws themselves at our pleasure. However, the People proceeded to a Scrutiny, and as every Ward was called in, they all gave their Suffrages without any Hesitation, for Fabius. Then overcome with this general Consent of the whole City, May the Gods (quoth he) approve, O Quirites! what you do, and are about; but since you will dispose of me as you please, I hope you will not deny me the favor of nominating my Colleague, and therefore make it my Request, that you would please to chuse for the other Consul, P. Decius, a Man that I have try'd, and born Office with already very lovingly, and a Person worthy of your regards, and that incomparable Father from whom he is descended: This was readily granted, and Q. Fabius and P. Decius

P. Decius created Consuls by a general consent. The same Year abundance of Persons were prosecuted by the Aediles, for holding greater quantities of Land than they ought to do by Law, and generally they were found guilty and punish'd, whereby their immoderate Avarice was for the present very much restrain'd.

While the new Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus the third, were concerting their Affairs that one should attack the Samnites, the other the Tuscans, what Forces would be sufficient for each Province, and which of them would be most proper to manage each War; Ambassadors from Sutrium, Nepes, and Falerii, advertise them, That the States of Tuscany were now consulting in their Diets about a Treaty of Peace, Whereupon they turned the whole bulk of the War upon the Samnites. For the reader provision of Grain and Victuals, and that the Enemy might be the more to seek where the Tempest would first fall upon them, the Consuls led their Legions into Samnium two different ways, Fabius through the Territories of Sora, and Decius along by the Sidicini. Being come up to the Enemies Confines, both of them immediately spread their Forces to Forrage the Country; yet warily sent out their Scouts before them, by whom they had advice, That the Enemy lay in readiness about a blind Valley or untoward Pass near Tifernum, designing as soon as the Romans should be got into it, to set upon them from the higher Grounds. Fabius having disposed of his Baggage in a place of safety, under a small Guard, and given his Soldiers notice, That a Battel was towards, marches in good order, directly to the aforesaid Ambuscade; the Samnites then despairing to do any good by surprize since their Design was discovered, and seeing the matter must once at length come to an open dispute and decision, were themselves pretty willing to venture a pitched Field; and so descended into the Plain, and committed themselves to Fortune, with greater courage than hopes. Whether it were that they had there amass'd together the utmost strength they could make from all parts, or whether the consideration that all was at stake, inspir'd them with an unusual Valor, certain it is, that even in fair fighting they held the Romans hard to it, and put them into no small fright. Insomuch that Fabius seeing he could not make them flinch in any part, commanded two Colonels, M. Fulvius, and M. Valerius, that were with him in the Front, to go to the Horse, and tell them, That if ever the Commonwealth were to be assisted by the Service of the Cavalry, they should this day strive to render the glory of their Order invincible and eternal; for now the Enemy had stood the utmost shocks of the Infantry, and no hopes left but in a brisk Charge from the Horse; and withal, he encouraged these two young Gentlemen by name, both with commendations and large promises of Reward. But when neither this attempt of the Horse could make any Impression, concluding, That Artifice must effect what down-right Force could not accomplish, he orders Scipio, a Commissary General, to retreat out of the Front with the Hastati, or Javelyneers, of the first Legion, and march them round about as secretly as possibly he could to the top of the next Hills, and from thence on a sudden to fall upon the back of the Enemy. The Horse led by the two Colonels, advancing before the Standards unexpectedly, disordered their own Men as much as they did the Samnites, who received them gallantly and repuls'd them, so that they were forced to fall back again behind the Ensigns, and troop'd out of the Battel. This encouraged the Enemy; nor had the Fore-front been able, after so tedious a Conflict, to sustain their Violence, still encreasing upon confidence of a Victory, had it not been reinforc'd by the Consuls command with the second Battalions coming up and relieving them; who being fresh, put a stop to the braving Samnites, and at the same time the Ensigns opportunely appearing on the Hill behind, and a shout from thence, did not only terrifie them with a just apprehension of danger, but the same was made far greater by a mistake: For both the Consul Fabius cryed out, That his Colleague Decius was come, and all the Soldiers repeated the same Note with the highest Joy: O the other Consul! the other Legions are yonder at hand! An happy error to the Romans, but fatal to the Samnites, causing them to be surprized with a Fright, and to run away as fast as they could, lest they should be hem'd in, and by these fresh Forces cut to pieces now they were already weary and over-toil'd. The slaughter was not so great as might be expected from such a Victory, because they disperfed themselves every way in their flight, there being only 3400 of them slain, and almost 330 taken Prisoners, together with Three and twenty Colours.

The Apulians had join'd the Samnites before this Battel, if the other Consul Decius had not intercepted and routed them at Maleventum: There too there was more flying than killing, for there were not above two thousand of them slain; and Decius making no reckoning of that Enemy, advanc'd into Samnium, where the two Consular Armies marching several ways, over-run the Country, and laid all wast before them for five whole months together. Decius encamp'd at no fewer than five and forty, and the other Consul at Eighty six several places in Samnium during that Expedition, leaving behind them not only the Monuments of their Rampires and Ditches, but other more notable marks of Desolation throughout those Regions. Fabius likewise took the City Cimitra, where there were taken Two thousand four hundred armed Men, and slain Four hundred and thirty, or near thereabouts. Thence by reason of the approaching Elections, he hastned back to Rome; and when at first all the Wards chose him the said Q. Fabius to be again Consul for the next year; Appius Claudius, a Person of Consular Dignity, and one of the Candidates, but a Man hot and ambitious, not so much for his own Honor, as that the Patricians might recover into their hands both the Places of the Consulship, endeavored with all his own Interest, and that of the whole Nobility, That he might be Elected the other Consul with Fabius. When Fabius at first began to excuse himself with such kind of Arguments as he used last Year, the Nobles flock'd about his Chair in a full Body, intreating him, That he would pluck out the Consular Dignity from the Plebeian dirt, and restore the antient Majesty both to the Office it self, and the Patrician Families, to whom of right it appertain'd. Fabius, after silence made, with a kind of triumphing Oration qualified their Heats, telling them, That he would endeavor the People should accept of the Names of two Patricians, if they would pitch upon some other Man besides himself; for he would not now suffer himself to be put in Nomination, since the same being against the Laws, would be of very pernicious Example to after Times. So Lucius Volumnius a Commoner, was chosen Consul with Appius Claudius, who serv'd the same Office together before: But the Nobles ceased not to reproach Fabius for refusing to accept for his Colleague, App. Claudius, a Person for Eloquence, and dexterity in managing Civil Affairs scarce to be parallel'd.

XV.

XVI. The Elections thus over, the old Consuls were ordered to carry on the War in Samnium, their Commands being continued for six months longer; so that P. Decius in Quality of Pro-Consul, proceeded to spoil and harrafs all parts, so long till at last he drove the Samnite Army quite out of their Country; who made for Tuscany, and thinking they might in such a Troop of armed Men, by intreaties intermix'd with threats, obtain what by so many Embassies they had desired in vain, did demand to have a Diet or General Council of the chief Men of Etruria to be conven'd; which being assembled, they Remonstrate, For how many Years space they had stoutly disputed their Liberties with the Romans; that they had tryed all means, to sustain if it were possible, the whole weight of so desperate a War with their own proper shoulders; that they had also made proof of the Aids of the neighboring Nations, but to little purpose; that moreover, they desired a Peace of the Romans, when they were able no longer to maintain the War; that finding Peace with slavery more intolerable than the most unprosperous War with freedom, they had been again necessitated to take up Arms; that now the only hope they had left was in the Tuscans, as knowing them to be both for Men, Munition and Money, the mightiest Nation of all Italy, and having for their next Neighbors the Gauls, a People born to Arms and Blood-shed, and fierce as well by their Natural Inclinations, as especially in any quarrels against the Romans, whom they boast (and not untruly) to have been vanquish'd by their Arms, and forc'd tamely to ransom themselves and their City with Gold; that nothing would be wanting if the Etrurians had but the same brave Spirits, as Porſena and others their Ancestors had of old, they might then easily drive back the Romans out of all their usurped Possessions on this side the Tiber, and make them quit their design of enslaving all Italy, and be glad to defend themselves. That for their encouragement here was now a Samnite Army well arm'd and paid, at their service, who would readily march along whithersoever they would lead them, though it were up to the very Walls of Rome.

XVII. Whilst they were making these Rhodomontado's and preparations for War in Etruria, the Romans made havock of their Country at home; for P. Decius understanding by his Scouts, that they were gone, call'd a Council of War: And what, says he, do we stand piddling thus, ranging over empty Fields, and making Bon-fires of a few sorry Villages? Why should we not set upon their Cities and Walled Towns? There is now no Army in Samnium to oppose us, or relieve them; they are gone out of their own Confines, and voluntarily have inflicted banishment upon themselves. All approving this Counsel, he comes up before Murgantia, a very strong City, but such was the zeal of the Soldiers, both for the love they had for their General, and the hopes of a greater Booty than in the Country Hamlets, that the very first day they made themselves Masters of it. There 2100 Samnites were taken, and abundance of Pillage; which that it might not clog and encumber his Army, Fabius assembling his Soldiers, thus bespeaks them: Fie, Gentlemen! Will you be content with this Victory, and this Plunder? rather raise and extend your Hopes equal to your Courage and Gallantry; All the Cities of the Samnites, and all their Fortunes and Riches therein, are yours, who in so many Battels have routed their Forces and beat them out of the Country. Therefore sell these Prizes, and with good penny-worths invite Chapmen to follow you as you march, I'll soon find you more Waves for you to put off. Let's away from hence strait to the City Romulea, there your pains will not be so great, but your spoils far greater. So having sold their Pillage, they march on eagerly to Romulea of their own accord, spurring on their General to the expedition; and being come there, without casting up any Works, without using any Engines for Battery, in spite of all resistance, they fly up to the Walls, and every man clapping up his Scaling-Ladder, the Town in a Trice was taken and plundered, Two thousand and three hundred kill'd, and 6000 Persons taken: The Soldiers here had a mighty Booty, which they fold as they did the former. And though they had no rest given them, but were presently led to Ferentinum, yet they march'd with the greatest cheerfulness; but that prov'd a task of of greater difficulty; for both the Walls were stoutly defended, and the Place as well by Nature as Art strongly fortified, but the Assailants were now so enur'd to, and eager after Plunder, that they surmounted all difficulties, and got possession, having first slain to the number of Three thousand of the Enemy about the Walls. The greatest share of Honor in winning these Cities, is in some Annals ascrib'd to Maximus, that he took Ferentinum and Romulea, and Decius, Murgantia; some assign the glory thereof to the new Con-management of the Province of Samnium.

Whilst these Actions (by whose Conduct soever it was) were perform'd in Samnium, the Romans are involv'd in a dreadful War like to be carry'd on by the united Forces of several Nations in Etruria, the principal Fomentor of which, was Gellius Ignatius a Samnite. The Tuscans almost all in general had taken Arms, and drawn in their next Neighbors, the several Nations of Umbria, into the Confederacy; besides, Auxiliaries were hired from the Gauls, who all came to a Rendezvous at the Camp of the Samnite Army. The news of this sudden tumult arriving at Rome, after Volumnius the Consul was gone into Samnium, with the second and third Legion, and Fifteen thousand of the Forces of the Allies, it was thought fit, That Appius Claudius should forthwith depart thither also, followed with the first and third Legions, and Twelve thousand of the Forces of the Allies, who encamped not far from the Enemy. But more advantage was gain'd by his coming thither in time, whereby some People of Tuscany already inclinable to a Revolt, were kept in awe, than by any thing wisely or fortunately atchieved by the Consuls conduct. Many Engagements he took heart, and grew every day more formidable, and to that ill pass were Affairs reduc'd, that neither could the Soldiers confide in their General, nor the General much trust his Soldiers. In three several Annals, I find, That Appius being in this bad condition, did patch'd his Letters to his Fellow Consul, and sent for him out of Samnium; but I know not how to assert this, since 'tis so uncertain, that even the Consuls themselves, and those too, the second time conjoin'd in that Office, fell into variance about it, Appius flatly denying that he sent any such Letters, and Volumnius as peremptorily averring that he was sent for by Appius.

Volumnius had already taken three Castles in Samnium, in which near three thousand were slain, and half as many taken Prisoners, and likewise had pacified the Seditions of the Lucanians occasioned by the beggarly Rabble, and adjusted all their Differences to the greater content of the better sort, by the pains of Q. Fabius then Proconsul, whom he had sent thither with his old Army; therefore leaving the other Proconsul Decius, to forrage upon the Enemy, he himself with his Forces march'd directly into Tuscany to his Colleague, and was there joyfully receiv'd by all but Appius himself, who had reason to be angry, if he were indeed conscious that he never wrote for him; or if he had written, was willing, out of an envious and ungrateful mind, to deny it, and dissemble that he stood in need of his Assistance: For scarce had they saluted each other after they met, but he thus accosts him, How is it, Lucius Volumnius! are all things well? How go matters in Samnium? What makes you come out of your own Province? Volumnius tells him, All was very well and prosperous there, but he came thither upon his Letters desiring him so to do; which if they were counterfeit, and there were no occasion for him in Etruria, he would immediately turn his Ensigns and be gone: Marry, quoth the other, as fast as you please, here's no body will tarry you, for 'tis very preposterous that you, who perhaps are scarce able to manage your own War, should make your boasts that you quitted it, and came thither to help others: To which Volumnius only reply'd, Hercules turn all to the best, I had rather lose my labor than that any thing should have happened, whereby one Consular Army might not be sufficient to cope with all the Enemies in Etruria.

The Consuls being thus ready to part, the Commissaries and Captains of Appius's Army flock about them; some intreat their own General, That his Colleagues assistance, which it could have been no disgrace to have sent for, might not be slighted now it was so frankly offered; but a greater number earnestly besought Volumnius as he was turning away, That he would not, by an unhappy contest, betray the Commonwealth into an inconvenience; that if any loss should happen, the blame would fall upon the Deserter, rather than the deserted; that things were now come to such a pass, that the honor or dishonor of the Tuscan War, succeed it well or ill, will reflect upon Volumnius; for none would inquire after the harsh words of Appius that provok'd him to go away, but after the ill fortune of the Army, the consequence of his going; That he was indeed sent away by Appius, but still detained both by the Interest of the Commonwealth and the desires of the Army; for proof whereof, let him but make trial of the Soldiers affections. Thus with Remonstrances and earnest Entreaties they drew both the Consuls as it were against their wills, to hold a general Audience before the whole Army, where they fell into longer Speeches, but to the same effect with what they had spoken before in the presence of a few. Now when Volumnius having the better Cause, seem'd after a good fashion, and with a greater readiness of Expression than ordinary, to answer the singular and celebrated Eloquence of his Colleague, and Appius thereupon in a joking manner, had said, They were beholden to him, that of a dumb and Tongue-ty'd Consul, they had got an eloquent one; for he who in his former Consulship, especially for the first months, could scarce open his mouth, was now grown an Orator, and a shrewd Man at popular Speech-making: Volumnius reparted, I wish with all my heart rather, that you had learn'd of me to fight valiantly, than I of you to speak prettily; however, I will make you a fair offer which shall decide, not which of us is the best Orator (for that the Common-wealth regards not) but which is the ablest General; Here are two Provinces, Etruria and Samnium, take your choice of either of them, and I with my own Army will manage the War in the other. But the Soldiers crying out, and desiring, That they would both for the present attend the Tuscan War, Volumnius perceiving their Inclinations, Since, said he, I mistook in construing my Partners mind, I will not have yours to be doubtful or obscure, Let me therefore know by a Shout, Whether you would have me depart or tarry? They presently set up such a shout for his stay, that it raised the Enemy out of their Camp, who snatching up their Arms, drew out into the Field, and Volumnius gave order for the Trumpets to sound a Charge, and the Standards to advance. Appius, 'tis said, stood a while in a kind of quandary, since whether he fought or not, the honor of the day would be given to his Colleague; but afterwards, fearing his own Legions would follow Volumnius, if he himself should refuse to head them, he granted them the Signal, which they so eagerly call'd for. On neither side were the Battels rang'd in very good order, for the Samnites General, Gellius Egnatius, was absent, being abroad a Foraging with a Party, and his Soldiers undertook to fight rather of their own head, than under any regular conduct; and as the Roman Armies were not both laid up together, so neither had they time enough to marshal them: For Volumnius gave the first Charge, before Appius came near the Enemy, so that the Fronts were not equally attack'd, but as if Fortune had purposely chang'd the Enemy which each was wont to engage, the Tuscans receiv'd Volumnius, and the Samnites (who stayed a while for their General) entertain'd Appius.

It is reported, That Appius in the very heat of the Conflict, holding up his hands to Heaven so as they might be seen, in the front of the foremost Ensigns, did make this Prayer, O Bellona! if thou shalt this day give us a Victory, I do now Vow to build thee a Temple. Which words were no sooner pronounc'd, but, as if he had been inspir'd by that Goddess of War, both himself equaliz'd his Colleagues Virtue, and his Army that of their Leader: For as he now in all respects excellently perform'd the part of a brave General, so his Soldiers did strive with might and main, that the other Army should not prevent them in the Victory; whereby they routed the Enemy, who was not able to bear the present shock, far more fierce than what they were wont to grapple with; but being desperately press'd upon and pursued, retreated into their Camp, where by the coming in of Gellius, with some Sabellian Troops, the Fight for the time was renew'd, but they too being by and by defeated, the Conquerors now storm their Works, and whilst Volumnius bears his Ensigns in at the Port; Appius calling upon the Conquering Bellona, breaks through the Trenches and Rampire, and so the Camp was taken and pillaged, there being a mighty booty, which was all bestow'd upon the Soldiers. Here were Seven thousand and three hundred of the Enemy slain, and 2120 taken.

XX. Whilst both Consuls, and most of the Roman Forces were thus intent upon Tuscany, new Troops are levy'd in Samnium, to waite the borders of the Romans Dominions; for marching along through the Vescines Country, they fell into Campania, and the Falern Territories, where they committed abundance of spoil: It happened that as Volumnius, with large Marches was returning into Samnium (for the six Months time added to the Command of Fabius and Decius, was now expired) he received Intelligence of this new Samnite Army, and the havock they made in Campania, which turn'd him out of his way to the relief of his Allies; and being entered into the Fields of Calenum, both himself beheld the fresh Marks of that Devastation they had made, and the People informed him, That they had got so much Plunder, Cattel, and other booty of all sorts, that they could hardly march in good order, insomuch that their own Captains had openly declared, that they must forthwith march into Samnium to secure their Spoils, and then return again for a fresh Expedition, rather than to hazard an Army so over-charg'd upon a Battel. Though this seem'd probable enough, yet for more certainty he sent out a party of Horse to take up some of the Plunderers as they were stragling through the Fields; by whom he understood, That their Army lay upon the River Vulturnus, whence at the third Watch (that is about mid-night) they would advance on their march for Samnium. Having now sufficient Intelligence, he makes after them, and makes an halt at such a convenient distance, as they might not perceive him, and yet he might fall upon them as they went out of their Camp; whither, a little before day, he sent some Scouts skill'd in the Oscan Language (the Samnites Mother-tongue) to see what they were doing. These mingling with the Enemy (as was easie to do in the night, and that hurry they were in) understand, That the Ensigns were gone before, but very slenderly guarded, That the Booty and its Convoy were just then setting forward; That the whole Party were but a kind of a base Crew and sorry Fellows, without order or discipline. The day now began began to break, which was thought the fittest time to fall upon them, and accordingly the Trumpets sounded, and presently they came up with the Enemy: The Samnites encumber'd as they were, and few of them arm'd, began some of them to double their pace, and drive their prey before them; others stood still, uncertain whether they were best to go on, or return into their Camp; but whilst they delay, they are surprized and knock'd o'th' head by the Romans, who were got over the Rampire. The Samnite Army, besides the unexpected assault of their Enemy, was disorder'd by the revolt of a vast number of Prisoners whom they were carrying home; for some of them being loose, unbound the rest, caught up Arms out of the Fardles, and being confusedly intermingled in this running march, made a more terrible havock than the Battel it self; and at last performed one very notable Exploit, for as Statius Egnatius (one of the Samnites chief Commanders) was riding through the Ranks and encouraging his Men, they set upon him, beat off the Troopers that attended him, hem'd him in, took him Prisoner, and on Horse-back as he was, carry'd him to the Roman Consul. Upon which tumult the Samnite foremost Ensigns were called back, and the skirmish, which was in a manner over, seem'd to be renewed, but long they could not hold it: There were slain about Six thousand Men, Two thousand five hundred taken, and amongst them four Colonels, and thirty Colours; and (which most of all over-joy'd the Conquerors) Seven thousand and four hundred Prisoners released, with a mighty booty taken from their Friends, recovered, the Owners being summon'd in by Proclamation to come in and challenge, and receive their own; and such things as had no Owners appearing at the day appointed, were distributed amongst the Soldiers, but they were compelled to make sale thereof, that they might not have their minds running after any thing but their Arms and their Duty.

This Inroad into Campania had set their hearts a pit-a-pat at Rome, the rather because at the same time they were told, That Etruria (after Volumnius's Army was withdrawn from thence) had again taken up Arms, and not only drawn Gellius Egnatius the Samnites General, and the People of Umbria to joyn in their defection, but also hired the Gauls for a great sum of money to assist them: Alarm'd with this news, the Senate commanded all proceedings at Law to cease, and a levy to be made of all sorts of Men, not only Youths and Free-born Citizens, but likewise some Regiments of the Elder sort, and of Libertines, or Persons newly Enfranchis'd, were listed in every Ward; the City to be put into a posture of Defence, and the Prætor P. Sempronius to have there the chief management of Affairs. But they were in a great measure eas'd of these disquietudes, by the Letters of Lucius Voluminus the Consul, giving an account how the Foragers of Campania were routed; therefore in favor of the Consul, solemn Thanksgivings were ordered to be held for his success; the Courts of Justice were again opened, after eighteen days Vacation, and the Thanksgiving Processions were joyfully celebrated. Then they took into consideration the providing of a Guard for defence of those parts which the Samnites had waisted, and it was Decreed, That two Colonies should be Planted on the Vestine and Salern Coasts, one at the mouth of the River Liris, called Minturnæ; the other in the Vestine Forrest upon a Pass near the Salern Territories, where 'tis said a Greek City named Sinope, once stood, but by the Roman Colony called Sinuessa. It was referred to the Tribunes of the Commons, that by an Act of the Commonalty P. Sempronius should be empowered to create Triumvirs for conducting these Colonies to the respective places: But much ado they had to find any that were willing to enter their names to go thither, supposing they were indeed sent thither, not so much to enjoy Lands, as to lie in Garison, since they must be almost always upon their Guard amongst such inveterate Warlike Enemies. But from the care of these Affairs the Sonate was diverted, by the Tuscan War, whereof the rumor daily increased; as also Letters came thick from Appius, advertising, That by no means they should neglect the motions of that Province, since four several Nations had united their Arms; the Tuscans, the Samnites, the Umbrians, and the Gauls; and were already encamped at two places, because one could not contain so vast a multitude. Hereupon, and because the Election-days drew nigh, L. Voluminus the Consul is recall'd to Rome; who before he would summon the several Wards to give their Suffrages, assembled the people to an Audience, and discours'd largely before them of the Importance of this Tuscan War: That heretofore, when he and his Colleague together manag'd it, 'twas such as one General nor one Army was sufficient: But now 'tis reported, the Umbrians, and a power of the Gauls are added thereto; That they should remember they were that day to make choice of two Consuls against four Nations; That for his own part, were he not well assured that the People of Rome would declare him Consul, who without dispute was the most able General of that Age, he would presently nominate a Dictator.

None doubted but Q. Fabius would unanimously be chosen, who accordingly was pitch'd upon by the Prerogative, and other principal Tribes, together with L. Voluminus: Fabius made the like Apologies as he had done two Years before, but finding the same not accepted, began to desire his old Colleague P. Decius, alledging, That he would be a prop to his Age; That he had found by experience in one Consulship and two Consulates which he had already born with him; That nothing could more tend to the safety and preservation of the Commonwealth, than a good understanding between those that were intrusted with the Government; That his mind now grown old, would not so well suit with a new Partner; and that he could more freely communicate his Thoughts and Councils to a Person, whose humor and manners he had long been acquainted with. The present Consul Voluminus (though himself before nominated) was so far from taking this as any affront, that he seconded the motion, and highly applauded P. Decius, enumerating as well the advantages arising from the Agreement of Consuls, as the mischiefs attending their jars and discord in the management of Military Affairs, recounting how near they were to the very brink of destruction by the late differences between him and his Fellow-Consul App. Claudius; and withal, admonishing Decius and Fabius to live together with one heart and with one mind, telling them, They were both Persons born for War, renowned for their mighty Deeds, but regardless of fine Words, and unapt for brawling Controversies, which sort of Wits and Tempers, were naturally most fit for the Consular Dignity: But the crafty and subtle Men, affecting the reputation of Eloquence and Skill in the Quirks of Law, such as App. Claudius was, would best be employed as Lord Presidents of the City, or chief Justices, or Pretors for the administration of the Laws. These Speeches took up that day; next morning, by the Consuls order, Assemblies were held for the Election both of Consuls and Prætor; the Consuls, Q. Fabius and P. Decius; the Prætor App. Claudius, all absent: And L. Voluminus, both by an Act of the Senate, and Ordinance of the Commons, was continued in his Command for the space of a Year.

XXIII. That Year happened many Prodigies, for averting their Presages the Senate ordered Solemn Supplications to be held for two days together, where Wine and Incense for the Sacrifices was allowed at the publick Charge, and the People, both Men and Women, went in Procession and to their Devotions in great numbers. But that which rendered this Solemnity more remarkable, was a Controversie which happened amongst the Ladies in the Chappel of the Goddess Pudicitia Patricia [or the Chastity of the Noble Dames] which stood in the Beast-Market by the round Temple of Hercules. The Noblemens Wives would needs turn out Virginia the Daughter of Aulus, and not suffer her to be present at the Sacred Rites, because, though she were a Noble-woman born, she had married out of her Rank to Voluminus the Consul a Commoner: A few hard words (the bellows of Contention) soon blew them up into a Flame; as Women commonly are both impatient of Affronts, and quick in their Resentments: Virginia told them, That being a Noble-woman born, and of unspotted Reputation, Married when she was a pure Virgin, and but once, she thought she had as good a right to resort to the Temple of Patricia Pudicitia, as the best of them: And as for her Husband, she had no reason in the World to repent her Match, or be ashamed either of him, or the brave Actions he had done, or the high Dignities which he had honorably born and discharged. These generous Words she seconded with as Heroick a Deed; for in the Long street where she dwelt, she separated a part of her Mansion-house, as much as would handsomely serve for a Chappel, and set up an Altar therein; and having invited the principal Commoners Wives thither, and made her complaint to them of the unjust and injurious Treatment she had received from the Patrician Dames: This Altar (quoth she) do I dedicate to Pudicitia Plebeia [The Chastity of the Commons] and do exhort you all, That as the Men, our Husbands, in this City contend which shall surpass the other in feats of Arms and Military Glory, so the Women with no less emulation, may strive to exceed each other in Modesty and Chastity; and that ye will all endeavor, That this Altar may have the credit to be frequented with more devout Reverence, and (if it be possible) of more chaste Dames, than that other of the Nobility: And so it fell out indeed; This Altar from that day forward was resorted unto with the same Rites and Ceremonies (in a manner) as the other which was more antient, so that no Matrons, but such as were of approved Chastity, and but once Married, were admitted to Sacrifice at the same: But in process of time, this Religious Institution was prophand, and the Altar haunted by scandalous people, not only Matrons, but Women of all sorts, until at last (the abuse causing dislike) it came to be altogether neglected and forgotten. The same Year the two Ogulni, Cn. and Q. being Ædiles of the Nobility, indicted several Persons for Usury and Extortion, who being fined, and their Goods levied, with the Money they caused a Brazen Threshold to be made in the Capitol, and three Cupboards of Plate for Jupiters Chappel, and a Figure of Jove himself sitting in his Chariot, drawn with four Eagles on the top of the Capitol: Moreover at the Fig-tree, called Ruminalis [where the Wolf gave Romulus and Remus suck] they erected the Statues of the two Children that were Founders of the City, pendant at the Teats of a Shee-Wolf; they also paved with Free-stone the Foot-way from the Gate Capena, unto the Temple of Mars. In imitation of whom, the Ædiles of the Commons, L. Emilius Pætus, and C. Fulvius Curvus, did employ the Fines they had set upon the Graziers or Farmers of the Cities Pasture-Lands, for some offences, in exhibiting several fine Shows or Plays, and setting up Golden Challices in the Temple of Ceres.

XXIV. Now Q. Fabius the fifth time, and P. Decius the fourth, enter upon their Consulship, Colleagues thrice in that Office, and once in the Centorship, and not more famous for the glory glory of their Actions, which was very great, than for that concord and good intelligence which had always been maintain'd between them: And truly, I think it was rather the fault of their several Ranks intermeddling, than any propensions of their own, that this their loving Agreement was not perpetual; for so it happened, That the Patricians would needs have the Province of Tuscany assigned to Fabius, without putting it to the Lot; and the Commons were as earnest with Decius to bring the matter to that ancient course of decision. The dispute began in the Senate, where Fabius having the greatest Interest, it was brought down to the People in the Common-Hall: where both of them, being Martial men, and standing more upon deeds than words, they made no long Harangues, only Decius said, That it was an affront for another to gather the Fruit of that Tree which he had planted; That he was the Man that first pierced the Ciminian Woods, and taught the Roman Arms a passage through those pathless and almost unpassable Forrests: What did they mean so importunately to solicit him, a person of those years, to accept the trouble of the Office, if they resolv'd to commit the conduct of that War to another? Did they intend to chuse him an Adversary instead of a Companion in the Government? Or did Decius repent of, or envy that sweet Harmony and Accord which had been between them in three Offices? For his own part, he desired no more than this, That if they thought him worthy of the Province, they would send him thither; That as he had before left it to the Senate, so he would now intirely refer himself to the People to dispose of him as they thought fit.

On the other side, Decius complain'd of the Injury offered him by the Senate, telling them, *That the Fathers had all along endeavored with all their Interest wholly to exclude Commoners from places of Trust and Honor: But after Virtue had so far prevail'd as not to be unrewarded, nor pass without due preferment in whatsoever rank of Men she appeared, they now were studying tricks, not only to elude the suffrages of the People, but over-rule Fortune it self, and reduce all things to the disposal and good pleasure of their own Cabal. That all Consuls hitherto, had by the Lot divided the Provinces; but now, contrary to custom, the Senate will by their absolute Authority assign a Province to Fabius without suffering it by the Lot to be fairly determined: Now what's the meaning of this? If it be out of respect to Fabius, I freely confess he hath deserved so well both of the Publick and of my self, that none shall be more ready than I to advance his Glory, provided always, I am not made the Foil to set it off with the greater Lustre; that mine own Honor be not Eclipsed, to make his shine the brighter, nor his reputation built upon my disgrace. But where there are two several Wars depending, but the one much more sharp and difficult than the other, and that shall be in an extraordinary way committed to the manage of one of the Consuls particularly, without so much as trusting Fortune with the decision: Who can doubt, but the other Consul is look'd upon as a Cipher, and reputed either needless, or unfit to be trusted in such an important Service? 'Tis true, Fabius does glory in his Achievements in Tuscany, and he has reason; but P. Decius desires an opportunity that he may have something to glory of in that Province likewise: And who knows but he may be able for ever to extinguish that unhappy Fire, which Fabius left behind him only rak'd up and cover'd, and which so often hath since unexpectedly broke forth in fresh Flames and Conbustions? I have that deference to my Colleague in respect of his venerable Age, and the Majesty of his Person, that I can be content to surrender to him all Titles of Honor and Rewards of Virtue; but when there is fighting in the case, and dangers to be undergone, I neither do, nor (by my good will) ever will give place to him, or any Man else whatsoever: However, if I get nothing more by this contestation of Right, I shall at least so far gain the point, that what belongs to the People they shall dispose of, rather than that the Senate should be gratified in their encroaching Pretensions: And I do heartily pray Jove, and all the Immortal Gods, so (and not otherwise) to give me a Lot as good and honorable as my Colleague, if they will also vouchsafe to give me equal Valor, Conduct and Success in the management of the War: And surely, as the antient method of the Lot is in its own nature most fair and indifferent, so the contrary practice may prove a very pernicious President; nor does it a little concern the Honor and Reputation of the People of Rome, to have it known, That her Consuls are such as either of them (not much material which) is fit and capable to manage the War in Tuscany. Fabius only prayed the People, That before they gave their Suffrages, they would bear read the Letters which App. Claudius the Prætor had lately written out of Tuscany, giving an account of the present posture of that Convery, and so went out of the Hall. And the People as unanimously as the Senate, conferr'd the Charge of Etruria upon Fabius, without putting it to the Lot.*

Mighty flocking there was now of almost all the young Blades in the Town to the Consul, and every one was ready to lift himself, so fond they were of serving under him; who told them, That he resolv'd only to levy Four thousand Foot, and Six hundred Horse: You that will enter your selves to day or to morrow, I will take along with me; but my care is not so much to have a great number of Soldiers, as to bring them home safe and enrich'd with good Booties.

XXV.

Booties. Setting forth with a competent Army (in which he confided the more, because they were select Men and Volunteers, and not a multitude of raw Fellows or pressed Men) he came to the Town Atharna, where App. Claudius the Prætor lay encamp'd, not far from the Enemy. A few miles off from thence, the Fuelers (or Persons sent out to provide Wood for the Army) with their Convoy, happened to meet him; and seeing the Lictors marching before, and understanding it was Fabius the Consul, they were almost over-joy'd, and returned Thanks both to the Gods, and People of Rome, for sending them such a worthy General: Then coming up to salute and welcome the Consul, he inquired, Whither they were going? who answered, to get Wood and Timber: Why, says he, Is not your Camp fortified? they replied, Yes, with a double Rampire and Trench, and yet they were still terribly afraid. Well, well, quoth he, You have Timber enough, get you gone back, and down with the Rampire as fast as you can: They did so, and thereby at first amaz'd not only the Soldiers that were left behind in the Camp, but Appius himself, until they told him, They did it by the express Command of Fabius the Consul. The next morning the Army dislodg'd from thence, and Appius the Prætor was dismiss'd and went to Rome: After this the Army had no standing Camp, for the Consul declared his Opinion, That it was not convenient for an Army to lie long in a place, but that it was as well more Noble, as more Healthful for them, often to change their Quarters: Their Marches were as long as the Season at present would permit, for the Winter was not yet altogether past.

Early in the Spring, leaving the second Legion at Clusium, which of old was called Camers, and having appointed L. Scipio the Pro-Prætor to be Commander in Chief during his absence, he himself return'd to Rome, to consult and take further Measures touching the War, whether of his own accord, as having a prospect that it would prove hotter Service than was commonly imagined; or whether he were call'd home by an Order of the Senate, for there are Authors that relate it each way. Some would have it thought, that his return was occasion'd by Ap. Claudius the Prætor, who both in the Senate, and to the People (as he had formerly done by his Letters) did continually augment the terror of the Tuscan War, and represent it in most hideous colours, "That one General, nor one Army, would never be enough against four several Nations; that it would be equally dangerous, whether jointly in a Body they gave Battel, or whether being separated, they carry'd on the War in divers Quarters, 'twas impossible one Man should be able to give the necessary Orders for all at once; That he left there but two Roman Legions, and that both the Horse and Foot that came with Fabius were not full Five thousand Men effective; that 'twas his Opinion the other Consul should immediately be dispatch'd into Tuscany to his Colleague, and that L. Volumnius in the mean time should have the charge of Samnium; or if the Consul had rather go into his own Province, that then Volumnius, with a compleat Consular Army, should be sent into Etruria. This Discourse of the Prætors had influenced a great part of the House, had not P. Decius thwarted it thus: "That all things, in his Opinion, should be left free and intire to the Judgment of Fabius, until such time as he himself, if it might stand with the Publick safety, came to Rome, or at least sent one of the Commissary-Generals, by whom the Senate may be truly informed of the State of the War in Tuscany, and what Forces and Commanders it would require.

XXVI. Fabius, when he came to Rome, both in the Senate and his Oration to the People, held a middle tenor of Discourse, so as he might not seem to over-magnifie, nor yet to under-rate the report of the War, and to shew them that in assuming another General, he did rather indulge other Mens fears, than do it for any need either himself or the Publick had thereof: But (says he) if it be your pleasure that I shall have a Coadjutor and Partner in Command, How can I forget P. Decius the Consul, whom I have had such good Experience of? Of all Men in the World, there is none that I would rather have joyned with me; for having Decius with me, I will never think my own Forces too few, nor the Enemy too many: But if my Colleague Decius be not inclinable to it, then I desire L. Volumnius may be my Assistant. The determination of all was left both by the Senate and the People, and by Decius himself, unto Fabius: And when Decius had declared, That he was ready to go either to Samnium or Tuscany, which his Partner pleased, there was such general rejoicing and congratulations, as if People did already in their minds preface a Victory, and the Consuls seem'd marching out to fetch home an assured Triumph, rather than manage a difficult and dangerous War. In some Authors, I find, that both Fabius and Decius went into Etruria at the very beginning of their Consulship, without mention of parting their Provinces by Lot, or any of those squabbles between them which I have recited. But there are others that do not only attest the same, but over and besides tell us how Appius the Prætor, accused Fabius in his absence before the People with sharp Invectives, and behav'd himself very obstinately and strangely to his face; and of another difference between the Consuls, occasioned by Decius's insisting, that each should keep himself wholly to the Province allotted him. But from the time that they both set forwards upon the Expedition, the Story is clear and certain.

Before

Before the Consuls were got quite to Tuscany, the Tribe of the Gauls, called Senones, came in vast multitudes as far as Clusium to attack the Roman Legion that lay there encamp'd. Scipio, who was their Commander in Chief, hoping to help out the finalness of his Numbers, with the advantages of the Ground, led his Army up to the Hill between the Town and the Camp; but (as often it happens in an hurry) having not sufficiently discovered the Passages before-hand, when he came near the top of the Hill, he found the same possess'd by the Enemy, who were got up to it another way. Thus was the Legion charg'd, Front, Flank and Rear, surrounded and cut to pieces, so that some Writers affirm, there was not one left alive to carry tidings of their Defeat, and that the Consuls knew nothing on't, until near Clusium they had a sight of some of the Gallick Troops, carrying in Triumph the Heads of those they had slain; some hanging at their Horses Petronels, others aloft advanced upon the points of their Spears, and they themselves chanting Songs of Victory after their barbarous fashion: Yet some say, they were not Gauls, but Umbrians that did this, and that the loss was nothing so great, for that L. Manlius Torquatus, selves sure of the day, to fight it over again; where he routed them, took many Prisoners, and recovered all the Booty. But still, 'tis more likely that they were Gauls than Umbrians that gave the Romans this overthrow, because, as often at other times, so especially this Year, the City was in great dread and fear of the Gauls. Inasmuch that besides the Consuls marching out with four Legions, and a great Body of Horse, all Romans, and a thousand Campanian Horse drawn out on purpose for that Service, and a power of Larines and other Allies, making a greater Body than that of the Romans: There were moreover two other Armies brought into the Field, not far from the City, on that side that looks towards the Frontiers of Tuscany; one in the Faliscan Territories, the other in the Vatican; Cn. Fulvius, and L. Posthumus Megellus the Pro-Prætors, being ordered to keep their standing Camps in those places respectively.

The Consuls having pass'd the Appennine, advanc'd near the Enemy in the Country of the Sentinats, and encamp'd not full four miles distant from them; who held frequent Councils, and at last agreed to act separately, and neither joyn in one Camp, nor engage all at once in any Battel; but that the Gauls should be united with the Samnites, and the Umbrians with the Tuscans: They also appointed a day for a Battel, which the Samnites and Gauls were to manage; and at the same time, the Etrurians and Umbrians to storm the Romans Camp. But these resolutions were frustrated by three Clusine Renegado's, who came secretly in the night to Fabius, and discovered all the Enemies Counsels, whom he rewarded and sent back, that from time to time as new Measures were taken, they might give him intelligence. The Consuls write to Fulvius and Posthumus, that removing from the several places where they were posted, they should advance to Clusium, and with all their Forces over-run, wast and destroy the Enemies Country. The News of which Incurfion call'd home the Tuscans to defend their own Territories; in whose absence, the Consuls for two days together provok'd the Enemy to a Battel, but little was done either of those days more than skirmishing, wherein some were kill'd on each side, and their Spirits warm'd for the grand Encounter, rather than any tryal made of the main Chance. But on the third day, into the plain Field they came with all their Forces. As the Armies stood in Battalia, a Hind chased by a Wolf out of the Mountains, happened to run in the midst between them, where they took several ways; the Hind to the Cauls (who kill'd her) the Wolf to the Romans, who opening their Ranks and Files, gave him clear passage through their Host: Upon which accident a Roman of the Forlorn-Hope, cryed out aloud, There will the fight, there the slaughter be, where you see Diana's Beast yonder lie kill'd; but here on our side, the Martial Wolf, having gon clear away with Victory, unwounded and untouch'd, does fitly represent us and the Founder of our City, descended of God Mars's race. The Gauls stood in the Right Wing, the Samnites in the left; against the latter Fabius placed himself in the Right Wing with the first and third Legions; and against the former, Decius, with the fifth and sixth: For the second and third were in Samnium, under L. Volumnius the Pro-Consul. At the first shock, the strength of either side appeared so equally ballanced, that if the Tuscans and Umbrians had either shew'd themselves in the Field, or attack'd the Camp, the Romans must needs in either place have received a great loss and overthrow.

But though Fortune had not as yet declared her self in favor of either party, yet the manner of the Fight was not alike in both Wings; for the Romans, under Fabius, fought rather defensively than offensively, and fought more to keep off, than charge the Enemy, lingering out the Battel as long as they could, till it was very late in the day; for the Consul was satisfied, that both the Samnites and Gauls were best at the first push, and therefore it was enough to keep off that Fury in the beginning; for the longer the Battel held, the Samnites spirits more and more would flag, and their Courage abate: That the Bodies of the Gauls, were the least able of all others, to endure heat and long fatigues, and their Courage would quickly be spent and languish; for though in the Onset they were more than than Men, in the process of a Battel they were less than Women: Therefore he reserv'd his Soldiers fresh and in breath against that time when they should begin to faint. Decius more fierce, both by his Youth and natural Temper, charg'd the Enemy with all his Force at the very first, and thinking the Foot too slow, brought on the Cavalry to encrease the fury of the Battel; for mixing himself with a brave Troop of young Gentlemen, he begs they would follow him in a Charge upon the Enemy; That they would gain a double Honor if the Victory began on the Left Wing, and by the Gallantry of the Horse. Twice had they forc'd the Gallick Troops to retreat, and the second time made them give ground a great way, and were broke into the midst of them, when a new mode of fighting presented it self; the Gauls had certain Chariots or Waggon on which numbers of them stood extraordinarily armed, and with a strange noise of the Horses that drew them, and wonderful rattling of the Wheels, ran full upon the Romans, and frighted their Horses not enur'd to such uncouth noises: so that they who before were just at the point of Victory, now fled as if the Devil drove them, and both Men and Horses threw down one another: In this confused Repulse they disordered the Foot, and many of those that fought in the Van were trod to pieces, and their guts squash'd out either by the flying Horses, or these Chariots that pursued them, and forc'd their way through the midst of the Squadrons; for the Gauls seeing them in a consternation, press'd hard upon them, and would give them no time to rally. Decius fail'd not to call out to his Men, Whither run you, Gentlemen? Or what hopes can you have in flight? He endeavored all he could to stop those that retreated, and put those that were scatter'd, into order; but seeing his Soldiers so much daunted, that he could by no means prevail with them to make head against the Enemy, calling upon his Father Decius by name: Why, quoth he, do I defer that Fate which is now familiar to our Family? 'Tis the privilege of our Race to be propitiatory Sacrifices for diverting threatened Dangers from the Publick. Even now therefore will I offer up the Enemies Legions, with my self, to Dame Tellus and the Infernal Gods: Saying this, he commands M. Livius the Pontiff (whom when he first went into the Battel, he charg'd not to leave him) to pronounce the Solemn Words by which he might Devote himself for the Roman Army. And so with the same form of Imprecation, and in the same Habit as was used by his Father, adding this Prayer, That he might wherever he went, carry with him Terror and Flight, Blood and Slaughter, and all the Wrath and Vengeance of the Gods in Heaven and Fiends in Hell; That he might infect the Banners, Ammunition and Armor of the Enemy with Curses, and the utmost overbrow and desolation; and that the same place might be both their destruction and his own: He spurring on his Horse, hurl'd himself amongst the thickest of the Enemy, where with an heap of their Weapons he was immediately slain.

XXIX. Thenceforwards the Battel seem'd not to be manag'd by humane Force: The Romans having lost their General, which is wont to others to administer fear and terror, presently stop their flight, fac'd about, and renew'd the Battel as resolutely as if but just then they had come into the Field: The Gauls, and especially the croud, surrounding the Consuls Corps, as if they had left their Senses, either stood still, or flung their Darts from them at random to no purpose, and were altogether stupified, forgetting both to fight or to fly. On the other side, Livius the Pontiff, to whom Decius had left the Ensigns of his Office, and made him Pro-prator, cryed out as loud as he could, That the Romans had already the Victory; That by their Consuls voluntary death they had discharged all their ill luck; but as for the Gauls and Samnites, they were now destinatd to mother Earth and the Gods below; That Decius was plucking after him that Army which with himself was devoted to destruction, and all the Enemies Host full of nothing but terror and consternation. Whilst these were thus renewing the Fight, Cornelius Scipio and C. Marcius came up with fresh Forces from the Rear, sent by Fabius to the relief of his Colleague; who being informed of Decius's gallant end, it was a wonderful encouragement to them to run all hazards for their Country. The Gauls stood exceeding thick together, with their Targets before them, so that to cope with them at handy-strokes was to little purpose; the Roman Commanders therefore ordered the Darts and Lances that lay scattered on the ground between the two Armies to be gathered up, and flung at the Enemy, who now stood like a Tortoise in his shell impregnable: But these Darts and Javelins sticking in their Targets, and many of them lighting upon, and with their sharp points piercing into their Bodies, that Wedge-like Battalion began to scatter, and many of them, though not wounded, did like men amaz'd tumble upon one another. Thus various was the Fortune of the Romans Left Wing. But on the Right, Fabius having as aforesaid lingered out the day, at last, when he perceiv'd that the Enemies shouts grew fainter, their Charges weaker, and their Darts and Javelins not lanc'd with the same force and vigor as before, he commands the Captains of the Horse to wheel about from the Wings; that upon a Signal given, they might Charge the Samnites on the Flank: In the mean time, he by degrees advanc'd his Legionary Foot, and made the Enemy give ground; seeing therefore that they made no considerable resistance, and that 'twas plain they were weary'd out, then he brought up all his Reserves which he had kept fresh for such an opportunity, and at the same time gave the Signal Signal to the Cavalry to fall on. The Samnites were not able to stand the fury of such an impetuous Charge, but fled in confusion to recover their Camp, running by the Battalions of their Friends the Gauls, whom they left to maintain the Fight as well as they could. The Gauls compacted themselves in a close order, and stood immovable; and therefore Fabius being advertis'd of the death of his Colleague, commands a Wing of Campanian Horse, consisting of almost Five hundred, to withdraw out of the Conflict, and wheeling about to Charge them in the Rear, and the foremost Divisions of the third Legion to follow them; and wherever the Horse should disorder the Enemy, they were to second them. Whilst he himself having first vow'd a Temple to Jupiter the Conqueror, and all the spoils of the Enemy, pursued the Samnites to their Camp, where he found all on an heap, and in the greatest consternation imaginable under the Rampire; for the Ports were so narrow that they could not all get in at once: They that were shut out by the throng, made an offer to renew the Fight, and there Gellius Egnatius the Samnite General was slain, but they were quickly cut off or beat into the Works, which after a small skirmish were also taken by the Romans, and then the Gauls surrounded and cut to pieces. There were kill'd that day of the Enemies Five and twenty thousand, and Eight thousand taken Prisoners. Nor was this glorious Victory purchased without Roman Blood, for of P. Decius's Army there fell Seven thousand, and Fabius lost Twelve hundred. The Spoils of the Enemy were all heap'd up together, and burnt as a Sacrifice to Jove the Victor. The Consul Decius's Body could not that day be found, being covered with the Carcasses of the Gauls; but next day it was discover'd, and brought to the Roman Camp, with a general lamentation of his Soldiers: Whose Funeral Obsèques, Fabius, setting all other Affairs aside for the time, caused to be Celebrated with the highest Honors and Applauses.

About the same time likewise Cn. Fulvius the Pro-Prator had as good Success in Tuscany as could be wish'd; for besides the vast damage done the Enemy by over-running and plundering the Country, he routed them in a pitch'd Battel, where of Perusines and Clusines, above Three thousand were slain, and twenty Colours taken. As the Relicks of the Samnites Army fled through the Territories of the Pelignians, they were by them intercepted, and slaughtered, so that of Five thousand there was scarce a thousand left. This Battel fought in the Sentinates Country, was certainly a great Action, and deservedly famous if a Man keep strictly to Truth, and make no more on't than 'twas; but some have Romanic'd upon it, and say, That the Enemy had Forty thousand three hundred and thirty Foot, Six thousand Horse, and a Thousand War-Chariots, including the Umbrians and Tuscans, whom they will have to be in this Fight; and that they may encrease the Roman Forces proportionably, they add to them L. Volumnius, the Pro-Consul, and his Army. But in most Chronicles, the honor of this Victory is ascribed only to the two Consuls; for Volumnius was at that time managing the War in Samnium, where, having forc'd the Enemy to take the Hill Tifernum, nothing discouraged with the disadvantage of the place, he pursued and utterly routed them. Q. Fabius leaving the Decian Army in Tuscany, march'd back with his own Legions to Rome, and Triumph'd over the Gauls, Tuscans and Samnites, the Soldiers following him with their rude Military Catches, wherein they did not more celebrate and applaud the Victory of Fabius, than the noble Death of Decius, equalling the Glories of the Son in all respects, publick or private, with the Renown of his Father, who expos'd himself in the same manner for the good of his Country not many years before. In lieu of the spoil, the Soldiers had given them Eighty two pieces of Money apiece, and every one a Campaign Coat and Tunick; no contemptible Military Reward in those days.

But for all these notable Victories, neither the Samnites nor the Tuscans would yet be quiet; for as soon as the Consul was gone with his Army, the Perusines began to Rebel, and the Samnites in several Parties came down to forrage and ransack the adjacent Provinces; some into the Territories of Vestin and Formianum, and others into Aferniac, and the Banks of the River Volturnus. Against whom Appius Claudius the Prator was sent forth with the Army which Decius lately commanded. Fabius himself undertook to chastize the Tuscan Rebels, and killed Four thousand and five hundred of the Perusines, and took One thousand seven hundred and forty of them Prisoners, who were forced to pay Three hundred and ten Asles [that is, about Forty six shillings and ten pence] apiece, for their Ransome: All the rest of the Booty was distributed amongst the Soldiers. The Samnite Forces being hard pursued by App. Claudius one way, and by L. Volumnius the other, rendezvouz'd altogether in the Territory of Stella; and there also Claudius and Volumnius join'd their Troops. A sharp and cruel Fight it was on both sides; the one enraged against those that had so oft rebelled, and the other now grown desperate and resolv'd to run all hazards: Of the Samnites Sixteen thousand and three hundred slain; of the Romans, Two thousand seven hundred.

This Year so prosperous in Military Affairs, was by reason of Pestilence very doleful, and mens minds much perplex'd with Prodigies; for 'twas reported, that in divers places it rain'd Earth, and in the Army of App. Claudius several Soldiers were blasted with Lightning, therefore the Books of the Sybils were consulted. The same Year Q. Fabius Gurges, the the Consul's Son, find certain Matrons convicted and condemned before the People of Adultery, and with the Money caused the Temple of Venus to be built, which stands near the Circus, or grand Racing-place. The Samnite Wars still continued, which have already fill'd the most part of our last four Books, for the space of Six and forty years, from the Consulship of M. Valerius and A. Cornelius, who were the first that carried the War into that Country; and not to repeat the alternative overthrows and fatigues of both Nations, by which yet their stout Courages were nothing daunted; let it suffice to say, That although these Samnites the very last Year, both in the Sentine Fields, and amongst the Pelignians, and at Tifernum and Stella, were miserably shattered and defeated with their own proper Legions, and likewise join'd with others their Confederates, by four several Roman Armies, under four distinct Commanders in Chief; and though they had lost the bravest General of their Nation, and saw their Allies, the Etrurians, Umbrians and Gauls, in the same forlorn condition with themselves, and that they were no longer able to subsist either with their own Forces, or any Auxiliaries from abroad; yet for all this they would not give over the War, so little did they repent them of defending their Liberties, though unsuccessfully, and chose rather to be daily vanquish'd, than not daily try for a Victory. And who is it that will not be wearied in writing or reading so tedious a War, which never wearied those that manag'd it?

The next Consuls after Q. Fabius and P. Decius, were L. Posthumius Megellus, and M. Atilius Regulus, who were both ordered to take charge of Samnium, because 'twas reported the Enemy had prepared three compleat Armies; one for Etruria, another to Forrage Campania, and the third to defend their own Frontiers; but sickness detain'd Posthumius at Rome: Atilius marching out in all haste with the Army, that he might surprize the Enemy in Samnium before they had taken the Field (for so the Senate had given direction) found them ready on the way to meet him, as if it had been design'd; so that he could not enter into, much less forrage the Samnites Country; as on the other side he stop'd them from going thence into the peaceable Territories of the Roman Allies. Being Encamp'd near together, what the Romans, so often Conquerors, scarce durst attempt, the Samnites ventured upon (see how despair pushes Men on to extremities) even to attack the Romans in their Camp. And though this rash Enterprize succeeded not, yet it was not altogether in vain. There chanc'd to be a foggy Mist, which continued a good part of the day so thick and palpable, that it hindered all Prospect, not only from the Rampire at a distance, but also those that were near together could scarce see one another: The Samnites taking the advantage thereof, before it was full day, and that too so overcast, came up to the Roman Corps-du-guard at the entrance of the Camp, who were too secure and negligent; and being thus surprized, had neither the Courage, nor were strong enough to resist them. So that on the back side of the Camp, they rush'd in at the great Port called Decumana, and took the Questors Tent, the Questor himself, L. Opimius Pansa, being there slain, whereupon on every side the Alarm was given.

XXXIII.

The Consul raised with this Tumult, commanded two Companies of the Allies (one of Lucanians, the other Suessans) who were next at hand, to guard the Head-Quarters, and leads up some Legionary Bands that had scarce yet got on their Armor, along the principal Street of the Camp, and set them as well as he could in order. They knew the Enemy rather by their Out-cries, than that they could see them; nor could they guess at their number. This made them at first retreat, as doubtful of their Fortune, and receiv'd the Enemy into the middle of the Camp; but then the Consul cryed out, and ask'd them, If they meant to be turn'd out of their own Fortifications, and afterwards make a new work on't to recover them? Whereupon they first stop'd, set up a shout, and presently advanc'd, and charg'd the Enemy, whom they drove back with as much terror as they came in, and beat them clear out at the Gate, and beyond the Works, but did not think fit to pursue them any further, for fear of an Ambuscade, the weather being so dark and hazy. Glad that they had rid them out of the Camp, they kept themselves within their Trenches, having kill'd near Three hundred of the Enemy: Of the Roman Out-guard and Sentinels, and those about the Questors Tent, there were slain One hundred and twenty. This bold adventure proving not altogether unsuccessful, raised the spirits of the Samnites, so that they would not suffer the Romans to remove their Camp any further into the County, nor send out any Parties for Forrage; whereupon they were forced to retire into the peaceable Quarters of their Friends about Sora for Provisions. The noise of these unwelcome Occurrences (represented much worse than in truth they were) at Rome caused L. Posthumius the Consul, though he had scarce recovered his Health, to depart from thence, having by an Edict appointed all his Soldiers to come to a Rendezvous at Sora. Himself now dedicated unto the Goddess Victoria that Temple, which he ordered to be built when he was Curule Aedile, with the money raised out of the Fines of several Persons convicted of misdemeanors. Then he march'd his Army from Sora towards Samnium to the Camp of his Colleague; but the Samnites finding themselves incapable of making Head against two such Armies, dislodg'd and retreated, and the Consuls taking several Courses, proceed to harass the Country, and attack the Cities of the Enemy.

Posthumius

Posthumius invest'd Milunium, and first endeavored to carry it by Storm, but afterwards by approaches, and bringing Engines of Battery close up to the Walls, with which having made some Breaches, his Soldiers entred; yet from ten in the Morning, till two in the After-noon, the Fight continued very sharp and doubtful in all parts of the Town, but in the end the Romans became Masters of it; of the Samnites there were slain Three thousand two hundred, and Four thousand two hundred taken, besides other Booty. Next, the Army march'd to Ferentinum, but the Inhabitants, with all that they could either drive or carry, had in the Night quitted the Town at the Postern-Gate; so that when the Consul in the Morning had drawn up his Men expecting to have met with the same resistance as he had at Milunium, he admired at that strange Silence in the Town, and that he saw neither Men nor Arms on the Walls, or any of the Works, and kept back the eager Soldiers from scaling the deserted Walls, lest they should fall into some Ambush; therefore he commanded two Troops of Horse of the Latines, to skirt round about the Out-works for discovery, who finding a Gate or two wide open on one side, and apparent tracks of the Enemies Nocturnal flight, and that the City was wholly abandoned, brought back the news thereof to the Consul, who thereupon leading a Party thither, ordered five Horse-men to enter the Town, and if they saw all safe, three of them to stay there, and the other two to return; who informing him, That they could perceive nothing but silence and solitude, he with some light-arm'd Regiments went into the Town, charging the rest in the mean time to pitch their Tents and fortifie a Camp. The Soldiers that went in, fell presently to breaking open of the Doors, and found only a few aged People, or such as were sick and weak, left behind with Lumber that was too heavy to be removed; and by the Prisoners they understood, that not only the Inhabitants of that, but of several other Towns, were all with one accord fled and gone; that their own People went away in the beginning of the Night, and they verily believed he would find the rest of the Towns thereabouts quitted in like manner; which proved very true, and the Consul possess'd himself of those forsaken Places.

The other Consul M. Atilius met not with so easie a War; for having drawn his Legions to Luceria, which he understood was besieged by the Samnites, the Enemy came forth to encounter him upon the Frontiers, with a rage equal to their strength; the Fight was various and doubtful, but the issue more fatal to the Romans, as well because they were now not wont to be baffled, as for that they found more of their Men kill'd and wounded in their disorderly Retreat, than in the Combat it self. These dreadful considerations they were not sensible of, till after they were got into their Camp, which if they had apprehended during the Conflict, the loss and overthrow had undoubtedly been much greater. They pass'd over the Night very uneasily, as fearing the Samnites would storm their Camp, or at least that they must be obliged in the Morning to engage again with those who had already worsted them. But though the Enemies loss was less, their Courage was not greater, for at break of day they were very desirous to get away without renewing the Combate: But there was but one passage, and that lay just by the side of the Roman Leaguer, so that when they were come into it, they seemed as if they were marching to rights to attack that Camp; whereupon the Consul commanded his Men to arm, and follow him without the Rampire, and to his Lieutenants, Colonels, and Captains of the Associated Forces, he gave the necessary Orders, who all promised punctually to execute the same as far as 'twas possible, but withal told him, That the Soldiers hearts were down; that they had scarce slept a wink all night, for the pains of their own Wounds, or the dismal groans of their Comrades that lay a dying; That if the Enemy had approach'd the Camp before it was day, so daunted they are, they would undoubtedly have fled from their Colours, and it must be only shame that can now keep them from running away, for otherwise they are already as bad as beaten. The Consul hearing this, thought it best to go about amongst them in Person, and speak to and encourage them, and when he saw any backward to betake them to their Arms, check'd them thus: Why loiter ye, Gentlemen? and go so coldly about your business? The Enemy will certainly come into the very Camp and cut our Throats, if we do not march out and repulse them, you must presently be forced to fight at your Tent-doors, if you will not manfully defend your Out-works; and whoever shall naked and unarmed attend the Enemies coming, must assuredly dye for it, or (which is worse) endure slavery as long as he lives. Whilst thus he rebuk'd and reproach'd their Fears, they flatly answered, That they had enough and too much of Yesterdays work; That they had no strength, nor scarce Blood left, and the Enemies appear in greater numbers now than before. Whilst they were thus bandying of Words, the Enemy approached, and being now at a less distance, so that they could have a more certain prospect, because the Samnites had their Baggage with them (as designing not so much to fight as to march off) the Romans concluded they brought with them stakes and pales to raise a Palizado round about their Camp, and so meant to block them up: Then the Consul cry'd out upon them for shame, to suffer this most vile disgrace, from a pittiful cowardly Enemy: What (says he) shall we let them empale and chop us up? and will you chuse rather to perish for hunger with Infamy, than to fall by the Swords point (if Fate will have it so) with

Gallantry

Gallantry and Honor? The Gods defend the Roman name from such dastardly baseness! Let each man do as he shall think best becomes him: The Consul M. Attilius (though not a Soul should follow him) resolves alone to Charge the Enemy, and thinks it much better to fall bravely amongst the Samnites Standards, than live to see the Romans besieged in their Camp. This resolution of the Consul, the Lieutenant-Generals and Colonels, the Cavalry and principal Centurions, all applauded, so that at last for very shame the common Soldiers began to handle their Arms, but after an heartless fashion, and as slowly did they march out of the Camp; not thick and close united, but in a long broken Train, with heavy cheer, and looks that would better have become a Rout than a Charge, they fac'd the Enemy, who were much in the same condition, as hopeless and dead-hearted as themselves. For as soon as they discovered the Roman Ensigns, a whisper ran amongst the Samnites from Van to Rear, That the Romans were come out to intercept their Passage (the only thing they always feared) so that there was now no means left to escape, no, though they would run for't, but they must either dye on the spot, or cut their way through the thickest Squadrons of the Enemy: Presently they flung all their Baggage together on an heap in the midst of their Army, and drew up in Battalia.

XXXVI. There was now but a very small space between the two Armies, and each stood expecting when the other would fall on, neither of them having any stomach to fight; so that they had parted without a stroke struck, but for fear which soever first should march away, the other would attack him with advantage. Thus between willing and unwilling, at last a kind of a dull fight was begun with a faint halloo shout, nor did a Man advance a step. To warm and quicken the work, the Roman Consul sent out some few Cornets of Horse from their main Body, to Charge the Enemy, who being for the most part knock'd off their Horses, or otherwise disordered, Parties came out apace both from the Samnites Host to kill those that were fallen, and from the Romans to relieve them. Here the Skirmish grew pretty hot, but the Samnites advanced forwards in greater numbers, and ply'd their Blows more lustily; and besides, the affrighted Horses flying backwards, trod to pieces many of the Foot that came to their rescue, who beginning to fly, set the whole Roman Army upon the run, and the Samnites plaid upon their backs as they fled; seeing this, the Consul wheeling about with his Horse, rode before to the Camp-Gate, where he planted a good Guard of the Cavalry, charging them, that whoever came thither, were he friend or foe, Samnite or Roman, they should immediately dispatch him. And threatening the same Severities, he set himself against the Soldiers that were running towards the Camp: Whither away, Sirrah? (cries he to each Soldier he met) you shall here meet with Men and Arms to oppose your Cowardize as well as in the Field; as long as your Consul lives, here's no entering the Camp without Victory: Take your choice therefore, whether you will fight with the Enemy, or with your Fellow-Citizens. Whilst the Consul thus entertain'd them, the Horse came round about, threatening them with the naked points of their Spears, and command them at their peril to face about. Fortune was not wanting in this Extremity to the Consul's courage, for it happened, that the Samnites did not follow the Chase so hard, but he had both ground and time enough to rally his Men, and bring about his Standards to face the Enemy: Then they began to hearten on one another to try the other Bout; the Captains snatch'd the Colours, and themselves advanc'd and flourish'd them to encourage their Men, telling them, The Enemy was but few in number, and weary as well as they, and besides, came against them now in disorder and a confused march. Amongst the rest, the Consul lifting up his hands to Heaven, with a loud Voice that the Soldiers might hear him, vows a Temple to Jupiter Stator (Jove the Stayer) if the Roman Army should cease their flight, stand to it bravely, and in this second Charge defeat the Samnites. Thence-forwards they endeavored on all hands, both Commanders and Soldiers, Foot and Horse, to reinforce the Battel with their utmost efforts; nor was the favor of the Gods (as it seems) wanting to take pity on the Roman Name at that Juncture, so quickly the Dice turn'd, the Enemies in a moment boat back from the Camp, and reduc'd to the same spot of Ground where the Fight first began: Where, by the great heap of their Fardles and Baggage, they were stop'd in their retreat, and for fear of losing their Gear, cast themselves in a Ring to defend it; but whilst the Roman Foot charg'd them in the Front, their Horse were got about, and fell upon in the Rear, so that they were cut to pieces in the middle, or taken Captive: For the number of the Prisoners was Seven thousand three hundred, who were all forced to pass naked under the Gallows, and so released; the number of those slain out-right, amounted to Four thousand eight hundred. Nor had the Romans much cause to boast of their Victory, for the Consul taking a review of his Army, found that he had lost in these two days, Seven thousand and three hundred Men.

During these Occurrences in Apulia, the Samnites with another Army, attack Interamna, a Roman Colony situate on the High Road to Latium, and though they could not win the Town, they plundered the Country round about it, and as they were driving away a vast Booty as well of Cattel as of People, whom they had taken, they chanc'd to be met with by the Victorious Consul in his return from Luceria, and lost not only their Prey, but marching marching stragglingly and in disorder, were most of them cut to pieces. The Consul march'd to Interamna, where he made Proclamation for all persons to come and receive their Goods recovered from the Enemy; and leaving his Army there, he himself repair'd to Rome to hold the Elections: He put in for a Triumph, but that honor was denied him, as well because he had lost so many thousand Men, as because he had released the Prisoners only upon their passing under the Gallows, without holding them to Ransom, or some harder Articles.

The other Consul Posthumus, finding no work for his Arms in Samnium, carry'd his Army into Tuscany, where first he wasted the Fields of the Volturnians, and when they came out to defend themselves, fought with them almost under their own Walls; Two thousand and two hundred being slain, the rest sheltered themselves in the City, being so near. Thence he advanc'd to the Territory of Rosellum, where he not only harra's'd the Country, but also took the City, and therein above Two thousand People, besides almost Two thousand men slain before the Walls: But still the Peace that Year obtain'd in Tuscany, was more honorable and of greater advantage than all these successes of War: For three of the most considerable States, viz. The Volturnians, Perusians, and Aretians, (the principal People of all that Country) made Overtures for Peace; and having upon an agreement to allow his Soldiers so much Corn and Cloaths, obtain'd the Consul's leave to send their Agents to Rome for that purpose, obtain'd a Truce for the term of Forty years, each City paying down for a present Fine, the sum of Five hundred thousand Asces [about One thousand five hundred sixty two pound ten shillings, sterling.] For these exploits, the Consul claiming a Triumph, rather for fashion-sake, than that he could hope to obtain it; some of the Senators object'd against him, That he did not set out from the City so early as he ought to have done; others, that he left Samnium, and went into Tuscany without Orders; some because they were his Enemies; some because they were the other Consul's Friends (to whom it would be some satisfaction that his Colleague was put by that Honor as well as he) all for some reasons or other were against his Triumphing; whereupon in an Huff he thus express'd his Resentments to the Senate: Though I have a very great Deference and Veneration, Conscript Fathers! for the Majesty and Authority of this House, yet I shall not so far regard it, as to forget that I am Consul: As by the right of my Place I manag'd these Wars, so having happily concluded them, subdued both the Samnites and Tuscans, and obtained Victory and Peace, by the same Right will I Triumph without asking your leave; and so in an heat flung out of the Senate. Amongst the Tribunes of the Commons there was variance, some threatening to oppose their Negative, That he should not Triumph in this manner as had never yet been practis'd, and must be a very ill president; others of them were for favoring and promoting his Triumph: After much ado, the matter was brought before the People in Common-Hall; where the Consul being summoned, after he had Remonstrated how heretofore the Consuls L. Horatius, and Marcus Valerius, and of late his own Father C. Marcus Rutilius, when he was Censor, had all Triumph'd not by the Authority of the Senate, but by the Ordinance of the People; he added, That he also would have moved the same to the People, but that he knew there were some of their Tribunes such Slaves to the Nobility, as they would have obstructed the Bill: As for himself he did, and ever would account the will and favor of the People agreeing together, to be as good as any formal Commands. And the next day, by the interest of three Tribunes against the opposition of seven, and against the general Resolution of the Senate, he did celebrate a Triumph, and the People joyfully solemnized the honor of the day.

But it must be noted, That the actions of this Year are very uncertainly and variously related; for Claudius writes, That Posthumus after the taking of a few Cities in Samnium, was routed and put to flight in Apulia, and himself wounded, and glad to take shelter with a few others that escap'd in Luceria. And that the prosperous Actions in Tuscany were achiev'd by Attilius, and that he was the Man that Triumph'd. Fabius on the contrary sets down, That both the Consuls managed the War in Samnium, and at Luceria; and that one of the Armies was thence drawn into Tuscany, but mentions not which Consul it was that Commanded it. He also tells us, That before Luceria there was great slaughter on both sides, and that in that Battel it was, that a Temple was vowed to Jupiter Stator, as Romulus did of old; but all this while, there had been no Temple actually erected, but only a Fanum [that is, a place set out and consecrated; whereon to build a Temple.] But now this Year, the Commonwealth becoming a second time obliged to perform the same Vow, Religious Reverence mov'd the Senate to Decree and Order, that a Temple should there be built accordingly.

The next Year, succeeded both a most excellent Consul L. Papirius Cursor, a person illustrious, as well for his Fathers Glory as his own, and also a mighty great War, and such a signal Victory as never any to that day had obtain'd the like over the Samnites, except it were L. Papirius his Father; and as it fell out, they had made just the like pompous preparations, and gaudy Armor now as then: But at this time, they moreover sought to conciliate the favor of the Gods to their party, by initiating their Soldiers in a strange kind kind of Oath administered with certain antient, but dreadful Rites and Ceremonies: For having made a general levy throughout all Samnum, with a new Law, That whosoever of Age fit to bear Arms, should not appear at the Rendezvous according to the Generals Edict, or afterwards should depart without License, should forfeit his Head to Jupiter as accursed. The place of Rendezvous was appointed at Aquilonia, where the whole strength of Samnum met together, to the number of Forty thousand fighting Men. In the midst of the Camp there was a plat of Ground fenced in with Hurdles and Boards, and covered over with Linnen Cloth, about Two hundred foot square: There a solemn Sacrifice was celebrated, and Service said out of an old Book with a Linnen cover, by one Ovius Paccius the Priest, a very old Fellow, who avow'd that he deriv'd that Sacred Form from the antient Religion of the Samnites, which their Ancestors had made use of, at such time as they secretly contrived to seize upon Capua, and take it from the Etrurians. The Sacrifice being dispatched, the General caused the Marshal to call in such as were most noble and renowned for their Quality and Valour, who were brought in one by one. There was besides other sacred Furniture, which might strike Mens minds with a Religious awe, in the middle of this place so covered on all parts, an Altar, and certain Sacrifices lying slain, and divers Captains standing round with their drawn Swords: The Soldier was brought up to the Altar, rather as a Sacrifice himself, than a partaker of the Oblations, and was first sworn to keep secret all that he should there see or hear; and then was forced also to take an Oath, composed after the manner of a Charm, with most bitter Imprecations and Curses against his own Life, his Family and all his Race, unless he should go into the Battel wherever his Commanders should lead him; or if either he himself should at any time fly out of the Battel, or not presently kill any other whom he should see give ground or like to run away. Some at first refusing to take this Curse were beheaded upon the Altars, and their Bodies lying amongst the slaughtered Carcasses, were a warning to the rest to conform. All the principal Persons having bound themselves with this Detestation; ten of them were particularly nominated by the Commander in chief, who every one were charged to chuse himself a Comrade, and they likewise to take others to them man by man, until they compleated the number of sixteen thousand, which were called the Linnen Legion, taking that name from the covering of that place where the Samnite Nobles were first sworn; these had brave Arms bestowed upon them, and crested Helmets, that they might seem taller than the rest. There was another Army consisting of Twenty thousand Men and upwards, who neither for able Bodies, nor past Services in the Wars, nor useful Armor, came short of the Linnen Brigade in any respect. This great multitude and so strong, Encamped themselves not far from Aquilonia.

XXXIX.

The Consuls setting forth from the City, first Sp. Carvilius, who had the Command of the old Legions which the former Consul M. Atilius left at Interamna, advances with them into Samnum; and whilst the Enemy was thus busie in their Superstitions and secret Consultations, took the City Amiternum, where were slain almost Two thousand eight hundred People, and Four thousand two hundred and seventy taken. Papirius having levied a new Army (for so the Senate had ordered) storm'd Duronia, where though he took not so many Prisoners as his Colleague, yet he kill'd more in the Conflict. At both places there was very rich Booty. Thence the Consuls proceeded to over-run the Country, especially about Atinium; Carvilius march'd to Cominium, and Papirius to Aquilonia, where the whole Power of the Samnites was posted. There for a while they were neither altogether idle, nor very smartly engaged, but spent their time in beating up of Quarters, Picquering, and Skirmishes, provoking one another, rather than coming to a close Fight; for whilst ever and anon they began, and as quickly gave over, the event even of those petty Rencontres was put off from day to day. The other Roman Army lay twenty miles off, yet though the other Consul was absent, he was frequently consulted with; Carvilius being more intent upon the Affairs at Aquilonia, whereon the main Chance of the War depended, than about the Town of Cominium which he then besieged. L. Papirius having by this time got all things ready for a Battel, sent a Currier to his Partner, That he resolved (if the Auspices prov'd favorable) to engage the Enemy next Morning, and therefore 'twas fit he should attack Cominium with all his Forces, to divert any assistance from thence: The Messenger returned at Night, and brought word, That his Colleague did well approve of those Resolutions. Then Papirius drew his Army together, and made an Oration in the Head of them, wherein he discours'd at large touching the nature of this War in general, and of the Enemies present Preparations, more gaudy in shew and for ostentation, than effectually of any real Advantage: For (he told them) "That it was no plumed Crests that gave the deadly Wounds; the Roman Lances would easily pierce their painted and gilded Shields; That this gay Army, glittering with their white Coats, would soon be dyed of a Crimson hue, when they came to handy strokes; That much such a Gold and Silver Army of Samnites was utterly defeated to the last; Man by his Father, and prov'd more honorable Spoils to the Conqueror, than safe Armor to themselves; That perhaps 'twas the Destiny of his Name and Family, to be chosen "chosen Generals against the Samnites greatest Efforts and Preparations, and that they were born to bring away those Spoils which might be an ornament to the publick Buildings of the City; That the Immortal Gods would doubtless be present to revenge Leagues so often desired, and so often violated: For if we may lawfully guess at the Divine Pleasure, they were never more adverse to any Army, than to this, which being polluted with the intermingled Blood of Beasts and Men, had doubly devoted themselves to the wrath and vengeance of Heaven, dreading on the one side the Gods which are Witnesses of their Treaties with the Romans; and on the other side, the Curses of that late Oath which they have taken directly contrary to those Treaties; an Oath which as they took perforce, so the memory thereof must needs be odious to them, since it makes them perjured, and no less afraid of the Gods, and one another, than of their Enemies.

Having declared these things (which he came to know by the relation of some Deserters) unto his Soldiers, who were already of themselves sufficiently enraged against the Enemy; they being all confident of Divine Assistance, as well as trusting on their own valor, unanimously cry out for a Battel, were vex'd that it was put off till the Morrow, and repined at that delay of one Night as too long. About Midnight Papirius having received Letters from his Colleague, got up when all was silence, and sent to the Sooth-sayers to take the Presages, whether or no it might be lucky to fight the next day. There was not any sort of Men in the Camp but were eager for a Battel; all degrees, high and low, Captains and Soldiers, were enflamed with the same desires, which zealous ardour reached even those that had the charge of the Auspices; for though the Chickens would not peck, yet the Chick-master ventured rather to falsifie the token by a lye, than to put off the Engagement, and therefore sent the Consul word, That they fell to their meat so greedily, that with their hasty feeding, the Corn fell from their Bills and rebounded again, which they called Tripudium Solistimum, and in their Learning counted it the best sign of Success that was in the World. The Consul hereupon joyfully declares, That the Auspices were excellent good, and that they should go on under the conduct and favor of the Gods, and so puts out the signal of Battel.

As he was marching into the Field, a Renegado acquaints him, That twenty Regiments of the Samnites (for they were in all about forty) were gone towards Cominium, of which he presently sent to advertise his Colleague; then causes the Standards to be brought forth with all expedition, Posts his Reserves in proper places, and assigns to every one his Charge. L. Volturnus led the Right Wing; L. Scipio the Left, and the other Lieutenant-Generals, C. Cædinius and C. Trebonius, had the conduct of the Cavalry. He ordered Sp. Nautius to take off the Pack-Saddles from the Mules, and to mount some Companies of Light-arm'd Foot that used to serve in the Wings, on their backs, and with all speed, fetching a compass, to seize a certain Hill that lay in view, and in the heat of the Conflict to shew themselves from thence, raising as great a cloud of dust as possibly they could. Whilst the General was thus busie, there arose a squabble amongst the Chicken-Masters, or Sooth-Sayers, about the Presages of the Day, which being overheard by some of the Roman Horse, they looking upon it as a matter of consequence, told Sp. Papirius the Consul's Nephew, That there was some doubt or question about the Auspice. The Youth, born in those days when there were no Atheists, or despisers of Religion and the Gods, having further enquired into the matter (because he would not certifie any thing groundless) gave notice thereof to the Consul, who answered: I commend your piety and diligence, however be not dismayed, but rather fight more heartily and use thy best endeavor; as for him that has charge of the Auspice, if he have made a wrong Report, let the punishment for his violating of Religion light upon his own head; for my part the Tripudium which was certified, I take to be a good and sufficient Omen of Success to me and the People of Rome. Then he commanded the Centurions to place the Chicken-Prophets in the Forlorn-Hope. At the same time the Samnites advanced their Ensigns, and their Army in excellent equipage followed so glorious, that even the sight of the Enemy was a pleasing and magnificent Entertainment; before any shout made, or that they came to Charge, a Javelin darted at random lighted upon the chief Chicken-Fortune-teller, and struck him dead before the Ensigns, which being told the Consul, The Gods (saith he) you see are present in the Field, and the guilty Wretch has his due reward: Whilst he was speaking these words, a Raven set up her Throat just before him, at which lucky Augury the Consul rejoic'd, and affirmed, That the Gods never did more evidently appear in Mens affairs, or give plainer Demonstrations of their favor. And immediately commanded the Trumpets to sound a Charge, and the whole Army to set up a lusty Shout.

The Battel was fierce and terrible, but managed upon very different motives; the Romans rush'd on animated with rage, and hope, and an ardent eagerness of Fighting; but the Samnites for the most part by necessity, and the charms of Superstition, were forced even almost against their wills, to make resistance rather than attack the Enemy; nor would they ever have stood the Romans first Charge, having for many Years been cowed with with constant Overthrows, but that a more prevailing fear imprinted on their minds, did retain them from flight: For they had continually before their Eyes the whole Parade of that secret Sacrifice, the armed Priests, and promiscuous slaughter of Beasts and Men; the Altars stain'd with humane Blood, the dreadful Execrations, and that furious Oath, wishing Plagues and Curses on their Kindred and Posterity; tyed with these Magical chains they kept indeed the Field, but still were more afraid of their own Companions than of the Enemy. The Romans press'd on from either Wing and the Main-Body with all imaginable fury, and butchered them at pleasure whilst they stood thus as it were astonish'd with a double dread of Gods and Men: The resistance they made was small and faint, and nothing but pure fear kept them from running away. So that by this time execution was done upon them up to their very Standards, when on a sudden there appeared at a distance on one side of them, a great cloud of Dust, as if some mighty Army had rais'd it with their march; for Sp. Nautius (Octavius Metius some call him) who had the Conduct of the Alarian Bands before-mentioned, purposely made a far greater dust than could be expected from so small a number, by causing his Regiment of the Black-Guard, as they sat on their Mules, to trail after them thick boughs of Trees; their Arms and Ensigns in the Front first appeared as it were through a dusky Light, but the dust behind them rising higher and thicker, seem'd to represent a great Body of Horse flanking an Army of Foot, and deceived not only the Samnites, but the Romans too: And to keep up that useful Error, the Consul so loud that even the Enemy might hear him, cry'd out, That Cominium was taken, and his Victorious Colleague was come; That now they should use their utmost endeavors to compleat the Victory before the other Army snatch'd the Honor of it out of their hands. Thus he spake as he gallop'd to and fro amongst the Ranks, and at the same time commanded the Colonels and Captains of the Foot to widen their Files, and make room for the Horse. He had before given Orders to Trebonius and Cadicus, that when they should see him flourish his Spear over his head, they should advance with the Cavalry, and as hard as they could drive Charge the Enemy. All things were punctually put in execution according to Order, the Files opened to the Right and Left, and the Horse thundered out upon the Enemy, and broke into the middle of their Main-Body, disordering their Ranks which way soever they turn'd their Force; Volumnius and Scipio bravely seconded them with the Infantry, and whilst they were thus disarray'd, beat down all before them. Then the Limmen Brigade went to pot, and fell under the fury both of the Gods and Men; the sworn and unsworn fled both alike, and no longer feared any but the Enemy. Their Foot, as many as escaped in the Battel, were beat into their Camp at Aquilonia; their Noble-men and Horse got to Bovianum; the Foot were by the Foot pursued, and the Horse by Horse; and the two Wings separated themselves, the Right marching up to the Samnites Camp, and the Left to the Town: Volumnius was somewhat the nimblest, and soon made himself Master of the Camp; Scipio had an harder task to win the City, not that they had greater Courage, being all alike disheartened with their Overthrow, but because Walls will better keep out Assailants, than a plain Trench and Rampire; and besides, from the Courtine they had an advantage to shour down Stones upon them so fast, as none could endure it. Scipio considering that it would prove a tedious piece of Work, unless he could carry the Town at this first Heat, whilst they within were in a fright, and before they could recollect their Spirits, ask'd his Soldiers, If they would suffer this disgrace, to see the Camp bravely won by the other Wing, and themselves Conquerors too as well as the others, to be shamefully repulsed from the City? They all testifying their Resolutions to the contrary by a loud shout, himself clapping his Target over his Head, march'd foremost up to the Gate, and all the rest following him in that posture, by main force they broke into the City, and knocking down those Samnites that were about the Gate, made themselves Masters of the Walls, but durst not venture up into the middle of the City, being so few in number.

XLII.

The Consul at first knew nothing of all this, but was busie in bringing the Main-Body of his Army to an orderly Retreat, for the Sun was now almost down, and Night coming on apace, made every thing seem dangerous and suspicious even to the Victors themselves; but when he was advanced further, he saw on his right hand the Enemies Camp taken, and on the left, heard a confused Cry and Tumult in the City, as compos'd of the mix'd clamors of Men fighting, and People in a fright, for it happened at that instant the Conflict was at the Gate. Upon this, he rides up nearer, and at last discovered his own Men upon the Walls, and that his Work was not yet at an end, since by a few Mens rash adventurousness, there was an opportunity of performing an excellent piece of Service, whereupon he recalled the Forces that were retreating, and caus'd them with Banners displayed to enter the City, where near the Gate they took up their Quarters, because the Night came on so fast, and before Morning the Enemy had deserted it. There were slain that day of the Samnites, Thirty thousand three hundred and forty; taken, Three thousand eight hundred and seventy, and ninety seven Colours. 'Tis Recorded, That never any General was more chearful and pleasant than Papirius during this Battel, whether it were of his own natural Disposition, or upon assured confidence of Victory; 'twas upon this strength of mind that he would not be diverted from fighting by the controverted Auspice; and in the heat of the Conflict, when others are wont to make Vows of building Temples to the Immortal Gods, he only Vow'd, That if he defeated the Enemies Legions, he would present Jupiter Victor with a Cup of Metheglin, before himself tasted a drop of strong Wine. Which Vow the Gods accepted, and turn'd the ill Presages to good.

The other Consul had no less success at Cominium; for drawing up all his Forces by break XLIII. of day to the Walls, he invested it quite round, and set strong Guards at all the Gates to prevent any Sallies. But just as he was about to give the Signal for a general Assault, the Messenger from his Brother Consul in a great fright, brought word, That twenty Cohorts of the Enemy were upon their march to relieve the City, which made him for a while defer the Storm, and draw off part of his Forces. For immediately he dispatch'd the first Legion, and twenty Cohorts of the Wings, and Horse, under the Command of D. Brutus Scaeva, to meet this Party of the Enemy, with orders to stop or divert their march wherever they should find them, and if need were, to fight them rather than suffer them to come up to Cominium. This care being taken, he commands the Scaling-Ladders to be set to the Walls round the Town, and several parties in close Order, with their Targets over their heads, to make up to the Gates, so that at once the Gates were burst open, and the Walls mounted: The Samnites, that had some hopes before to keep off the Enemy, when they saw them now in possession of their Walls, that there was no longer any fighting at a distance with Darts and Lances, but they must come to Handy-strokes, concluded, that they who from below had got upon the Walls, would then more easily descend, and be too hard for them upon even ground, who could not withstand them with all the advantages of their Works; they therefore quitted their Towers and Bulwarks, and were beat up to the Market-place, where for a while they tryed their utmost Fortune, but at last flung down their Arms, and Fifteen thousand and five hundred surrendered themselves at discretion to the Consul; the number of the slain amounted to 4780.

Thus went things at Cominium, and at Aquilonia, but between both places where a third Battel was expected, no Enemies were to be found; for that Detachment of the Samnites, upon the Romans drawing up in Battalia, were re-called, when they were but seven miles from Cominium, and so came not in to either of the Battels; but being arrived about twilight, within sight of Aquilonia on one hand, and their Camp on the other, and from each place hearing a mighty Clamour, they made an halt, wondring what the matter might be; but by and by the Camp being fired by the Romans, gave them certain notice of their Parties defeat, so that they durst march no further, but lying down where they were in their Arms, spent a restless night, wishing for, and yet fearing the approach of day. As soon as 'twas light, being yet uncertain whether to bend their course, they were put to the Run by the sight of a party of Horse, who had been upon the pursuit of the Samnites that in the night stole out of the City, and spying this multitude lie in the open Field without Trenches or Out-guards, were coming up to Charge them: They were also seen from the Walls of Aquilonia, and thence several Regiments of Foot were making at them; but they came not up time enough, and the Horse only cut off about 280 in the Rear, the rest escap'd, but in great Consternation, to Bovianum, leaving abundance of Arms scattered behind them, and eighteen Colours.

The joy of each Roman Army was encreased by the good success of the other. The XLIV. Consuls, by mutual consent, gave their Soldiers the Plunder of both Cities, and when they had ranlack'd the Houses, order'd them to be set on fire; so that on one and the same day, both Aquilonia and Cominium were laid in ashes, and the Consuls with mighty Congratulations on either side, joined their Forces. There in the Head of both Armies, Carvilius bestowed large Commendations and Rewards on such of his Men as had signalized themselves by any special Action: And Papirius, who had been engag'd in variety of Service in the Field, and the City, and the Camp, gave Bracelets, and Coronets of Gold, to Sp. Nautius and Sp. Papirius his own Nephew, and to four Centurions, and one whole Band of Hastati or Javelyneers. To Nautius for his expedition and dexterity in terrifying the Enemy with a shew of a great Army; to young Papirius for his gallant Service with the Horse, both in the Battel, and in pursuing the Samnites, when in the night they got out of the City; and to the Centurions and Hastati, because they were the first that took the Gate, and mounted the Wall of Aquilonia. To all the Horse-men, because they had behav'd themselves very well, he gave Bracelets and little Horns of Silver.

In the next place a Council of War was held, to consult, Whether both or either of the Armies should yet be withdrawn out of Samnium, and it was resolv'd, That the more irrecoverably to suppress the Enemy, they should with the greatest vigor improve their Victories, so as they might be able to deliver up the Country entirely subdued to the next Consuls: And since there was now no Army of the Enemies that durst appear in the Field, they had no business left but to assault their Cities and fortified Towns, the taking of which, would both enrich their own Soldiers, and impoverish the Enemy, besides the multitudes of them that must there be either slain or taken Prisoners. Therefore having by Letters given the Senate an account of their Proceedings, the Consuls divided their Armies; Papirius advancing to besiege Sepinum, and Carvilius to invest Volana.

XLV. These Letters from the Consuls were read with the highest Joy imaginable, as well in the Senate, as before all the People in the Common-Hall; and this Publick Rejoycing was celebrated with Processions and Thanksgivings for the space of four days together: For indeed this Victory was not only of great Importance in it self to the Romans, but also came very seasonably, for it happened, that just at the same time tidings arrived, That the Tuscans were in Rebellion, and People began to ponder in their minds how they should do to quell them, if any thing should happen amiss in Samnium, where both the Consuls, and all the Roman Forces were now engaged, which heartned on the Etrurians to this Insurrection. Ambassadors from some of the Roman Allies were introduced by M. Attilius the Prætor into the Senate, complaining, That their Territories were wasted with Fire and Sword by their Neighbors the Tuscans, because they would not relinquish the Roman Interest; therefore they did beseech the Fathers, to defend them from the Out-rages of these common Enemies: To whom Answer was return'd, That the Senate would take care, that their Allies should have no cause to repent them of their having continued faithful, and that very speedily they should see the Tuscans in as wretched a condition as the Samnites. Yet had they not proceeded with such Expedition against the Tuscans, but that News came, the Faliscans, who for many Years had been firm Friends, were now revolted and join'd with them. The near Neighborhood of this Nation quickned the Senate to send Heralds to demand satisfaction; which being not given, by the Authority of the Senate and Command of the People, War is Declared against the Faliscans, and the Consuls ordered to cast Lots which of them should remove with his Army out of Samnium into Tuscany. Carvilius had already taken from the Samnites three Cities, Volana, Palumbinum, and Herculaneum; Volana in few days time, Palumbinum the same day that he came before the Walls, but at Herculaneum he was forc'd to fight two set Battels, with doubtful Success, and more loss sustained on his side than on the Enemies. Then he Entrench'd himself, and shut them up within the Walls, and at last assaulted the Town and took it. In these three places there were taken or slain to the number of Ten thousand People. When the Consuls came to sort the Provinces, Tuscany fell to Carvilius, at which his Soldiers were pleas'd, who could not well endure any longer the sharpness of the Weather in Samnium. Papirius at Sepinum had an harder tug on't; he was forc'd to encounter the Enemy oft-times in Pitch'd-Battels, continual Skirmishes, and frequent Sallies, so that 'twas neither a meer Siege, nor an even War in the Field, for the Samnites did not so much defend themselves with their Walls, as their Walls with their Bodies and their Arms; but in the end, by these daily Conflicts he reduc'd it to a just Siege, and partly with Batteries, and partly by main force, took the City, where the enraged Soldiers committed great slaughter, there being 7400 cut to pieces, and not full 3000 that had Quarter: The Booty, which was very considerable, because the Samnites had brought all they had into a few Cities, was distributed amongst the Soldiers.

XLVI. The Ground was now all covered with Snow, and there was no enduring longer abroad in the Field; therefore the Consul march'd his Army out of Samnium, and coming to Rome, a Triumph was Decreed him by a universal consent; and accordingly he did Triumph before he went out of his Office, with as great State and Magnificence as those days could afford. The Horse and Foot appeared in the Carvalcade adorn'd with all their Prizes of Honor: Many a Civic Garland was worn that day by such as had saved the Lives of their Fellow-Citizens; many that first mounted the Enemies Rampire, and others that were formost in Scaling their Walls, were distinguish'd by their several Badges and Crowns. The Samnites spoils made a gallant show, and the People took great delight in comparing them with those brought home by his Father, wherewith the publick Buildings were beautified. Divers noble Prisoners, famous for their own or their Ancestors actions, were led along in Chains, and amongst the rest there was a vast quantity of Brass Bullion, raised by the ransom of Prisoners, amounting to Two millions five hundred thirty three thousand Asses in weight [about 25006 l. 13 s. 4 d. sterling] and of Silver taken in the several Cities, 1330 pounds weight, and upwards [amounting to 3990 l. of our money.] All this money, Brass and Silver, was carryed into the common Treasury, and nothing of the whole Booty given to the Soldiers; which as it caus'd much discontent and envy, so the same was encreased amongst the common People, because they were charged with a Tax to pay off the Soldiers; whereas if the Consul in a vain-glorious humor had not brought these Sums into the Chamber of the City, the same would have been enough both to have rewarded the Army, and satisfied their Arrears. Moreover, before he went out of his Consulship, he Dedicated the Temple of Quirinus, which his Father being Dictator had Vowed, for that he himself made any such Vow in the heat of the Battel, I find not in any ancient Author; nor could he in so short a time have finish'd it: This Temple he garnish'd with the Enemies Spoils, whereof there was such abundance, as not only suffic'd to deck up the same, and the Town-Hall, but great quantities of them were divided amongst, and sent unto their next Allies and Colonies to beautifie their Temples and publick Buildings. After

After the Triumph, the Army took up Winter-Quarters amongst the Vestins, because those parts were liable to be infested by the Incurfions of the Samnites.

In the interim, the other Consul Carvilius in Etruria, first sat down before the City Trailus, and for a great sum of money gave leave for 470 of the richest Burgers to depart thence whither they list, the rest of the Rabble fell into his hands after he had storm'd the Town. After which he took in five very strong and well fortified Castles. Here were slain of the Enemy 2400, and almost 2000 taken Prisoners: The Faliscans then coming to a Treaty, he granted them a Truce for a Year, upon paying down One hundred thousand Asses (312 l. 10 s. sterling) and paying off his Soldiers for that Year.

After these signal Successes he came home to receive the honor of a Triumph, which if not so glorious as his Colleagues for his Actions in Samnium, yet adding his Services in Tuscany, he might justly boast an equal merit. He brought into the Exchequer of Brass money, Three hundred and ninety thousand pieces [637 l. 15 s. 7 d. sterling] and with the rest built a Chappel to Sors Fortune (or good Fortune) near the Temple dedicated to the same Goddess by King Servius Tullus. Out of the Booty he gave his Soldiers 102 Asses [6 s. 5 d. sterling] apiece, and twice as much to each Centurion and Trooper, which was so much the more gratefully accepted, since his Colleague had been so niggardly as to give his Men nothing. And indeed, so much was this Consul in the Peoples favor, that 'tis said he protect'd his Lieutenant L. Posthumus, who being Indict'd by M. Cautius, a Tribune of the Commons, put off the Judgment by alledging his Command in the Army, and that during his absence they could not proceed to a definitive Sentence.

The Year being now expired, the new Tribunes of the Commons entred upon their Office; but they not being duly elected, five days after others were chosen in their stead. The same Year a Lustrum or general Survey of the City, was held by P. Cornelius Arvina, and C. Marcius Rutilus the Censors, and there were assessed 262322 Roman Citizens. These were the six and twentieth Censors since that Office erected, and this the nineteenth survey that had been taken. The same Year, and never before, divers Persons that had done good Services in the Wars, sat in the Publick Theaters to behold the Roman Plays with Wreaths and Garlands of Flowers upon their Heads, and then too came up the fashion, borrowed from the Greeks, to honor those with Palm-branches that won the Prizes at those solemn Sports. The Curule Ediles that exhibited these Sports, having fined the Grafiars that held City-Lands for defrauding the Publick, did with the Money, new pave the Road from Mars's Temple to the Beast-Market. L. Papirius held the Court for electing of Consuls, and chose Gurges the Son of Q. Fabius Maximus, and D. Junius Brutus Scæva; and Papirius himself was made Prætor. The many Prosperities of this Year were scarce able to ballance one Affliction, which was that of the Pestilence, so grievous both in the City and Country, that it was look'd upon as an immediate Judgment from Heaven: The Sacred Books of the Sibyls were consulted to know when the Gods would be pleas'd to put a period to this Calamity, or what remedy there might be for it; where 'twas found, That the God Æsculapius must be fetch'd from Epidaurus to Rome: But so involved they were in Wars, that nothing could this Year be done in it, save only, that one day was solemnly observed in honor of, and supplications to the said Æsculapius.

E P I T O M E.

Fabius Gurges the Consul having been defeated by the Samnites; and the Senate minding to remove him from his Command, Fabius Maximus his Father interceding that he might not undergo this disgrace, overpersuades the Senate, by promising to go himself Lieutenant to his Son: which he does accordingly; and his Son assisted by his Counsels triumphs over the Samnites, and beheads C. Pontius the Samnite General, whom he had led in Triumph. Pestilence raging in the City, Embassadors are sent to fetch Æsculapius's Shrine from Epidaurus to Rome: And bring with 'em a Snake, that came aboard their Ship, which they took for the Deity. Where this Snake went out into the Isle of Tyber a Temple is built to Æsculapius. Lucius Posthumius a Person of consular Dignity, being General, puts his Soldiers to work in his Ground, for which he is Fir'd. With the Samnites suing for Peace a League is renew'd the fourth time. Curius Dentatus the Consul having defeated the Sabines and conquer'd the Rebel Samnites who surrendered themselves, twice Triumphs in the same year. Colonies are brought to Caltrum, Sena, and Adria. Triumviri Capitales are first made. The People are poll'd. The number amounting to two hundred, seventy two thousand Citizens. The Commons by reason of Debt, and troublesome Mutinies, withdraw into Janiculum whence they are brought back again by the Dictator Hortensius, who Died in his Office: Besides it contains the Wars with the Volturnians, and Lucanians, against whom 'twas thought fit to assist the Tyrrhenians.

THe Power of the Samnites was now weakned by several Battels, and there was no doubt made, but the War might be ended, if the Enemy after this defeat, and consternation, should be allow'd as little respite as could be, to recruit their Spirits. Therefore the Consul Q. Fabius a hot Spurr'd Youth, and resolved to get himself the Honour of ending the War, having speedily levied Forces, marched out of hand to Campania. For the Samnites being a hardy People, and driven to despair rather than fear by so many defeats, because the Consuls the year before had carried away all the Legions to their Triumph; made use of this opportunity, and raised considerable Forces partly from the remainders of former Fights, and partly by new Levies. And because they knew the Plague rag'd amongst the Romans at that time, and withal, that the Consuls for that year were not much to be feared either for their experience in War, or Authority, they took heart upon this, and annoy'd the Campanians a People always contemn'd by 'em, and now hated more than ever, as the Authors of their suffering, by spoiling and wasting their Country.

The Roman General had a courage equal to the reputation of the Fabian House, but the contempt of an Enemy so often routed by his Countrymen, and too much eagerness to Fight rendred him very unway. Marching thus against the Enemy with great precipitation, at last he came in sight of an advanced party sent by the General of the Samnites, who desecring the Romans marching forward, retreated to their own men: Fabius hereupon imagining that the Enemy fled, without informing himself either of the situation of Places, or the condition of the People, commands his Army with all speed to advance; as if the whole hopes of Victory lay in making extraordinary speed.

The Samnites forwarn'd by their Scouts manag'd all things more circumspectly: for they possessed themselves of advantageous Posts, embattell'd their men, and encouraged them by the Orations of their Commanders. The event therefore of this Battel was such, as might justly be expected. An Army well order'd and every way appointed easily routed men tin'd out, with their Ranks broken, as if they came not to Fight but to Plunder. Fabius lost three thousand of his men, and more were wounded: and had not the night interposing prevented it, he would have lost all his Army. Then he got to a place of more security, and fortified his Camp as well as he could in such a consternation: and here things were not in a better posture, nor mens minds better assur'd, than they were in the Field. Here was no repose for the weary, no Food for the Hungry, nor any Medicins for the wounded. For they took only their Arms with 'em, having left all their Baggage in their former Camp. Therefore the whole night was spent between the groans of the Dying, and the complaints of the Living: whilst all waited for the next day with fear and despair, as their last. "For that men toil'd out and even spent with watching, weakn'd with wounds, and disheartn'd by their overthrow, and withal much lessen'd in numbers, were not able to withstand an Enemy, which an Army both in Courage, and Strength and also full of hopes had not been able to sustain.

- Things being thus given up for lost, as it happened, the Enemies mistake was a means to relieve them: who being alarm'd with the report of the other Consuls marching against him, dislodg'd, and went another way, contenting himself with this unexpected success, lest if he went to attack Fabius's Camp, he should be environ'd by these fresh Forces. When the Enemy went off, the Romans also retired to places of more security. When the News came to Rome, the People being more concern'd for the disgrace than the loss sustain'd, took it sadly to heart, that through the Consuls rashness matters should be ordered so ill that a War which had lasted as long as any before it, should be renew'd, now 'twas almost at an end; and that more terrible too than it had been of a long time before; because the Samnites were encourag'd by this Victory. Nor had the Tribunes of the Commons only, whose peculiar Trade it was, aggravated every thing as invidiously as they could, by their frequent Speeches to the Commons: But likewise when the Senate canvass'd the matter, very hard Sentences pass'd upon it, and a Decree was made by the Senate, whereby Fabius the Consul was commanded to Rome before such a time to answer to his Charge. When he came, several Persons accus'd him, nor could he defend the Fact, nay what is more, that very thing which should have helped him, namely the Interest of old Fabius, prejudiced his cause. For men thought him less worthy of Pardon, who having so gallant a Person for his Father, and being bred up among his Triumphs, had not only disgraced the Roman name in general, but the glories of his own Family in particular by his defeat imputable to his great rashness. The People were so incens'd that they would hardly hear the Defendant Plead: But however they were pacified by the extraordinary tenderness of Fabius, and afterwards by his Speech. For he fearing, lest his Son for his miscarriage in the War should be turn'd out of his Place, forbore altogether to excuse his fault: But modestly mentioning his own, and his Ancestors Merits, he pray'd "he might not undergo a disgrace so bitter to himself, so infamous to the whole Family of the Fabii: "But yet he did not in the least desire that the miscarriage of one Fabius should be Pardon'd for the sake of so many Fabii, who from the very Foundation of Rome almost had aggrandiz'd the Romans affairs: Nor likewise for those three hundreds sake, who by their own, and almost the universal destruction of the Fabian Race defended the Commonwealth: if so be that this fault were Incurable, and that more advantage was like to accrue to the publick from the punishment, than from the Pardon of his Son; for he had learnt to prefer the love of his Country before any other Relation. However the worst that could be feared from the Youth was already past, but the benefits, that may redound from one of such a temper, who has been Bred up by my self, a Master competent enough by your own Judgment, may yet be expected; unless you by a just, yet unseasonable severity destroy these hopes. Many men have by miscarrying in the beginning of an Enterprize been rendred more cautious; who being admonish'd of a fault have often repaired moderate losses with a great advantage; And for ought I know, we may impute it to Fortunes Spite rather than any mans fault, that the long Prosperity of our State, and of the Fabian Family has now by a slender disaster been thus allay'd, tho we may stile it the kindness, rather than the anger of the Gods thus to Arm us against that fatal Pride, which usually attends too much Prosperity: and withal to mind us of Mortality by a misfortune not so prejudicial to the publick, as advantageous to our Instruction. Whatever the matter was, Fellow Citizens, my mind misgave me, some mischance would happen: when in the Assemblies I solicited you not to make my Son Consul: for considering how my Father, Grand-Father, and others of my Ancestours had bore that Office often, and moreover that I my self had been Consul five times, I began to fear, that neither Gods nor Men would be willing to see the chief Honours continue still in the same Family. And I wish my Prayers had prevailed with you then; or else that you would make good your grant, lest what you have bestow'd on my Son for Honour against my will, should prove an occasion of extraordinary disgrace to us both: and you your selves also be accus'd of Rashness; who if you repeal your former Act touching Q. Fabius by another Order, you will be esteem'd by posterity, either to have given, or taken away that Power without a cause. If you take a milder course, you will then preserve your own Authority, together with the reputation of the Fabian house: and the Youths miscarriage, as it has done some hurt to the State, shall be also repair'd with greater advantage. But who can assure this? I my self, (Fellow Citizens) will be engag'd for my Son to the Commonwealth, (and may it be for the good of the Senate, the Commons, and our Family) He go Lieutenant to my Son, to share in any Fortune, which we shall find, or make our own. My Courage still remains: and for one of my Age I cannot complain for want of strength: I can yet endure the toils of War, and stand in the field. And were I good for nothing else, yet by the memory of former fights I shall be able to terrifie the Enemy, and encourage our own men: and (which is the main thing) I can by my Counsel direct the young Consul, whose Age betray'd him to this miscarriage, and by the cooler Counsels of elder years temper the vehement heat of Youth. Were I not acquainted with my Sons inclinations, and confident, that he will follow good Advice, now near the period of my Life spent with so much Honour, after so many Consulships born according to your and my own mind, such Victories and Triumphs, I would be loth to let a Reputation got by the toils of so many years at home and abroad, to be stain'd by the giddy rashness of one Youth.
- VIII. This Speech wanted neither weight to persuade the hearers, nor truth as to the assuring of better success. The Lieutenantcy being decreed by the joint consent of all, and every thing diligently provided, the Consul marches out honour'd now no less, than he was defam'd and quarrell'd at when he returned. Afterwards upon the way and in the Camp every thing was ordered according to the old Generals direction; and the Confederates who respected Q. Fabius for his kindnesses and great worth, were ready at hand to do whatsoever should be commanded them. The Soldiers also being desirous to repair their disgrace, and relying on their Generals Conduct, under whom they remembred how often that Nation had been routed by themselves and their Fathers, now wish'd with all their hearts to come to a Battel with the Enemy. The Samnites also after their last success were not less encourag'd, So that that whilst the one strove to maintain the honour they had won, and the other to regain what they had lost, they fought very smartly on both sides. And now the Romans began to have the worst of it, and C. Pontius Herennius with a party of choice Men encompass'd the Consul himself, when old Fabius seeing his Sons danger rode full speed into the thickest of the Enemies. A Squadron of Horse immediately follows him, who beyond their wonted courage were incited with shame to see an old Man outdo such brave Sparks both in strength and valour. This Effort drew after it the fortune of the Battel. The Roman Legions first stood, and being encourag'd by the Horse routed the Enemy, whilst Herennius in vain made resistance: who that day perform'd all the parts of a good Commander and Soldier too, endeavouring to rally his Men that were disorder'd, to stop those that fled, and to make head against those that charg'd him. Yet he could not hinder the flight of his own Men, but lost himself the opportunity to escape. There were four thousand of the Samnites together with their General taken prisoners, and in the Field, and on their flight twenty thousand of 'em were slain. Their Camp was taken also with a great Booty therein, which by ravaging the Territories of the Enemy, and rising their Towns either conquer'd or surrendered, was increased exceedingly. So great an alteration of Affairs insuing upon the account of one Man, inasmuch that an Army now victorious is defeated by those it had beaten, and that General who had routed the Consul, is now himself taken Prisoner by him, making a great show for the Romans, and adorning his Triumph, which when he return'd home next year, he obtain'd by the consent of all.

Whilst the Fabii acted thus at Samnium the other Consul, D. Brutus, to whose share the Province of Faliscum fell, had good success. For being assist'd by S. Carvilius his Lieutenant (for the Senate thought fit to assign him one likewise) an experienc'd Soldier and one that understood that Enemy (against whom being Consul the year before, he had fought with good success) he both ravag'd a great part of Hetruria; and also routed the Falisci, who adventured to engage him.

These things being related in the City, when the time of the Assemblies came, and it was esteem'd disadvantageous to the State to take off the Consuls from the prosecution of the War, a Viceroy was set up. This Viceroy L. Posthumus Megellus is declar'd Consul, in those Assemblies he call'd himself, a thing without a former Precedent, except that of Appius Claudius, which no honest Men approv'd. But Posthumus manag'd his Office with as great insolence as he took it upon him. For being vainly arrogant both for his birth, and his now third Consulship, he formerly condemn'd his Colleague C. Junius Brutus a Plebeian by birth, as one much his inferior. But as soon as they began to consider about the Provinces, he would neither divide, nor call Lots with Brutus for them: demanding the manage of the Samnite War out of course as his due, because he said he had done such great exploits against that Enemy in his two former Consulships. The business being canvass'd in the Senate with great debate; when C. Junius saw, that being an upstart, he could not obtain his right against the Interest and Power of his Colleague, lest the variance of the Consuls should incommode the Publick, he declar'd at last that he yielded of his own accord to his Colleague.

The Pestilence as yet rag'd terribly in the City and the Country: which now after three years could not be abated by any divine, or humane remedy whatsoever, though Men had try'd all. Therefore either by the command of the Books of the Sybils, or the Counsel of the Delphic Oracle (for this is likewise said) ten Ambassadors were sent to fetch Aesculapius from Epidaurus, which was esteem'd his native place, to Rome. For though the Oracle was dark enough, and the Senate could not foresee the event, yet they were resolv'd to obey the gods, making account that they would themselves reveal their own destinies, and the order they were to proceed in. Hereupon a very strange thing int'd and manifestly true both from many faithful Historians, and also from the building of the Temple dedicated in the Isle of Tyber. When the Roman Ambassadors had deliver'd their Commands to the Epidaurians, they were civilly receiv'd, but because they knew not what might be given 'em to carry away that might be mott for their advantage they were brought into the Temple of Aesculapius. In most parts of Greece the Temples of this Deity are built in high and open places. The Epidaurians also had a Temple five miles distant from the Town, which was then very famous, and richly furnish'd with the Offerings of those, who thought they had recover'd their health there. Being got in hither, whilst they admire a huge Shrine made by that famous Artill Thrasymedes the Parian; a great Snake sliding of a sudden from the Adytum surpriz'd 'em all. For the Priests in a devout posture said that the Deity shew'd it self in this form, and that when he appear'd in this guise, it was look'd on as a happy Omen. The Snake was seen for two days in the Temple, and afterwards disappear'd again. But the third day he went straight through the midst of the crowd, which gaz'd on and worship'd, to the Port where the Roman Galley stood; entering into which he lay down in the Cabin of Q. Ogulnius the chief Ambassadour winding himself round in several folds.

There goes an old Story, that the same Aesculapius appearing in the form of a Serpent was drawn by Males from Sicyon to Epidaurus, one Nicagora the Wife of Echetimus attending him. The Romans therefore rejoycing at this sight, as much as if they carry'd with 'em the god himself, set sail, and in few days crossing the Sea arriv'd safely at Antium and afterwards to Rome; but whilst they lay here by reason of a storm at Sea, the Snake which had not stir'd all the while, creeping out of the Ship slides into the Porch of a Temple the most magnificent in the whole Town, and there continuing three days, the Ambassadors being fore afraid, that he could not be got from thence: because all that time he did not return to meals, until at last coming aboard again they carry'd him very joyfully to Rome. The whole City came out to see this wondrous thing, and along the River side, where it was brought up, Altars were built, Incense burnt, and Sacrifices offer'd. When they were come up as far as the Isle of Tyber, the Snake swam over to that Island, which was afterwards call'd Aesculapius's Isle, and since was never seen. The Senate concluding this to be the place chosen by the god, decreed, that a Temple should be built for Aesculapius there. The Sicknells whether by that means, or because 'twas otherwise like to do so, ceased. The Temple grew famous for rich Offerings, and for several persons saying they had been cur'd by that Deity. L. Posthumus treated his Colleague with the same insolence in the Province, as he had done in the City. For when Fabius Garges who had been Consul the year before, by order of the Senate manag'd the Affairs in Samnium instead of the Consul: Posthumus wrote to him saucily, commanding him to depart out of his Province, for that he was able of himself to manage that War. Fabius pleads to this the Commands of the Senate, that he could not quit a charge the Senate had laid upon him. When the news came to Rome, they were afraid, lest the Commonwealth should suffer by the difference of the Consuls. Wherefore 'twas determin'd that Ambassadors should be sent to the Consul to require him in the Senate.

nates name to let Fabius act as General in Samnium. To this they say that as his answer was impudent and saucy, so it had one expression that imply'd an extraordinary churlishness in the Man, namely, that as long as he was Consul he ought not to obey the Senate but the Senate him, and that he might not seem more insolent in words than in fact, he dismisses the Ambassadors presently, and marches with his Army to Cominium, which Fabius besieg'd then, intending if he could not otherwise remove his Competitor, to fight with him. What a shameful fight would the Roman Army have afforded to the Enemy, had Fabius resisted as senselessly, as he was urg'd. But Fabius being a more moderate Man both in his temper, and by reason of his Fathers counsels, declaring beforehand, that he quitted his right not for fear of the Consul, but for the Commonwealths sake, departed the Province. Cominium in few days was taken by Posthumius, who from thence march'd against Venusia, and having taken it, carry'd the War about to other Towns: whereof he won very many, partly by force, and partly upon surrender. Of the Enemies in that Expedition ten thousand were slain, six thousand and two hundred delivering their Arms, yielded upon discretion.

XVI. The Actions of the Consul in this War were indeed very considerable, had not his haughty behaviour reflected a great blemish upon 'em, inasmuch that when he wrote to the Senate and advertis'd 'em that the City Venusia and the Country thereabout would be a most fit place for a Colony. The thing it self was lik'd 'tis true, but no notice taken of the Author either of the Victory or Counsel. That a Colony of twenty thousand Men was brought there by others, is deliver'd by authentick Authors: a great number and almost incredible, unless we suppose, that this multitude was settled there as a common garison among those savage people the Lucanians and Apulians. But as the outrageousness of Posthumius besides his other miscarriages made all people hate him, so it procur'd the esteem of all to Q. Fabius: and to him after his return to Rome and that he had made his Speech touching his Actions, a Triumph was easily granted. He triumph'd in the Consuls stead over the Samnites furnam'd Pentri the first of August. The old Fabius riding behind the Chariot was applauded by all the multitude, not onely as the Adjutant to, but the Author of the Victory. But he being desirous to give the Consul all the credit of the Action us'd the Title as well as modesty of a Lieutenant, being as well pleas'd to see his Son honour'd now, as when he carry'd him about in his Chariot, when he was a stripling, at his own Triumph. Moreover, the Consul gave part of the booty to the Soldiers, the rest was laid up in the publick Treasury. C. Pontius the Samnite being led in triumph is beheaded immediately, a valiant and renowned Soldier, who sustain'd the Roman Power so long in those days, having given 'em many smart blows, and put 'em to the highest disgrace at the Gallows of Caudium. Who by report us'd to say, That if he had been born when the Romans had learnt to take bribes, he would have suffer'd 'em to rule no longer. So that then 'twas not the puissance of Arms, but a perseverance in vertue that supported the grandeur of the Commonwealth.

XVIII. L. Posthumius in the mean time being angry for the Honours bestow'd on his Competitor, no less than for those deny'd himself, out of a peevish humour quarrell'd continually with the Senate, but this was far from curing his bleeding wounds, that it incens'd those against him, whom by his submission he might have made his Friends. For he ceas'd not to complain of his Enemies, to rail against the States, and to vex the Senate yet more, he divided all the plunder between the Soldiers and dismiss'd the Army ere one could be sent to succeed him. The Triumph he celebrated against the Samnites will, though by some 'tis reckon'd to fall within his second Consulship: yet I rather judg it belongs to this time, which is also attested by Historians noted both for diligence and faith. For these his Actions he became liable to fresh displeasures, inasmuch that as soon as he went out of his Office two Tribunes of the people arrefted him, and order'd him to come to his Trial before the Commons. Besides what is mention'd already, he was charg'd that as soon as he went out of Town in his Martial Habilliments, he had sent two thousand Soldiers, chosen out of the Legions, into his ground to dig about his Trees, and for many days had detain'd 'em in that work; not considering that Soldiers and not Slaves had been given him, and those not to manure his ground but to enlarge the Roman Territories. Being shrewdly impeach'd of these crimes after he had in vain attempted to make his defence, he was condemned by the Votes of all the Tribes, and order'd to pay two hundred thousand Sesterces damage.

XIX. The two new Consuls P. Cornelius Rufinus, and M. C. Dentatus now enter'd upon their Office: both of which with their Legion wast'd Samnium by ravaging the Country and destroying the Towns, inasmuch that they forc'd the Samnites who had in several places fought with 'em, by great slaughters of their Men to sue for a Peace. For whereas in so many Battels they had lost almost all their young Men, and after C. Pontius their Councellour and Captain too was taken. Having sent Ambassadors to the Consuls and with their consent to Rome, they prevail'd to have the Peace renew'd with 'em the fourth time. The Romans, I suppose, being likewise wearied with Victory, and desiring sometimes to exchange an irksome War, that had prov'd often calamitous to themselves for the tranquillity of a sure Peace. The War I find began with the Samnites, when M. Valerius was third time Consul, and A. Cor. Castus his Colleague, which continuing four and fifty years after with alternate fortune, or intermitted onely by short Truces, employ'd these two Nations. Whether Cornelius triumph'd for this War is not certain, but as for Manius there is no doubt of it, whose success was therefore the more remarkable, forasmuch as he having conquer'd other Enemies, besides triumph'd twice in the same Office. For the Sabines a potent Nation grown wealthy by a long Peace being mov'd either by the prayers of the Samnites, and compassion to their Kinred, or because they would stop the fire, which was like to reach 'em after the conquest of their Neighbours, now took Arms, and invaded several places of the Roman Territories. Curius marching with his Army against 'em, being minded to divide the Enemy, and also to spoil the Sabine Country, sent part of his Forces by secret ways, having order'd them to alarm the Country and wait it as far as they could. This forc'd the several Armies to act separately, that each of them might defend their own: and thereby the formidable strength of the Sabine Army was broken, so that the Consul easily routed people thus dispers'd asunder. By this Expedition they came as far as the Adriatic Sea, and took so much Men and Land by it, that the saying of Curius was afterwards much celebrated, who according to the discipline of those times being readier with his Hands than his Tongue, said, "I have won so much ground, that would be like to lie desolate, had not I taken so many Men; and I have taken so many Men as would be famish'd, unless I had taken so much ground."

XXI. The Sabines suing for a Peace, in memory of the ancient Alliance under Tatius, and because the quarrel was not carried on with fierce animosities between 'em, were made Denizens of Rome, but without a Vote.

Vote. We have but a slender account left us of the Consuls next year, M. Valerius Corvinus and Q. Cædicius Noctua: save that about that time, we find that Colonies were brought to Castum and Adria, whence the Adriatic Sea is so call'd, and also to Sena in the Gallic Country. But considering those Countries were not then conquer'd as far as that place, I am rather inclin'd to believe other Authors, who refer the Origin of these Colonies to later times.

For suppressing Rogues in the City which were now very rife, a new Magistracy was erected, which had power to imprison and punish Malefactors. These Magistrates were stiled the Capital Triumvirate [or Lord chief Justices] from their number, there being three of 'em. Of a Law touching this matter made by Papirius the Tribune of the Commons I find these words: "Whosoever hereafter shall be made Praetor, and shall sit in Judgment, let him propose to the people the Election of a Capital Triumvirate, and let them set Fines, and give judgment, and each of 'em have equal Authority to fine, and give judgment according to the Laws and Statutes of the people. For then the fine was call'd Sacramentum because it was generally laid out to defray the expences of Sacrifices, by reason of the multitude there was of them in the City, and the necessities of the Treasury. Of the Polling that year we have no more account left, but that two hundred seventy three thousand were said to be poll'd. That the President of the Senate this year chosen by the Censors was Fabius Maximus is very probable, which we know upon another account, forasmuch as that honour continu'd in the Tribe of that Family, descending from Ambustus the Father to Maximus, and from him to Gerges the Son. In the mean time whilst Affairs abroad went very prosperously, the State was pester'd at home with sad mutinies and dissensions. The Populace now being much in Debt, demanded discharges of it, an ancient thing practis'd two hundred years before, variously according as some turbulent Tribune us'd it to incense the people, or the oppression of Ufurers inflam'd their choler. But under some of the former Consuls, the fear of sickness or Enemies did abate the public heats and animosities. When Q. Marcius Tremulus, and P. Cornelius Arvina were Consuls: but the year following, when M. Cla. Marcellus and C. Nautius Rutilius, bore Office, the tumults rose higher, to the suppressing of which rather than for any other business or War, I conceive that Appius Claudius afterwards furnam'd Cæcus was made Dictator: whom I find in the Ancient Records to have bore that Office. But besides the rigor and oppression of the Ufurers, the infamous debauchery of C. Plotius fomented those ill humours that were working already in the people, so that they fermented more vehemently, and suddenly. T. Veturius Son to Veturius the Consul, who had been deliver'd up to the people for the dishonourable Treaty with the Samnites, had by reason of the misfortunes of his Family run into great Debt, and being not able to pay, he of his own accord deliver'd himself prisoner to his Creditor Plotius, to work out his Debt, and accordingly he did all kind of drudgery for him. But Plotius, is not satisfied to have thrown this young Gentleman from the hopes of a Consular House into arrant misery, endeavour'd also by force to debauch him as well as to inflame and beggar him. Afterwards seeing Veturius unwilling, and readier to endure any thing than such a brutal act, he in a barbarous manner falls to beat him: whereupon Veturius gets out into the street, and then the multitude carrying him before the Consuls, judging it no small matter, brought a Bill to the Senate concerning it, and judgment was given, that Plotius should be imprison'd, and all that were in prison for Debt through the whole Town, should be discharged: a Law being made touching that particular. Instead of Veturius I know there is one Publius mention'd by others a Tribunes Son that was concern'd in the Peace of Caudium: j Moreover 'tis said, that forty years before a Law had been made concerning the Prisoners for Debt upon a very like occasion: but for all that might not many Ufurers exercise the same cruelties; and a former Law, as it happens, be neglected by reason of the Debtors patience: until a fresh Act of the like nature shall remind people of the same? So that for the future a fuller and more exact provision might be made touching that particular. But the people desirous to be freed not onely from their slavery, but withal from the severity of the Ufury, could not, though the Law and the revenge pleas'd 'em, sit contented. But as it happens in some violent Diseases that the use of Medicines rather increases, than mitigates the pain, so here the State was so distemper'd, that when the Tribunes of the Commons endeavour'd by all means to make a Law concerning discharging of Debts, and the Creditors on the other hand oppos'd it with no less zeal and interest, the Commons leaving the City as their Fathers had done, withdrew over the River into the Hill Janiculum: being resolv'd not to return home, unless they should gain their point.

The Consuls being not able to help these things (who are thought to be M. Valer. Potitus, and C. Atilius Patrus) they made use of the best remedy in times of great danger, and chose a Dictator. Q. Hortensius was the Man; who having applied those lenitives, which the season and occasion requir'd, when he understood that the publick Peace was hindred, because the People were griev'd to see their Acts condemn'd and the Publian Law despis'd, thought it best, though many oppos'd him, to yield to the times, and making a new Law upon the Esculetum, he ordain'd again more strictly, that an Order of the Commons should bind all the people. The Commons by these and the like Addresses being pacified, and call'd home, the Dictator either by a sudden fit of sickness, or else being worn out with the toils of business, dy'd in his Office, a thing that happen'd to none afore him. The differences between the States abated for a pretty while after. But in the mean time the lustre of the Empire was more and more eclips'd; for whilst the Commons either understood not the Intrigues of ambitious Men, or else to exercise their Power, became easie to pass any Bills; many things were enacted, which not onely lessen'd the grandeur, but likewise struck at the foundations of the Government. This may be a caution for Governours, not to let the Populace, who never aim higher, if they enjoy but a competent Estate, to be forc'd by the infolencies of the Rich to desire such a Power as they are not fit to manage. The Law concerning Votes I suppose, was made about this time, by which the Senate were forc'd to approve the proceedings in the public Assemblies of the People, whatever they should be: who till then had the Power in their hands, that none could bear Office, unless he were first approv'd by them. This restraint controll'd the wild humours of the multitude: and though the Senate rarely disapprov'd the Assemblies proceedings, yet because of their Power to do so, they were fear'd as if they would disapprove them.

But when the Tribune of the Commons Menius made this Law, the Power of the people was hereby much augmented; but the exactness in Elections, a thing as honourable as beneficial to the State was greatly impair'd. After Q. Hortensius's death, 'tis said, that another Dictator was made for the administration of the Commonwealth: to wit, Q. Fab. Maximus now thrice Dictator. L. Volturnus was Censor, and Flamma Violens Master of the Horse. For then they had War with the Volturnians a Nation of Hetruria: which prov'd very seasonable to purge the City of innovators, and to efface the memory of former differences.

Moreover, a War broke out with the Lucanians upon a new score: who by molesting their Neighbours the Thurini, that inhabit a part of Italy called Magna Græcia, forced them after many injuries to put themselves under the protection of the Romans: and the people decreed a War should be made with the Lucanians, Ælius their Tribune proposing it to them. The Armies on both sides marched out, and several actions passed between them: the memory of which with the Annals that recorded them is quite lost. The Thurini presented a Statue and a Crown of Gold to C. Ælius.

- A. U. 468. The Consulship of C. Claudius Canina, and M. Æmilius Lepidus follows, which passed without any thing of note, whereof there is any Record, save that the Wars with the Hetrurians and Lucanians seem to have happen'd about that time. We have also the Triumph of Manius Curius, for his Victory over the Lucanians, which is to be reckon'd among his four Triumphs, so many being attributed to him; but when or in what Office he did these things, is not known. After this arose greater business, and memorable for no inconsiderable loss. A War being made with the Senones a people of Gaul, who had Peace and War at turns with the Romans, and now they had rested ten years after their defeat in the Country of Sentium, when upon Decius's devoting himself to death, great numbers of them were slain: only they let their young Men be killed by the Hetrurians against the Romans: but afterwards they came out in greater numbers than they had done for many years before, and cutting Hetruria besieg'd Arretium. The Arretines before that had a desired Peace with the Romans, but though that was denied them, yet they obtain'd a Truce, which was not yet expir'd; but now they were in greater hopes of aid because they knew the Galls could not clash with their Arms, but the Romans thought themselves concerned at it: therefore by their Ambassadors sent to Rome they begg'd aid against the common Enemy: and now the year ended when C. Servilius Tullia, and L. Cæcilius Metellus were Consuls. Some Annals put Cælius for Cæcilius, but the House of Cælius being of a meaner quality is supposed not to have bore the Consular Dignity till six hundred sixty years after the building of Rome.

DECADE II. BOOK XII.

Florus his Epitome of the Twelfth Book of Livy.

The Roman Ambassadors having been assassinated by the Gall Senones, a War is therefore declar'd against them, wherein Cæcilius the Pretor with his Forces is defeated. And the Roman Fleet being rob'd by the Florentines, and the Admiral kill'd, the Ambassadors sent to them to complain of these injuries, are beaten: Therefore a War is declar'd against them. The Samnites revolt, with whom as also the Lucanians and Brutians many Battels are fought with good success. Pyrrhus King of Epirus comes into Italy to aid the Tarentines. The Campanian Legion under the command of its Tribune, Decius Jubbilius, being sent for to aid the Rhegians, they slay the Inhabitants and seize on the Town of Rhegium.

- I. WHEN P. Cornelius Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius Calvinus were Consuls, there arose some fear again of the Gallie War, it being reported that many of the *Tuscan*s took part with the Gauls, so that the Senate looked on the danger of the Arretines as a thing not to be neglected; but because that neither Dolabella could be call'd out of the Volsinian Province, nor Domitius from Lucania without prejudice to the Affairs they had in hand: the Senate commanded L. Cæcilius the last year Consul, and then a Pretor to march out speedily to raise the Siege of Arretium; But lest this War should seem to be undertaken rashly, 'twas thought fit to send Ambassadors before to acquaint the Gauls, that Arretium was under the Romans protection; and that the Gauls would seem to act more honestly, if they would not suffer their young Men to leave in War against their Confederates. Whilst the Ambassadors carried this Message through the several Canons of the Gauls, one Britomaris a young Hotspur, descended from the Royal Line, whose Father among the Auxiliaries of the Hetrurians had been slain by the Romans, being blinfull with desire of revenge, not only seiz'd on the Ambassadors cutting them in pieces, but tore even their Robes, and badges of their Sacred Character. When this barbarous act was reported at Rome, and in the Camp of Dolabella, people were so incens'd at it, that a war was immediately declar'd against the Senones; and the Consul laying aside the Hetrurian Expedition, by great Journeys through the Sabino and Picene Countries, arrives upon the borders of the Senones, who being alarm'd by this sudden incursion of the Enemy, whilst the main of their Forces was absent, came out with a few unexperienced Soldiers, and were easily routed. The Consul giving no respite to the conquered, burns their Villages, and wafts all the Country round. In fine, he slew all that were of age, carried into captivity all the weak multitude of Women and Children, and left the Country as desert as he could be-hind him. Britomaris himself was taken, and after he had endured several tortures, he was releas'd for the Triumph. But at the same time Affairs did not succeed so well at Arretium, L. Cæcilius before the Town being routed by the Senones and Hetrurians. Seven Tribunes and many brave Men besides having been killed together with the General. Out of the Legions and Auxiliaries thirteen thousand Men were lost: but the joy for this Victory among the Gauls was quite damp'd with mourning and consternation, when they understood the ruin of their own Country: for these people being furious, desperate, and rash, having now no habitation to go to, drew together all their Countrymen that fought in Hetruria, resolving in a heat to march against Rome, as if they were led by Fate to their own destruction: "For they could not quit scores with the ravagers of their Territories, but by forcing them to behold their own City under the same Fate; and to be sure they had as much courage, and greater reason to march against Rome than their Ancestours, who setting out of Clusium a place in the same Hetruria, had conquer'd that City. Having provoked one another by such words as these, they marched out in a hurry being naturally impatient of delay, and now halting the more to surprize the Enemy; but whilst they pass through their Enemies Country, several devices were found to retard their motion, whereby time was gain'd to provide against against the storm. Being thus put back, whilst they roam heedlessly through strange and dangerous places, at last they light on Domitius the Consul, and immediately joined Battel with him; but his Conduct easily prevail'd over their rashness, many of them being kill'd in the Battel, the rest in rage and despair turned the Swords upon themselves, which they had drawn in vain against their Enemies. So that a Nation but now flourishing in power for the barbarous Assassination of the Ambassadors is overtaken by a swift and a severe vengeance: infomuch that in a few months space 'twas destroyed quite, and ceas'd to have a name among the Nations, whose rights it had invaded. For the small remainder of the Senones that went to the Boii their Neighbours and Kinsmen, was wholly destroyed that same year by the Consul Dolabella. For when they by considering the bloody slaughters of their people, and fearing the like fate themselves had stirred the Boii and Hetrurians to take Arms, they fought a Battel at the Lake Vadimonius wherein many of the Hetrurians were killed, and of the Boii a few onely escaped, but the whole race of the Senones was quite extinguished: infomuch that none of that people which had burnt Rome was thought to have surviv'd.

It seems probable that a Colony was brought to Sena about the same time, when the Romans having made themselves Masters of the whole Country, the Senones in that part of Italy were utterly destroyed. But yet the Boii and the Hetrurians having reinforced their Army with such Men as were grown up to military Age by that time, made bold again to try their fortunes in the Field, who I believe were then routed by Æmilius Papus, for his and Fabricius's first Consulship fell as this year. And 'tis certain Hetruria was Papus's Province, yet in most Annals extant the account of these things, by the intervention of greater, is quite lost.

Those States of Italy that were yet free and unconquer'd, being afraid of the Romans, who by daily Victories improv'd both in valour and power, rais'd a dangerous and bloody War, joining all their Policy and Force, as if they went to suppress a common Enemy. Nor was it thought good to defer the War till the remnants of the Boii and Hetrurians should be strong enough to divert the Roman Arms.

The Samnites first of all take Arms, having again broke the League, and entered into a Confederacy with the Brutians and Lucanians. But C. Fabricius the Consul routed them in several Battels, the most remarkable whereof was that, when Statilius besieging Thurina the second time, they fought hand to hand: and after great numbers slain of the Enemies, their Camp was taken. 'Tis reported that whilst their Camp was bravely defended, a Man of prodigious Stature helping to bring the Ladders, so encouraged the Romans, that they gained a complete Victory. In the fight, and in the Enemies Camp twenty thousand are said to have been killed: five thousand with the General, and twenty Ensigns were taken. Next day when the Consul would have rewarded them who signaliz'd themselves in this Action, promising him that first entred the Enemies Camp a Coronet [Corona Vallaris] the Man after diligent search could not be found, whereas had he been a Soldier, he would have come of his own accord to receive his reward. 'Twas therefore credibly reported, that Mars himself was the Author of this Victory. And hence by the Consuls Edict a solemn Procession was celebrated in honour of him: the Soldiers being adorned with Laurel, and performing the Solemnity with extraordinary joy.

The Tarentines had not as yet openly aided those that enter'd into the Confederacy against the Romans, though they were the main contrivers of that League; yet they held it more adviseable to let others begin the quarrel, and run the first risk of the War. Yet this Policy would now do no longer, for by an accident provoking the giddy Rabble, the whole mystery was reveal'd.

That part of Italy at that time after the mode of the Greeks who built Tarentum, and most other Towns thereabouts, diverted themselves unreasonably with Shows and Stage-plays; the Tarentines being particularly notorious for this piece of luxury: who by report abandon'd themselves so much to pleasures, that they had more Feasts and Games, than the year had days. It happen'd that they were in the great Theatre which stands by the Haven, at a Play, when L. Valerius (according to others Cornelius) the Admiral with ten Roman Ships came into sight: making shew as if they design'd to put in at that Port, which bred a mistake hurtful to both sides; whilst the Romans mistrusting nothing, drew to shore, as to a place of hospitality: But the Tarentines being jealous, took the Fleet to be sent upon an hostile design. Philocharus was present (one for his lewd life called Thais by his Countrymen) who mentioning some ancient Treaties, alledg'd that the Romans were not allow'd to sail by the Cape of Lacinium, "therefore he commands them to make up against those rash Barbarians, and to correct their insolence by force. The rude multitude through constant drunkenness being half mad applaud the saying, infomuch, that all approv'd the vile fellow's advice, and immediately betaking themselves to their Arms, ran aboard their Ships. The Romans wholly unprepar'd for fight fled away, but the Tarentines chasing them very hard, five onely of the Ships escap'd, the other five being surrounded by the Enemy were forc'd back into the Port, of which they sunk four with the Admiral, and took one. The Men of military Age and strength they slew, and sold the rest for Slaves. Soon after out of the same whimsical humour they make War upon those of Thurium, charging them "of being the cause that the Romans were come into those places, who "when they were Grecians had chosen to be protected in their distresses by a barbarous people rather "than by their Countrymen and Neighbours. The Town hereupon being seiz'd was plunder'd: the principal Men banish'd, and the Roman Garison having capitulated for their lives, were sent away.

This news coming to Rome, it was resent'd, as the greatness of the injury deserv'd. But to undertake a new War at such a time was judged inconvenient. Ambassadors therefore were sent to complain of the wrong done, and to require restitution of Prisoners, and of whatever had been taken from those of "Thurium, or else an equal compensation for the same. As likewise that the Exiles should be sent back, "and that the Authors of these mischiefs be deliver'd up to the Romans.

After the Grecian manner the Tarentines were wont to assemble their People in the Theatre; where the Ambassadors with much ado getting admittance found the Rabble carowing and revelling: for they at that time also kept Holy-day. Here when L. Posthumus began his Speech, he was received with derision by the scurrilous multitude; whereupon he return'd to Rome with greater reasons for War than he had when he came thence; for they used him so despicably, that afterwards no body minded what he said: but as oft as he mis'd the pronunciation of a Greek word, being himself a Roman, the whole croud laugh'd loud at it, and tauntingly call'd him Barbarian. They likewise derided the Ambassadors garb, for they wore their Gowns, and in fine turn'd them out of the Theatre, they in vain appealing to the Laws of Nations.

This usage was follow'd with worse and not fit to be mention'd, but that it may be an instance for checking the exorbitances of popular insolence. When the Ambassadors were going away among the croud of the Tarentines that stood at the door of the Theatre, one Philonides a Buffoon (for this Town by her lewdness deserves to have the names of her Buffoons recorded in Story, whilst her Princes are forgotten) piss'd upon the sacred Robes of the Ambassador, like an impudent Dog. This might have pass'd for the fault of one Rascal, had not the whole Town approv'd the same, and the Theatre echo'd with the laughter and acclamations of those that applauded it. Posthumus speaking these words, This Omen is welcome; Varlet, inasmuch as you give us what we do not ask you; turning to the multitude, and throwing his garment that had been soiled; when with repeated laughter, he saw them also expose the Romans by Lampoons and antick Dances, he cry'd out, Laugh, laugh you Tarentines, whilst you may, for you shall mourn sufficiently hereafter. The Tarentines being angry at this: To vex you yet more, I tell you beforehand (says he) that you will be forced to wash this garment clean in your own blood. After which without receiving any other Answer they departed. Now L. Aemilius Barbula, and Q. Marcus Philippus being Consuls had entred upon their Office at Rome. Who having conven'd the Senate, when they saw the Vestment (which was brought foul as it was by the Ambassadors;) and that they had reported to the Senate the several circumstances of this multiplied contumely: all in general being highly incens'd thereat, 'twas resolv'd that it should be reveng'd by Arms. But because their Forces were engag'd in so many other Wars against very powerful Nations, they could not well determine, whether they should presently send an Army against the Tarentines or stay a little; and the matter being debated in the House from morning till night for several days, some being of Opinion that nothing should be attempted before the other Provinces, at least those adjacent to Tarentum, were subdued; and others advis'd that a War should be immediately declar'd. At last, when the Voices had been numbred, the Senate decreed that a War against Tarentum should be propos'd to the Commons. Which when the People had unanimously ratified, an Express was sent to Aemilius the Consul, who was gone to the Army at Sammium, that quitting the business in hand, he should incamp in the Country of the Tarentines. And if the Tarentines refus'd to give satisfaction for the injuries they had done, he should make a just and sacred War against them.

The Tarentines seeing they had not now to do with a few unarm'd Men, but with military Forces drawn in Battalia, as it were rous'd from their drunken fit, they began seriously to consider what they had best to do. To undertake the War seem'd dangerous, to submit servile, and both could not be avoid'd. Whilst they thus varied in their Opinions, one rises up, and speaks to this Effect.

XIV.

"Why spend we the day in contrast, O Tarentines? These times require actions, not words, for the performing of which, to the advantage of the public, we want good Counsels and liberty of Speech. I am not at all concern'd, that according to the Epidemical distemper of all free States, you have been humour'd formerly with flattering Orations, though they often did you harm. For then as it happens in times of prosperity, what was most for the public Interest, you did not understand. But now the Roman Army is upon our Coasts, and the terror of the Enemy before our Gates: by such Schooling you shall easily learn to prefer your Interest before your pleasures: Do not yet mistake me, as if I stood up to upbraid you with things past; for to charge Men with an old fault out of season, proceeds from a malicious Spirit, such as insults over the mistakes of others: but honest Men, that love their Country, chuse to palliate and excuse the peoples miscarriages, unless when to avert a public Calamity the memory of former Errors does very much conduce. For to have ones self esteem'd free from Error as long as we are Men, is too proud; and yet to stumble often at the same stone, and never by the event correcting our folly, to learn Caution, is below a Man. Upon the Speech of one Man we sunk the Roman Gallies. Afterwards we annoy'd the Thurians our Countrymen after an hostile manner; because they chose to be protect'd by the Romans rather than to be worr'd by the Brutians and Lucanians. We let the Roman Ambassadors be affronted in a most contumelious manner: and hereby we have drawn upon our selves a dangerous, terrible and sudden War, which we might have been without, and that in the unhappiest time that could be for us. In fine, the Romans are incamp'd in the Tarentine Country: and we in the greatest uncertainty are demurring, whether we shall chuse a formidable War, or a dishonourable Peace; and I could wish now at least that foregoing all false hopes, and private Interests we concert our measures with an eye to the public Interest and Honour; then might we either treat upon honourable terms, or safely take up Arms. Now I see you are divided into two parts, and almost factions, not advising upon judgment and the true state of Affairs, but each of you is byas'd by his own private reasons; for why else should so many young and poor Men as I see, be bent upon the War? and why none of the rich and the old Men like it? Is there any other reason of the Peoples being thus divided equally; but that the one in times of Peace would enjoy their Estates, and the Interest of their Money, whilst the others in case of War hope for advantage from Places of Command, or free-booting. We have formerly been sick of this Disease, nor has our Commonwealth for a long while wanted such Men, as desir'd to improve their own Estates, though with the public damage. All which you will certainly prevent (for I must tell you, what I conceive most expedient in the present juncture) if you do neither buy a Peace upon such unequal terms, as may intrench upon the privileges of a Free State: nor yet oppose your own strength against so formidable an Enemy. The command in chief of our Forces has been given often to Foreiners by our Ancestors. From Peloponnesus or Sicily, Archidamus the Son of Agessilaus, afterwards Cleonymus, and then Agathocles have been sent for. In our memory, when we were infested by our Neighbours with War, our Forefathers sent for Alexander of Epirus: by which course they themselves not only enjoyed prosperity, but left the State flourishing to us. Between us and the Epiriots remains now the same Amity: and they are now as well appointed both for an Army and a General; and Pyrhus is oblig'd to us for the aid we gave him with our Fleet when he fought with the Coreyreans. Think not therefore this to be my advice onely, but that of the best and wisest Persons, who have fortunately govern'd this State: which you ought even for that reason to imbrace, because in the former instance you see as it were the whole reason thereof with the consequence. But besides, there are other strong and clear arguments for the thing. There is no Man among us so Eminent, that all the rest will condescend to obey him: how great the dangers of Emulation are, especially being to deal with a puissant, active Enemy, you your selves know; and whatever General you should make, he would ruin your Affairs, either by an immoderate desire of Peace, or an unreasonable inclination to War; not to tell you that against the Romans a Nation so inur'd to Arms, a War is not safely made under every General. But Pyrhus doubtless for Valour and Martial Conduct is outdone by none. Perhaps 'twill be said,

"said he will not come? Yes doubtless because he is a lover of action, and has no War in hand, he will not onely come willingly himself, but also bring with him an Army of brave experienced Soldiers, and that we may not fear any designs upon our own liberties, we may agree with him on such terms before-hand as may secure our Commonwealth. By this means we shall have some probable hopes of obtaining either an advantageous Peace for our selves, or the glorious opportunity of prescribing Conditions to them. Though it may be hop'd things will so fall out, that the Romans may upon even terms adjust their differences with us, rather than at such a juncture receive Pyrhus into Italy: who formerly stood in fear of a King of the same Epirus inferior to this for glory and power.

This Counsel prevail'd, not onely because it seem'd to propose a fair way for securing the State; but also because the Assembly being divided into two contrary parties, and neither side could prevail (the other still opposing) all of them consequently embrac'd that Opinion, which seem'd a mean betwixt 'em both. 'Tis reported that when the Decree for calling in Pyrhus was commonly talk'd of in the Town; One Meto, a sober Man, having a wither'd Garland and a Link like a Drunkard, entred the Theatre together with a She-piper: and then that the Tarentines after their usual merriment commanded them both to stand in the middle, the Man to sing, and the Woman to pipe. Then silence being made, Meto said, O Tarentines, you do well in allowing any that will, the liberty to sing and dance: For when once Pyrhus comes to Town, we shall scarce live as we would our selves.

The People being mov'd hereat, and some bustle rising among them, the Authors of the injuries done the Romans, left any proposals of Peace prevailing, they should be deliver'd to be punish'd, having rebuk'd the People for being so shamefully wheedled by such a senseless Fellow, drove Meto by force out of the Theatre: and then no body being left to oppose it, the Decree pass'd. But the Roman Consul having no answer of Peace from the Tarentines: and hearing besides that Ambassadors and Presents had been sent to Pyrhus, applied himself to the War, and wast'd the Country. Some Towns he takes by force, others upon surrender: and spreads terror and ruin all round. Forces were also sent from Tarentum to hinder the incursions of the Romans: and a shrewd Battel happen'd between them; but the Romans having the better of it, the Grecians after great slaughters of their Men were driven into the Town. Aemilius now burns and wasts the Country about, without any opposition. The Tarentines being frighted with their defeat, as the nature of the Rabble is, (who the more insolent they are in prosperity, are the more dejected in adversity) put the Government in the hands of Agis, who always advis'd them to have Peace with the Romans: whereof they had greater hopes and desire, by reason of some of their Noblemen who were dismiss'd by the Roman General: of whose civility they spoke much, and of the kind usage the Tarentines who were either taken in the Battel, or abroad in the Fields, had received of him. But their confidence in Cyneas's coming with succors from Epirus alter'd and kept up their minds.

For Pyrhus being a brave-spirited Man, and out of emulation to Alexander the Great, in his fancy aspiring to some mighty Empire, believ'd he had a way mark'd out by the Fates themselves inviting him, to perform what he had design'd; 'tis said likewise, that he was confirm'd by the Delphic Oracle, which, though it was ambiguous, and consequently capable of a double signification, the King interpreted after his own fancy, taking it for a sure lucky Omen. For they say, when he consulted the Oracle touching the event of the War he had in hand, he was answer'd [posse cum Romanos vincere.] But the Tarentine Ambassadors encourag'd him more, who assur'd him that out of their own Territories, together with the Lucanians, Samnites and Messapians, and the rest of the Confederates twenty thousand Horse, and three hundred and fifty thousand Foot might be rais'd; and if he could but master the Romans with these Forces, he promis'd himself an easy Conquest of the rest of Italy. From hence also the short passage into Sicily discover'd that Island after the extinction of the House of Agathocles void, and at odds with it self, which he presum'd, did belong to him by Inheritance, because he had Children by Lanassa the Daughter of Agathocles. And when these things were done according to his mind, he intended to carry on the War against Carthage.

'Tis reported that Cyneas being a very discreet person, to shew that the King's immoderate ambition being like to mar the pleasure of his present enjoyments, was even by his own confession to be restrain'd, asked him, "What he design'd to do after the Conquest of the Romans? and when Pyrhus told him of "Victory upon Victory; What shall we do then, says he, when all this is compleated? Then, says "Pyrhus, we shall abundantly enjoy the blessings of Peace. To which Cyneas repli'd, Why cannot we, O "King, enjoy the same now, whilst they are in our power, and not by undertaking new Wars utterly lose and destroy them?

But Pyrhus being prevail'd with by a second Embassy from the Tarentines, and carried away by his own ambition answer'd, "That 'twas natural for the Epiriots to fight not onely for themselves but also for their "Confederates. Yet the better to colour his designs, he made his agreement with the Ambassadors precisely that he should return home as soon as he had reliev'd them, and not be detain'd in Italy any longer than there was need of him. Then he diligently made preparations for the War: and mann'd a great number of Gallies: besides he set out other Vessels for the transportation of Men and Horses; making use of most of the Italian Ambassadors, (that under pretence of honour he might keep them for Hostages) in raising and levying his Forces; he sent the rest with three thousand Men before to Tarentum, under the command of Cyneas.

All hopes of Peace being destroy'd by the arrival of these, Agis is depos'd from the Government: and one of the Ambassadors that were return'd was put in his room by a decree of the People. Not long after Milo being sent by the King plac'd a Garrison in the Fort of Tarentum, and requir'd that he should guard the Town himself, the simple multitude being glad of it, for they thought that Strangers took all the pains and trouble, whilst they had ease and security. An allowance of Victuals was therefore order'd for the Soldiers, and Money for Pyrhus with all cheerfulness.

Aemilius in the mean time being inform'd of the arrival of these forc'd Soldiers, that he might take his Winter-quarters in places of more security, resolv'd to carry away his Army into Lucania; but he was to pass through several defiles, which were environ'd with steep, and unpassable Rocks on one side, and on the other side with the Sea. The Tarentines having intelligence of the Roman Generals design, put to shoar with several Ships carrying Engines to throw Stones, wherewith they gall'd the Roman Soldiers: whilst they march'd through these narrow Passes, which were expos'd to their shot. Aemilius seeing Valour could not prevail, made his way through by a Stratagem, placing in the Flank of his Army which was expos'd to danger, those Prisoners which were in the Rear: in compassion of whom (whilst they fear'd to shoot their own Men) the Tarentines spar'd the Enemies also. These are almost all the transactions of this Campaign at Tarentum.

XX. At Rome C. Fabricius Luscinus, who in his Consulship had bravely defeated the Samnites, Brutians and Lucanians, enter'd the Capitol in Triumph, and not many days after Q. Marcius the Consul had the same honour, being return'd from Hetruria, where he fought with good success: what the reason was that brought him back from that Province, the Hetrurian War being as yet not ended at such an inconvenient time (for he triumph'd the 11th of March) is not recorded. I guess he was call'd by the Senate, who being then much concern'd with the expectation of Pyrrhus, drew from every part all their Forces to oppose him. For then first of all (whilst this terrible War forced the Romans to put out several Armies for their defence) the common Subjects, who were anciently exempt from warfare, were listed, and Arms were given them upon the public charge, they being too poor to buy for themselves: So that whilst the Legions were elsewhere employed, several Squadrons of these being posted upon the walls and in the Market-place might guard the City.

Nor could all these Methods have prevented imminent ruin, had not the fortune of a People design'd by Fate to be Sovereign of the World, reserv'd for these dangerous times, very great Men, and perhaps the bravest of any that State ever had; being not renown'd for Wealth or Parentage, but for their Valour and contempt of Riches. For this Age bred up the Curii, and the Coruncanii, persons not esteem'd for Wealth, or Extraction, but of eminent Renown; which they (being persons of great integrity) acquir'd by their experience in War, and an equal probity of Manners, doing good service to their Country both ways, which against a King to be fear'd on either account, had as great need of Men that would contemn his Gold, as of such as would put back his Sword.

XXII. Pyrrhus in the mean while not tarrying 'till Spring, as he was bringing with him an Army of 22 thousand Foot, and 3000 Horse, besides twenty Elephants, and a company of Archers, and Slingers, met in the midst of his Voyage with a great storm, wherein he was almost cast away: the Navy being dispersed and several Ships wrack'd, when the Admiral also was in danger, Pyrrhus threw himself into the Sea, and with much ado swam to shore: his courage supporting his loss of strength, and the good attendance of the Messapians, who treated him being cast out upon their shore, with all kindness and civility; some of the Ships that had escap'd, were recover'd by their means: and a few Horsemen, two Elephants, and under two thousand Foot were got together. With these Forces he marches towards Tarentum, where Cynaeas with his Men went out to meet him, and waited on him into the Town, where being receiv'd by the Tarentines with all expressions of joy, he repos'd himself a few days: in which time when he observ'd the manners of this People to be such, that unless they were reform'd, they could not be preserv'd by any body, but would be like to undo their own defenders, he took no more notice of it for the present: till the Ships that had been scatter'd by the storm were arriv'd, so that he had Forces enough. Then he shut up their Galleries and Theaters (where the idle youth spent whole days in walking, and pastime) and prohibited all Feasts and Clubs, and retrench'd the excesses of their solemn Games. After which he strictly muster'd their young Men, commanding the Pref-masters (as he us'd to do) to list Men that were big set, and he would make them valiant: These being mingled among his own Troops, lest if they were separated from the rest, they should mutiny, were train'd by him with the same exactness of discipline, none being permitted to be often absent from his Colours upon pain of death. And as for those that bore Arms already, he compell'd them for the greatest part of the day to keep guard in the Market-place. The unwontedness of which usage to Men of soft effeminate lives was mighty troublefom, so that they call'd it Slavery, thus to be constrain'd to save themselves, whilst they were willing to perish by their idleness and Luxury. And that which offended them more was the rudeness of some of the King's Guards, who taking up their Quarters where they fancy'd, kept them against the Masters will, and afterwards behaved themselves with the same incivility towards their Wives and Children.

XXIII. Many therefore being weary of such a life, left the Town, and departed into the Country, till the Gates were shut up, and a Guard was set to hinder them. Then the Tarentines understanding too late, that they had received a Master instead of a Confederate, with anger and murmuring deploir'd their condition, and that more freely, when they had assembled together upon some necessary occasions, and besides their usual passion were heated also with Wine: and some inform'd Pyrrhus of the same; who sent for several that were charged for railing against him at a Feast. But the downright confession of one Person among them brought off the rest: saying, "We own our selves to have spoken these words, and if our Wine had not been out, we had said worse than this." Then Pyrrhus, who had rather have the fault imputed to the Wine, than to the Men, smiling at the matter, discharged them. But still mistrusting the humours of this people, where he saw any Person esteem'd either for his Authority or Counsel by the Tarentines, he upon just, or pretended causes sent him away to his Son Ptolemy (a Youth of fifteen years of age, to whom at his departure he had committed his Kingdom to be govern'd:) He destroy'd others by secret wiles. There were some, whom with a feigned civility he carel'd, using them as his Minions, that they might become the more suspected by the People: Of this number Aristarchus was one, a Person eminent among the Grandees both for his Eloquence, and also because the People lov'd him. Now because he saw this Man in such favour with the People, he commands him upon pretence of business to sail to Epirus. Aristarchus when he saw it was present death to disobey the King's Command, and to obey it a more slow, but every whit as certain a destruction, went aboard, and when he got pretty far into the Sea, he changed his course for Rome, and being received there into protection, he inform'd the Senate at large of several important Affairs.

XXIV. Whilst Pyrrhus acts thus at Tarentum, the Romans with no less diligence levied Men and Money for the War. C. Fabricius being sent to the Confederates to deter them by his Interest and Authority from Innovation: they put Garisons likewise into some convenient places to keep those from revolting, whose inconstancy they were jealous of. For now whatever discontent upon account of former injuries, or turbulent humour out of a desire of change was entertain'd by any Man, the strength of so many Nations joining against one, and the expectation of such a warlike Prince had set all this a working. Whence the Romans were very diligent in securing themselves by crushing the Ring-leaders of the Factions. A remarkable accident happened about that time; some Noblemen of Prænestæ, who were brought to Rome in the dusk of the Evening being imprison'd in the common Treasury: whereby they came at last to understand the quibble of that false Oracle, upon the confidence of which they had oft assur'd their Countrymen, when they solicited them to revolt, that it was doom'd for the Prænestines to enter the Roman Treasury.

XXV. Whilst Pyrrhus acts thus at Tarentum, the Romans with no less diligence levied Men and Money for the War. C. Fabricius being sent to the Confederates to deter them by his Interest and Authority from Innovation: they put Garisons likewise into some convenient places to keep those from revolting, whose inconstancy they were jealous of. XXVI. Whilst Pyrrhus acts thus at Tarentum, the Romans with no less diligence levied Men and Money for the War. *C. Treasury. The Senate being already much concern'd, (upon news that Fabrizius was kept by their Confederates, that they by such a pledge might receive their own Men safe from the Romans, and that Ambassadors were sent to stir the Hetrurians, Umbrians and Gauls against the Romans) were now perplex'd with new trouble, by reason of an action both horrid in it self, and also of dangerous consequence at such an ill juncture, being like to bring the Roman faith into suspicion and discredit among the Italians. In the utmost coast of Italy opposite to Sicily Rhegium stands, a Town nam'd so by the Grecians; the People wealthy and flourishing in those days. These upon the arrival of Pyrrhus apprehending the danger of the War, and being affrighted by the Carthaginian Fleets roving in that Sea, distrustful their own strength, they resolv'd to send for a Garison of Roman Soldiers, and accordingly four thousand Men were sent that were raised in the Colonies of Campania, (whence they were call'd the Campanian Legion) under the command of D. Iulius the Tribune. These Men at the first wanted neither faithfulness nor diligence in defending the Town. But afterwards, because there was no fear of War near them, they grew Luxurious through sloth, and an imitation of the Grecian softness, and comparing their present plenty with the hard labourious life they had led hitherto, they began to look with an envious Eye on the commodiousness of the place, and the prosperity of the Inhabitants; and when they were together in their Quarters they would talk of plundering them. This pleas'd Decius being himself of the same rapacious humour; and having long since contriv'd that villanous design of seizing the Town into his own hands. The conjuncture of the present War favour'd the enterprize, whereby he knew the Romans would be so taken up that they could not mind the Rhegians: and on the opposite shore he look'd on the Mamertines as a President of thriving Villany, and doubtless like to be abettors of his treachery: besides that they were ally'd together as Countrymen. For these being Campanians originally, when they served formerly among the Auxiliaries of Agathocles, being received as Friends by those of Messina possess'd themselves of the City, having killed or cast out the Men and divided their Wives and Houses amongst themselves. They remembered also how the Ancient Campanians seized on Capua being taken away from the Tuscanians by a like perfidy: The design then being well approv'd, it remain'd that they should consult, how they might act this Villany safely, lest being but a few in a populous City they should be environ'd by greater numbers and kill'd. He counterfeit's Letters as sent from the Rhegians to Pyrrhus, that the Roman Garison should be betrayed to him, and the Soldiers were privately call'd, and the Letters read, as intercepted: Decius complaining heavily of the Rhegians treachery, and some of the Soldiers prepared on purpose, crying out, that they must defend themselves with their Arms, and turn the destruction contriv'd against them upon the heads of its contrivers: withal there comes one, as they had order'd it beforehand, who says, that Pyrrhus's Navy was seen upon the Rhegian shore, and that private correspondence pass'd between Pyrrhus and the Rhegians. The Soldiers besides their former eagerness to the thing, were now also enrag'd by the treachery of the Enemy, and the fear of danger, and by the consent of all they came to this resolution, that they should surprize the Town, and having kill'd the men they should seize upon all their public and private Wealth. Hereupon this horrid and infamous act was committed; for Decius having invited some of the chief Men to Supper, kills them at his Table, against all the sacred ties of hospitality. Others were assassinated in their own Houses, and the greatest part of the Rhegians, being murder'd: the rest were expelled their Country by those very persons, whom a little before they had receiv'd into it (for the defence of themselves and their Country) under the name of Friends and Confederates. This done, they drew up a new Model of Government: the Houses and Estates of these poor wretches being divided among the Villains: and whilst the slaughter was yet fresh, the Widows and Virgins were forced to marry those who had slain their Husbands and Fathers: and the power and name of the Rhegian State was assum'd by this treacherous Legion.

But God has well order'd for Mankind that generally instances of notorious Villanies prove likewise Examples of as remarkable vengeance, that no man should be encouraged to the same practices by the success of Impiety, but deter'd by the consequence thereof. For wicked men can never enjoy true felicity; nor is there any greater folly than to imagine any man happier by his wickedness; for, supposing that no punishments remain'd after this life, which yet wise men know to be very great, (though such is the infidelity of some Men, that they are apt to disbelieve even what they see; much more what they are not sensible of) yet though every thing should hit luckily, the reflexion upon their own guilts will gall their minds with inward anxiety: their names whilst they live, and their memories when they are dead will be hated and abhorred amongst Men; and what they have got so basely, and kept so diligently, is taken away from them to their great sorrow, neither God nor Man suffering Villains to pass long with impunity.

And here I think it not amiss to relate the punishments inflict'd on Decius Iulius, and his Complices in this barbarous act: which in point of time fell in with these matters we treat of; for their final destruction, (they being in the mean while plagu'd with several disasters) was defer'd till ten years after, as we shall mention in time; for these Rogues had no long peace or joy among themselves. However they secur'd themselves from the Romans and Pyrrhus, besides the opportunity of the times, by making a Peace with the Mamertines, with conditions for mutual Security. For at present in the infancy of their State, until their Commonwealth erected so violently and suddenly were establish'd, it was thought the best course to abstain from War: for that they could not safely take Arms against the King, and hop'd for an easier pardon from the Romans, if they should not fight against them also. The first occasion of their Quarrel, (as it is wont to be among Thieves) arose from the unequal division of the Spoil. Decius in the tumult being driven out fled to Messina. The Garison of the place chusing his Secretary M. Cæsius for their Commander. Decius likewise, having brought with him a great sum of Money, received the same honour from the Mamertines; but he did not long enjoy his good fortunes. For it happen'd, that having fore Eyes he caus'd a famous Physician to be sent for (the divine Vengeance now halting the Villain to heavier punishments) and the Physician was brought, who was a native of Rhegium, but because he had dwelt at Messina many years, his Country became unknown, not onely to Decius, who wittingly would never have trusted any Rhegian, but also to most of the Inhabitants of the Town.

This Man remembering his own Country, and being resolv'd to revenge its wrongs, persuades Decius that he had brought a strong Medicine for him, but that it was very safe and quick in its Operation. And then having applied a Plaster, made of Spanish Flies, and forbidding it to be taken off, 'till he was return'd to his Patient, he presently took Ship and left Messina. Decius having long enough endur'd an incredible torment, after that the Physician return'd not, commanded the Eye-salve to be taken off: which was no sooner done, but he found his Eyes were put out: and thus he leads an infamous vagrant life; being blind, and likewise troubled with a crazy body as well as a discontented mind, (like a Prisoner chain'd) he is reserv'd reserv'd for his Execution. A strange providence it was, that he should suffer this calamity from that very Man, to whom he had trusted his life, who himself had barbarously and perfidiously circumvented thole whom he ought to have defended. Such examples for the good of Mankind ought to be recorded in Story. For Men can never be too much convinc'd, how far that Craftiness is distant from true Prudence, by which for a certain false good, men having condemn'd Vertue and Honesty, through base and dishonest passions run into real evils.

DECADE II. BOOK XIII.

Florus his Epitome of the Thirteenth Book of Livy.

Valerius Levinus the Consul is worsted by King Pyrrhus, chiefly occasion'd by the Soldiers being frighted at the sight of his Elephants. Pyrrhus after the Fight viewing the Bodies of the Romans that were slain, takes notice that they all lay with their faces towards the Enemy. He spoils the Country almost up to the Walls of Rome. He attempts to seduce C. Fabricius that was sent by the Senate to treat with him about redeeming of Prisoners, but cannot prevail with him to forsake and betray his Country. The Prisoners are released gratis. Cynæas is sent by Pyrrhus Ambassador to the Senate, desiring that for the better Treating and concluding a Peace; his Master the King with a small Guard might be admitted into the City; The Debate whereof being adjourn'd to a fuller Senate, Appius Claudiuſ who by reason of the weakness of his sight, had a long time refrain'd coming to publick Councils, then appeared in the House, and argued so smartly against it, that Pyrrhus's request was flatly deny'd. Cn. Domitius the first Commoner that ever was Censor, makes a Cessing or general Poll, and finds 278222. Citizens. Another Battel is fought with King Pyrrhus, but with doubtful success. The League with the Carthaginians is renewed the fourth time. A Renegado having offered C. Fabricius the Consul to poison King Pyrrhus, is sent back again and his Treason discovered. This Book also contains several successes against the Tullians, Lucanians, Brutians and Samnites.

- I. IN the mean while part of the Forces being kept at Rome for its defence, and the uncertain chances of War, the Army and the Provinces were dispos'd of among the new Consuls. To P. Valerius Levinus the Tarentines and Pyrrhus were allotted, and the relicks of the Hetrurian War to Coruncanius. Levinus conceiving that it might render him more terrible and renown'd, if he should first attack the Enemy; and withal that it was advantageous to the State, to have the fear and damages, as far as might be, remov'd from the Roman Territories, marches out of hand into Lucania and fortifies a Castle, that was conveniently situated there: putting in it a strong Garison, that he might both obstruct Pyrrhus's designs, and hinder the Lucanians whose treachery he fear'd, from revolting to the Enemy.

Upon the news of the Roman Consuls arrival, Pyrrhus, though the Confederates were not come together, judging it a disgrace to him to discover any signs of fear in the beginning of the War, marches out with the Forces he had immediately against him; but that by some plausible pretence he might put off the matter, and gain time, he sent a Herald with Letters, the Contents wherof were as followeth:

PYRRHUS to LEVINUS.

- II. I hear that you are coming with an Army against the Tarentines: but leave the Army, and come with a few Men to me. "For when I shall have understood the matter, I will force one side to do to the other whatever is just, though against their wills."
- To this Levinus answers: "We neither take you to be Judg of our differences, nor fear you as our Enemy: but 'tis impertinently done by you, thus to meddle with other mens matters, who your self being very blame-worthy have not yet made us any satisfaction for entring Italy without our leave."
- "Therefore we are come with our Armies in Battalia, to fight with you, as well as the Tarentines, referring the decision of our Quarrel to the arbitration of Mars the founder of our Race."

- Then he march'd outright against the Enemy, and late down between the Cities Pandosia and Heraclea; the River Siris parting his Camp from the Enemies. 'Tis reported, that Pyrrhus having gone to the River to view the Enemies posture, told Megacles one of his Friends: Those Barbarians certainly are not drawn up after the manner of Barbarians, but we shall soon understand their mistle. Afterwards having set a strong Guard to secure the Passes of the River, that the Enemy might not come over, he resolv'd to wait for the Confederates. For he was concern'd not onely for the present posture of Affairs, being deceived in his hopes that the Romans would be straitned for Provisions in a Hostile Country, but also by reason of Levinus's confidence, which by a fresh instance he had rendred more admirable; having freely dismissed the Enemies Spies, that came to view his Camp, and telling them, that he had another Army greater than that.

In the mean while the two Armies lying so near, there happen'd continual Skirmishes between them; but there was no set Battel fought: and after they had spent fifty days in these Skirmishings, the Consul being concern'd for the same reasons to hasten a Battel, as Pyrrhus was to put it off, assembled his Soldiers and informed them of his design; he incouraged them also not to fear this strange Enemy, by lessening the Fame of Pyrrhus, and the terrour of his Elephants as much as he could. In fine, he prepares so as to be able to fight the Enemy, if he would give him Battel, or else to force him to it against his will.

After-

Afterwards finding that Pyrrhus continu'd in his resolution, he sent the Cavalry before, as if they made an incursion to plunder the Country, waiting in the mean time with his Army in order of Battel, till the shout was heard from the other side of the River. The Horsemen taking a great compass about from their Camp, pass'd the River where it was not guarded, and with great speed advanc'd against those that were posted on that side where the Enemies lay. The Epirots affrighted with this sudden appearance of the Enemy, betook themselves to their Camp; and Pyrrhus understanding that the Enemies were coming up, made haste with his Horsemen, being in all three thousand, to the River: hoping to surprize the Romans, whilst they pass'd over with their Ranks broken, and strugled with the roughness of the ground and waters, in a blind Foord; but when the Roman Horsemen had oppos'd themselves, the King charging at the head of his Troops, fought with a Courage equal to his Fame, being distinguish'd by his valour and gallantry, as well as by his glittering Arms. For he govern'd the whole Army by his Conduct, as if he late tooke from all other businels, and also fought upon occasion, as if he had been a Common Soldier, and some other Person had been General of the Army.

In the mean time one Leonnatus a Macedonian acquaints Pyrrhus, that he had observ'd one of the Enemies, who had his Eye upon him in particular, watching his motions through the Army, and riding up thither, where ever he saw him charge: To whom Pyrrhus replies, O Leonnatus, "Tis impossible to avoid Fate: but yet neither shall this Italian nor any other man whatsoever come off with safety, if he in-counters with me: And he had scarce spoken this but Oplacus (for that was the man's name, he being Commander of the Fretane Squadron) with his Lance kill'd his Horse under him, and Leonnatus serv'd his Horse likewise after the same manner, and then the King's Friends besetting Oplacus round about, kill'd him fighting, and so rescued the King.

But this accident caus'd a great consternation among the Epirots, who imagin'd the King himself had been kill'd: therefore to incourage his men, and to secure himself withal from all dangers that might lie in his way, he changes his Arms with Megacles, and having left him in the Affray he goes himself to arrange and bring on the Phalanx. The Roman Legions likewise had a warm dispute with them, which held a long while with alternate success; the fortune of the Battel varying by report seven times: in-somuch that one while the Romans forc'd the Enemies to quit their ground, and another while the Epirots made the Romans retire. But things were like to come to a desperate condition on the King's side, when Megacles was slain; for he being distinguish'd by the King's Armour was set upon by the stoutest of the Enemies, whilst each was desirous to have the honour of killing the King; till at last one Dexter a Horseman, bringing his Coat and Helmet taken from him when he was kill'd with a great shout to the Consul, made both Armies to believe the King had been slain. Hereupon the Grecians were seiz'd upon with consternation, and they would have fled doubtless had not Pyrrhus (as soon as ever he could) rode to and fro bare-headed, and spoke to them with a loud voice that he was with them and alive: whereby he both abated the confidence of the Enemy, and rais'd the Spirits of his own Men.

Levinus now thinking it high time to have recourse to the last reserve, gave the Signal to those Horsemen that lay in Ambush, to fall upon the Enemy in the Rear: but Pyrrhus sent out the Elephants against them, having reserv'd them for the last terrour of the Enemies. This Stratagem spoil'd the Romans Game: and gave the fortune of the Battel to Pyrrhus. For the men themselves being amaz'd at their huge bulks, and the terrible sight of arm'd men standing upon their backs, fancied, that they saw some strange Monster, rather than the shape of any natural Creature: and the Horses likewise being frighted with the sight, smell, and noise of Beasts never seen before by them, presently disorder'd the Ranks: and in a wild carrier took the next way before them; either throwing their Riders, or else running away with them, while they in vain endeavour'd to stop them. Moreover, by running upon the main Body of their own Army, they put all into confusion. The Masters of the Elephants went in pursuit of those that fled, and those that stood in little Castles upon the Elephants wounded many of them: but there were more kill'd and bruise'd by the Elephants themselves.

The Consul with much ado kept his men however yet in a body: till a Squadron of Theffalians being detached by the King broke and dispers'd them, though they made a brave resistance; and doubtless all of them had either been slain or taken, because they were coop'd up into such a narrow place, but, besides that Pyrrhus's held it to be a Generals Policy not to pursue the Enemies flying too eagerly, lest they should make a more obstinate resistance another time through despair of saving themselves, the Evening likewise drawing on had forc'd the Conquerour to leave the pursuit. Good fortune also favour'd the remaining part of this poor Army: for one of the Elephants having received a wound turn'd back, and with his braying disorder'd all the rest. This stopp'd the Enemy, and gave the Romans, who fled, time to pass the River, and to get into Apulia, where they were secur'd from the present danger by the fortifications of a City.

In this Battel there fell of the Romans and their Confederates 14870 Foot, 246 Horse. Prisoners taken in all 1812. among these were 802 Horsemen, beside 22 Ensigns. Which makes me marvel the more, why the Authors who have so diligently related these things should deny, that the number of those the King lost was not taken notice of: whereas Dionysius writes that Levinus lost near fifteen thousand, and Pyrrhus thirteen: but Hieronymus Cardianus a Writer of those times says, that there were not above seven thousand of the Romans lost, and of the King's side but four thousand; but all agree that this Victory cost Pyrrhus the flower of his Army: and he was heard to say, that he lost as much as he gain'd by this Battel, and even when he offer'd his spoils to Jupiter of Tarentum, 'tis said, that he confels'd the same in an Inscription to that purpose: and that when his Confederates made complaints to him, he answered, "Truly, if I get such another Victory, I shall be forc'd to go home without a man left me. I am inform'd also, that the King himself receiv'd a great Wound in this Battel: but because others report no such matters: and seeing the actions of different Fights are sometimes jumbled together, I dare not believe one man against so many and those exact Writers too, who speak not a syllable of it. That this was a very smart engagement, may be gathered hence: because that when Pyrrhus the next day after the fight view'd the bodies of the slain, which for the credit of being esteem'd merciful he order'd to be bury'd: and saw the Romans with their Faces towards the Enemy, having dy'd all in the bed of Honour, he broke out into these expressions: "O how easie a thing would it be for me to conquer the World, if I had Roman Soldiers. Therefore by courteous address and great promises he sollicit'd those that were taken, to take pay of him, and though they obstinately refused it; yet he us'd them with the same civility as before: never putting them in Chains, or to any of those disgraces that usually attend the fate of Prisoners.

But

But the Romans after this their defeat were terrified with another Calamity, which though as to the loss it was lighter than the former, yet it was look'd upon as more dismal and astonishing. For they reckon'd it a signal judgment from Heaven, that a sudden storm had destroy'd their forage in the Fields, so that four and thirty Men were kill'd by the Thunder, and two and twenty left half dead: their Horses being likewise either kill'd or hurt by the same storm. In the mean while Pyrrhus took the Romans Camp, which they had quitted, and making the best use of his success he advanc'd with his Army, and by waiting the grounds of all the bordering Nations alienated many from their friendship with Rome.

- XI. Afterwards arriv'd the Lucanians and Samnites his Confederates, to whom after a light rebuke given them, for not assisting him in the Battel, he bestow'd part of the booty: being exceedingly pleas'd for that he had routed such a numerous Army of the Romans, having only the Auxiliaries of the Tarentines, besides his own Forces.

Whilst Pyrrhus was thus intent upon making the best advantage of the Victory, Levinus on the contrary by taking care of the maimed Soldiers and drawing those that were dispers'd into a Body got a considerable Army together: and the Senate, notwithstanding this defeat was laid to the Consuls charge by many, and that Fabritius said, the Romans were not conquer'd by the Epirots, but Levinus by Pyrrhus, order'd supplies of Men to be lent him.

- XII. When the Crier made Proclamation, that whosoever was willing to serve his Country in the room of those that were kill'd, he should list himself; such numbers of men came into the service, that two Legions were made up immediately. With which the Consul being now recruited followed Pyrrhus at the heels, annoying his Army as much as he could: and having intelligence that Pyrrhus design'd to make himself Master of Capua, he march'd speedily to prevent him, and having prepar'd all things for its defence deterr'd Pyrrhus from attacking it.

Pyrrhus then turns his course towards Naples, and being there likewise disappointed in his designs, marches speedily by the Latine road towards Rome. And now he was got from Anagnia and the Country of the Hernicans as far as Preneſte within twenty miles of Rome, having taken Fregelle in his way. But the Magistrates of the City upon the first news of this defeat, had put all the young men in Arms by an Order of the Senate; and at this juncture the Romans were luckily furnished with another considerable help; for the other Consul, who had better success against the Hetrurians, had engaged that Nation by a new Treaty, so that when the Senate call'd him away for the defence of his Country, he hastned with his victorious Army to its relief being now hindred by no other Enemy.

- XIII. Pyrrhus having in vain solicited the Hetrurians to take Arms again, and considering withal, that two Consular Armies, one before and the other behind were ready to fall upon him, return'd into Campania. Where finding Levinus marching against him with greater forces than he had before his defeat, he said, "He was to deal with the Lernean Hydra, whose heads grew more numerous by being cut off. Yet relying on his former Victory, he led his men forth, and let them in Battel-array. Moreover, to try the hearts of his men, and to strike a terrour into the Enemy, he caus'd the Soldiers to shout, and the Elephants to bray: but the Romans answer'd them with a more terrible noise; so that the King guessing of the Courage of both, judg'd it more advisable for the present to forbear Battel; and pretending some ill Omens from the Sacrifices, he led his Army back into the Camp, from whence he return'd to Tarentum, carrying with him a rich booty, and a multitude of Prisoners.

- XIV. The Romans, who had not abated a jot of their former Courage in these hard times, but had always hop'd the best, and spoke confidently of the success of the War, conceiving that the rewards of Valour were then especially to be bestow'd, decreed a Triumph to L. Aemilius Barbula for his actions in his Consulship, who accordingly triumph'd for the conquest of the Samnites, and Tarentines, and of the Salentines who had aided the Tarentines. But Valerius the Consul was commanded "that he should carry the rest of his defeated Army to Setinum, there to encamp: and that he should make them take their Winter-quarters in Tents.

At the same time it being debated in the Senate, concerning ransoming the Captives, it was order'd that they should be redeemed; their minds being chiefly mov'd thereunto (I suppose) in compassion of the Horsemen, who had play'd their parts very bravely, until the Elephants came on: but when their Horses were frightned by them, the men without any fault of their own fell into the Enemies hands, and were either killed or taken by them. Upon this account Persons of very great quality were sent Ambassadors, P. Cornelius Dolabella famous for overthrowing the Senones, and C. Fabritius Luscinus, and Q. Aemilius Pa-pus Fellow-Consuls two years before.

- XV. Pyrrhus was naturally a Person of an obliging address, this being the inseparable attendant of all generous Spirits: but yet his ambition whilst by a common mistake he thought Vertues to be but the handmaids of Empire, had rendred him too complaisant: so that being extravagantly addicted to desire of Glory, he had an Eye to it in all his undertakings: and though he was as valiant and as experienced a Commander as any then living, yet he us'd to try all means, before he would put things to the hazard of Battel, endeavouring to win his Enemy, according as each was to be wrought on, by arguments of fear, or interest, pleasure, or pity; and in fine by just and reasonable compositions. Therefore hearing that Ambassadors were coming to him from Rome, and imagining, that so many Persons of Consular quality were not sent upon a slender Errand, he was in hopes they came to treat of a Peace.

Therefore that they might have the safer and more honourable access, he sent Lyco the Molossian as far as the borders of the Tarentines Country to meet them with a Convoy, and he himself with a Troop of Horse bravely mounted met them out of Town, and attending them with great civility gave them a noble Entertainment. They having at first spoken something touching moderation of mind, and of the inconstancy of Fortune, how sudden the alterations of War, and that futurities cannot be foreseen: deliver'd their Message; That they were come to ransom their Prisoners, if he would let them be redeem'd at such a sum, or else be exchange'd for the Tarentines and others.

- XVI. Pyrrhus did not use to determine any great Affairs without the Counsel of his Friends: who being then assembled: One of them, Milo by name advis'd, that he should detain the Prisoners, and make good use of his Successes, not leaving the War till the Romans were subdu'd. But Cynias spoke quite contrary, who first taking notice of the constancy of the Senate and People of Rome, which they had shewn to be invincible, in their greatest extremities, added, "We may hate the Customs, and despise the Arms of another Enemy perhaps, but O King, I think we ought rather to be at Peace than in War with this People. Nor will it be onely your Interest to restore, but even to give them their Prisoners: and I think you should

"should not delay, but send the Ambassadors immediately with Presents to Rome to conclude a Peace upon even terms. For now I suppose the time is come, wherein, if I am not mistaken, you may get to your self some advantage, and that with honour; for now in time of prosperity, if you will treat of Peace, you shall more easily obtain what you desire, and withal seem for no other cause, but onely of your wonted generosity to have offer'd Peace to those whom by your Arms you might have Conquer'd. But supposing you do not miscarry in your designs, but run on successfully as you have begun, and God forbid it should be otherwise, yet we are still but Men, and if Fortune varies, we shall not make Peace upon so easie, nor so honourable terms.

The rest having spoke likewise to the same effect, and the King himself assenting thereunto, command'd the Ambassadors to be call'd in, and as soon as they came, the King spake to them in this manner:

"That which you Romans propose, is indeed very unhandson, when without offering any Conditions of Peace: You demand the Prisoners I have taken in the War, intending when I shall have restor'd them, to employ them against me; if you will take better measures, and such as may be advantageous to both sides, let us enter into an Alliance, and then you shall have all your own Men and those of your Confederates whom I have taken, without Ransom; but if you are resolv'd to persevere in hostility with me, I should be esteem'd a Fool, if I should strengthen my Enemy with so many stout Men: Nor am I so straitned for Money, as to want any of the Romans: who, were we Friends, might be more proper Subjects of my Liberality.

And hereupon he commanded that Presents of considerable value should be given to the Ambassadors with promises of larger.

These things were done and said before all the Ambassadors, but he had a longer and a more particular Conference with Fabritius alone, which I shall relate, as I find it in authentick Authors. When they discours'd privately, 'tis reported that the King among other things spake to this effect:

"As I desire to have all the rest of the Romans for my Friends, so especially you C. Fabritius: whom I esteem as a Person that excels all others for your Conduct as well in Civil as Military Affairs. Yet I am sorry to see you wanting in one point, I mean, of an Estate that may enable you to live in that Port which becomes a person of your Quality. But I will not suffer this injury of Fortune any longer to be troublesome to you: and I will bestow on you so much Gold and Silver coin'd and in the Bullion, as shall make you richer than any of your fellow-Citizens: For I hold it to befit my condition to relieve such great Men as are poor, who have aim'd more at getting Honour than Money. This I look upon as a very glorious Action: by which a Prince rears the noblest Monument of his Magnificence, and tenders the most sacred and well-pleasing Sacrifice to the Gods. I shall therefore think that I have receiv'd a benefit rather than bestow'd one, if you will let me supply your necessities. Yet I would not have desir'd this of you, if the honour of this benefit accru'd to me with dishonour to your self; but now because you come not upon any perfidious design, or that which is at all unworthy your Character, why should you refuse a small Present offered you out of kindness by a Friend with an obstinate averleness? For I ask nothing of you but what may, yea and ought to be done by any honest Man that is a lover of his Country: That you would bring the Senate off from their obstinacy to a more moderate temper: telling them the truth of the matter, that a War cannot be undertaken by them without great danger and detriment: nor yet be foregone by me (who promising the Tarentines my assistance, have even won the first Battel) without breach of Faith and dishonour. Nor am I for having War with you, whom I esteem worthier my friendship, than my hatred: and by reason of many businesses falling out, which require my presence I had rather return into my own Kingdom; and for this I will give all the Security you can desire, that you may be sure of my intentions: and also take away all doubts from other Men, if there be any that will say perhaps, that Kings cannot be trusted safely, because of the perfidiousness of some few, who having no sense of honesty, stand onely to their Articles as long as they make for their Interest: but upon the first apprehension of any good to be got by falsehood, they will break their faith, rather than let go their advantage; but when the Peace is made, there can be nothing more grateful to me, nor more conducive to us both, than if you would go with me to Epirus, there to be prefer'd to the highest Honours among my Friends, and to be my Lieutenant in War, and a sharer with me in all my Fortunes: for I value no possession more than that of a faithful and valiant Friend. Moreover, the State of a Court, and the grandeur of a King's service is more suitable to your Genius. If therefore we shall mutually assist each other herein we shall attain the greatest humane Felicity.

When the King had ended his Speech, Fabritius a little after began thus:

"If I am observ'd to have any Skill in the management either of Civil or Military Affairs, 'tis needless for me to say any thing of it: since you have believ'd others so much concerning it; nor is it necessary that I should speak any thing touching my Poverty: and how being Master of a little spot of ground and Cottage, I live not upon the Interest of Money or by the labours of Slaves, but by my own. For as to these things I suppose you are sufficiently inform'd by the relation of others; but yet if you suppose that I am in a worse condition, because I am poor, than any other Roman, truly whether you imagine so of your self, or follow others Opinion in the point, you are mightily mistaken; for whilst I do my duty with contempt of Wealth, I feel no misery; nor have I ever yet lamented my fate, either in my publick or private Concerns: for why should I quarrel at it? unless I should blame it, because in this condition as poor as 'tis I enjoy all those things in my Country, which seem desirable by a generous Spirit, nor onely with but before the wealthy. For I bear the greatest Offices among us: I manage the most important Wars: I am employ'd in the most honourable Embassies. The charge of Religion is committed to my care: I am call'd to the Senate, and consulted with concerning the weightiest Affairs of State. There are many that praise and imitate my Actions of their own accord. Nor am I less esteem'd than any of the principal Men of our Commonwealth: and I am thought by others an Example for the undertaking noble things. But yet all this while I do not spend a penny of my own Money, nor does any of the rest do so. For in other places where Riches lie generally in the hands of private men, and the public Revenues are but small, the Officers out of their own Purses maintain the Port and splendour of their Place; but our Commonwealth has far different Constitutions, being no ways burthensome to the Estates of private men. All that Equipage wherewith our Countrymen, as many of them as are employ'd in the management of State Affairs, are so splendidly furnish'd, is given by the Public. Hereby all Estates are made equal: inasmuch that the poorest can lack nothing for the maintaining either his public or personal Honour, nor the richest have

"have any thing over. Therefore inasmuch as being the poorest of all, I come not short of any of the wealthiest in what is commendable and good, why should I complain of my Fortune? Should I require of her that she should have made me equal to Kings, who have it in their power to heap up vast Treasures.

XXII. "Thus far touching my publick Capacity: now in my private one, my poverty is so far from being a burthen to me: that on the contrary when I compare my self with your Rich men, my condition seems infinitely happier than theirs: and I count my self one of those few, who have attain'd the greatest happiness of this World: and therefore I bless my Stars for my condition, and I am thankful for my poverty. For since it seems but an idle thing to me to covet superfluities, and withal since my little Spot of ground, if well cultivated, will supply me with necessaries, I do not know why I should be solicitous for any more Wealth. For my appetite recommends any sort of Diet to my taste: I procure my self an ease sleep by labour: my Cloaths if they are warm, satisfy me: in Householdstuffs I like that best which is cheapest and fittest for the use it is designed to; wherefore I should be unjust to accuse Fortune for not granting me a greater stock of Wealth than my nature requires: which never implanted in me either a desire of too great Riches, or the skill of getting them. Wherefore (as poor as I am) I think my self

XXIII. "richer than the richest, not excepting your self, for I have as much as I desire. But what made you come into Italy seeing you already posses'd Epirus and other places, but that you thought your self poor? Ay, but Wealth enables one man to benefit others: and this I cannot do for poverty. But this concerns me no more, than that I have no other extraordinary accomplishments; that God has not made me a great Scholar, or a Prophet, for other mens good, or any thing else; but if I serve my Friends and my Country with those Talents that I have, and do all the good I can to any man: I think I am thus far free also from this imputation. Nor may you count these things small and trivial, who pretend to an high value of them, and seem ready to buy them off at such a dear rate; but if great Wealth be onely

XXIV. "desireable for helping the necessitous, and that the possession thereof upon that score renders a man any thing happy; as to you, Kings, the matter seemeth: Which is the best way of getting Wealth, to receive it from you dishonorably, or to get it my self hereafter handlomly? My good successes in the service of the State have given me brave opportunities to improve my fortunes, as at other times often, so especially four years ago, when being Consul I was sent with an Army against the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, and wasted their large Territories; and having routed them in several Battels took and rifled their rich Towns: from which Booty after I had given largesses to my Soldiers, and repay'd private persons, whatever they had lent the State upon the occasions of the War, there remain'd the sum of four hundred Talents, which I laid up in the common Treasure-house. Seeing therefore that I have thus myself made my fortune by just and honourable means out of this Booty, which was ready in my

XXV. "hand; and like V. Publicola and many other noble Romans who have rais'd the State to this pitch, prefer'd Honour before Interest; shall I now take Bribes of you, quitting an honest way of getting Wealth for one as infamous as dangerous? Besides, as for that Wealth I could have spent it freely upon some good uses: but there is no probability of getting so much good by this; for that Money which comes by anothers bounty, seems rather to be lent than given: and it is an incumbrance to a generous man, until it is repay'd, whether it be given and receiv'd upon the account of friendship, hospitality, or kindness. But now what do you think would be the issue of the matter, if the thing should be discover'd (and it cannot be conceal'd) to those Magistrates, called Censors from their Authority in reforming Manners, and that they should impeach me of Bribery?

'Tis added by most that Pyrrhus knowing such a brave Man was not too dearly bought at any rate, try'd his constancy and resolution more importunately a second time; after other large Promises offering to him part of his Kingdom. And that the Roman was concern'd at it, onely so far, that he could not tell what to think of Pyrrhus's design. For, says he, if you think me an honest Man, why do you corrupt me? if a Knave, why do you court me?

Afterwards, 'tis reported that he should say, This business would prove neither pleasing nor profitable to Pyrrhus himself if it would succeed; for his free carriage might give distaste both to the King and his Friends: and if the Epirois would but taste his justice and temperance, they would probably leave the King, and come over to him. All which together with what I shall hereafter deliver, as being related by several Authors I thought pertinent and useful to mention: whereby the minds and dispositions of those persons might be known, by whom the Roman State being buoy'd up, through so many difficulties and calamities arriv'd to such an incomparable grandeur of Empire and Renown: and that by a remarkable instance it might more easily appear, how men ought to be qualified if they intend to be admir'd; and to leave their posterity a more flourishing State than they receiv'd from their Forefathers.

When these things therefore had been said and heard 'tis reported, that the King gave over the business for the present. But two days after he order'd Fabricius to be call'd to him: and whilst they were talking, an Elephant which was prepar'd beforehand to affright Fabricius, and placed behind a Curtain at their backs, when the Curtain was suddenly drawn aside, let down his Trunk upon Fabricius's head, and roar'd terribly, but the undaunted Hero, onely turn'd himself leisurely about, and smiling upon the matter, said, "Your Gold could not corrupt me yesterday, nor has your Elephant affrighted me to day.

XXVII. "Afterwards at Supper when he heard Cyneas discourse of the Grecian Philosophers: how the Scholars of Epicurus made Pleasure the chiefest good, and held the management of State-affairs among the chief impediments of happiness: that the Gods took no care of humane affairs, but liv'd at ease and rest neither loving the good, nor hating the bad; 'tis reported that Fabricius should say, I wish, Pyrrhus and the Samnites may be taken with that Philosophy as long as they War with the Romans.

These were the manners of those days: Great men did not then strive to exceed in Wealth and Luxury, but in Valour and Conduct, in hardiness, and fidelity to their Country: for these were no warm expressions, arising from passion, nor premeditated by the speakers the more plausibly to carry on some secret Intrigue: but these men being rather admirable than imitable in our days by the constant tenor of their actions verified their words.

XXVIII. "This same Fabricius, when he had but two pieces of Plate in his House, a Saltcellar and a Dish, with a horn Stand to hold it, and the Ambassadors of the Samnites would have presented him with Money and rich Household goods, carry'd his hands wide open to his Ears, and thence to his Eyes, nostrils, mouth, throat, and at last down to his Belly, saying, "As long as I can rule these, I shall want nothing: carry you the Money to them that want it. In fine, he liv'd so all his life, that he had not any thing left to raise fortunes for his Daughters: but this was a glorious Poverty (for the Senate being ashamed to let them continue without Portions, whilst their Father was not ashamed to leave them so, paid their Portions out of the common Treasury.

The chief Senators liv'd then with the same continence and moderation. Among whom was Q. Fabius Maximus, a person who had often bore the greatest Offices; who having been once Censor refus'd the Office a second time, saying, that it was not for the Interest of the Commonwealth, to have the same men often chosen Censors. This Man also receiv'd a like testimony of his poverty, and the publick Charity from the Romans. For when he dy'd there was so much Money given by the people as enabled his Son Gargus to give a Dole, and to make a publick Feast.

Cyneas also out of a like generosity condemn'd the Sabines Presents, as Fabricius had done those of the Samnites. Amilius Papus Fabricius's Colleague in several Offices, as also Tib. Coruncanius, and other eminent Persons, being of like dispositions, maintain'd a constant friendship among themselves. So that the Poet seems to me to have hit exactly the humour of those times, when he said that the Roman State was onely supported by Persons and Principles that were honest and vertuous.

In consideration of which things Pyrrhus being more inclin'd to conclude a Peace with this Nation, sends home two hundred Prisoners without any Ransom; and if any others desired to go to Rome to celebrate the Saturnalia then near at hand, they were permitted to go: the King relying on Fabricius's word, which he had engag'd for their return as soon as the Feast was ended, unless a Peace were in the mean while concluded. And such was both the Authority of the Senate, and the honesty of each of them at that time, that they return'd every man upon the day appointed by the Senate; though they had earnestly solicited their Friends who were stily bent against a Peace.

For now whilst their minds were softned with the sight of their dear Relations, and fill'd with desires of enjoying them, they might be thought more inclin'd to embrace friendship and amity; and hereupon the politick Prince looking on it as a convenient juncture, resolves to send Ambassadors to Rome to conclude a Peace upon those terms he propos'd to Fabricius, to wit, "That the Tarentines should be included in the same Treaty: That the rest of the Grecians who inhabited Italy should live free, and be govern'd onely by their own Laws: and whatever was taken away by the Romans should be restore'd to the Samnites, Apulians, Lucanians and Brutians: and the Romans should receive their Prisoners without Ransom from Pyrrhus.

Cyneas, whom we mention'd before, was then with Pyrrhus; He was an excellent Politician, and withal an honest Man: one who by adding study and practice to the pregnancy of his own Genius had attain'd to a very masterly Eloquence. For these his Accomplishments he was very gracious with the King; who often said, "That he had conquer'd more Cities by the Tongue of Cyneas, than by his Arms.

When this Man was come Ambassador to Rome, he cunningly delay'd the time from coming to have his Audience before the Senate, and sent Presents in the King's name to the Nobility. Being afterwards introduced into the Senate, and having largely magnified his Master's Valour, and his affection to the Romans, and likewise discours'd of the equity of those terms he propos'd, a great part of the Senate were almost perswaded to embrace them. For besides other things, he promised them so much Aid, if they would desist from spoiling his Confederates, with which they might easily make themselves Masters of all the rest of Italy.

But the debate held many days, the Senate being solicitous upon an Affair of so great importance, so that some report and suspicion of a Peace was rais'd. Hereupon Appius Claudius, who formerly by his Age and blindness was forced to absent himself from the Senate, caus'd himself immediately to be carried thither in a Chair, where at the first sight of him, his Sons, and Relations receiv'd him, and standing about him with respect and honour conducted him to his Seat.

There, when by reason of the strangeness of the thing, and out of reverence to the Person all were silent, and expecting to hear the reasons that had induc'd him after so long absence to return to the Senate; beginning with the relation of his infirmities, he said,

"Hitherto I have been sorry, because I am blind, but now I do not onely rejoyce for it, because I cannot see the things you do; but I am sorry, that I am not deaf also, that I might not be forc'd to hear such scandalous things, so unworthy the Roman name. For whither is that Courage fled? Where are the ancient Roman Spirits? You us'd formerly to say, when you heard Alexander the Great celebrated for a mighty Hero; that his Glory was not so much to be imputed to his Valour as to his Success. For had Fortune constrain'd him to have had War with the Romans, the case would have been alter'd with him, and the World would have had another Opinion of him. But now see how much you have degenerated from that magnanimity. You thought you might have conquer'd the Macedonians: You are now afraid of the Molossians and Chonians, the constant prey of the Macedonians. You despised Alexander then; now you fear Pyrrhus, a Vassal not of Alexander himself, but even of his Vassals. Who to run away from old Enemies, rather than to seek new ones has pass'd over into Italy: intending forsooth to get an Empire for the Romans with those forces, wherewith he could not defend the least Spot of Macedonia: Unless therefore we drive him hence with considerable loss, we shall invite other Guests to come boldly into Italy, as to a ready prey, in just contempt of us. For what will the World take us for but onely a company of Cowards; if Pyrrhus being admitted into our friendship, shall be so well rewarded for affronting us, that he may be able to expose us Romans to be jeer'd by the Tarentines and Samnites.

This is well nigh the whole drift of that Speech spoken by Appius at that instant, wherewith they were all put into such a heat, that in pursuance of this resolute Counsel of his, by common consent they decreed, "That the War should be carried on; and that Cyneas should be commanded to depart the Town that very day, and acquaint Pyrrhus, that they would neither let him come into the Town (which he desir'd) nor treat at all of Peace with him, unless he left Italy. Afterwards a decree of equal rigor was made by the Counsel of Appius touching the Prisoners; the Senate ordering, "That they should neither be sent out against Pyrrhus, nor be kept together all of them in any other place; but that some should be dispos'd in one Garison, and some in another, their Posts being alter'd for the greater disgrace: So that the Horsemen were turned over to the Foot, and the Legionary Foot were entred among the Light-armed's, none being allowed to recover his former Post, till he should twice have gotten the spoils of an Enemy.

When the Ambassadors return'd with this terrible Answer. 'Tis reported, that the King being astonish'd at the Roman Courage, ask'd how the City and the Senate look'd? And that Cyneas answer'd him, "That the

"the City appear'd like a Temple, the Senate like an Assembly of Kings. After this some imagine that Fabricius was sent Ambassadour to the King: but besides the testimonies of Authors, they may be convinc'd of their Error by duly considering the Series of the things themselves.

Now all hopes of Peace was over, and preparations were made for the War with all vigour and application, so that this was a busy Winter on both sides. I think this was the time when Pyrrhus to escape Shipwracks, and to make a passage for the Epirots and Tarentines to go to and fro to one another's assistance, intended to lay a Bridge from Hydrus in the utmost point of Italy to Apollonia a Town situate on the opposite shore, for the space of fifty miles. For thereabouts Greece and Italy are so far distant from one another. M. Tarentinus Varro afterwards is reported to have attempted the same thing: when in the Pyrate War being Lieutenant under Pompey he guarded the Ionian and Aegean Seas with his Fleet.

In the mean time Tib. Cornelianus the Consul triumphed over the Volturnians and Vulcentians a People of Herruria the first day of February. The Censorship was remarkable that year, the ceremony of the Lustrum being then first perform'd by a Censor descended of a Plæbeian House, 278222 men were Poll'd. That Fabius Maximus us'd to be chosen in those times President of the Senate is very certain. And 'tis thought his Son surnam'd Gurgus was Censor then. Cn. Domitius for having perform'd the Lustration, and because the privileges of the Commons were enlarg'd was had in great esteem.

In the beginning of the Spring Pyrrhus having got together the Forces of the Confederates advanc'd to Apulia, and took there several Towns partly by assault, and partly by surrender. Against whom the new Consuls, P. Sulpicius Saverrio, and P. Decius Mus marching out with two Consular Armies pitch'd their Camp opposite to the Enemies near Asculum a Town of Apulia of the same name with that in Picentia. There was no doubt but that they would come to a set Battel: which was delay'd for many days, not onely because of the deep River that parted the two Armies, but also because they fear'd each other. The success of the former Battel and the Victory of Pyrrhus affrighted the Romans; and the courage of the Romans, together with the name of one of the Consuls, which was fatal to the Enemies, terrified the Epirots. For it was said, that, P. Decius to procure Victory for his men, was about to devote himself as his Father and Grandfather had done before: and the ill success of those Battels, wherein they dy'd, render'd the threats of the Decii devoting themselves ominous to all.

XXXVII. Pyrrhus looking on this as a thing not to be slighted, assembled his Soldiers, and told them plainly, "That the success of the War was not dispos'd by the Goddesses Tellus, or the infernal deities, who were invoc'd in that Curse: for that the Gods could not be esteem'd so unjust as for the sake of one Madman to alter and dispose the fates of Armies: that Victories were not won by superstition and Sorceries, but by fighting, as the Romans themselves might bear witness, who use not to encounter their Enemies with a company of Wizards and Priests, but with armed men. But yet because ignorant People are more apt to be mov'd by the fooleries of Superstition, than by true causes of fear, he told them how they might rid themselves of this fear, by describing to them the gabs, wherein the other Decii had offer'd themselves, and warning them if they met any man so accoutred, they should not kill him, but take him alive.

He sent also a Messenger to Decius himself to acquaint him, that he should not play the Fool among armed men, for that his design would not succeed; and if he should be taken alive he should smart for it.

XXXVIII. The Consuls answer'd, That they trusted onely in their Arms, and needed no such desperate means of help: and to assure him of the truth hereof, they gave him his choice either to pass the River himself (which as was said before, ran between the two Armies) or else to expect the Romans on the other side: for they would either retire with their forces to leave safe passage for the King, or if he retir'd, pass over themselves. So that coming to Battel with all their forces, it might appear that they plac'd the hopes of Victory in nothing but Valour.

Pyrrhus being affraid to discover any sign of fear or doubt in the case approves the last Proposal, giving the Enemy liberty to pass over. Their fear of the Elephants (being now grown a familiar sight to them) abated of it self, and by the experience of the former Battel they had learnt that their Trunks might easily be cut off. C. Minucius a Pikeman in the Vanguard of the fourth Legion having with his Sword chop'd off one of them at one stroke. But now they had contriv'd other means of defence that were safer. For they had a Chariot set round about with Iron Spikes, which was drawn by Horses covered with Armour. In the Chariot there were placed Soldiers to beat the Elephants back by shot, and casting fire among them.

XXXIX. The Soldiers being thus appointed passed over, and Pyrrhus on the other side set his men in Battel Array according to his great skill in Marshal Discipline, and that excellent Conduct, wherein he was esteem'd to outdo all the Commanders of his time. Having therefore observ'd the situation of the Country, which by reason of the unevenness of the ground and because the place was woody, was onely fit for the Foot to post themselves in, he plac'd the Horsemen and the Elephants upon the reserves. The Right Wing consisted of his own Soldiers with the Auxiliaries of the Sammites: the Brutians, Lucanians and Salentines were posted on the left Wing: and the Tarentines whose Valour he most distrust'd were placed in the body of the Army. The Consul's Army was made up of the Legionary Foot with some parties of Light-arm'd Soldiers mingled in convenient places among them for their assistance, and their reserves were order'd in the same posture. The Horse spreading themselves out upon both the Wings would neither hinder the Foot when they engag'd, nor were they yet too far off in case there should be occasion for them.

The two Armies thus match'd not onely for Valour but numbers (each of them consisting of forty thousand men) fought with so much bravery as might be expected: but Night at last parted them, when neither side could claim the Victory.

XL. Pyrrhus on the morrow having secur'd all the most difficult Passes with Guards, forced the Romans to come down into a more level ground, where the Elephants stood him in some stead: for they being suddenly brought on in another part of the Army than that where the Chariots stood ready against them, frightened and put to flight the Enemies Horse, as they had done in the former Battel, but to the Foot they did no great harm. The account of this fight is very different: some report that the Romans overcame, and that by an accident: when the Detachments sent by the King against the Apulians, that plunder'd the Baggage, appear'd by their going off to the rest of the Army, as if they fled, so that by this fear and mistake all the King's Army was discomfited. A vast number are reported to have been slain: twenty thousand on Pyrrhus's side, and five thousand of the Conquerors. Besides, 'tis said that the King, after he had been wounded with a Lance through the Arm, being not able to rally his men, was carry'd almost last of all out of the Field by his Guards, and that Fabricius who was Lieutenant to one of the Consuls was wounded.

Others on the contrary say, that the fortune of this Battel and the former was alike: and that the Romans being secur'd by the nearness of their Camp, the loss on their side was not so considerable: but yet that they retir'd in great disorder having lost six thousand men, and that on Pyrrhus's side there were three thousand five hundred and five killed, and that was the number recorded in the King's Journal as Hieronymus writes; and this not onely difference but contradiction of Authors induces me rather to believe those, who affirm that they parted upon equal terms. For both sides use to challenge the credit of the Victory, when they go off with equal loss: which is afterwards through the carelessness or knavery of others recorded: this being a great Cheat, and a great shame to those men, who report such things for truths, for which they have onely a bare hearsay, or else believe them to be true because they would have it so. Wherefore the account of those Annals seems more probable, which tell us, that at Asculum they fought but once, and that after a very warm Dispute and great slaughters on both sides, at Sun-setting by reason of the King's Wound and the loss of his Baggage with much ado they parted, and that both Armies then founded a retreat, about fifteen thousand having been slain on either side. And that this was the time when Pyrrhus answer'd one who congratulated him for his Victory: "If the Romans must be conquer'd thus once more, we shall be quite undone.

XLII. And the sequel confirms me in this Opinion. For Pyrrhus went to Tarentum: and the Consuls not pursuing the Enemy, settled their Army in their Winter-quarters in the Towns of Apulia. Whereas if we consider the season of the year and the posture of Affairs, the first did easily admit the prosecution of such a noble Victory; and the latter might even have enforce'd it. Moreover, I find not that these Consuls triumphed; but there are many who imagine that P. Decius the Consul devoted himself in this Battel, who immediately following his Father and Grandfather, that dy'd in the same manner offer'd himself a third Sacrifice for the Commonwealth. A thing I should not have thought fit to relate, much less to confute, unless Cicero in some of his Philosophical Discourses has mention'd it, and that more than once: whilst Histories are silent in the matter.

The Battel of Asculum, whatever the issue of it was, concluded that Campaign: but in the mean while they were concerting their Measures and preparing for the War.

Pyrrhus having lost most of his Soldiers and a great part of his Officers, sent to Epirus for men and Money to be brought to him about the beginning of Spring. But before that Fleet could be fitted out, some new hopes arising alter'd the King's resolutions.

For Pyrrhus had formerly possess'd Macedonia, having won it from Demetrius: but afterwards he lost it to Lysimachus in Battel. And now again there seem'd a fair way made to him for recovering it by the death of Protony Ceraunus, who being slain by the Gauls, whilst Pyrrhus was in Italy, had left his Kingdom in a very troublefom condition, and no man in actual possession of it. For this reason he determin'd not to leave Epirus without Soldiers: left at the same time it should be expos'd to the injuries of the Gauls, that were then burning its neighbouring Province Macedonia. He went not however just then into Sicily, but other occasions call'd him thither afterwards, as we shall shew in due time.

XLIV. When Winter had been spent in such cares as these, the two new Consuls Caius Fabricius Luscinius, and Q. Æmilius Papus both of them Consuls together before, came to the Army. Upon intelligence hereof Pyrrhus march'd out with his Forces against them, being resolv'd to observe the motions of the Enemy. And whilst they were thus incamp'd very near one another, a very odd accident happen'd, which is deliver'd by several without any material difference.

One Timochares an Ambraciot a favourite of the King, came privately to Fabricius the Consul, promising, if he should be well rewarded for his pains, to poison his Master: which he made account to do easily by means of his Sons who were the King's Cup-bearers. Fabricius though he abhor'd the Treason, gave the Senate however an account of it. The Senate sent Ambassadors to Pyrrhus, not to inform him of the Treachery of Timochares, who intended to do the Romans a kindness however, but to warn him in general to look about him, and see what sort of Men, and how honest, he employ'd in his service. Thus Valerius Antias says; but Claud. Quadrigarius, for Timochares mentions Nicias as the person who offer'd to poison the King: and that Ambassadors were sent by the Consuls, not by the Senate; who in their Letter to Pyrrhus discover'd Nicias's design, and told him withal that they would not fight with him by Money or Treachery, but by Valour: adding, That they wish'd the King safe from all traitorous designs, hoping to have him reserv'd for the subject of their Triumph, and the noble Subject of their Victory.

By others 'tis said, that the King's Physician either by word of mouth, or Letter inform'd Fabricius of the matter, and that upon the Consul's discovery thereof to the King, the man was hang'd for it. Though this is uncertain, yet they are manifestly mistaken, who say, that the Physician was sent by Curius to the King. 'Tis said, that Pyrrhus being surpriz'd at this extraordinary generosity cry'd out, "This is that Fabricius whom it is harder to turn from the ways of Vertue and Honesty than the Sun from his course.

XLVI. And immediately that he might not seem to be outdone in kindness, he restored all the Roman Prisoners he had taken, and sent Cynas again to sue for Peace and Alliance. It was not thought honourable, either to receive a gift from an Enemy, or to have abhor'd a Vice for lucre, rather than out of any generous principle; and therefore that they might not receive the Captives gratis: as many more of the Tarentines and Sammites were sent in lieu of them. This public moderation of the chief Men was follow'd (with conspicuous generosity) by a like grave and continent behaviour in private Men: insomuch that Pyrrhus's presents (for he had brought several precious ones for both Sexes) were refus'd not onely by the Men but even by the Women too. For when they had been refus'd by those who had the first offer, and were carry'd to others, there could not be found one Man or Woman so mean or covetous, as to open his door to receive them. The Ambassadors after this receiv'd their former Answer: That Pyrrhus should be treated as an Enemy of that State till he had quitted Italy. The King who was puzzled at this, being unwilling to continue the War, and also to quit it dishonourably, was in this streight reliev'd by the Expedition into Sicily, which he after a long and doubtful Consultation resolv'd at length to undertake: For so he hoped he might upon specious pretences decline the Roman War; and also subjugate that wealthy Island. Withal he desir'd to be aveng'd of the Carthaginians, who had first affronted him. For they upon suspicion of the King's designs, a little before had sent Mago their General with a Navy of a hundred and fifty Ships, pretending, "That they came with foreign succours to aid the Romans against a foreign Enemy: and though

"the

"the Romans did not make use of their service, the Senate answering, That they were wont to undertake no War, but such as they could wage with their own Countrymen; yet a League was renew'd a fourth time between the two States. And to the former Articles it was added, "That if either the Romans or Carthaginians should make Peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with this particular exception; That if either of them were invaded, the other should be at liberty to assist him: and that as often as either of them wanted aid, the Carthaginians should furnish Shipping: and that every one should pay their own Soldiers; that the Punic succours should aid the Romans by Sea, and not be forced to Land-service.

XLVIII. When this was done, Mago goes to Pyrrhus, pretending that he came to conclude Peace with him, but indeed he came as a Spy to observe the King's designs, who as the Carthaginians were inform'd, had been called into Sicily: and they offer'd their Fleet to the Romans not out of any respect or love for them, but onely that they might make Pyrrhus the more deeply engag'd in the War in Italy, that so he might not overthrow their flourishing Power in that Island. They were then with a great Fleet guarding the Seas between Italy and Sicily, and made shew as if they would attack Rhegium, but indeed it was onely to hinder Pyrrhus that he might not pass over into Sicily.

For these reasons therefore the King apply'd his mind to the business of Sicily, being mightily encouraged thereunto, partly by the posture of Affairs there, and partly by the Embassies of the Sicilians, which coming one after the other brought word that he was desir'd to come by all men, as the onely support of those miseries, wherewith that unhappy Island was at that time more grievously harrass'd than ever it had been before. For after the miserable rather than unworthy death of Agathocles, one Manno a native of Egesta in Sicily, who also had poison'd the King, aspiring to the Government and being driven out of Syracuse by the Prætor Hicetas, had put himself under the protection of the Carthaginians; hence there arose a greater War, which was unfortunate to the Syracusians: at which time notwithstanding Hicetas's Power was increased by private means, who afterwards turning his Arms against Phintia the Agrigentine, held the Government of the Island for a long while in his hands, though in a very unsettled posture: till at length by the courage of one Thenio he was depos'd after he had govern'd the Island nine years. Thenio who endeavoured to keep the Power in his own hands was oppos'd by Sosistratus a Nobleman of Syracuse: and between these two there was a long War: whilst Thenio was Master of the Island (call'd by them Nasus) which is part of Syracuse, and Sosistratus play'd the Tyrant over the rest of the City.

At length, when both Parties saw that these quarrels would end in the common destruction of them all, they unanimously agreed to send for Pyrrhus: who being the Son-in-law of Agathocles and next Heir to the Crown, having had a Son by Lanassa his Wife, was esteem'd also a man capable both for Courage and Power to settle the Affairs of Sicily. Moreover, the Princes of the Agrigentines and Leontines, who also offer'd him the Government of their respective Seignories, ask'd him with one accord to come over into Sicily: that he might by his presence succour their distressed State, and preserve their liberty now endangered by the Arms of Barbarians.

For the Carthaginians having waisted the Country belonging to Syracuse, besieg'd the Town it self with a hundred Gallies by Sea, and an Army of fifty thousand men by Land. Pyrrhus therefore being resolv'd not to lose time, sends Cynæas before, whom for his prudence and fidelity he employ'd very much to make Leagues with the several Provinces of Sicily. Moreover, he comforted his Confederates who were troubled for his departure by telling them, that if the Romans should molest them he would come time enough out of the Neighbouring Island to their aid, being strengthened with the addition of these new Confederates.

But when he was about to leave a Garrison in Tarentum, the Tarentines earnestly request'd him either to give them the aid he promis'd upon those terms agreed betwixt them, or else to leave their City free; but they could prevail in neither: Pyrrhus giving them no satisfactory Answer, but commanding them to wait his time.

LI. Whilst Pyrrhus bends his mind this way, the Consuls find it easier to deal with the rest of their Enemies: We find therefore that at this time they fought with good success against the Hetrurians, Lucanians, Brutians and Samnites. That they had but little action with the Hetrurians appears hence, because no Triumph follow'd that War: and I think they did not fight with the whole Nation, but onely with one or two Provinces: which being solicited by the Samnites, that were left in a forlorn Estate upon the departure of Pyrrhus, took Arms again against the Romans, having been at Peace a little before with them. With the other Nations as the War was greater, so the Conquest was more illustrious. C. Fabricius the Consul, his Colleague being gone, as is conjectured, to the Hetrurian War, because that one Consular Army seem'd sufficient upon the Epirots departure, overcame the Lucanians, Brutians, Tarentines and Samnites. With some of those States he made a League, among which was that of Heraclea: and he Triumph'd over all these Nations before the fifth of December.

LII. Afterwards when the Election was held, Pub. Cornelius Rufinus, and C. Junius Brutus were elected Consuls the second time. There were other Noblemen likewise who stood in competition with Rufinus, but he got it by the interest of Fabricius: who having an Eye to the public good, valu'd the safety of his Country more than any private animosities. For there was some pique betwixt these two upon the account of their different dispositions: Fabricius being a Person not superable by Money, that wholly minded the good of the Community: But Rufinus being a greater lover of Money acted and design'd several things for his own Interest. However, because he was otherwise a good careful Commander Fabricius judg'd him preferable to his Competitors, far inferiour to him for experience in Arms. 'Tis reported, that Rufinus afterwards thank'd him, because though he was his Adversary yet he should make him Consul, especially for so great and important a War: and that he answer'd him: That it was no wonder if he had rather be pillag'd than sold. For there were yet remaining in Italy very dangerous Wars, and Pyrrhus proceeding successfully in Sicily (whither he was now arriv'd) gave them just cause to fear, lest the King back'd with the additional Forces of this noble Island should return a more formidable Enemy to Rome.

DECADE II. BOOK XIV.

Florus his Epitome of the Fourteenth Book of Livy.

Pyrrhus crosseth the Sea into Sicily. Amongst other Prodigies the Image of Jupiter in the Capitol is overthrow'd by Lightning, and the Head thereof supposed to be lost, recovered and found again by the skill of the Aruspices or Soothsayers. Curius Dentatus the Consul when he was making his Levies, caus'd the Goods of one that being Cited would not answer to his name, but declined the Service, to be presently sold by the public Cryer, and he was the first that took that Course to punish such as refused to be Listed. The same General routs King Pyrrhus being now return'd out of Sicily, and beats him quite out of Italy. Fabricius the Censor turns P. Cornelius Rufinus, one that had been Consul, out of the Senate, because he had as much Silver Plate in his House as weighed Ten Pounds. Upon a Poll taken by the Censors the number of Citizens is cast up to be 271224. An Alliance is made with Ptolomy King of Egypt. Sextilia a Vestal Virgin convicted of Incest [Fornication was called so in one of her sacred Order] is buried alive. Two Colonies peopled, Pollidonia and Cosa. A Fleet of Carthaginians comes to assist the Tarentines, by which they first broke the League with the Romans; It likewise relates several Exploits against the Lucanians, Samnites, and Brutians, and the death of King Pyrrhus.

WHILE Affairs went thus in Italy, Pyrrhus carrying his Army and Elephants aboard his Ships, set sail from the Port of Tarentum to Sicily. After he had stay'd in Italy two years and four months: being attended by Thenio, who met him with his Fleet, he was receiv'd with the general satisfaction of all the Sicilians: who deliver'd their Towns, Forces and Money into his hands, striving which should come first. Therefore having in a short time brought all the Territories of the Greeks under his subjection; he won likewise all the Punic Dominions by Arms, except onely the Town of Lilybeum: which the Carthaginians being much advantag'd by its natural strength defended against Pyrrhus, who had in vain attack'd it. From whence having (not without cause) entertain'd great hopes in his mind, he intended to leave his eldest Son his own hereditary Dominions, and of his other two, to make one King of Italy and the other of Sicily. This King was then a Man of great fame, and worth, and the Sicilians having for many years endured forein and domestick Wars, and what was yet worse than either, Tyranny, they were ready with all their hearts to accept of a Prince that was but tolerably good. But a little after when he fell to oppress them with heavy impositions of Taxes, and to make away those that were in greatest sway among them, he render'd himself very odious. Moreover, the covetousness and arrogance of his Ministers did him no less prejudice than his own faults. So that next to that prime duty incumbent upon Kings to be good themselves, they cannot fix their thoughts upon any better or worthier concern, than to chuse virtuous Friends: for whereas among private men every one is hated for his own fault, the misdemeanours of others are imputed to the Prince. But these things came to pass afterwards.

But then while Peoples affections were warm, being first nobly entertain'd and honour'd by Tindario the Prince of the Taurominitans (for he had landed first in that part of the Island) and afterwards by the People of Catania, he march'd with an Army of Foot to Syracuse, and order'd that the Fleet being in a readiness should steer its course near the shore: for that the Carthaginian Fleet belike would not let them have passage to Syracuse without running the risque of a Battel: but as it happen'd, a little before that time thirty Ships of the Carthaginians were gone off from the Fleet upon other occasions; and because these were not yet return'd, the Carthaginian Admiral durst not hazard Battel with the rest. Therefore having entred the Town without any opposition, Thenio and Sosistratus deliver'd him their public Fond, with their Artillery and Ammunition of War, as also one hundred Gallies, and twenty Long-boats. While he was doing these things, there came to him Ambassadors from the Leontines, who in the name of their Prince Heraclides offer'd to him their City: and other Towns likewise resign'd their Power readily into his hands: his success flowing upon him in a full tide. Pyrrhus by his obliging meen, and good entertainment having endear'd himself to them all, dismissed them; for now he had greater designs in his head, and intended, if things should thus succeed, to pass over into Africa. But his Confederates had no such happy times: for the Romans taking this advantage of the King's absence, and the strength of the Army, annoy'd them daily more and more; whilst Milo, that was left with a part of the Army at Tarentum, was not in a capacity to defend them. However, he stood them in so much stead, that the Consuls did not fall upon them presently, but employ'd their Arms against Samnium. The Samnites, when they saw the ruine of their Castles and Country, their Allies falling off, and the burden of the War lying upon them, being unequal both for courage and strength to their Enemies, retir'd into high Mountains, carrying with them their Wives, Children, and as much of their most valuable goods, as they could for the hurry and confusion. The Romans besides the piques of their Officers, were also through contempt of the Enemy and prosperity seiz'd upon with supine security, the attendant of success. Hence they incur'd some danger and disgrace: for whilst the Soldiers crept up those crags in a careless and disorderly manner, they were routed by the Samnites that had the advantage of the ground. In which action many were slain, some with Darts and Stones, and some with tumbling down the Precipices: but others having neither room to fight, nor to retreat, fell into the hands of the Enemy.

This Accident made the Generals divide their Armies again, whilst one charg'd the other with the miscarriage, and each of them pretended, that if he had acted separately, things should have succeeded better. Caius Junius with his Regiments staid in Samnium; and Publius Cornelius bends his course against the Lucanians and Brutians: There while he was spreading terror and ruin all around, by burning the Villages, and laying the Country waste, he lights upon an opportunity of undertaking a greater Enterprize.

In the utmost Coast of Italy at the farthest point of the Lucanian Promontory to the Eastward, on the Ionian Sea Croton is situated a Town of Ancient Fame, and then considerable for Wealth; through the middle of it in those days the River Esfarus ran, on both sides of which a great number of Houses stood inclosed with a Wall twelve miles round: the Consul not daring openly to besiege the place, trusted that he might possess it by treachery; for that he was assured by several of the Roman party within, that the Town having no extraordinary Garrison in it, might be taken by the interest and assistance of those that disgusted Pyrrhus's Government, if he should lead his Forces to the place in time. But by chance, at that nick, whether for fear of the Enemies approach, or upon suspicion of Treason (which is not generally conceal'd long) the Crotonians had sent to Milo for a Garrison; and there arriv'd a strong Body of Lucanians to the place, which issuing forth suddenly defeated the Consul, who without fear of danger had made his approaches nearer to the Walls, and slew and wounded several of his men upon the place.

Rufinus was resolv'd by Stratagem to repair the loss sustain'd by his temerity, and therefore of himself enhances the report of his defeat: and that he might seem to be more afraid, he makes a shew of quitting this design, and gives Orders to his Soldiers to make ready their Bag and Baggage, as being for the march. This was soon understood in the Town, the Camp lying so near it: and besides the probability of the thing, they believ'd it the more because they wish'd it to be true. And now while they were of themselves leaning to this Opinion, a certain Prisoner induc'd with hopes of liberty and reward by the Consul, came among them, pretending that he had made his escape, taking this opportunity of the haste they were in at their departure. This person informs them, that Cornelius Rufinus having not men enough to attack Croton, was gone for Locri, being inticed thither by certain, who promis'd to betray the place to him. A little after there comes in another, and tells the same story with the former; adding withal, that the Romans had now begun their Journey, and at the same time the Ensigns and the Army were seen afar off advancing toward Locri.

Nicomachus being thus trepann'd makes all haste with his men, taking the shortest cut to Locri, with an intention to defend it; which when Rufinus understood by secret intelligence, he returns back to Croton, having now by so much better success, by how much he was more subtle than before: and not only the security of the Enemy, but good fortune too contributed to his diligence. For a thick mist happened at that time very seasonably, so that he was not seen coming towards the Town, nay his Army was almost entred within the Walls, before the Crotoniates knew of his returning back. And the joy for this Victory, which was great enough of it self, was accompanied with other successes not inconsiderable, Fortune being mostly in the extremes, either over-crofs, or over-kind.

For Nicomachus reflecting upon his irreparable mistake while he returns to Tarentum being at a great non-plus, in his way is encountered by Rufinus, and loses a great part of his men, himself with the rest with much ado saving themselves by flight; after he had lost two Towns, by being not contented to defend one: for the Locrians were animated with this success, insomuch that they slew the Garrison of Pyrrhus and the Governour, and enter'd into Alliance with the Romans. While matters went on in this manner the Sammites and the other Nations were not so disheartned thereby, but that besides their innate stubbornness they were by the expectation of Pyrrhus and his successes in Sicily encouraged to stand it out and expect whatever should happen.

For Pyrrhus (to speak something of his actions abroad, (as having relation both in times and places, and in the very nature of the things themselves with our Roman Affairs) having settled the Affairs of the Locri, Aruntines and Syracusians: about the same time went with his Army to Agrirentum, and had intelligence by the way, that the Punic Garrison was put out of the Town, and that the Agrirentines were willing to serve him with their lives and fortunes; and they were as good as their word.

For Sofistratus, that had surrendred Syracusa into his hands, deliver'd to him the Town, and also eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse, brave Soldiers, and not inferiour to his own Countrymen. Sofistratus also caused thirty other Towns, whereof he was Governour, to submit themselves to him. After this was done, he sent men to Syracusa to fetch Arms and Engines of all sorts, that were necessary for besieging of Towns. For he had a mind to attack those Towns that belonged to the Carthaginians, having now in readiness an Army of thirty thousand men, besides one thousand five hundred Horsemen and the Elephants which he had brought with him into Sicily. And in the first place he took Heraclea, once a Garrison of the Carthaginians: afterwards he made himself Master of Agone: and presently after the Selinuntians tack'd about together with the Egestanes and Halcyans, who revolting from the Carthaginians incited by their Example a great many other Towns in that Coast to espouse the same Interest. But the Erycinians, who trusted in the numbers of their Auxiliaries, and the fortifications of the place, he resolves to attack with all his strength. Therefore with his Army in Battalia, he marches in his Arms towards the Town, having obliged himself by a Vow to Hercules upon condition, That he should shew himself that day to the Grecians a Warrior worthy his Race and Quality.

After that an Assault had been made upon the place, and the Defendants were by shot continually poured upon them, forced to give ground, so that there was room to apply the Ladders to the Walls; Pyrrhus got up first himself, and there fought very stoutly with the Enemies, hand to hand; some of whom he strook down with his Buckler, killed others with his Sword, and terrified all with his Courage.

Nor was this Action only honourable to him, but successful too; for with safety and honour he carried the Town at the same effort. The rest being encouraged with the King's Example no less than concern'd for his danger, for both reasons behav'd themselves gallantly. Afterwards he sacrific'd to Hercules according to his Vow, and exhibited magnificent Shews of several sorts for many days together.

This year also we find that they Triumph'd at Rome over the Lucanians and Brutians the 14th day of January: but I wonder, why C. Junius is entitl'd to that Triumph, whereas Rufinus fought with those People, and took from them two famous Towns: whom also I find by some Authors honoured with the title of a Triumphal Person.

The City, which was already disturb'd with Pyrrhus's successes, falls also under fresh terrors proceeding from Prodigies, and pestilential Diseases; but that which was reckon'd the most ominous of all, was the Statue of Capitoline Jove beaten down by Lightning, the head of which being broken off could not be found again, but by the Augurs Art and diligence; the City afterwards was not only fear'd but hurt by a Pestilence equally destroying Men and Beasts: but yet it was more especially formidable for causing Abortions

Abortions in all Creatures, so that when neither the Off-spring of Men, nor of Beasts could be brought forth alive, it was imagin'd that the whole race of living Creatures should be destroy'd by the indignation of the Gods.

This violent Calamity rendred the second Consulship of Q. Fab. Maximus very remarkable, wherein C. Genucius Clepsius was his Colleague. But for all this they gave not over the Wars with the Lucanians and Sammites: of the great slaughters of both which there are two certain proofs, namely, because Q. Fabius triumph'd over the Sammites, Brutians and Lucanians, in the Quirinalia: and also because those People sent Ambassadors and Letters to Pyrrhus to inform him of their desperate condition, "If they were not succour'd; and that they could not hold out against the Romans any longer, but must yield themselves to prevent their own utter destruction."

For this Reason, and also because that things did not go right in the Island, the People being quite averse from him for his cruelty, Pyrrhus was induc'd to leave Sicily, and to carry back his Army into Italy.

For the fuller demonstration of which design of his, and of the series of Affairs ensuing thereupon: 'tis convenient that I should more particularly relate the Actions he did in the mean time.

After he had taken Eryx and put a Garrison into it, he went to Egina remarkable for its strength, and commodious site near the Haven of Palermo; and being received into that Town by the Burgers of their own accord, he marched to Palermo to called from its commodious and capacious Harbour: and having carried this place also by assault, together with a place called Epiroete lying between Palermo and Eryx upon a pleasant Mountain but of difficult access, he was now Master of all the Carthaginians Province, except Lilybeum. This Town had not been long before built by the Carthaginians to fear the Mortians: in whose City had been raz'd by Dionysius the Tyrant in the Carthaginian War.

When therefore the Carthaginians saw that of all their Empire in Sicily, there was only this place remaining in their power; hearing of preparations made by Pyrrhus to attack it, they resolv'd to defend it with all their strength. Having put therefore a strong Garrison into the place with good store of Ammunition, and abundance of Arms and Engines (wherewith they might be well furnish'd, having the Sea at their command) they fell to fortify the place with all diligence, especially on that side where it was accessible by Land; they rais'd several Towers, and made a broad Ditch: the work going on the more speedily, because the Town being for the most part built upon the Rocks of the Sea, needed no works for all that space.

In the mean while though they had made great preparations for the War, having rais'd a great many mercenary Soldiers in Italy and other places, yet they sent Ambassadors promising Money, and their Fleet to Pyrrhus, if Peace might be obtain'd upon reasonable terms.

Pyrrhus would not hear of the Money, being desirous to hold the Cities he had taken: but as for Lilybeum he seem'd to like of their propositions.

But yet his Friends and the Grandees of Sicily telling him, "That Sicily could never be quiet for the descent by, persuading him to answer them, That he would not conclude Peace with them, unless they would quit the Island, leaving the Sea to be the limit of both Empires."

The Treaty thus broken off, he led his Forces immediately against the Town, and encamping near the Walls formally invest'd the place: having so order'd his men, that such of them as were tir'd, might be reliev'd by fresh ones; but the Lilybetanes defended the Town, being strengthened with men, and well furnish'd with Engines: for the Carthaginians had put so many into the place, that the compass of the Walls was hardly large enough to hold them all. Therefore having pour'd all manner of shot upon the Epirotes, and kill'd and wounded many of them they forced them to desist from their Enterprize.

The King after this makes other Engines besides those brought from Syracusa, and by mining and all other methods of besieging tries what might be done. But after he had tired himself in vain for almost two Months, the Carthaginians not losing ground at all, and considered that as long as they had the Sea open to go in and out, Lilybeum could not be taken; he rais'd the Siege, and directed his course another way. For certain Grecian Cities desir'd his protection against the Mamertines, who besides other injuries done to them forced them to pay Tribute.

Pyrrhus then leading out his Army with great speed, takes and kills some of these Mamertines, who were gathering the Contributions, and overcomes those that encountred him in Battel, and withal takes and demolishes many of their strong Holds.

Hitherto the King by noble Exploits had gain'd great power and glory, having not so much got as deserv'd the love of every man in particular, and the good will of all the Country by his obliging address, not to speak of his other good Qualities.

But his so great felicity, which one would think had been firmly establish'd was destroy'd in a moment, the occasion hereof proceeding not only from the natural levity of that People, and the extravagancies of the King's Officers, but also from the King's own fault, who though a brave Man in Adversities, yet by Prosperity, which generally men are too weak to bear, was puff'd up with pride.

For finding, as was before said, a Fleet to be absolutely necessary for the effecting of his designs, and that though he had several Ships, yet they were ill furnish'd with Mariners: by too vigorously pressing men for Sea-service he disgust'd the People extremely: He was now quite another man, his former lenity was turn'd into imperiousness and insolence, and these vented themselves in threats and punishments too. However the People made shift to suffer these things, because they were done under pretence of the publick good, till they saw those very Persons kill'd by whose Interest he had got Sicily; and then they turn'd Enemies to him, not by degrees but all on the sudden, and many revolted from him, some joining themselves to the Carthaginians and others to the Mamertines, according as best serv'd their turns.

Thus Cruelty however odious of it self, becomes intolerable when 'tis exercised against the well-deserving, and improves every private hatred with the general detestation that all mankind have for an ungrateful and perfidious man. That which chiefly seems to have forc'd him upon using these violent courses, was his too great compliance with the Counsels and perverse dispositions of his Friends: for the Elites he had taken away from the Relations and Friends of Agathocles he bestow'd on these men, who were not one grain better than they: Some of his Guards and Captains he set up for Magistrates of Towns, contrary to the constitutions of the places, nor for the lawful time, but after what manner and as long as he pleas'd himself.

He

He ingrossed all the Power in their Courts of Judicature, all the administration of publick Affairs into his own hands, committing most of those matters to his Creatures, who were abhor'd by all for their Luxury and Avarice, and who minding only how to get and to spend Money dishonestly, for the satisfaction of their lusts, made no difference of right and wrong.

At these things the People being incens'd, began first to mutter, and then to complain openly, "That they ought not to have repented of their former condition, if they must suffer the same things over again: That Pyrhus had been sent for and entertain'd in vain, if he thought to imitate those men he came to punish, and that no injury made so deep an impression, as that whereof he was the Author, who ought to have been the Avenger.

XIX. And by this time many People did apparently incline to a revolt from him, whilst he taking the worst measures, chafes to exasperate rather than assuage their Animosities, as if by Cruelty he intended to atone for the Crimes of injustice.

The Carthaginians in the mean while looking on the King as not very strong in forces of his own, and daily more weakened in the affections of the Scilians, entertain'd hopes of recovering their Territories, and landed a fresh Army. And while People daily deserted Pyrhus for fear of his Cruelty, they annoy'd the Epirots very considerably.

Pyrhus by reason of the Punic War having put a Garison into every Town, resolves to make away all the principal Men, by forging accusations of Treason against them: When these were taken off, he made account the multitude would be more easily kept in awe: at last he seizes on Thenio and Soffstratus, two Persons of the greatest Quality in the whole Isle, by whose Interest, we told you, he had attain'd the Dominion of Sicily, and Thenio was kill'd, but Soffstratus escap'd to the Enemy, where he becomes no less instrumental to the expelling of the King, than he had been before to the setting of him up and establishing him. Afterwards vying who should be first, they revolted from him most to the Carthaginians, and some to the Mamertines: so that now the once flourishing Power of the Epirots, here was reduc'd to the lowest ebb of Fortune.

XX. In this state of Affairs the Ambassadors from his Italian Confederates came welcome to the King: who complaining to him, that several Towns being lost, the rest with much ado kept out the assailing Foe, gave him a fair pretence to be going, which he wish'd heartily; for that now being to aid his Confederates he could seem to return into Italy, not as forc'd by the Carthaginians.

Being upon his departure, when he consider'd with himself the Wealth and Situation of the Island, and tempers of the People, 'tis reported that he said, "O my Friends, what a Prize do we leave here for the Romans and Carthaginians! And this was a true preface being sufficiently fulfill'd in those long Wars that follow'd, wherein so many men were kill'd, and such great Navies sunk on either side.

And now the Enemies being encouraged with their fortune rendred Pyrhus's journey very dangerous to him from Sicily, and also very unsecure after his landing in Italy. For the Carthaginians tell upon him in the Streight, and having to do with unexperienc'd men in Naval Fights, themselves being most expert, sunk seventy of his Gallies, and disabled the rest. So that after this blow he escap'd into Italy with twelve Gallies onely, having set out with one hundred Gallies with Decks, besides a far greater number of Barks, and such as were for transporting provisions for the Army.

But having got together as many of his men as recover'd Land after this defeat, he presently had so strong an Army on foot that he was in good hopes to surprize Rhegium; but being repuls'd by the Campanians, who defended Rhegium, he fell soon after into another considerable danger. For, while he led his Army through difficult and woody places, the Enemy lying in Ambush suddenly charg'd and disorder'd the Rear of his Army, having kill'd many of his men and two of his Elephants: this was a strong Body of men, both in respect of their kind and number. There were ten thousand of them, no less, experienc'd Soldiers, and most of them were Mamertines: for these trusting in their Alliance and Kindred to the Rhegians, upon intelligence had of Pyrhus's intentions to return into Italy, crossed the Sea before him, and in hopes of booty lodged themselves in places convenient to surprize him: In this Action Pyrhus, while he was fighting according to his usual Courage in the front of his Army, receiv'd a wound in his Head: and when he had withdrawn for a little while from the Army to stop the blood, one of the Enemies, a man remarkable for the bigness of his Stature, and glittering Arms, thrusts himself before the rest, and defies him with a loud Voice, commanding him if he were alive to come out. Pyrhus being fir'd with rage, and looking terribly with his blood running down his Face, presently engages this Challenger, his men being not able to hinder him: and with a blow upon his Head killed him there right.

It is reported that the temper of his Sword was such, and the stroak so strong, that it cut the man through the Body, so that the wound cleft one half of him from the other. This frightful sight terrified the Enemies, insomuch that they quitted the fight, looking on him with Reverence as something more than a Man. Pyrhus, though freed from this trouble, had no great pleasure for all that; for when he had lost part of his Baggage in that Battel, and that all his rich Booty taken from the Scilians had been intercepted in that unfortunate fight with the Carthaginians, he was so streightned for Money to pay off his Soldiers, that he was forc'd to rob the sacred Treasures of Proserpina.

Her Shrine was then famous among the Locrians for an Opinion held of its Sanctity. Pyrhus having retaken this Town Locri, his Party within being encouraged by his presence, acted several cruelties upon the Locrians, prosecuting the revenge of the Garison, slain by them, more eagerly and furiously than he ought to have done, by making a prey of the Lives and Estates of those wretches. When he had taken from the People all they could, or would part with, he seiz'd on the holy Treasure; the most profligate of his Friends, who always had given him the worst Counsel, fomented this covetous humour of his.

XXIV. Their names were Evagoras the Son of Theodorus, Balacer the Son of Nicanor, and Dinarchus the Son of Nicias. These were not onely advisers to Pyrhus in the thing, telling him, That necessity had no Law, but likewise became the Instruments in committing the Sacriledge, having got out a great quantity of Gold, which had been kept in Vaults under ground for many years. The thing took mighty well with the King, who said, that Religion out of season was foppish, and that none but a Madman would refuse ready Cash: and accordingly he commanded the Prize to be carried by Sea to Tarentum, he himself going by Land; but this Act of his was not more dishonest in the Execution, than unfortunate in the Event; for a sudden storm surpriz'd his Fleet, the Wind, that stood fair before, changing all night, insomuch that some of his Ships being tossed about in the dark were driven out into the Sea: but as for those which carried the Holy Treasure, they were torn and scattered by the storm, and all of them lost with the men; but the

the Money stuck upon some planks remaining of this Wreck, and within two days after it had been carried away, was thrown out by the Sea upon the shore near this Temple. When the thing was known, he caused all the Treasure diligently to be got together and to be carried back to the old place, thinking hereby to procure the pardon of the Gods.

But notwithstanding all this, he could never prosper afterwards, Fortune still crossing all his designs XXVII. even those which were manag'd with Conduct and resolution too, which he ever after imputed to the anger of the Goddess, as Proxenus the Historian, and Pyrhus himself says in his Commentaries; Beside this, quickly after the perpetration of this vile Act, he sacrificed to Proserpina; but when none of his Offerings prov'd auspicious, he fell into such a rage, that he took off all the Counsellors and Intriguers; and these men indeed dy'd as they deserv'd.

Pyrhus after this continues on his Journey, and without any trouble arrives at Tarentum. The Romans who were extremely afflicted with a Pestilence, and the fear of War increasing upon Pyrhus's return into Italy, against both these made use of all humane and divine means whatsoever. There was an Ancient Concern- ing this Opion among them, that the driving in of a Nail by the Dictator might assuage the Disease, and it may be very probably guess'd, that this shift was made use of, and that P. Cornelius Rufinus was made Dictator to drive the Nail, whilst the greatness of the Calamity was apt to urge People to seek for any Remedies: and 'tis manifest that Rufinus was disgrac'd by the Censors the next year after he had been twice Consul and Dictator: and there cannot be found a surer Record, or a sitter place for his Dictatorship. &c.

Thus they did all they could to remove the Pestilence; but the care of the War by reason of the difficulty in making Levies put them to a greater trouble. For besides the long continuance of the War, the Pestilence having rag'd a long while made People weary of their lives: and the young Men being cited, obstinately refus'd to enter into service. But the severity and resolution of M. Curius Dentatus being Consul the second time broke their obstinacy: for he was now entred upon his Office with L. Cornelius Lentulus his Colleague. While Curius was making new Levies in the Capitol, and saw that none would list themselves, he commanded the names of all the Tribes to be put into the Box, and the Lot falling upon the Pollian Tribe, the first name of that Tribe that was drawn, was cited; but when the Man would not answer, he first of all sold his goods, and afterwards, when with grievous complaints he had made his Appeal to the Tribune, he sold the man himself, laying beforehand, "That the Commonwealth had no need of such a Member as would not be obedient. The Tribunes did not assist the Fellow in the least; and from that time this action was esteem'd to good a President, that if any one refus'd to list himself, when he was commanded to do so in a Muster rightly held, it became a Custom to make a Slave of him. This terrour forced the rest to enroll themselves more readily: and so having rais'd as many Regiments as they had design'd, the two Consuls advanc'd towards the Enemy. Lentulus makes an inroad into Lucania, and Curius invades the Samnites.

Pyrhus bestirring himself at this news, in a general Rendezvous of his Forces at Tarentum, review'd XXVIII. his Army consisting of twenty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse. With which, and a choice Troop of Tarentines he entred into Samnium: where he found that Nation but coldly affected to him, and his aids from other places came in very slowly and thin: People being not onely wearied out by their great losses, but very much nettled, because he was reckon'd to be the Author of all the miseries they suffer'd, whilst betraying his Italian Allies by his departure he undertook an Expedition into Sicily.

But yet for all this being furnish'd with great Forces he sent part of them into Lucania, to divert the other Consul, and goes himself against Man. Curius, promising himself an easie conquest of the rest, if he could but conquer this Man. But the Roman knowing full well, that no Army could be a match to the Macedonian Phalanx, if it were drawn out in Battalia; posted himself in a place that was of difficult access: and because he hop'd for Aids out of Lucania, beside that the Sacrifices and Auguries did not bode well, he was not willing to give Battel.

Pyrhus the more earnestly desir'd Battel before the two consular Armies were joyn'd: and therefore taking with him some of the Light-arm'd Soldiers together with some Elephants he resolv'd by Night to surprize the Roman Camp. And now when all things are prepar'd for this attempt, he falls asleep, and dreams that most of his Teeth drop'd out of their place, and a great deal of blood ran out of his Mouth. Being perplex'd with this Dream he determin'd for the present to forbear all Action; But because his Friends importun'd him not to pretermitt an opportunity, not likely to be retriev'd, he commanded that the Signal for the March should be given. About the Town of Maleventum (which was so called in those days) the County is woody and mountainous, but further on the Hills by moderate and gentle descents it determines in a spacious Plain, called the Fields of Taurasimum. Whilst Pyrhus was going from the lower ground by the ascent of these hilly and woody places, the Lights he carried with him went quite out, so that straying in the dark, and being stop'd in his Journey he could be seen from the Roman Camp by break of day.

The Romans were not a little surpriz'd at the sudden arrival of the Enemy; but because they knew XXX. for certain they must engage, and considering that their Sacrifices appear'd auspicious: the Consul marches speedily out of the Camp, and falls upon and routs the foremost of the Enemies that were broken from the rest, and in disarray; these running back upon their own men, disorder'd the Army, and a great many were kill'd, and some Elephants left by the Enemy were taken by the Romans. This success encouraged Curius to pursue his good fortune, and to lead his Army in Battalia down into the Plain, where the Epirots were ready to receive them. They fought very sharply on both sides; but the Romans having gotten the better in the former Battel, they were more courageous now. The Epirots at length gave ground, which made Pyrhus to have recourse to the assistance of his Elephants, by which means when one Wing of his Army fled, he forced the Romans in the other Wing to retire to their Posts.

The Consul having before left there a strong Guard, commands them now being fresh to receive the XXXI. Enemy, and beat back the Elephants. Against these Creatures experience had taught them how to secure themselves very easily: and they had learn'd in the former Battels that they were more afraid of Fire than Sword; they got therefore bundles of Hempen stalks besmear'd with Pitch, which being fir'd they threw upon the backs or Towers of the Elephants: and these, whether they lighted on the skin of the Elephants, or on their wooden Towers, stuck fast by shap hooks they were arm'd withal.

While they ply'd them with these and several other kinds of shot very thick from the upper ground; the Elephants partly by the terrour of the fire, and partly by their Wounds were put into a rage, and in an ungovern'd ungovern'd manner retreating upon their own men disordered and destroy'd all where they bent their course. This confusion, as they say, began by a young Elephant, who being shot in the head with a Dart, made a mournful noise, at which (as being known by her) his Dam leaping out, and increasing the disorder afterwards, put all the rest of the Elephants into the like hurry and confusion.

XXXII. This Battel was a very great one both for the number of the slain, and the advantages of the Victory. For then was Pyrrhus quite defeated: nor did the rest of Italy hold out long after him, nor other Countries and States after Italy.

'Tis said, that the King had in that Battel three times more men than the Romans: for that he had eighty thousand Foot, and six thousand Horse; whereof according to those who say most, there were thirty six thousand slain, and according to those that say least, twenty six thousand. There were taken one thousand three hundred men with eight Elephants, Pyrrhus with few Horsemen escaping to Tarentum.

His Camp was also taken, which was not onely admird, but likewise prov'd of very great use afterwards. For anciently the Romans and all other Nations us'd to pitch their Tents here and there after the manner of Booths in the midst of their several Battalions: but Pyrrhus was the first who measuring out the ground incamp'd all his Army within a Trench. By which Example the Romans being enlighten'd in the matter, adding onely such things as seem'd necessary attain'd to that absolute skill in incampments in succeeding times. This year was not onely remarkable for successes abroad, but also for domestick Affairs, and great severity of Discipline. Q. Fabricius Lucinus, and Q. Aemilius Papus bore the Consulship with good accord together. Many had their Horses taken from them: some were paid by, when they chose Members for the Senate; but the most memorable thing of all was the Censure upon P. Cornelius Rufinus. This Man had been twice Consul and Dictator, and having perform'd many warlike Exploits had triumph'd also; but now the Censors turn'd him out of the House, and for the reason of their proceedings gave this, That they found him to have ten pound of Silver Plate for the use of his Table. And this blot remain'd so long upon the Family, that none thereof were admitted to Honours and Offices till the times of Sulla the Dictator.

So great was the abstinence of those days, and their Luxury was as great afterwards, so that that Household-stuff, which would have been looked upon by their Posterity as mean and lewd, should have been esteem'd too anxious and gay by these their Forefathers.

XXXIV. After the Poll there follow'd a lustration. There were poll'd 271222. In the end of this year, both the Consuls rode into the Capitol in triumph; Curius was first, whose triumph both for the honour of his Achievements, and the joy of his Successes, as also for the splendour of his Train made the more glorious show. For till that day there was nothing to set off a Triumph (as being but overpoor neighbouring Nations) but onely some rusty Arms, or Gallic Waggon: and there was no booty, but Flocks and Herds. But now both for the variety of Nations, whose Captives were led before the Chariot, as also for the beauty and magnificence of the Spoils the Show was splendid and great. Here you might see Epirots, Thessalians, Macedonians, Apulians, Lucanians and Brutians led in Chains before the Chariot: while curious Pictures, and Statues of noble Artificers with Gold, Purple, and other transmarine Rarities, implements of the Tarentine luxury were carried before to adorn the Triumph. But the pleasantest and most surprising sight of all was, the Elephants; four of which with their Towers (for the rest dy'd before of their Wounds) were then first seen at Rome: the common People from the name of the biggest Creature they knew, and the place they had been first seen in, call'd them Lucanian Oxen. The other Consuls triumph a few days after was more obscure: though his Actions were none of the meanest; for he had beaten the Sannites and Lucanians, and taken several Towns: but yet the lustre of Curius's fame outshone these lesser exploits.

XXXV. Among those who were rewarded for their Courage, he bestow'd a golden Coronet out of the booty upon Ser. Corn. Merenda, who had been a chief Instrument in taking a Town of the Sannites. While the Romans thus enjoy'd the fruits of their Victory, their Enemies were in a quite different humour; for they, who a long while had been dissatisfied with the Government of Pyrrhus, after this unhappy Battel, being filled with fear and indignation, began to murmur and mutiny. The King himself who had a long while been weary of this game with the Romans, and now wholly despair'd of Victory, thought of nothing else, but onely how he might without danger and disgrace go away. But dissimbling his design for the present, he exhorted his Allies, by telling them, "That they should not be cast down for one defeat, for that they had not been worse beaten by the Romans in the last Battel, than they had beaten them in the first: who for all that could not be persuaded to make Peace with them; and if they would but imitate their Constancy, and wait for better times, then all things would appear more tolerable: Besides that, they had strength sufficient for a longer War; and that he had in Greece many potent Friends from whom he might expect certain assistance. Nor were these idle stories; for the truth of it is, he had been aided considerably before by Ptolemy King of Macedonia, and was held in great esteem by the Grecians and Barbarians too. And withal, he was honour'd by the Etolians then a powerful People, by the Macedonians and the Princes of the Slavonians; whom he had won partly by fear, and partly by kindness. But yet he pretended these things to keep his Allies from revolting from him, until the Sea being open for his Voyage, he might return into his Country; and not because he was willing to continue the War in Italy, or did put any great hopes in foreign Succours: but yet he sent Ambassadors about to the Kings of Asia and Macedonia, desiring Money of some, and Aid of others, and both of Antigonus King of Macedonia. By such hopes as these he preserv'd to himself the good will of his Allies however, so that while he had prepar'd all things ready for his departure under-hand, his Ambassadors return'd from Antigonus. Having therefore assembled the Chiefs of the Italians and Epirots, he reads to them not those Letters he had receiv'd but counterfeit ones, wherein Antigonus signifi'd that he would send him aid speedily.

XXXVII. By this Intrigue having wheeled not onely his Allies but the Romans too, who kept Guard in the Neighbourhood, he set Sail the next day without any hindrance, and so arriv'd at the Ceraunan Mountains (a Promontory of Epire so call'd). But to take off the shame of his having quitted the War, and to make men believe he would return when he had perform'd those things for which he was call'd away, he left Milo to guard the Citadel of Tarentum: and that he might continue faithful to him, not onely in hopes of rewards from him, but also for fear of the same doom, he presented him with a Chair, the Cords of which were made of the skin of Nicias, whom for Treason design'd against him, he had put to death.

Having given this Man a Guard of Soldiers, he return'd with the rest of his Forces being eight thousand Foot and five hundred Horse into his own Kingdom, now in the sixth year after he had come from thence.

In

In the mean while when the Centuriate assemblies were held at Rome, and that it was thought Pyrrhus would renew the War, they determined to make Curius Consul the second time, because he of all Men had managed the business most handsomely against that King; and therefore seem'd a Person of the greatest stroke and fortune to go through with the rest of the War. Of the Nobility Ser. Cornelius Merenda was made Consul, his late Achievements and glory advancing him, and also the recommendation of his Kinsman under whom he had bore Arms in the last Campaign.

These Consuls bent the effort of their Arms against the Lucanians, Sannites and Brutians; who defended themselves rather by strength of places, than by Arms, so that no Action could be perform'd comparable to the rest. Yet this did not in the least impair Curius's glory, whilst all were of Opinion, that the warlike King would not onely be afraid for the blow he had receiv'd, but also because Curius would be made General again, to fight against him. Therefore the whole honour of ending this War, and routing Pyrrhus out of Italy ought to be ascribed to this Great Man.

The next year after Curius's third Consulship, the first Embassy came from the Kings of Alexandria with Presents to Rome, in the Consulship of C. Corfo, and C. Claud. Canina. Ptolemy surnam'd Philadelphus upon intelligence of Pyrrhus's flight sent to congratulate the Romans, and to desire an Alliance with them. The Senators thought it highly honourable, and a great happiness thus to be courted by Kings so potent and remote of their own accord for their Alliance, therefore they received the Ambassadors civilly, and enter'd into Alliance with Ptolemy. Moreover, they nominated persons of the greatest Quality to go Ambassadors to the King to ratify the Alliance, and to return the Complement, namely, Q. Fabius Ginges a Consular Person, and with him Caius Fabius Pictor, Numerius Fabius Pictor, and Q. Ogulnius. When these were gone, the Consuls fought with good success against those Italian Nations, who out of necessity and despair continued yet in Arms: but that the actions of one of the Consuls exceeded the others, may be collected from the Triumph of C. Claudius Canina had over the Sannites, Lucanians and Brutians, in his Consulship, at the Feast Romulus. But these Joys for successes abroad were somewhat disturbed by Sex-tilia a Vestal Virgin convicted of Incest, and thought to have incens'd the Gods against the City by her Irreligion; but the anger of the Gods was appeas'd by Sacrifices and Atonements, and the Nun suffering the punishment due to so great a Crime was buried alive at the Collatine Gate. The same year Colonies were brought to Cosa of the Volsians and Pestum in Lucania, called by the Greeks, Possidonia. This place the Lucanians had taken from the Sybarites: and now it was newly subjected to the Romans. The year following was more remarkable, wherein not only the War against the Sannites and others, but also against the Tarentines was ended.

L. Papirius Cursor, and Sp. Carvilius Consuls the second time, having the Lucanians, Brutians, Sannites and Tarentines for their Provinces, by their great Exploits and undertakings answer'd the expectations they had rais'd (being both chosen on purpose in hopes to conclude the War that year): and the Sannites being totally subdued by Carvilius after a War of seventy one years, now with more fidelity than before imbrac'd the conditions of Peace impos'd upon them by the Romans. L. Papirius forc'd the Brutians and Lucanians, after great slaughters made of them, to sue for Peace. But as it happens in a War against several bordering People Papirius was also engag'd with the Sannites, and Carvilius with the Brutians and Lucanians, and both with the Tarentines: nor were the Forces of the Tarentines onely defeated, but the City it self was taken; which whole affair I shall more particularly relate as containing not only the Conquest of this famous City, but also the death of King Pyrrhus, with the false dealings of the Carthaginians, and the source of that Rupture between them and the Romans.

Pyrrhus two years before had so departed from Italy, as by his Garison left behind at Tarentum, to give People hopes of his return: which soon after being much increas'd by the late successes of that King in Macedonia, kept up the spirits of the Italians in their present sufferings: for being a Man of an active Spirit, who could not long rest, he had made War against Antigonus, for not aiding him in the business of Italy, and having defeated him, almost dispossest him of his whole Dominions. Whence the Romans were then continually afraid, lest returning with more Forces into Italy he should raise a greater War than the former. But the sudden death of Pyrrhus destroy'd the hopes, and remov'd the fears of all People. For Pyrrhus insatiably coveting to enlarge his Dominions to the utmost, under pretence of re-inflating Cleonymus in the Kingdom of Sparta, who then had difference with Arens, entering Peloponnesus, resolv'd to make himself Master thereof likewise; and he annoy'd the Lacedemonians very much, though he had in vain attacked their City. In the mean time at Argos there were two contrary Parties, headed by Aristippus and Aristias, the first of which sends for Antigonus, the latter for Pyrrhus to help to pull down their Enemies: For Antigonus also was come to Peloponnesus, to assist the Lacedemonians against the common Enemy. So that the same Night the Forces of both Kings were receiv'd through several Gates into the Town. Pyrrhus understanding that his men were press'd hard by the Enemies, entering himself likewise into the City; when he saw at break of day a figure of a Wolf and a Bull in Brags representing them fighting with one another, was astonish'd at this Omen of his imminent danger. For there was an ancient Oracle which said that the place where Æacides should see a Bull and a Wolf fighting, should be fatal to him. Therefore he design'd to draw back with his Forces, and to retire out of the Town; but his Son Helenus meeting him with the reserves and Elephants had stop'd his way; and the one endeavouring to get out of the Town, and the others to enter in, whilst the Enemies bore hardly upon the multitude retiring, and the Argives, Epirots, and Macedonians, together with the Spartans and Cretians belonging to Arens, and some Elephants were in those narrow streets crouded together, and trampled upon one another, all was in a hurry and confusion. Mean while Pyrrhus, whilst he does all he can by his directions, exhortations, and valour to repel the Enemy and defend his own men, receiv'd a light Wound with a Lance from an Argive Youth, whose Mother being a poor old Woman was there among others of her Sex looking upon the Battel from the top of a House, and happening to see Pyrrhus eagerly coming up towards the person that wounded him, was so concern'd for her Sons danger, that she took a Tile from the top of the House, and with both hands threw it on Pyrrhus's head. Thus Pyrrhus died miserably and ignobly: a Person outdone by none in that Age for Courage, Conduct, and Experience in Military Affairs, and several other endowments both of Body and Mind; but the fruit of his Achievements, and the lustre of his other Excellencies was destroy'd by his Ambition; for he wanted nothing of being a happy Man but Contentment. In fine, had he been as circumspect in maintaining, as he was industrious in making Conquests, the World could not have shew'd a greater Prince.

- XLIV. When the news hereof came to Italy, it was receiv'd with joy or regret according as People were differently affected to the Person. While other Nations which were free bought their Peace with Rome upon such terms as they could get, the Tarentines were not able to take those measures they would have done, being over-ruled by Milo and the Garison of the Epirots: between whom matters improv'd from lighter Affronts to an open quarrel. The Tarentines thus sorely afflicted on both sides, by the Romans their Enemies without the Walls, and the Epirots within, sent Ambassadors for aid to Carthage; the Carthaginians, who already possess'd a great part of Sicily, and wish'd rather to make themselves Masters of the Maritime Coasts of Italy, than that they should fall into the hands of the Romans, readily came with a Navy equip'd under pretence of casting out Milo, but intending if they could take Tarentum, to defend it against the Romans. When L. Papirius the Consul was also arriv'd thither, Tarentum was block'd up on all sides: the Romans besieging by Land the City and Citadel, and the Carthaginians besieging the Citadel by Sea. In this state of Affairs, whilst the Romans were no less solicitous that the Carthaginians should not take the place, than that themselves should take it, whilst they cunningly tried all the Methods of Victory, they sent to Milo by private Messengers, promising, if Tarentum were deliver'd into their hands by his means, they would dismiss him and his Countrymen safe home. Milo thinking it the best course to do so at present, treats with the Tarentines, that they should unanimously consult concerning their common safety: and by degrees he persuades them to send him Ambassadors to L. Papirius, and that he would get such conditions from him as would be for the advantage of them all. When these People being tir'd with cares and dangers had willingly assented to him, he went likewise to the Consul, with whom he had laid the Plot, and return'd from him with very advantageous Conditions, and hopes of Peace upon reasonable terms. This credulity expos'd the Tarentines to security and confidence, laying aside all care and circumspection; and thereby administred an opportunity to Milo, not onely to deliver the Citadel, but the Town also to the Romans. The Carthaginians being not well pleas'd with this event, departed, pretending themselves still Friends to the Romans: and that they were come for no other end but to drive out Milo. According to some Authors, I find that the Romans had warn'd the Carthaginians not to meddle in the Tarentine Affair, for in so doing they would act contrary to the Articles of the League; but that the Carthaginians did not onely slight the admonition, but also that the Punic Auxiliaries fought in the Tarentine Army against the Romans: from which distaste the War that was waged against the Carthaginians in Sicily first broke out; though the Carthaginians being desirous to conceal their falshood by perjury, swore they had acted all things squarely and honestly. But as I do not deny, but such things might pass between the Generals: while the Romans could not endure the presence of the Carthaginians, and the Carthaginians colour'd the matter as well as they could, or that People commonly discours'd such things: so I am of Opinion that the War rose upon other reasons; both because they did not enter upon the War presently, and also because the War in Sicily rising afterwards chiefly broke out by reason of the Mamertines, while the Punic League was still valid.
- XLVII. Their Dominion being thus enlarged, the Consuls returning to Rome being receiv'd with a great deal of rejoycing, triumphed afterwards with Honour and Renown. In the mean while Q. Fabius Gurges, and the rest who had been sent to Alexandria, gave an Account of their Embassy in the Senate, how that they had been entertain'd with all manner of civility; costly Presents being sent to them when they came, and "richer ones when they were returning home. But that it was conceiv'd more for the honour of the Roman abstinence, to refuse the former modestly. But as for the rest which had been receiv'd, they had carried them into the Treasury of the Roman People before they had done any other business; and as for the golden Crowns sent to them at Alexandria, when they were invited to a Feast according to the usual custom of the Court, that they had receiv'd them for the Omens sake, and plac'd them at Night upon the King's Statues.
- The Senate being very glad for the success of the Embassy, and gravity of the Ambassadors, returning them thanks for rendring the Roman Manners venerable even to foreign Nations by their continence, order'd those Presents to be restor'd them which they had put into the Treasury; and the People saying, "That the Commonwealth would then be best manag'd, when that base course of getting Riches by the Acquests of Ministers of State during their employments was taken away, immediately decreed the same thing: and the Treasurers readily delivering up the Money as they were commanded, these Persons worthy of this fruit of their abstinence, with equal glory refus'd and receiv'd the Egyptian Wealth. Q. Fabius the Chief Ambassador was (I suppose) upon this account prefer'd before so many noble Persons, and chosen President of the Senate by the Censors Curius and Papirius: whilst both for the nobleness of his blood and his Father's deserts; as also for his two Consulships, and as many Triumphs he seem'd ripe for any Honour.
- XLVIII. In the same year M. Curius the Cenfor defray'd the charge of bringing the River Anien into the City, with the booty taken from the Enemy. Out of which he was so unwilling to be enrich'd himself, privately, that when he was charg'd by some Adversaries of his with having imbezzled that Money, bringing out a wooden Cruise that he us'd to Sacrifice withal, he swore that he had carried no more of the booty into his own House, but that: a Man that deserves for the greatness of his Achievements, and other famous proofs of his Vertues, to have his more remarkable Deeds and Sayings taken notice of, though we digress a little. For I think it not unfit or impertinent to the business of an Historian to relate such things, whereby men that are like to be conversant in State Affairs may be no less instructed towards the attaining of happiness by Vertue, than by Military Actions and Counsels. In the Sabine War, when there had been so much booty taken, that the Historiographer Fabius imagines that the Romans then first of all had the taste of Riches; Curius out of such a wealthy Victory assuming to himself nothing but the Credit and Satisfaction of the Performance, continu'd in his former austere way of living, being both a competent Example, and also a severe exactor of publick Abstinence.
- XLIX. For when the greatest part of the Land taken from the Enemy had been confiscated, he allotted not above fourteen Acres to every private mans share; and when the Senate would have assign'd him a greater share, he was content with the same quantity of ground as the rest had, saying, that he was an ill Citizen, who could not be satisfied with the same as others had. Afterwards in this place stood the Villa of Curius among the Sabines, in which by chance as he was boyling Rapes, the Sannites being newly conquer'd came to him and presented him with a great sum of Gold; unto whom he said, I had rather have these things in my earthen Vessels, and command those men who have Gold. Caro the elder possessing some Lands near this Villa came thither often, and contemplating upon that small Cottage and spot of ground, which that great Man had dig'd with his own hands after three Triumphs, Triumphs, remembering also his life led with the greatest abstinence that could be, he form'd his Mind to a like generosity in imitation of that Primitive Integrity and simplicity of Curius. And in truth, they were the fittest Persons to lay the firm foundations of an Empire, which might bear up the superstructure, and not onely withstand foreign Assaults, but also scarcely be shaken with its own domestick Vices.

DECADE II. BOOK XV.

Florus his Epitome of the Fifteenth Book of Livy.

Both Peace and Liberty is granted to the vanquish'd Tarentines. The Campanian Legion that treacherously seiz'd Rhegium, is besieg'd, and upon surrender, all Beheaded. Some unruly young Noblemen happening to affront the Ambassadors which the Apolloniats sent to the Senate, they were all delivered into the Apolloniats hands to be punish'd at discretion. Peace granted to the conquer'd Picenes, and a Colony planted at Ariminum in that Country, and another at Beneventum in Samnum. Now and not before the Romans began to use Silver Coin for their Money. The Umbrians and Salentines subdued, and their submissions accepted. The number of Questors increased to Eight.

ALL these Potent Enemies being conquer'd after many Battels, and a Peace made in Italy, the Lords of the Senate fell now to consider how they might improve their Victories to the best advantage. They resolv'd that all those who had taken Arms against them, should forfeit part of their Territories; reserving a severe revenge for the Tarentines, because their Crime was greater: whom they commanded to deliver up their Arms and Shipping, and also, razed their Walls, and impos'd a Tribute upon them: but yet they had Liberty and Peace given them.

Afterwards they judg'd nothing more necessary than to punish the treachery of that Legion, which having circumvented the Rhegians possess'd that Town now for the space of ten years. These People foreseeing, that the Romans being every day more and more successful, their wickedness should not go unaveng'd, diligently applied themselves to fortifie their Town and to secure themselves against danger, well knowing that what they had got by fraud and rapine, was to be maintain'd by the same practices. Besides their inbred insolence, they trusted in their Alliance with the Mamertines; and their success against the Carthaginians and against Pyrrhus, whereby they had try'd the courage of their People, having soon forc'd the Enemies to quit their attempts of besieging them: So that the Rebels and desertors were grown so bold, that they took Croton by treachery, kill'd the Roman Garison, and destroy'd the Town. L. Genucius therefore who bore the Consulship with C. Quinctius that year, was order'd to do justice upon these matters: who having forc'd the Traitors within their Walls, besieg'd the Town. But whilst they made great resistance with their own Forces, and those of the Mamertines, the Consul after considerable losses was streighten'd also for Provision, until Hiero King of Syracuse supply'd him with Men and Victuals: for he being an Enemy to the Mamertines hated also their Allies of Rhegium. He was also induc'd hereunto by the consideration of the Roman greatness, whom he thought to make his Friends against future occasions, by obliging them first. Thus at last the Town being forc'd to surrender it self, the Consul dismiss'd the Mamertines obliging them to certain Conditions, and punish'd the Thieves and Desertors that had got to Rhegium as to a Sanctuary: but he carried the Legionary Soldiers to Rome, that the Senate might take a course with them. Hereupon a great Example of the Roman Discipline follow'd: The Senate first of all commanded that all those who had been brought by the Consul should be imprison'd, and from thence be brought to Execution. Afterwards, when a Tribune of the Commons had remonstrated against this act of the Senate, declaring, That the lives of Roman Citizens should not be taken away contrary to the Laws and Customs of their Ancestors: the clamours of the Tribunes were contemned by the resolute Senators, and the Malefactors punish'd; but to take away the invidiousness of such a sad action lest the People should regret, to see such a company of men suffer death together: they brought them out by fifty in a day, and after they had scourg'd them, strook off their Heads. The Senate order'd that their Bodies should not be buried nor any mourning made for them.

D. Iulius who had liv'd blind till that time that he might die with greater torment, kill'd himself in Prison. Following most Authors in the Point, I have related that the whole Legion consisting of four thousand men, was belicaded. But I hold that a more true account which is given by Polybius, namely, that they had taken alive no more than three hundred of that Legion, the rest chusing by manful resistance to die by the Sword; when the City was taken, as knowing that after such enormous Crimes, nothing else could be expected from a surrender of themselves, but greater tortures and a more infamous death. The Town of Rhegium was restor'd to the former Inhabitants, as many of them as could be found out, and they enjoy'd their Liberty and Laws as before. This act of Justice mightily encreas'd the reputation of the Roman Commonwealth, and the Italians and neighbouring Nations lov'd them no less for this action, than they fear'd them for their Arms. Afterwards when Genucius and Cornelius were Consuls, they had War with the Sasines, (a Race of Umbrians inhabiting the Apennine) but upon what cause these took Arms, and upon what confidence they durst oppose a Power so formidable, as the Romans was grown, I cannot imagine, what remains of Authors being wholly silent in the matter: the whole Series likewise of that War is wholly lost, no further account of these ancient actions remaining, but that Cneius Cornelius triumphed over the Sasines.

The Winter this year is reported to have been exceeding sharp, so that the Trees wither'd, the Tyber was frozen over with a thick Ice, and Cattel dy'd for want of fodder: nay, the weather was so extremely cold, that in the Roman Forum the Snow lay very deep for forty days together. This unusual thing, as

- A. U. 484. it happens, being esteem'd for a Portentous Accident by many, strangely affected People with fears, which were increas'd when they saw and heard of many Prodiges, Q. Ogulnius Gallus, and C. Fabius Piclor being Consuls. For at Rome the Temple of Health, and part of the room under it was beaten down with Lightning. Three Wolves coming into the Town before day brought a Carcass half eaten, and left it mangled in pieces in the Forum, being affrighted with the noise of people. From Formia, it was reported, that their Walls had been frequently destroy'd with Lightning. From the Country of Calenum, it was said, that the Earth suddenly gaping a violent flame issu'd forth, which continuing to burn for three days consumed five Acres of ground into ashes, so that not onely the fruits of that place, but the Trees themselves dy'd from the roots. These things caused greater fear than harm at Rome; for nothing extraordinary followed hereupon, except it were a War with the Picentians, which was concluded the next year with the addition of that Province to the Commonwealth. Mean while Silver began to be coyn'd first at Rome, their Riches being increas'd by the successes of their Arms, whereas till that time Brals Coyns were the onely Money us'd in common at Rome: but then there were Denaries and Quinaries of Silver coyn'd in the Temple of Juno, in the Capitol: for Juno was so sumam'd, because that when the Romans in the War against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, consulted her touching their present exigencies for Money; she answered them, that they should not lack Money if they would follow Justice and the Ways. The Consuls Q. Gallus, and C. Fabius went to take Lollius the Sammite, who being an Hostage at Rome made his escape privately, and taking a certain Cattle, robbed the people from thence, and stir'd up the minds of his Countrymen which were not yet settled in a sure Peace, to a Revolt: but bringing onely an unarmed Rabble with him, he made no great resistance, except that by the Caricinians (a people bordering on the Frentani) things were put into greater trouble and danger: for whilst they were attacking a certain Fort, which was the receptacle of Lollius's booty and pillage, by a various turn of Fortune their hopes were changed into fear, and their fear again into Victory. Some of the besieged induc'd upon promise of indemnity to themselves received the Romans in a Moon-shine Night into the Town. The Townsmen being got together at this, as soon as they came to close fight, a great deal of Snow suddenly falling down hinder'd them from seeing one another in the fight. Hereby the Caricinians had got so much odds against them that were Strangers in those places, that the Roman Ensigns were endanger'd; and now they were almost forc'd to give back, when upon a sudden it ceas'd to snow, and the Moon shone again: and thus when they were deliver'd from their blind fear, Victory was waiting to crown their Valour with success. These battles seem to have hinder'd them from subduing the Picentians that year: but the next year P. Sempronius Sophus, and Appius Claudius the Son of Cecus in the entrance upon their Consulships undertaking the War, manag'd the business with success. About the same time in the Picentian Country belonging to the Galli Senones, a Colony was plant- ed at Ariminum, as also at Maleventum in Sammium, the name being chang'd into Beneventum for the O- mens sake. The Sabines, who some years had been made Denizens of Rome, received now also the Power of Voting in Elections. Claudius likewise ingaged with the Enemies in Umbria, and took the Town of Camarinum, the Inhabitants whereof were sold for Slaves: but because the War seem'd to have been carried on by indirect means, the Romans prefer'd Justice before Lucre; and order'd the Camarinians to be sought for and ransom'd by the buyers: and that being made Denizens of Rome, they should have places to inhabit assign'd them in Mount Aventine, and their Lands restor'd.
- IX. But the Victory obtain'd over the Picentians was a Subject of greater Triumph, esteem'd at so high a rate as to have impress'd on the Silver Deniers then newly coyn'd to represent it, that so it might be known presently by all men, and also the memory of it transmitted to Posterity. Q. Ceditius the Son of Quintus by an Order of the Senate, procur'd the Money to be coyn'd with Picus the Son of Saturn (for he was thought to be the founder of the Race) instamp'd on one side, and a Roman Magistrate reaching out his hand to a Suppliant upon the other. Moreover, that the Conquest of that Nation made a considerable accession of strength to the Romans may be collected hence, because 360000 Picentians are said to have then yielded themselves to the mercy of the Romans.
- X. Both the Consuls deserv'd and enjoy'd a Triumph for that War, but Sempronius was the more Illustrious: because he had ingag'd against stronger Forces of the Enemy with greater danger and difficulty. For there happen'd a prodigious thing at the time when the Armies being drawn up in Battalia were just ready to fall on, namely a sudden Earthquake. But the Consul in a Speech proper for the occasion encourag'd the terrified minds of the Soldiery, alledging, that the Enemy was also as much disturb'd with a needless fear, and that the day should be his, who first bravely adventur'd to charge his Enemy lying yet under a consternation. Afterwards, vowing a Temple to the Goddess Tellus in case she should give Victory to the Romans: he fell upon the Enemy, who were ready to receive him; so that a bloody and terrible slaughter ensu'd: and of the Conquerours the least part are said to have escap'd. After this Battel, among other Towns of the Picentians, Asculum their Metropolis, a place strong by Nature and Art yielded it self to Sempronius. Afterwards, by the Example of this place, the whole Picentian Nation promising obedience obtain'd Peace of the Romans. And thus all Italy, as far as it is wash'd with the Ionian and Sicilian Seas being conquer'd, the Sallentines onely remain'd to be subdued, a People inhabiting the utmost Coasts of Italy where the Ionian and the Adriatic join. From the Picentians therefore the War proceeded as it were by some contagion to these People, which was declar'd against them. M. Atilius Regulus, and Julius Libo being then Consuls, they were charg'd of having entertain'd Pyrrhus coming from Epirus in their Towns and Ports. But the commodiousness of the Haven of Brundisium, which with the Wind blowing from the same Point, receives and sends forth Vessels, together with the easie passage into Dalmatia and Albania from thence, as also the convenience of having their Dominions terminated by the bounds of Italy, were deemed the most important reasons of the War. Both the Consuls triumph'd over these people in one day being the 20th of February. The Sallentines being overcome they took Brundisium, the most eminent Town in that quarter, and achiev'd other matters very prosperously: being assisted, as they gave out, by Pales the Goddess of Shepherds, said to have requested for reward of the Victory, a Chappel to be consecrated for her at Rome. The greater part of the Sallentines being subdued by these men, the Consuls of the year following compleated the Victory; their names were Numerius Fabius C.F.M.N. and Decius Junius D.F.D.: by these the Umbrians and Sallentines also were subjected to the Roman Yoke. Thus Italy being conquer'd where it is bounded by the Seas and the Po, the Roman Power immediately began to be magnify'd by the hopes of some, and fear of others in the neighbouring Islands, and the Continent lying to the Ionian and Adriatic Seas. For those who desir'd to aggrandize themselves by oppressing others, were afraid to be hinder'd in their designs by the Romans, whilst others on the contrary imbrac'd their aid as sent from Heaven against the outrages of their Adversaries.

The Apollonians first of all desired by their Ambassadors to be admitted into an Alliance with the Romans. The Town of Apollonia is distant from the Sea sixty furlongs, being built by the Corinthians and Corycians: it has a commodious Harbour, and the shortest passage from Brundisium into Greece lies that way: the Illyrians and Macedonians inhabit about it; therefore the people can hardly maintain their ground against their ambitious and potent Neighbours. The Embassie was graciously received by the Senate, not regarding so much the Wealth and Power of that People being but small, as future hopes and opportunity open'd for greater matters in reversion: whence the punishment taken upon some young Noblemen for beating the Ambassadors in a scuffle was the greater; for neither could the dignity of his Office (for he was Edile) nor the nobleness of his Extract rescue Q. Fabius from being deliver'd up to the Apollonians for that mildemeanour. Q. Apronius likewise an Edile, and an Accomplice in the same Crime was surrendered to the Apollonians; for the Senate decreed that these should be deliver'd by the Herald to the Apollonian Ambassadors, and that a Questor should go along with them to Brundisium, lest the Relations of the persons surrendered should offer any injury to the Ambassadors in their Journey.

This was a signal demonstration both of the justice of the State, and of their prudence too: for whilst by an Opinion of honesty they desir'd to attract the minds of foreign Nations to an Amity with them; it nearly concern'd them in some signal manner to revenge the Affronts offer'd to those, who first came to propose an Alliance with them; for nothing could have prov'd more prejudicial to their Interest than to let matters come to such a pass, that the Apollonians should have cause to repent of their action, and others for their Example. And hence in after-times it went for a constant Rule, that those who had beaten the Ambassadors of a free People, should be deliver'd into the hands of those to whom the Ambassadors belonged. The Apollonians however when these persons were brought to them, wisely considering that they should reap more good by their Humanity than Revenge, sent them home safe. This year both the Consuls triumph'd twice: D. Junius before the 27th of September, and Numerius Fabius before the 5th of October over the Sarfinates a people of Umbria. Fabius also the first of February, and Junius the 5th triumph'd over the Sallentini and some Messapians assitants to their Neighbours the Sallentini. This year was made an end of the Italian Wars; for the War which was w.g'd the year following, Q. Fabius Gurges being the third time Consul, having for his Colleague L. Manlius Vitulus, was not against a just Enemy, but onely a Revenge taken upon recreant Villains in behalf of Allies.

The Volsinians a powerful People of Umbria implor'd the protection of the Romans against their quondam Slaves: for whether it were in hopes to recruit their strength impair'd by former Wars or to indulge themselves in ease shunning the toil of War, they imprudently permitted their Slaves being made Freemen to bear Arms: and afterwards communicating Honours to them, chose some of them for Senators, and some for other Offices in the State; so that these in a short time over-topping the ancient Citizens, and wresting the Power into their own hands, most impudently exercised their liberty against those men, to whom they were indebted for it. So that now it became their common Trade, to ravish the honourable Dames and Virgins, to answer the complaints of Parents and Husbands for these injuries with mockery and reproaches instead of rediefs and correction of the Offenders; and to plunder, destroy and harass all things as they pleas'd themselves. And not to pass by a signal demonstration of that brutish impudence to which servile Spirits may arrive, when they have power on their side; they published a Law, whereby the Libertines were authoriz'd to ravish the Wives and Daughters of their Patrons: and that every Maid, that was to many a Freeman, should first be deserv'd by one that had been a Slave. Now the old Volsinians being neither able to endure these miseries, nor yet to remove them with their own strength, entering into private consult, determin'd to send Ambassadors to Rome: who by addresses underhand prevail'd to have the Senate assembled in a private House (for they foresaw, that the thing if it should be discover'd, would undo them) declared in a lamentable harangue the calamities of their City: whereat the Senate being moved promised to assist that distressed people in order to the recovering of their ancient rights and privileges. But whilst these matters were thought to have been transacted Incognito, they were discovered by a certain Sammite to those very men, against whom all the complaint was made. This Fellow being a Guest to the Matter of that House, when the Senate assembled, lay ill, and being forgotten lay'd behind in that place, whereby he over-heard, and betray'd the whole matter.

The Ambassadors therefore being returned from Rome were put to the torture: and the business being found out, both they and the chief Men of the City were barbarously murdered.

This gave a juster pretence for making a War: and Q. Fabius was sent with an Army against them, who defeated them in Battel, and slew a great number of them in the pursuit: and as for those who betook themselves into their fortresses, he resolv'd to attack them by storm; but whilst they made brisk resistance, and several Skirmishes hapned between both parties, the Consul unwarily exposing himself to the shot receiv'd a Wound, whereof he dy'd, being under the Chiurgions hands. The besieged understanding this disaster, sallied out with all their Forces, hoping that an Army cow'd by the fall of their General, might be beaten from the Town if it were suddenly assaulted, but the event of the Battel proved contrary to their expectations: for the Roman Soldiers bravely receiv'd them, and with great slaughter forced them to retire into the Town.

I suppose Decius Mus was chief Commander in this Battel: for that this man might be Lieutenant to Fabius, and so might manage the War after his death until one was sent to succeed him. And hence, I believe, it comes to pass, that Decius Mus by some negligent Historians is entitiled to the beginning and ending of this War. The Censors made that year were Cn. Cornelius the Son of Lucius, and C. Marcus who having been Censor once before, was call'd Censorinus in the time of his second Censorship. Memorable was the moderation of this Marcus, who receiving a Power he had not for, reprimanded the People being assembled, in a grave Harangue because they had twice committed that Office to the same Man, whereas their Ancestors had for no other reason judg'd that the time of bearing this Office ought to be limited, but because the Power was too great. Hence there arole a Law, whereby it was provided, That no man should be twice Censor: the same year the number of the Questors were increas'd, hitherto four had serv'd the turn: two in the City, and as many more joyn'd with the Consuls that went out to the War. But some years after, the Commonwealth being enlarg'd, and greater Customs and Revenues coming in, it was necessary that that number should be doubled. Afterwards Appius Claudius surnamed Caudex in his Office, and M. Fulvius Flaccus were made Consuls. This year was memorable for the War then first begun against the Carthaginians in Sicily; for then the quarrel first brake out between those two most potent States, which after many years and great losses on both sides, could not be ended but by

by the destruction of one of them. But we must premise some things more particularly concerning Carthage before we come to the handling of these things: for that in the narrations of these matters several things will be unintelligible, unless we have first an insight into the rise and growth of that City.

DECADE II. BOOK XVI.

Florus his Epitome of the Sixteenth Book of Livy.

The Original of the Carthaginians and the first Fortunes of their City related: Against whom, and Hiero King of the Syracusans, the Senate of Rome decreed Forces to be sent in Aid of the Mamertines [or Inhabitants of Messina] after much debate Pro and Con, upon that point. And then the Gentlemen of Rome that serv'd on Horseback first cross'd the Seas, and fought valiantly against King Hiero in several Battels, who at last suing for Peace, had it granted. The Censors held a Lustrum, and enroll'd 292224 Citizens in the Subsidy-Book. D. Junius Brutus in honour of his deceased Father, entertained the people with a Prize or Fencing-match of the Gladiators, the first of that kind that was ever shew'd in Rome. A Colony planted at Telerina, and several prosperous Actions against the Carthaginians and Volscians.

- I. THAT Carthage was founded by Phenicians of Tyre besides the Authority and faith of ancient Story, we have the perpetual amity between those two Nations while they flourished, as also the apparent similitude of Language even now remaining to attest it. It is reported that one Elisa of that Nation, the same which is surnamed Dido, Daughter of Agenor Son of Belus fled from her Country, in hatred to Pygmalion her Brother-in-law for the cruel murder of her Husband Sicheus; and arrived at that Bay or Peninsula in Africa, where Carthage was afterwards built; whose Power at its beginning being but inconsiderable, discovered not any hopes of that grandeur, which it afterwards attained to. For Elisa is thought to have bought no more Land from the Inhabitants, than could be cover'd with an Ox hide: But then that she cut this Hide into small thongs, and so took in a far greater quantity of ground, than the Owners thought they had bargain'd for; so that the place serv'd for the building of a Citadel, which from thence is supposed to be called Byrsa. In process of time, when several people for the convenience of trading with these Foreigners built Houses close to the Citadel, so that it appeared like a Town, and that the Africans also desired to retain such civil and rich customers with them, they easily complied with the Ambassadors from Utica, who by their own Example (for Utica was a Colony of Tyrrians) exhorted them to build a City in those places. It was agreed therefore between them, that the Africans should give the Phenicians a place to dwell in: these paying a yearly tribute to the Africans in lieu thereof. When the work was finished, Elisa call'd it in her own Language, Carthadas, which signifies the new Town, the Greeks call it Carchedon, and the Romans as is usual, by altering the pronunciation, Carthago. This City having peaceful Neighbours, an industrious People, and what was the main thing of all, a wise Queen, arriv'd in a short time to great prowess and Riches.
- II. These things seem to have been done about seventy years before the building of Rome; for Authors differ in their account of an affair so ancient. But as the life of Elisa was remarkable for variety of Fortune, so was her death memorable too. Jarbas a petty Prince of some African Province courted her for his Wife, threatening War if he should be deny'd; But she being a Woman of rare chastity, and still retaining true to her deceased Sicheus, was averse from marrying him: however because she understood that a War would be destructive to the infancy of her blooming State, she took some time to consider on't, as if she were inclining towards the marriage with this African Prince: and then order'd a pile of Wood to be set up in the further end of the Town, pretending, that before she would enter upon the second Marriage she would perform holy Rites to the ashes of her Sicheus: and afterwards having offered many Sacrifices, she climbs up the Pile her self at last, and with the Sword which she had brought for that use kills her self: her affection to her Husband and People exceeding the care she had of her own life.
- III. The Carthaginians shew'd as much respect to her memory as they could; and in admiration of her Vertues worshipp'd her for a Goddess, as long as their Commonwealth stood: She had a Temple built her in the place where she dy'd, being call'd Dido (a name given to brave Amazons by the Carthaginians.) Afterwards when no single Person was held worthy of the succession to the Government, the City began to be governed by a mix'd power of the Nobility and the Populace, but yet the Royal Title continued still: but their Kings were like the Lacedaemonians; unless it were that the honour being ty'd to no particular House was given to any of the Nobility that was eminent above the rest for his Valour and Riches. To these administrations of War abroad did belong; whence by the Romans comparing their Government with their own, they were call'd Pretors and Dictators. At home these were the Presidents of their Councils, with whom they advis'd concerning State Affairs: matters of great importance were propos'd to the people; whose judgment was decisive, when the Kings and Senators differ'd. They had likewise a Power to remonstrate against the Decrees of the Kings and Senators, if they seem'd to be prejudicial to the Publick (every one having the liberty to judg of their proceedings:) which extravagant Power of the Populace when excessively heightned, as is usual, by the soothing of Flatterers in after-times did a great deal of mischief to the Carthaginians.
- IV. Moreover, they had in their Senate thirty elderly Men as it were the Privy Counsellours, and these had a great influence over the other Counsellours of State. They had also an Officer indued with an Authority like a Censor for the keeping of good Order and Discipline. In process of time, the Power of the Carthaginians increasing, several Commanders were chosen for the Wars: of whom Mago was the most valiant and successful, who when he had left two Sons qualified like himself, and that they also as it were handed down to their more numerous Progeny the same hereditary qualifications, it happened that this immoderate power of his Family seem'd fit to be restrained by some new remedies: and a hundred Officers were created, who were commission'd to pass sentence even upon the Commanders themselves; a formidable power this, whether we respect the largeness of their Commission, or the continuance of it, which was for life: whereas the Kings themselves were not created for life, nor for any longer term than a year: at home they were call'd Suffetes or Judges resembling the Roman Consuls.

But the Centumviri behaving themselves insolently were restrained by a Law of Hannibal, whereby he enacted that these Judges should be chosen yearly, and none should hold the Office for two years together. In their Religion they imitated very much the Modes of Tyre: to which some additions were made afterwards. Juno was the Deity most in vogue: Eseulapius had also honours paid him, to whom was built a noble Shrine in the City. Apollo's Temple likewise was richly adorned, being cover'd with golden Plates, having a noble Statue in it, which was carried to Rome after the destruction of Carthage, and placed by the great Cirque: to Hercules of Tyre they sent yearly a Ship, one of the choicest they had, with the tenths of the annual products of their Country and of their spoils taken in the Wars. From the same people likewise their Founders, they receiv'd another piece of horrid impiety, which was, yearly to sacrifice a Man to Saturn, call'd Belus by them; the remnants of which barbarity could not be quite extinguish'd and abolish'd with the ruin of their City. The utility of Commerce did for the most part moderate the other customs of that people; for being addicted very much to Trade by nature, and the institution of their Ancestors, whether willingly, or unwillingly they squar'd all their designs and measures in order to this. Hence by avoidleis mischief, the admiration of Wealth and Honour, corrupted the Assemblies of the Magistrates: weakned Vertue and Courage, being subjected to Money: inflam'd the people with covetousness, and infected them with a servile custom of cozening and lying, and forced the Commonwealth wholly to betake it self to the pursuit of such things as these. For from hence it came to pass that there was so little faith in the Punic Capitulations, and that all their strength lay in shipping. Their Infantry was the main support of their Empire, but their Cavalry was little or nothing esteem'd. In their Wars by Land they employ'd mercenary forces, whose affection to the Commonwealth was not real, and their faith was venal, their diffentions dangerous, and conspiracies destructive: by which main error in their Policies it came to pass that no Enemy ever threw the State till its final dissolution, into so much confusion as this did. Again, abundance of mischief befell this State, whilst the men of power and authority among them, by mutual dissimulation without control committed extortion and pillaged the People: so that we need not so much wonder that in a War risen between those two States the Romans should have the better on't: whose Senators in times of danger contributed to the necessities of the publick out of their own Purses: whereas the Carthaginians made a prey and spoil of the Commonwealth.

But these Grievances increased with the City: wherefore at the beginning they were very tolerable, as being but small and inconsiderable: and a long while after the Empire bore up under them by its own greatness, and by the good conduct of some of its Commanders, by whose means chiefly we find all that happiness procur'd and establish'd, which Carthage ever attain'd to. At first they warred with the Africans, who demanded a Tribute for that ground whereon their City was built, which ingagement they could not free themselves from but by repeated Wars. Hence their Empire is enlarged, and the best inhabited part of Africa reduc'd under the subjection of the Carthaginians. And as for their passing over into Sardinia, and thence into Sicily, they were invited therunto by the convenience of the Sea, and the openness of the first of these places for any assault through the rudeness of its Inhabitants in War, as also by the beauty of the latter expos'd as a prey to him that had the longest Sword, by reason of immortal quarrels and contests. The passage from Sardinia to Corfica was easie, and the conquest of a weak people cheap. But Sicily became the Scene of the various and sundry chances which accompany the Wars: sometimes yielding wreaths to adorn the triumphant Generals of Carthage, and sometimes proving a field of blood to them. Hamilcar the Son of Hanno having transported three hundred thousand men into Sicily was defeated by Gelo and slain; with which blow the Carthaginians being runn'd forbore the business of Sicily, till at the request of the Egestanes molested by the Selunians, they sent out Hannibal Hamilcar's Grandchild by his Son Gesco. This person having destroyed Selinus and Himera acquired great Power to the Carthaginians in Sicily. Imileo overcame the elder Dionysius's Brother and General, Leptines, in the Sicilian Strait; he took and sunk one hundred Vessels, and slew above twenty thousand. He won several Towns in Sicily, and took also part of Syracuse: but a sudden Plague forced him to return with a small company to Carthage, the whole Army being very near destroy'd.

But notwithstanding this, the Carthaginians did not abandon all hopes of possessing Sicily, but sent Hanno a few years after with another Fleet against Dionysius. After this Timoleon expell'd Mago, call'd in by Iceras, and then incamp'd in Syracuse with sixty thousand men. Again, Hannibal and Hamilcar bringing seventy thousand men with them were in a signal Battel defeated, and beaten out of their Camp by the same Timoleon; but these scarce ever appear'd a quicker or greater revolution of their fate in any War as in that against Agathocles; who being routed in Sicily, besieg'd at Syracuse, and apprehending no hopes of safety, of his own head transfer'd the War into Africa, and having overcome the Carthaginians in several Battels, whilst the Africans revolted in great numbers to him, brought them into great danger and fear, and afterwards having return'd home, expell'd them quite out of Sicily, till the death of the King, and troubles arising thereupon opened a door to let the Carthaginians into the possession of Sicily again: from which time, they fought with various successes against Pyrrhus as we have shewn already, and at last conquer'd him. Me in while, some Cities in Spain were made tributaries to this State: when the Gaditanes addressing for succour against their Neighbours, the Auxiliaries sent unto this people their Kinred (for the Tyrrians built Gades also) reduc'd some bordering Countries of Spain to the subjection of the Carthaginians.

This was near upon the matter the State of Carthage when they enter'd into War with Rome. As for Sicily, where it was not under the Carthaginians Sovereignty, the Syracusans and their King Hiero sway'd the greater part thereof, the rest the Mamertines possess'd by Conquest, who as long as they could serve themselves with the Alliance of the Romans, that seiz'd on Rhegium, being not content to stand upon the defensive, made incursions into the Territories of the Carthaginians and Syracusans: And in fine, forced

- several Towns of Sicily by tribute to redeem themselves from being plundered and otherwise annoy'd. But Rhegium being expugned, and the deserters punished, the Mamertines bereav'd of their main strength became unable to maintain their former Post; and so being reduced almost to the last Stake, fought for Messina with the King of Syracuse. Concerning which King I shall treat somewhat more largely, because he was then an Enemy of the Romans, but a little after prov'd their Friend and Ally for many years together, and mightily contributed to the establishment of their Affairs: for he was a Man of prodigious success, great Valour and excellent Conduct: and in those days the power of the Syracusans rose and fell away with Hiero. This Man therefore inherited neither Honour, Riches, nor any such advantages from his Ancestors: but all his fortune, all his honour he owed to himself. He was not raised as many are from a low degree to greatness by flattering the Innocent, and destroying or defeating his Adversaries; but by a singular Moderation both in the acquisition and the exercise of Power; whilst he prudently consider'd, that no Government could be established better than that, which is so manag'd, that the Subject may rather be afraid of being depriv'd of it than the Prince. Therefore when he had reigned fifty four years, and that when two mighty People clash'd with one another, and contended with their utmost power for the Empire of the World, being attempted upon by no foreign Enemy except in his younger days, nor by any homebred Plots and Treasons, he died upwards of Ninety, having arrived at this Age with his Senes intire and sound, and his Body vigorous, a great demonstration of his temperate life: being a Man not onely belov'd by his own People, but held in great esteem among the Romans and Grecians: who also, as he was minded to resign up the Government was hinder'd by the people in general from doing it, and his Son Gelon, who being fifty years old deceas'd before Hiero, out of a moderation very rare in the World, chose rather for ever to want his Kingdom, than his Father, and honour'd him as long as he liv'd, with all dutiful respect and obedience. Now this Hiero was expos'd by his Father Hierocles, who deriv'd his pedigree from Gelo an ancient Tyrant of Sicily: because a noble Person such as he was, disdain'd to breed up a Child begot on a Maid-servant. But when he was bereft of all humane succour and relief, Bees fed him for many days with their Honey drop'd into his mouth as he lay along; By this Prodigy, as also by the answers of the Diviners who assum'd that a Royal Power was portended thereby, Hierocles being mov'd takes the Child again, owns him and provides for his good Education, in hopes of his future greatness. Thence 'tis said, that whilst he was learning his Lesson with his School-fellows, a Wolf came in suddenly among the Boys and snatch'd his Book out of his hand. Afterwards, when he was just entering upon the rudiments of War, an Eagle lighted upon his Buckler, and an Owl upon his Spear. This was interpreted a sign of Counsel and Strength and eminence of Place denoted by the Kingly Bird.
- XIII. But afterwards he gave more manifest and certain Signs than these, by the shape and great strength of his Body: yet he was rendred more noble and illustrious upon the account of his temperance, judgment, affableness, justice and moderation. For having often at single Combat fought both in the Field, and also upon Challenges, and always coming off victorious, he was rewarded by Pyrrhus with many Military Ornaments for his Valour; whose Kinswoman afterwards call'd Nereis, was married to Gelo the Son of Hiero. Pyrrhus being routed out of Sicily, when according to the usual distemper of those times, a Contest had risen betwixt the Syracusans Army, and the Townsmen, Artemidorus and Hiero were created chief Commanders by Military Votes in the Camp at Mergana: and by the contrivance of Hiero and the help of his Friends, they put Soldiers privately into the Town, and so became Masters of it: for he neither kill'd nor expell'd any one of the contrary faction, but by clemency, meekness and good counsels so quieted these commotions, that he got the good will of his Enemies as well as Friends to be made Prætor of Syracuse.
- XIV. But this Personage being as zealous for the Publickweal as for his own, observing an old reigning distemper in that Body Politick, whereby it came to pass that as often as the Magistrates march'd out their Forces, mutinies would usually break out in the Army, or else some Riots and Innovations at home: he began to look about him for some person to whom he might trust the government of the City, if he should be forced at any time to go abroad to the Wars; he marries therefore the Daughter of Leptines a principal person among the Citizens, and one that had the reputation of an honest and true-hearted Gentleman, by which means being secure at home, he contriv'd a remedy rather necessary, than any ways laudable against the insolence of the Mercenaries. For marching out his Army against the Mamertines, when they had met him near Centuripa, in arranging his Forces at the River Cyamessus, he play'd his game so cunningly, that leaving a space between the Citizens and Mercenaries, he commanded these to charge the Enemy in the front, as if he design'd with the City Militia to attack them on some other side as soon as they were engag'd.
- XV. Thus the Mercenaries surrounded by a greater number of the Mamertines were slain: and whilst the Enemies were diverted by the slaughter of them, he retreats with his Forces quietly and safely into Syracuse. When he had in this manner clear'd the Soldiery of seditious Spirits and Male-contents, he exercis'd the City Militia in their Arms with great diligence, and rais'd new levies of Mercenaries: and so having wrought himself into the favour and good liking of the people, and remov'd all that could stand in his way, the rest not daring to mutter against an armed and a watchful Man, he manag'd the Government as he pleas'd himself.
- Mean while the Mamertines encouraged by their late Victory, negligently and in a contemptuous manner spoil'd the Country of the Syracusans. Against these Hiero now secure of the fidelity of his Countrymen and Soldiers, marches out with all speed and advances with his Army even to the Gates of the Enemies City, then drain'd of men by reason of several Parties drawn out of it to pique up and down the Country; and here he pitches his Camp. The Mamertines alarm'd at this danger of their City, post'd with a Body of Light-Horse to its relief. Whereupon Hiero decamping from their Borders takes a Town called Myle and in it fifteen hundred men: from thence having surpris'd some Cattles in his way, he proceeds to Ameselum situated in the mid-way between Agyrium and Centuripa; which place likewise though strengthened with fortifications and well garrison'd, he took and raz'd, the Garrison receiving quarter, he forced to bear Arms under himself, and divided the Lands belonging to Ameselum between the Centuripians and Agyrians.
- XVI. And now being flush'd with these successes he makes an incursion into the Territories of the Mamertines, takes the City Alelus upon surrender, and brings over the Abacenians and Tyndaritanes voluntarily to espouse his Cause: thus the next Towns to Messina towards both Seas becoming subject to Hiero (for the the Tindaritanes border on the Tuscan Sea, and the Tauromenians on the Sicilians, who were Confederates of the Syracusans at that time.) The Mamertines thus reduc'd to straits and difficulties, under the conduct of Cios their Pretor march'd against the Enemy, then incamped in the Plains of Mylea near the River Longanus. When Battel was join'd, and they fought a long while with doubtful fortune, until a fresh Squadron charging the Mamertines in the Flank won a signal Victory, and gave the glory of the day to Hiero. For Hiero before the fight began, had ordered two hundred Messinian Exiles, brave Fellows and mortal Enemies of the Mamertines, together with a detachment of four hundred choice men of his own to go round about a neighbouring Hill (called Thorax) and by a sudden attack to disorder and break the Enemies ranks: they having executed his Orders with vigour and resolution cut to pieces the whole Army of the Mamertines.

Cios in this desperate condition desiring nothing else but to die in the bed of Honour, having been wounded in several places falls into his Enemies hands, and being carried into their Camp, confirm'd the predictions of the Entrails and Diviners by a contrary event than he had looked for. For when he sacrific'd before the Battel began, the Soothsayers viewing the Entrails promis'd him, that he should that Night lodg in the Camp of his Enemies: which he interpreting as an Omen of Victory, understood too late the Cheat and Delusion of an equivocal Prediction. Being already cast down with the disaster, when he sees next day among the captive Horses that whereon his Son rode in the Battel, musing that he had been kill'd, he tore the Plasters and bands from off his Wounds, and expir'd his maim'd self before repeating treatie. The Mamertines hearing of this slaughter of their men were quite cast down, and were ready to meet the Conquerour with the badges of submission, and to yield themselves to him, but had not a lucky hap unexpectedly interposed to their preservation.

It happened that Hannibal the General of the Carthaginians was at the same time in the Liparian Isles, places adjacent to Sicily, who being advertis'd of Hiero's Victory, and seeing left upon the ruin and subversion of the Mamertines, the Syracusian Power would become troublefom and intolerable to Carthage, came straightway to Hiero under pretext of congratulating his success; and so having stop'd him from marching outright against Messina, enter'd himself before him into the Town, and not onely by words encouraged the Mamertines, who had thoughts of surrendering themselves, to maintain their liberty, but likewise brought a Garison of his own men into the place. Hiero finding himself out-witted by this trepanning and cunning Carthaginian, return'd to Syracuse, being too weak to undertake a Siege of so much difficulty as this was like to prove: and being received with general satisfaction he was by the whole Army declared King, which Title he afterwards retain'd by the consent both of his own people, and of Foreigners.

Hiero being gone, the Mamertines, when they had taken heart again for a little while, deliberating upon the present state of Affairs, were divided into two factions: "One party was of Opinion, that they must put themselves under the protection of the Carthaginians, it being thought not onely convenient for several reasons, but now their Garison was received, almost necessary for them so to do. The other reply'd, "That the Carthaginians were as much their Enemies as Hiero; and doubtless design'd not out of kindness, but desire of Empire to defend Messina, as having for many years aspir'd to the Dominion of Sicily; "deter'd from this their unreasonable resolution, neither by the losses of Armies, nor Navies, nay, not by the concern of their domestick Affairs, and the African Wars: If so be therefore that they should trust themselves to them, who had so strong a Fleet, and the best part of Sicily in their hands, they must without all dispute become perfect Slaves and Vassals. Therefore it would be absolutely against their Interest to call the Carthaginians to their assistance, a tyrannical treacherous People, who would impose a heavier Yoke upon their Necks, than they had yet fear'd from the Syracusans. As for the Punic Garison, if it were purely sent on purpose to preserve their State from falling into Hiero's hands: they might dismiss it, now the business was done in an amicable civil way; but if any Sham was design'd, they ought the more carefully to prevent the treachery of false Friends, and for that reason address themselves rather to the Romans for protection, a Nation victorious in Arms, of approved fidelity and justice, who would have neither power nor any pretensions to keep Messina in their own hands: who had not one span of ground in Sicily, no skill in Navigation nor any Genius that way. These would rest content, if so be they might but conserve their own Italy, by opposing Messina as a curb or dam against the violent ambition of Hiero and the Carthaginians. Therefore they had best resolve to try the Romans friendship, rather than any other peoples whatsoever: for that it would be a dishonourable action, and very ill tim'd, if they should alter their former Measures having sent Ambassadors to them, and received a promise of assistance.

For before this, the Mamertines beginning to look jealously upon their own Affairs after the last Battel with Hiero had employ'd the assistance of the Romans, as being of the same stock, and the Consuls having incited the peoples minds, and prepar'd them for the undertaking of the War, procur'd their Votes for it; but the Senate demur'd, and would not ratify the act of the Commons. For they who had but just now punish'd their own people for a villanous act committed upon Rhegium, saw, that in assisting the Mamertines, who by a like treachery had possess'd Messina, they should forfeit all the honour and reputation of their justice which was amply acquir'd by that procedure. But hearing immediately of the Mamertines defeat, and considering that if they were forsaken by the Romans, they would place their regards upon the Power of Carthage, they comply'd readily with those, who voted the War. For several of the Senators too were inclin'd to the thing; foreseeing that otherwise, Messina presently and after that the rest of Sicily, would fall into the hands of the Carthaginians: and should that happen, the Romans would be oblig'd to dispute their Title to Italy it self with them. And to render this danger unavoidable the ambition of that potent People, and the situation of the place did manifestly concur. For Italy in a spacious Tract of ground extending it self from the Borders of Liguria between two Seas is separated onely by a narrow Frith from the Sicilian shore, and doubtless these two Countries were formerly joyn'd: but afterwards the Sea running between parted them, whether it were that the Country lying lower on that side was overwhelm'd by the Sea, or else that some violent Earthquake, or the impetuous rushing in of the Waters broke through the Isthmus; from which event it may be, they call it Rhegium: for so the Grecians express those things that are broken off. Hence it is very probable, that Sicily was at first peopled from Italy: which conjecture the very name seems to confirm. For the Opiques are said to have built Messina, a Town lying opposite to the Italian shore: which I suppose, they call'd Sicily, because it was built in a Bay resembling the Figure of a Sickle; which the Grecians arriving thither afterwards translated Zancle, these two words signifying the same thing in the several Languages.

XXII. Hence the whole Island (as it usually happens) came to be so named: for some call it Zancle, but most Sicily. Now this Isle as well for greatness as fruitfulness far exceeds all those of the Mediterranean Sea, incredibly abounding with Oil, Wine, and Corn of the best, being well peopled, and admirably adorn'd with many and those very great Towns: but in respect of convenient Harbours and situation, there's no place in the World fitter to such as design the erection and establishment of an Empire; for joining on one side to Italy, it has Africa on the opposite: Sardinia also lies on another side of it, and Eastward it is separated from Morea and the parts of Greece by the Ionian: to all which places round the Voyage is but short: and for Ships to ride in and out at, there is no place more safe and commodious; and the truth on't is, a desire to become Masters of this Isle, which the Romans and Carthaginians, at the same time affected, gave occasion to the War; tho' other things were pretended: for the Romans alledged the assistance given the Tarentines contrary to the League, and the Carthaginians quarrelled at the Alliance with Hiero as made against them.

XXIII. But now both Nations were arrived to such prowess, that they must of necessity fall out sometimes for one thing or other. For as Trees planted at a small distance asunder for a while interfere not with one another; but being grown up intercept one anothers nourishment and juice: and when they are arrived to their full growth and proportion, then they mutually consume and starve one another root and branch. So rising Empires scarce ever hold correspondence longer than till the intervening Land of Union is worn out, and both Nations joyn'd, clash and jumble together: being neither of them capable of fixing within their former bounds, nor yet free to extend themselves to a greater bulk and dimension, till all impediments are removed.

To these reasons we may add the great influence of the Commons, and their eager desires to have a War, in both States. For in that of Carthage the Commonalty bore a great sway, and because upon the growth of their national Power and Riches, they were wont also to enrich themselves by several ways of gain and advantage, allured by the sweets thereof they were well enough content to have one War upon the neck of the other. Nor indeed was the State or the Roman Commons much different from this; who being in hopes to retrieve their private damages sustained in the former War, by the Riches of Sicily, in compensation of a priviledg extorted from the Senate, confirm'd such Votes as pass'd for the War, by an Order of their own; with which Power the Consul Appius being armed, whilst the major part of the Senate already assented, the rest complying now notwithstanding all their scruples and boggings, immediately dispatches C. Claudius a Tribune of Soldiers with some few Ships, and commanded him to wait an opportunity, and if any happen'd, to pass over into Sicily. When he was arrived at Rhegium, he durst not venture out with his Gallies to Sea because the passage was guarded by a very strong Fleet of the Carthaginians. However, he himself gets into a Fisher-boat and so pass'd over; where having conferred with the Mamertines concerning the present state of Affairs, but availing little by his Negotiation whilst the Carthaginians still oppos'd him, he return'd without any manner of success. But a while after when it was known that the Mamertines bandied into parties, whilst some oppos'd the calling in of the Romans, and most were disgusted at the Carthaginian Garison, having repass'd the Sea, among other things proper to the business on foot, he insist'd mainly on this point, "That he was come onely to deliver the Town; and when he had so done, he would immediately depart."

XXV. "When the Carthaginians reply'd thereunto, that the Romans need not be at any trouble to set free a place, that was already so; and that by the Arms of the Carthaginians provision had been made, whereby the Mamertines were secured from becoming Vassals to the Syracusans; therefore the Romans would do well to be gone, or else declare, if they had any other just cause to be at Messina. Claudius denies that that City could be thought free, wherein a Garison of Foreigners was resident against the Burgers wills. To which when no answer was made: the Carthaginians out of disdain and the Mamertines for fear holding their Tongues, says this politick and quick-witted Man: "'Tis manifest by this your silence, that the cause of the Carthaginians is unjust, and that the Mamertines are desirous of liberty: for were it otherwise, they would not be loth to speak concerning their own Right, and to justify their proceedings; and these without dissembling the matter, dig they consent to the Carthaginians, would openly and avowedly approve what they do."

XXVI. At this the Mamertines humming, and the major part of them applauding his Speech as true, and agreeing with their own thoughts and judgments, the Roman for the present thinking he had proceeded far enough in the point, having felt their pulses, and founded the tempers of their minds, return'd to Rhegium; and not long after having equipp'd those Gallies that were with him, attempted to pass over: but coming far short of the Carthaginian Commanders both for number of Ships, and skill in Navigation; and moreover, being driven back by the violence of the Tide, which was then vehemently rais'd by a sudden Tempest, he return'd from whence he set out, with the loss of some of his Gallies, and hardly saving the rest. But not daunted with this cross event, but desiring to try again his fortune at a better season, he refitted his Gallies: when in the mean while Messengers came from Hanno (the Governour of the Garison of Messina, and Commander in chief over all the Fleet in those Streights) bringing with them all the men and shipping which had been taken in the former Battel by the Carthaginians. This Hanno did, being minded to lay the fault of violating the Peace upon the Romans: and complaining of the attempt made by the Romans to force their passage over a Sea under the Carthaginian jurisdiction, pressed them to a stricter observation of the Peace for the future.

XXVII. But understanding that Claudius would admit of no Conditions, till the Garison were drawn out of Messina, and that he intended again to pass over, he cry'd out in a rage, "That he would not suffer the Romans so much as to wash their hands in that Sea: nevertheless he could not hinder it, but that Claudius having observed the course of the Tide, and taken an opportunity when the Wind blowing very commodiously further'd the reflux of the Water got to Sicily, before he could be met withal. And there having assembled as many of the Mamertines as were in the Port, he persuaded them to send for Hanno, as if they intended to advise and deliberate with him upon the present state of Affairs: for Hanno suspecting the mutinous Spirits of the Burgers, had with his Men possess'd himself of the Citadel, neither durst he venture his person among the Mamertines. But yet lest this should provoke and irritate them the more against him, he came to the conference, which being protracted in debates a long while, at last the Romans seized upon Hanno, and threw him into Prison, the Mamertines approving what was done. Thus being circumvented partly by treachery, and partly by terrour, seeing there were no other terms allowed him, drew the Garison out of Messina, delivering the Citadel into the hands of the Mamertines.

The

The Carthaginians hearing this were much enraged at it: and whereas at other times they usually punished their Commanders for their ill conduct, though never so fortunately succeeding, now accusing both the folly and cowardise of Hanno, they crucified the poor man: and forthwith order'd their Forces by Sea and Land to move towards Messina, having sent another Hanno the Son of Hannibal to command in Sicily: Who having rendezvouz'd his Forces at Lilybeum proceeded forward to Selinus, and encamping there, left the Infantry behind him, whilst he himself goes to Agrigentum, and having fortified the Citadel, persuades this People being Allies to Carthage, to come and enter into an Association of Arms against the Romans. Afterwards, when he was returned into his Camp, Ambassadors came to him from Hiero, who also did not well relish the arrival of these new Guests into Sicily, and thought it now the most convenient time with the conjunction of the Punic Forces to expel the Romans, and the barbarous Inhabitants of Messina quite out of the Island.

In order hereunto, he enters into a Conference with the Carthaginian General, and both of them having miscarry'd heretofore in their design upon Messina, easily concluded an Alliance against the Romans, equally mischievous to them both; by which it was agreed, that Messina should be besieged by their joint-forces, and that none should be permitted to live in Sicily, which were not Subjects either of the Syracusans or Carthaginians. Hereupon the Punic General having sent before him a Herald to command the Romans, "As they valued their Peace with Carthage to quit Messina, and within a set-time to depart the Island of Sicily; advanced with his whole Army against the Mamertines. The Fleet was order'd to keep Guard near Pelorus: the Infantry intrench'd themselves at Etna [the Beds] a place not far distant from Messina. Hiero likewise came according to agreement, and encamp'd on the other side of the Town near the Chalcidic Hill. Thus the Town was beleaguerr'd on all quarters, so that no supply of men or provision could be sent into it either by Sea or Land.

The Carthaginians, when their Herald at the same time return'd without tidings of Peace from Messina, moved partly with anger and partly with distrust, barbarously slew all such Italians as bore Arms amongst them. The news of these Actions being brought to Rome, the Consul Appius marching outright at the head of a stout Army, arrived at Rhegium, from whence having dispatch'd some persons before-hand to expostulate with Hiero and the Carthaginians about raising the Siege; he began to consider, and diligently examin by what means, now the Carthaginians so narrowly watch'd and block'd up the Strait, he might pass it with the least danger and inconvenience. The Consul's Ambassadors received no amicable Answer from the Carthaginians, and Hiero reprimanded them in a very smart Speech, and recounting the kindnesses he had done the Roman people, spoke to this effect:

"I am at a loss, O Romans, whether I should more bewail, your or my own condition! for I indeed have lost Friends, which prov'd worse than I had thought: but you have lost the credit of that Faith, and Fidelity, which made you so famous in the World. With the Mamertines you never had Friendship or Alliance, but you were Leagu'd with the Carthaginians long ago, and of late with me also. Now that you are minded to break these Leagues for the sake of others no ways relating to you, tell me if you can, for what injury of ours, or for what merit of the Mamertines ye do this? but because the Carthaginians are able enough to plead for themselves, I shall wholly wave their Cause, and at present onely mention such points as concern my own particular. The Mamertines, those honest Countrymen of yours, when (as you know) they had receiv'd pay in the service of the Syracusans; being dismissed to return into Italy, at Messina where they had been hospitably treated by the poor credulous Messinians, committed one of the most barbarous acts that ever was known since the memory of Man. For against all the Laws of hospitality they assassinated them by Night, and seiz'd on their Wives, Children, Goods, and their Town it self; which had not you as well as the rest of mankind refented as a cur'd intolerable piece of Villany, you would not certainly have punished so severely the same Crime in the persons of these, who copy'd the Mamertines Example in their cruelty against the Rhegians."

"The same indignity wherewith you were moved to punish those Villains, moves me likewise to do the same with the Mamertines, especially when they have since by pillaging all Sicily over as it were antiquated the memory of their former Crime, which is almost outdone by those of later date. For to pass by other things, the Cities of Camarina and Gela rifled by them, when these were under the Syracusans protection, seem to me a just ground, why I should prosecute these bold lawless Villains by a pious and religious War. But if you pretend that you must protect them, because being born in the same Country, they seem to be your Kindred; how much more equitable would it have been then to spare the Italians of Rhegium, who had been your Fellow-Citizens? In recovering which place from these Traitors hands, when I assisted you with Men and Ammunition, ought I ever to imagine, that you would hinder me, who am now besieging Messina, upon as good pretensions as any you had to shew? But what need I enlarge, O Romans! For if you have any care of your Faith and Reputation, any sense of honesty and justice; in fine, if there be any shame remaining in you, I need not doubt but you will assist rather than hinder me, whilst I now take Arms in so just a Cause; but if you slight these, the event of War indeed is doubtful; but this is most certain, that the World will plainly see, it is not any colour of Justice or Equity, nor any injuries receiv'd, which they themselves cannot pretend, nor also any pity to the Mamertines, but onely ambition to enlarge their Empire by the Conquest of this noble Isle, which incites the Romans to make this War."

When this Message had been deliver'd by the Ambassadors, Appius foreseeing there was no crossing the Strait without great danger, whilst a strong Fleet guarded, and observ'd the passage, contrives this cunning Stratagem. He professes, "That he was not for having any breach between Hiero and the Romans: Nay moreover, that this War was neither intended upon Hiero, nor could it be carried on without the consent of the People. Therefore at a day prefix'd, he commands all the Mariners to be ready and to put the Fleet in order to sail, making as if he were to return home. For he knew that several Soldiers both of the Syracusans and the Carthaginians, were then in the quality of Merchants trafficking in the Port of Rhegium: who, thought he, will carry this Report soon enough to those, who are chiefly design'd to be inform'd thereby. And as he had fore-cast'd, so it happen'd. For when the whole Fleet putting to Sea in a clear day, he had begun to steer his course near the Italian shore: the Carthaginians who were posted for blocking up the Frith, left it open and unguarded, every one going where he pleas'd.

The Consul, who guess'd it would be so, at Night changing his course arriv'd with his whole Fleet in Sicily, whilst no man observ'd, much less resisted his passage in the dark. This Enterprize was hazardous and bold: for an Army of fresh-water Soldiers to embark in a Sea terrible of it self in the day-time, without out the fear of an Enemy, and that too in such unwieldy, awkward Vessels, and the thing was thought worthy to be transmitted to posterity by the monument of a new Name. For because the Consul in transporting the Soldiers had serv'd himself with some Vessels made of thick Planks judely clap'd together, he was named Caudex, according to the simplicity of that Age. For hitherto the Romans were such strangers to Marine Affairs, that they had not one Vessel with Decks and Hatches, nor any Bark, but they made use of Gallies of three banks of Oars and Pinnaces of fifty Oars, which they had borrowed of the Tarentines, Eleates, Locrians and Neapolitans.

XXXV. Appius, after he had landed near that Plain where the Syracusans were incamped, encouraging his men, boldly promising them a sure Victory, if they would surprize their Enemies, immediately puts forward to attack the Syracusans Camp; Hiero being rouz'd with this Alarm, marches out his men likewise, in as good order as the shortness of time would permit him to draw them up in. The fight continued very sharp for a long while, and the Roman Horse were beaten back, but the Legions fighting with great Valour forced Hiero fearfully to retire into his Camp, leaving the glory of the day to the Romans.

Appius having first order'd the Soldiers to strip the Enemy, enters Messana, and puts new life and vigour into the hearts of the Mamertines, after their late fears. But Hiero finding himself overcome ere he saw the Enemy (as he himself afterwards confessed) and suspecting the passage of the narrow Sea betray'd by the Carthaginians, was at a non-plus as to what course he had best take. He began to fear for the main Stake, and in the Still of the Night following march'd out of his Camp, and continuing his Journey retreat-ed to Syracuse.

XXXVI. When he was departed, Appius to improve the terror of his late Victory to the Conquest of the Carthaginians, commands his Soldiers to take some refreshment in time, and marching out at break of day, he resolv'd to attack the Carthaginians in their Camp. They were posted in a very advantageous place, and their Camp was strengthen'd by Nature as well as Art, for the Sea lay on one side of them, and deep Morasses on the other in the form of a Peninsula. The narrow space where the place was only accessible was walled in to hinder the assaults of the Enemy, against which the Roman Soldiers made an attack, but the situation of the place disadvantageous to them, and the multitude of the Defendants, render'd all ineffectual: for the Carthaginians fought with Darts, as is usual in Sieges, wherewith they gall'd the Romans so that they were forced to retire without success. But oftentimes misfortunes in Wars are but the Prologues to good success; whilst those that have suffer'd loss, endeavour by their conduct and courage to repair the same; but the Enemies bewitch'd with a false Opinion of their present happiness, are rash and precipitous, wholly neglecting to arm themselves against casualties.

XXXVII. This happen'd at that time to the Carthaginians, who not content to have repuls'd the Enemy from their Camp must needs pursue him, and fall out of their Lines and Works: fondly imagining that it was their Valour, and not the strength of their fortifications which had beaten the Romans. But when they had got out of that Streight, wherein they were secur'd, the fortune of the Battel alter'd with the place, and a great number of them was slain, the rest fled away, some into the Camp, and some (as they could shift best for themselves) into the circumjacent Towns. Nor durst they thenceforwards stir abroad out of their Post, during Claudius's stay at Messana. The Consul likewise by reason of the difficulty of the place, and its uneasy access, concluding it unadvisable to fight again, not to lose any more time there, makes an in-road into the borders of the Syracusans and the Allies, leaving a Garison at Messina, and when he had wasted the Country without any opposition, he was so encouraged thereby as to venture with his Army forwards, and advance towards Syracuse it self. There they fought with variable fortune: and the Consul himself was once in great danger, and had been incamp'd by the Enemies, unless he had prevented it in time by sending to Hiero one of his Confidants, to treat with him. Hiero likewise sent one of his Friends. And so the Parley being begun and prolong'd on purpose, the Consul insensibly got out of this dangerous difficulty into a place of greater security. The Syracusans coming after held several Conferences with the Romans touching a Peace, and the thing had been concluded, if Hiero would have approv'd it.

XXXVIII. The best part of that year was spun out in these Treaties, and then the Consul return'd to Messana, and from thence, having left some Squadrons of men to defend the Mamertines, pass'd over with the rest to Rhegium: soon after he departed thence to his Triumph at Rome; which he celebrated with universal applause, for conquering Hiero and the Carthaginians; because that it was the first Triumph, which was obtain'd for the Conquest of transmarine Nations. This was the first time the Romans attempted any action by Sea, and this was the success of their Arms in Sicily. But yet these transactions, as also those that follow'd, have been mis-represented through the prejudice of the Historians, whilst the chief of them Philinus the Agrigentine, and Fabius Pictor the Roman, the one favouring the Carthaginians, the other his own Countrymen, preserv'd neither faith nor sincerity in their Histories.

XXXIX. These mens levity is justly taxed by Polybius. For if it be counted an execrable thing by a false evidence to trepan and circumvent a private Person, in matters of lesser moment: how much more heinous is an Historians fault, think you, thus to corrupt and falsifie the Actions of States and Princes? who ought in duty to prefer nothing, not life it self before the truth, being the more inexcusable, because he cannot have any pretence to tell a lye: who if upon any account he is barr'd from speaking truth, to the best of his knowledg, might then certainly have held his peace.

XL. But now whilst Claudius conquer'd Hiero and the Carthaginians, M. Fulvius the other Consul ended the Siege of the Volscinians, and by starving them reduc'd a People that would have been unconquerable by force, because of their desperation. Upon the surrender of the place, those insolent ungrateful Libertines were tortur'd to death: the City it self was demolish'd, and the rest of the Volscinians, with such Slaves as had been obedient to their Masters, went to those places of settlement which were assign'd to them. This War was likewise thought worthy of a Triumph, which the Consul celebrated as if it had been over the Volscinians, the first day of November. The same year Cn. Cornelius and C. Marcus the Censors perform'd the Lustration, 29224 Citizens were polled, a great number, and almost incredible to one that considers how many men were lost in the Wars, which from the first foundation of Rome hardly ever ceased: as also what multitudes of people were swept away by the Plague and other malignant distempers which caus'd as great mortality as the Wars. But yet by communicating the freedoms of their City to Strangers, a Policy constantly practis'd ever since the time of Romulus the Author thereof, the Commonwealth was render'd insuperable by any losses or calamities whatsoever. For neither could the soils and damages it receiv'd from Pyrrhus, nor the many Shipwracks in the first Punic War, nor could Thrasymen and Canne dash and weaken its strength; but after its losses it reviv'd and flourish'd more gloriously than before.

Whereas

Whereas in Greece those great Masters of Military Affairs and not inferior to the Romans, the Lacedaemonians, by reason of their prohibiting all Commerce with Strangers, could neither long maintain the Empire they had acquir'd, nor preserve their private liberty always: but when one thousand and no more Spartans fell in the Battel of Leuctra, the whole power of the City was broken by this one blow. Again, when at Sellasia six thousand of the Spartans had been kill'd, their whole liberty was lost also. But the Argives Inhabitants of the same Peloponnesus imparting the pivilidges of their community to all their Neighbours, and uniting them to their own selves erected a glorious well-form'd Republick, a Republick that would have lasted it out for many years, had not the madness of some few Hot-headed Fellows provok'd the Romans, who were then extending their Empire on every side, to the ruin of themselves and their Country too. Such diversities of events must needs follow from such different counsels and practices: for as it naturally follows, that a body refresh'd by wholesome nourishment to a just measure proves stronger and more long-liv'd, than the same would have been, if, content barely with its inward moisture, it had refus'd all kind of aliment from without; so those Cities have ever been more flourishing, which knew how to make anything their own which was excellent and praise-worthy, whatever Climate it was to be found in, than if they had follow'd the Manners of those people; who through an over-weening conceit of themselves, despise what is not of their own Countries growth, and thereby rob themselves of several fair supports and advantages both for the acquiring and the maintaining of their Power.

The same year first gave birth to a very barbarous Custom, afterwards immoderately practis'd; for to spill humane blood for the gratifying of any whiffing Fellow that was a looker on, arriv'd to be a publick pastime and diversion. The Authors of which inhumane butchery were M. and D. Junius Brutus, who to adorn and solemnize their deceased Fathers funerals with some strange and unheard of Rites and Devotions, set out a Match or Prize of Gladiators, which took nightly with the People. But the Pestilence reveng'd this injury done to Humanity, raging most violently for two years after, which upon consulting the Sibyls Books was found to be a judgment sent by the offended Deity to punish them. Therefore some suspicion arose that their Worship and religious ceremonies were not duly perform'd and observed, and the Pontiffs upon a stricter inquiry into the matter found several Temples and Chappels turned into private Tenelements, as also one of the Vestal Virgins (called Caparonia) guilty of Incest. But while her Indictment was a drawing up she prevented the Executioner by hanging her self; but he that debauched her and the servants that were privy to the fact, were punished according to Law. The Sacred Places were vindicated from all those abuses, whereby private persons had profan'd them: and restor'd to the use they were at first intended for. After this reformation of Religion in the City, the Senate began to apply themselves again to the Affairs of the Commonwealth. And because after the Conquest of Heturia there was no Enemy in Italy appearing, it was resolv'd that the new Consuls should pass over with the Legions into Sicily.

The Consuls were M. Valer. Maximus, killed during his Honour Messalla, and M. Octavius Crassus. These having luckily put over with their Forces into the Island, met afterwards a success answerable to so good a beginning; for having first taken the City of the Adranites after a short Siege by storm, whilst they sat down before Centurippum the Alesian Ambassadors arriv'd there, being sent to surrender their Town: From whence the Consuls taking their course into several parts of the Island, and acting with their Forces together, or separately as occasion required, spread the terror of their Arms into the most distant parts of the Land: routing the Syracusans and the Carthaginians, where-ever they met them. And so vigorous and easie was their Conquest, whilst they warmly pursu'd their good fortune, that a little while after no less than sixty seven Towns were reckon'd which had become subject to the Romans. Of which number were the Tauromenitans and Cataneans.

Upon which the Consuls daily encreasing their Armies by the addition of as many Auxiliary Troops as they pleas'd to demand, were encouraged to incamp before Syracuse it self, designing to invest that place. Hiero finding matters come to this pass, and on the one hand distrusting his own, and the Carthaginian Power, whilst on the other he took the Romans for the honestest Men, resolves himself also to enter into Alliance with the Romans, and accordingly sends Ambassadors with Instructions to conclude a Peace. The Romans were glad enough to dissolve the League between Hiero and the Carthaginians, chiefly because hereby their Legions would be better supplied with provisions: for no Victuals could be transported out of Italy, the Carthaginians being Masters of the Sea, and the Consul the year before had received more harm for want of provision, than from the Enemy. But now Hiero being on their side, the Territory of Syracuse so well stor'd with Provisions was likely to afford all necessaries for their Camp. Therefore they agreed upon these Articles:

“That whatsoever Places or Persons Hiero had taken from the Romans, he should restore them gratui, and withal pay one hundred Talents: That he should continue in an absolute possession of the City of Syracuse with all other places dependant thereupon, whereof Acrae, Leontium, Megara, Elorus, Nitini, and Tauromenium were the most considerable. Ambassadors afterwards coming from Hiero, the Articles were interchang'd, and reciprocally confirmed, and the Senate decreed that a Peace be concluded with Hiero, which a little after was ratified by the People upon Cn. Atilius Calatinus's proposing the business to them. This League at first being made but for fifteen years lasted ever after. Whilst Hiero accotied the Roman grandeur with just and suitable respect, and they likewise requited his kindnesses with as much generosity and bounty. So that neither had any cause to repent of the Alliance contracted between them.

When the report of the Peace with Syracuse was nois'd abroad, Hannibal the Carthaginian, having come as far as Asiphonia on purpose to raise the Siege of Syracuse, retreated more hastily than he had set forwards.

The Romans now having Hiero for their Ally and Associate in the War, without delay, took in several Towns of the Carthaginians; and though from Adrano, a walled Town, and Macella after a Siege of several days they had been repuls'd; yet they reduc'd the Segestantes, who having kill'd the Punic Garison, revolted to them of their own accord; besides other reasons, these gave out that they favour'd the Romans for Kindreds sake, deriving their pedigree too from Aeneas, who escap'd from the flames of Troy, and shortly after the Alienians join'd themselves to the Romans: but as for Hilarus, Tyritus and Afcelus, they were forced to batter and storm them: and therefore the conquered were more severely treated. At which terror the Tyndaritanes seeing themselves to be next the danger, and their Succours too far off, whilst they were considering about delivering up their Town to the Romans, were hinder'd by the Carthaginians: for they guessing from the present juncture at what was in agitation, carried away the principal Citizens to Lilybeum for Hostages, together with Corn, Wine, and other Ammunition.

XLVII. At this time the severe Discipline of Octavius Crassus the Consul was of great importance to the Public; for he order'd those Soldiers, who upon dishonourable terms of safety, had suffer'd themselves to be treated as Slaves by Hannibal, to post themselves without the Trenches, thus exposing them perpetually to the Incursions of their Enemies, so that having no hopes but in their Valour they might become resolute and bold, and learn to defend themselves rather by the gallantry of their Arms, than by the strength of their Camp. These things being done and the Winter was now approaching, the Consuls leaving their places garison'd which were most advantageous, return'd to Rome carrying the rest of the Army into Italy, where a Triumph was decreed to M. Valerius who had been most successful in the War: which he kept before the 16th of March, for the Conquest of Hiero King of Sicily and the Carthaginians. A Dial which was torn up among the Spoils was the more taken notice of, because such a thing had never been seen at Rome before. Valerius having carried it away after the taking of Catana, placed it in the open Street near the Rostra upon a Pillar. He also posted a Table wherein the Victory over the Syracusans and Carthaginians was painted, upon one side of the Curia Hostilia, which none ever did before him, but many after him: It is certain that this Man was surnam'd Messalla from the City of Messina, but I wonder it should be believed upon several considerable Authors testimonies, that this name was impos'd for the taking of that place, whereas the thing it self manifestly shews, that this name was therefore impos'd, because Messina, which upon Appian Claudius's departure was by the Carthaginians and Hiero sorely distress'd, was by him deliver'd by driving the silt away, and winning the latter to his side.

XLVIII. The City of Rome in the mean while being afflicted with the Pestilence, it was resolv'd that a Dictator should be nam'd to fasten the Nail. Cn. Fulvius Maximus Centumatus was declared Dictator: he chose Q. Marcius Philippus for his Lieutenant. The same year a Colony was brought to Efenia, as the year before there had been one planted at Firmum, and another, as some will have it, at Castellum.

A. U. L. Posthumus Megellus, and Q. Mamilius Vitulus were afterwards made Consuls, and both of them have 491. Sicily assign'd for their Province, but they had onely two Legions allotted them: this being judg'd a sufficient Army, now the War was become less burthenfom, upon Hiero's coming into the League; and as for Victuals they thought it might be easier provided, the fewer men were sent over.

XLIX. The Consuls with their Forces having arriv'd in Sicily, and drawn together the Auxiliary Bodies of their Allies, whilst they pass'd by places of lesser moment, convert'd their main effort upon Agrigentum resolving to besiege it. This place had been plentifully furnished with all necessaries by the Carthaginians, who intended it for their Head-Quarters. For when they saw that Hiero had left them, and that the Romans apply'd themselves in good earnest to the business of Sicily, concluding that more diligent preparations for the War were necessary to be made on their part also, they sent at first the best part of their present Forces into Sardinia, to lie in wait upon the Coast of Italy, that by this terror they might divert the Romans from Sicily, or at least oblige them to fight there with a smaller Army than they would have done. But the Romans being still strong enough both to defend their own, and to bring a fresh Army into Sicily, disappointed in these their hopes they hir'd great numbers of Soldiers out of Liguria and Gaul, and greater yet from Spain: and withal put a great quantity of provisions into Agrigentum; designing it for the Granary and Retreating-place of their Armies, as being a Town for its convenient Site and capaciousness fitted for that purpose above any other which they held in Sicily.

L. This place therefore being made the Scene of the present War, the Consuls having oblig'd the Carthaginians to retire within their Fortifications, incamp'd at a mile distance from thence. Corn was then ripe in the Fields; and because the Siege was like to be a long one, the Soldiers out of a desire to reap and gather in the Corn rovd farther than they should, when the Enemy lay so near them. And the Carthaginians cunningly laying hold of this opportunity had made great slaughters of them, but that the Roman Soldiers by their Valour had repair'd, whatever damage they had incur'd through their negligence. For the Foragers not being able to stand the sudden flock of the Enemy, the Carthaginians proceeded forwards to the very Tents of the Romans, and dividing their Forces some endeavour'd to ruin their Palisado, whilst the others fought with their out-Guards, that were posted for defence of the Camp. Then was the time, when strictness of Military Discipline rescu'd the Roman Army from hazard and destruction.

LI. For it being a capital Crime among the Romans for any man to desert his Station, the Guards entertaining no hopes of safety by flight, though they were for number much inferior to the Enemy, received them with great Valour, many of their own men being slain, and more of the Enemies, until the rest of the Army was drawn in Battalia to relieve them in this stress and difficulty. Hereupon the Enemy was routed on that side, and those who had almost taken their Trenches were circumvented, and the Romans chased the rest to the Walls of the Town.

This accident made the Romans for the future more cautious in the matter of foraging, and the Enemies more timorous to sally out. Their Recounters afterwards abating as to their vigour, whilst the Carthaginians made but seldom any excursion, and that onely for a brush, they thought it expedient to divide their Forces, and to attack the Town on two Quarters, on the one side of Esculapius's Temple, and the way that leads to Heraclea. Their Camp was intrench'd and fortified round towards the City to prevent Sallies, and on the other side for defence against Aggressors, and to stop up all Avenues whereby any provision might be convey'd into the Town. The space in the middle between the two Camps was fortified and guarded with several Courts of Guard.

LI. In all which Affairs they were much assisted and further'd by those Sicilians, who had lately sworn fealty to them: whereof there were now one hundred thousand on the Roman side. Provisions also were convey'd by the same persons to Erbesus, from which place (for it stood but a little way off) the Romans themselves afterwards fetch'd it into their Camp: insomuch that they had plenty thereof.

In this condition the Siege lasted almost five Months, whilst neither side having got any great advantage towards a Victory, (nothing but Skirmishes having pass'd between them) at length the Punic Affairs began to decline, for because a vast multitude, no less than fifty thousand men cooped up so long in one Town had consumed almost all their Provisions, and that no Recruits could be hoped for, the Romans diligently blocking and watching all the Avenues, the minds of the besieged what by their present evils, and what by the expectation of approaching miseries were mightily dismay'd.

Han-

Hannibal therefore the Son of Gisco (who was the Carthaginians chief Commander at Agrigentum) by frequent Messages craving help against their present scarcity and dangers, Hanno the Elder with some Soldiers afterwards levied, and Elephants, is sent over into Sicily to the number of fifty thousand Foot, six thousand Horse and sixty Elephants, who being arrived at Lilybeum with these Forces he march'd thence towards Heraclea, and immediately some came and offer'd to surrender Erbesus into his hands; and by their means having made himself Master of Erbesus, from whence till then Provisions us'd to be fetch'd to serve the Roman Camp, he seem'd to have achiev'd an Exploit of no small moment, whilst thus by debarring the Romans from all supplies, he incommoded them no less, than they did the Agrigentines. And now they had oftentimes consulted about raising the Siege, and once were in a manner resolv'd to quit the design as unfeasible, had not Hiero tying every way, by stealth convey'd some Corn and other necessaries into the Roman Camp, and thereby administred a little relief to their present wants, and necessities.

Hanno observing that the Romans were much afflicted with Famine, and other maladies that attended it; whilst on the contrary his Army was strong and healthy, resolv'd to approach nearer to them, and to try the fortune of a Battel, if he should have an opportunity for the same. Taking therefore along with him fifty Elephants and the rest of the Army he marches out of Heraclea, and sends the Numidian Horse to Scout before the Romans Camp, thereby to decoy their Horse, and drill them on into an Ambush laid for them. When the Numidians, as they were order'd, contemptuously rode up to the Consul's Camp; the Romans sallied forth, and routed them, at the first making resistance, and afterwards pursu'd them upon high speed, as they were flying back disorderly that way by which they knew Hanno was coming. The further therefore they continued this pursuit, their retreat to their own Camp was made the more difficult, and many of them were slain, when they were met with by fresh Forces, and that those, who fled before, wheel'd about to inclose them.

This Event rais'd in Hanno great hopes of an intire Victory, and thereupon he posted his Army upon an Eminence, called Torus, at a Mile and a halfs distance from the Roman Camp. It might have been expected, that two such great Armies so near to one another should have join'd Battel sooner, which was defer'd the longer, because both sides were afraid to venture all upon the fortune of one Battel. Therefore whilst Hanno seem'd more desirous to fight, the Romans stir'd not out of their strong Holds, because the Enemy was numerous, and elevated with success, and therefore an over-match to a people cow'd and terrified with the loss of their Cavalry. But when they found that because of their timidity the Spirits of their Allies began to flag, and the Enemy to take heart upon it, and withal that they were like to wage a sorer War with their hungry stomachs than with the Enemy, they resolv'd to fight. Hanno upon this began likewise to draw back and flinch, and to fear every thing.

Two Months were spent in this manner, whilst besides some Skirmishes which pass'd daily, no action of greater moment was performed. At last upon the frequent importunities of Hannibal, who sent Messengers daily, and also gave signs often by fire, how that the besieged could no longer subsist for want of Victuals, and that many ran over to the Enemy being forced by the scarcity, he resolv'd to put off the Battel no longer: Hannibal also being order'd to sally out with his men at the same time; which when the Consuls understood, they kept quiet within their Camp. Hanno upon this began more boldly to brave them with his Army in Battalia, and when none durst oppose him, to advance to the Romans Lines and Trenches desying them to fight him, and upbraiding them with cowardice for not venturing. They being contented to have repuls'd the Enemy by light Skirmishes from their Palisadoes, neither oppos'd them with their Army in order of Battel; nor went in pursuit of them when they retir'd. Thus having done for several days, and the Carthaginians being now grown confident that the Romans durst venture no further, L. Posthumus the Consul wisely turn'd the Enemies contempt to his own advantage; for having very silently put his men in array, and keeping them within the Trenches, he sent out some small detachments to drive away the Carthaginians who attack'd them as they were wont: and by light Skirmishes and Combars kept them in play from break of day till six a Clock. Then at last when the Enemies retreated, he pour'd the Legions out of his Camp upon them.

Hanno, though he saw he must fight contrary to his judgment, boldly engag'd the Enemy, so that the Battel continued doubtful till the Evening; but the Romans having refresh'd themselves well with meat, and being prepar'd for the work could better endure thirst, heat and labour; whereas the Carthaginians by standing, and hunger being tir'd before the Battel began, made the fainter resistance, their strength still decaying, the longer the Battel continued, till at last the Mercenaries, who made the Vanguard, could no longer sustain the Shock: nor did they onely quit their ground, but retiring fearfully among the Elephants and the other ranks behind them disorder'd the whole Army, and forced them to fly before the Enemy, who bore up stily upon them. Matters likewise fell out luckily, on the other side of the Camp at the same time, and Hannibal after a Sally made more to his own than his Enemies damage, was beaten back into the Town. The Carthaginians Camp was taken, three Elephants wounded, thirty kill'd, and eleven taken by the Romans. The men far'd much alike: Of so great an Army but very few elcaped with the General to Heraclea.

The besieged after this blow not seeing any prospect of Relief, but being hopeless of safety, were affected with great consternation; when Hannibal (making the best of a bad Market) having observed that the Romans partly through the fatigues of labour, and partly through excess of joy were grown more lazy and remiss in keeping Guards, got out of the Town with the Mercenaries: and having thrown some hurdles filled with straw, and prepar'd beforehand into the Ditch, pass'd over, and got pretty far on his Journey: till the Romans at break of day understanding what was done, overtook part of the Rear of his Army, and cut them off, but Hannibal with the rest saved themselves. The Agrigentines seeing themselves forsaken by the Carthaginians, cut off many of those who remained in the Town, partly for anger, and partly to ingratiate themselves with the Conquerour: and yet for all this the Town was plunder'd, and above twenty five thousand Freeman sold for Slaves. After this manner was Agrigentum taken after seven Months Siege, to the great glory and advantage of the Romans, but yet with great effusion of blood; for above thirty thousand of the Consular Armies and the Auxiliaries by fundry fates perished during that Siege: for which reason as also because no great action could be undertaken for the Winters near approaching, they return'd to Messina.

LIX. The next year after L. Valerius Flaccus, and T. Otacilius Crassus, being Consuls, went Commanders into Sicily. The former Generals in hopes of a Triumph returning to Rome. The Carthaginians by sending out a Fleet in shew as it were to cruise upon the Coast of Italy, thought to divert the new Consuls from going in hand with the Sicilian Expedition; but they placing several Companies of Soldiers along the Coast to hinder the Enemies descent, put over notwithstanding into the Island.

LX. Then there were many Towns of Sicily which surrendered, being terrified by the late Example of the destruction of Agrigentum; nor did the Carthaginians withstand them, being besides their late defeat, perplex'd also upon the account of the seditious humours of their mercenary Soldiers. The Gauls especially mutinying for some months Arrears due unto them. To be reveng'd of whom Hanno contriv'd this cunning Plot; pacifying them with fair words he bad them be quiet a little while, and tells them withal, that he had in his Eye a certain rich City, of whose Conquest he was every day surer: and out of the booty thereof, he passes his word that the Gauls should be abundantly satisfied for the delay of their payment. Being thus amus'd, and even ready to conn him thanks, at a convenient time he practises with a Steward of his, in whom he reposed great confidence, that he should go in the form of a Renegade to Consul Otacilius, as if he had falsify'd and imbezled his Accounts, and inform him that the Night following four thousand Gauls were to take possession of Entella, which was to be betray'd unto them, and might be circumvented by Ambush. The Consul looking on it as a thing worth the taking notice of, though he could not trust the defectors word, yet detaches out a party of choice Men for the business. The Gauls likewise deceiv'd by Hanno came on: whom the Romans attack'd, and there arose a sharp Combat, wherein all the Gauls being slain, whilst they were resolv'd to sell their lives as dear as they could, brought double joy to Hanno, who cunningly chafed the insolence of his Mercenaries, and that with no small damage to the Enemy.

LXI. About this time the Praetor Minucius prefer'd a Bill to the Senate about bringing the Water of the River Anienis into the City, the charge of which Work the Censor M. Curius had undertaken to defray before out of the booty taken from the Enemy; but there arose several hindrances, which made the business to be defer'd for nine years after, when the matter was revived again, and Curius, and Fulvius Flaccus were made Surveyors of the Work: but Curius dying within five days after left the glory of finishing it solely to Fulvius.

About the same time Hamilear came from Carthage to Sicily to succeed Hanno: for when Hanno after his defeat at Agrigentum return'd home, he fell into great disgrace among the Carthaginians, who after they had set six thousand Crowns fine upon his head, took away his Commission of General. That this Hamilear was the Father of Hannibal, who commanded in the following Punic War, has been deliver'd falsely by some, who were mistaken through the likeness of their names. For Hamilear the Father of Hannibal in the latter end of that War came in his younger days Generalissimo into Sicily. But such was the Renown of the Man, that the acts of another Hamilear an obscure Person were ascribed to Barca Hamilear the famouslest of any that was ever known by that Name.

This Hamilear, the Successor of Hanno, seeing the Romans far Superiour to him in Foot durst not attempt any of the mid-land Towns, nor descend from the Mountains into the Champaign Country, but being strong in Shipping, whereby he became absolute Master of the Sea, with that part of his Forces he was very active, and having sent another Hamilear to wait the Coast of Italy, himself cruising about Sicily easily recover'd most of the Maritime places, which had submitted to the Romans. So that whilst the Romans easily conquer'd and defended those places, which lay farther up in the Country, and the Carthaginians those on the Sea-coasts, their hopes and fears were counterpoised; nor could it easily be judg'd, which side should get the better on't in the War.

DECADE II. BOOK XVII.

Florus his Epitome of the Seventeenth Book of Livy.

Cn. Cornelius the Consul circumvented by the punick Fleet, and wheedled out under colour of a Parley, is treacherously taken Prisoner. C. Duilius the Consul had an Engagement with the said Fleet and beat them, being the first Roman that ever Triumph'd for a Victory at Sea. For which reason he had the Honour as long as he liv'd, when he went from Supper, to have Musick and a lighted Flambeau carried before him. L. Cornelius the Consul overthrows the Sardinians and Corsicans, and Hanno the Carthaginian General. The Consul Attilius Calatinus, having rashly drawn his Army into a very disadvantageous place where they were surrounded by the Carthaginians, is brought off by the Courage and diligence of M. Calphurnius one of his Colonels, who with a Regiment of three hundred Foot desperately sallied out and diverted the Enemy. Whilst the Army made their escape, Annibal a Carthaginian Admiral having lost the greatest part of his Fleet in an Engagement, is by his own men crucified.

II. NOW the fourth year of the Carthaginian War was ended, nor had the Romans any cause either to repent at either their courage or fortune. For in all the Battels they fought, either with the Carthaginians or Syracusans, they came off victorious; they had taken some rich places by Storm; others surrendered themselves unto them upon Articles: but when the War was waged in the Island, and that neither provisions of Victuals, nor recruits of Men could be conveyed thither to serve the turn, and also that the Carthaginian Navies by their sudden and free descents, nor only infested the Sicilian Towns next the Sea, being themselves out of all harms-way, but also by wasting the Coast of Italy endamag'd the Roman Territories, and lessen'd their reputation in the World; whilst in the interim Africa was free from hauns and and exempt from all the calamities and pressures of War. The Nobility therefore and Commons of Rome, having duly deliberated upon the matter, made an Ordinance for building a Navy, that so they might be in a posture not enely to fight with the Carthaginians by Land, as they began, but likewise try their fortune by Sea.

This was the first time the Romans set their minds in good earnest to the business of Shipping: which as they boldly undertook, so they no less prosperously accomplished. So that it might be justly said, That the Romans might challenge the Empire of the World as their due: who when they were to fight with the most experienc'd Seamen wanted neither Courage to essay, Prudence to manage, nor Resolution to go through with the Work. For although till then the Romans were such strangers to the Maritime Affairs, that they had not one Man among them who had ever seen a Sea-fight, no Ships of War, nor any skilful Shipwrights; yet resolutely applying themselves to the point they soon put out to Sea, fought and overcame those who for many Ages had been counted the most experienc'd Seamen.

The Persons constituted Supervisors for the building of the Ships were Luc. Cornelius, Scipio Asina, and C. Duilius who had newly entred upon their Consulships. They had one Galley of five banks of Oars, which when Claudius was upon his passage cross the Streight, out of an eager desire to fight had drawn too near shore, and ran aground in the shallow Water. So that the Soldiers that were upon the Land took it. The Consul order'd that the whole Armada should be built after the form of that Vessel, and they ply'd the work so closely that within sixty days after the felling of the Timber a Navy of one hundred and sixty Vessels lay at Anchor: nor did the Consuls set forwards this Expedition with less cunning, than industry. For judging it unadvisable to hazard a Battel with unskilful Rowers, and likewise being unwilling to have the time of action taken up in exercising them; they found out a device, which at first sight may seem ridiculous, but in the event it proved very commendable. For while the Vessels were building, the Rowers were taught to handle the Oar sitting upon the dry Land, being seated in the same ranks as if they were aboard the Gallies, with the Boatswain sitting in the middle they were commanded as he gave the word, either to pluck at the Oars or to rest, as they do at Sea. By which prelufory exercise they arrived to so much skill, that afterwards, the Gallies being launch'd, when they had given some Specimens of their Art in the Work it self the Consuls now confided in them, and ventur'd their own and the lives of their men in their hands.

Afterwards, when the lots for the Provinces had been drawn, the command of the Land-forces fell to Duilius's share, and that of the Fleet to Cn. Cornelius, who taking with him seventeen Gallies went to Messana to provide necessaries against the arrival of the Fleet, which he commanded to follow as fast as it could: but before the Fleet could enter the Streight he fell into the Enemies hands. This was effected partly through the policy of one Boodes Lieutenant to Hannibal the Carthaginian General, and partly through the Consuls credulity, who believing some Lipareans suborn'd by the Enemy rashly conceived hopes of taking Lipara by treachery. There being hemm'd in by the Punic Fleet he resolv'd to fight his way through them: had not Boodes by another trick enticed him and the Officers to come aboard his Ship, pretending to treat about Conditions of Peace with the Carthaginians. As soon as they were come, they were put in Chains, which so terrified the rest that they yielded themselves to the Enemy without striking a stroke, and Boodes having taken all the Ships sent the Captives to Carthage.

The Carthaginian General afterwards committed such another mistake, which was therefore the more infamous, because the Consuls oversight by so late an Example might have taught him more wit. He had been inform'd that the Roman Fleet sailing along the Coast of Italy was on its way towards the Streights, and that now it could not be far off. Willing therefore to view the Fleet at a near distance, and to inform himself of the number of the Ships and the Romans skill and dexterity in this new Trade, he put forwards with fifty Gallies: and thinking himself secure of future events, his Navy riding in a confused manner, as is usual, when there is no danger within ken, he fell in suddenly with the Roman Fleet, sailing in good order at the point of a Promontory: so that he was routed before he had prepared himself to fight; and having lost the best part of the Fleet he had much ado to escape, having been reduc'd to the utmost danger. The Fleet that had got the Victory, having heard of Cornelius's misfortune, sent Messengers to Duilius to inform him of their arrival, and withal made themselves ready for the Battel; for they had intelligence that the rest of the Carthaginian Fleet was riding near them. There whilst they seriously considered the inconveniences of their own Ships, which being ill contriv'd and built after a bungling manner could not compare with the Carthaginian Gallies for swiftness, one of them devised a certain Engine to hold fast Ships, called afterwards a Crow.

The form of it was thus; There was a round strait piece of Wood four fathom long, and nine inches thick with a Pulley at the end of it, fastned to the Prow of the Vessel, to which was fitted another Engine Scala made of several cros boards, strongly nailed together. In this Engine there was left an oblong hole, through which it was to be clap'd upon the Beam and so fastned to it, for the space of sixteen foot the length of the Beam: but the rest of the Engine that was not joyn'd to the Beam, being about eight foot hung as it were by certain joints, so that it could be easily lifted up and let down upon occasion: At the end of this Engine there was fasten'd a very strong sharp piece of Iron, with a ring at the head of it; from which a Rope was tied that reached through the Pulley, and so to the Deck. Now when they pulled the Rope to them, the Engine was raised, when they let it go, it fell down, fastening with its sharp claws, and grappling fast whatever it laid hold of.

Mean while Duilius leaving his Land-forces with the Tribunes arriv'd with the Fleet: and understanding that the Country round about Myle had been wasted by the Enemy he made to shore with the whole Fleet. The Carthaginians were glad of this, promising themselves sure Victory against Mid-landers, and no Seamen. But they became Examples to instruct Men, that no Enemy ought so much to be despis'd as to render any one less cautious and wary in dealing with them.

Hannibal Captain General of the Gallies, who led his Forces from Agrigentum, was aboard a seven Oar'd Galley of King Pyrrhus; the rest of the Fleet followed her: not in Squadrons and order of Battel, but every one made up towards the Enemy with eager haste, through contempt of them. When they were got nearer, and saw the Prows of the Ships armed with those terrible Engines, they stood still for a while wondering at the novelty of the sight. But at length, whilst the forwardest of those senseless fellows per'd and scoff'd that ill-favour'd device, the foremost Vessels advanc'd very furiously. When the Crow being suddenly let down, where they lighted upon any Ship, pierc'd the boards through, so that the Ship was not able to move, but stood still. The Roman Soldiers, if it so happen'd that the Vessels fels were grapp'd on the sides, pushed forward and from every quarter boarded the Enemy: but when the Prows were onely seiz'd upon, by the Beam and the Bridg adjoining two Soldiers pass'd over, and that the more easily, because the ledges of the Engine standing knee-high afforded safer going and safer footing. For the foremost holding their Targets before them defended their Faces from the Enemies Darts; those that followed behind on either hand held their Targets even to the ledges of the Engine: Thus their sides being defended, they attacked the Enemy hand to hand; so that there was no tilting of Peaks one against the other, but they fought as it were a pitch'd Battel, and each man flood his ground. And hence it was that the Romans being the stronger men, easily obtained the Victory over light-armed Soldiers, who trusted to the swiftness of their Ships, more than to their Arms.

IX. There were about thirty Gallies of the Carthaginians taken, among which the Admiral with seven banks of Oars was one. But Hannibal having leap'd out of the Gallie which was just then taken into the Long-boat, escap'd falling into the Enemies hands, and having dispatch'd an express post-hast to Carthage, that might outgo the very fame of this defeat, cunningly ward'd off the punishment that hung over his head for his ill-success. For the Messenger entering into the Council-Chamber, as if all was well, consulted the Senate, whether they thought fit they should encounter the Roman Fleet. To which when all answer'd, that they must do so, and that too out of hand, says he, he has done so already and has come off by the worst. Thus whil't they durst not accuse an action, which before it was done, every man seem'd to approve, the General was clear'd from all capital punishment, losing onely his Commission of Captain of the Gallies.

X. But after the Generals defeat the rest of the Carthaginian Fleet (for the greatest part by far remain'd) were at a stand as to what they should do. They could not in honour quit the Battel, having receiv'd no loss, and not one man urging and pressing upon them. Again to attempt the Roman Gallies seem'd hazardous for fear of their Crows. At length coming up in a half-Moon, and trying all their tricks, when they saw the beaks of the Gallies with those terrible Engines on every side planted against them, they fell off, and bad adieu to all hopes of Victory. Of the Carthaginian Fleet fourteen Vessels are said to have been sunk in that engagement, and thirty one taken with seven thousand men, after that three thousand had dy'd in the Battel.

Thus fought Duilius the Consul, near the Isles of Lipara, against the Carthaginians, from whence the Romans reap'd some advantage, but more glory and renown. The Consul with the Land-forces march'd to Segesta, which he deliver'd, after it had been reduc'd by the Carthaginians to the utmost danger. Then he took Macilla by storm, Hamilcar not daring to oppose him; and having encourag'd and assur'd the Confederate Towns of Sicily, in the end of Summer return'd to Rome.

XI. At whose departure the Punic Affairs began to revive again. For first the Romans having lost a great many men were forc'd to raise the Siege of Messana after seven Months. Afterwards upon a feud arising between them and the Auxiliaries, when the Confederate Forces had encamped apart from the Legions between Paropus and Thermae, Hamilcar resolving to make his advantage of their humourous temper, in a sudden Assault slew about four thousand of them, and the grofs of the Roman Army was like to have been involv'd in the same ruin. Then it was that Hannibal won several Towns partly by force, and partly by treachery; which news though they were sorry to hear at Rome, yet these losses were esteem'd but inconsiderable if compar'd with their Victory at Sea. For whereas the Romans had hitherto onely signaliz'd themselves by their invincible courage in Land fights, they were very glad (and not without cause) that they had purchas'd so much glory and reputation in Maritime Affairs also. From whence they began to conceive great hopes of the success of the War: and judg'd the Author of so great an exploit worthy of unusual Honour.

XII. Duilius therefore first celebrated a Naval Triumph over the Sicilians and the Carthaginian Fleet the 24th day of February, and the State allow'd further, since not content with that Honour, he had himself assum'd another without any President for the same, that when he return'd from Supper, he should have Musick and Flambeaus to attend him home. There was also by an Order of the Senate, a Triumphal Arch of white Parian Marble adorn'd with beaks of Ships set up in the Forum, which is to be seen to this day, with an Inscription shewing the number of the Vessels sunk, and taken, and also what Money was taken: but time has defac'd several words. Nevertheless it is apparent enough, that there were thirty seven thousand Sesterces of Gold taken, of Silver coyn'd above one hundred thousand, of Brass two Millions and seven hundred thousand pounds.

XIII. This Solemnity ended, C. Duilius call'd an Assembly of the People, where L. Cornelius Scipio, C. Aquilius Florus are made Consuls; the Senate appointed the Provinces for the Consuls Sicily and the Navy. The Person that was to command at Sea, was permitted to put over into Sardinia, if he thought it advantageous for the Public; and when the Lot fell upon C. Cornelius he went out with the Fleet equipped in all points. This was the first Voyage the Romans ever made into Sardinia and Corsica.

These Isles are so nearly situated, that a man would think them both to be but one: but yet the nature of the Climate and Soil, and consequently the tempers of the people do very much differ. The Ancients call'd Sardinia, Ichnusa, for its resemblance to the print of a mans foot, as also Sandaliaria. Afterwards they say, that one Sardus the Son of Hercules the Lybien gave the Island, which he much frequented, the present name. The Poets also deliver, how that the Grecians with one Ariflaus, as likewise the Tyrians after the Trojan Wars came to those places. The Country for fruitfulness and bigness is not much inferior to the largest and fruitfulest of those Isles that lie in that Sea: being excellent for breeding Cattel, very fruitful in Corn, and rich in Mines, especially Silver; but yet it has no such good Air, and in the account of Strangers it loses much of the glory of its fertility by reason of the unhealthiness thereof: which in Summer is very unwholsom, especially in the rankett places.

XIV. Besides, it produces an herb like Mint, which is a strong Poison: and being eaten casts men into fits, and by a violent convulsion of the Nerves, causes such a distortion of the Mouth and Lips, as is seen in Laughter. The juice proves deadly, unless after vomiting some Milk and Metheglin be presently drank; for so the present force of the Poison is stop'd, and afterwards such Remedies cure the other ill effects of it, as are prescribed in Convulsion: there is also a little Creature there call'd Solpuga, which kills those who sit upon it ere they are aware: it is a kind of Emet, and does the mischief the more dangerously, because being such a very small thing, it cannot be seen: and those who are ignorant of the nature of it, are not afraid thereof when they see it. The Sardi are a medley of Barbarians, who if they are left to themselves, chuse rather to live by Robbery, than Husbandry. Their Arms are a Target and a short Sword.

For

For Armour they wear quilts made of the skins of those Rams which that Country breeds, being hairy like Goats, and not bearing Wool as others do. The Metropolis of the Country is Caralis, lying towards Africa, and peopled from thence; having an excellent Harbour.

XV. Corsica is neither for bigness nor Riches comparable to Sardinia, yet among those Islands, it is suppos'd to obtain the third place for magnitude. The Inhabitants say, that it had its name from a certain Woman named Corfa, from whose Herd a Bull pass'd over out of Liguria into this Isle: by the Greeks it is called Cyrnus. It is mountainous, rugged, and in many places unpassable: and consequently breeds a People void of all civility, and almost as savage as Brutes. When they are taken Prisoners they never become tractable, but either through impatience of labour and restraint make away with themselves, or else through their dulness and stubbornness become troublefom to their Masters. There is good store of Honey in the Island, but it is harsh of taste, and such as is made of Box-tree blossoms, which is counted very wholsom Honey, and it is thought that men in Corsica live long, because they generally use it. They have but few Towns, and those but ill stock'd with people, they reckon about thirty of them: the chiefest whereof are Aleria a Colony of Phoenicians, and Nicca of the Etrurians. The Air is here likewise foggy and unwholsom, and the Coast Harboursless.

XVI. With these Nations the Carthaginians warred a long while, and made themselves Masters of both the Islands, excepting such places as they could not come at: but because it was easier to conquer than civilize a headstrong barbarous People; among other devices they us'd to keep them under, they destroy'd all the Corn in the Country, whereby the Inhabitants might be forc'd to furnish themselves with provisions out of Africa, and made it death to any of them to sow any Corn again: till by long custom they were civiliz'd, and submitted themselves to the Yoke more patiently.

XVII. L. Cornelius then made an Expedition to these Islands: and first he took Aleria a Town in Corsica: and afterwards easily and without any danger over-ran all the rest. From thence as he was going for Sardinia, the Carthaginian Fleet met him, which the Consul attack'd and routed before they could come to close fighting. In the next place he march'd against Olbia; but finding the Carthaginian Fleet lying in the Port, and not judging himself strong enough in Foot to besiege a place so well fortified and garrison'd, he quitted that design for the present: and return'd homewards to take in more men.

XVIII. At the same time the Slaves design'd to make an Insurrection, which was fortunately quash'd in the first breaking out: and thereby freed the Commonwealth from that great trouble and disturbance which it was like to have created. There had been great numbers of Seamen press'd from the Countries lately conquer'd for the service of the Fleet, most of them Samnites. Now these being unwilling to go to Sea complain'd in private of their condition, and became so transported with rage, that they resolv'd to rise, and burn the City. There were three thousand Slaves who joyn'd in this Plot, the Conspiracy daily gathering more strength, when Erius Potilius a Captain of the Auxiliaries cunningly defeated and ruin'd all the Design: For making as if he were one of the same Party, he exactly learn'd all their Intrigues: found out the quality, number and names of all the Conspirators: as also the times and places, when any thing was to be attempted. And now he was ready to make a discovery of the whole to the Senate, but he could not have an opportunity to go to the Senate-house: for the Samnites follow'd him always, so that he could not perform his design: till by a cunning wheedle he perswaded them, that when the Senate were sitting they should go in crowds to the Forum, and there cry out, that they had been cheated in the measuring of their Corn: telling them, that an opportunity would arise from thence for them, either to execute their designs, or at least to discover what courage and resolution the Senate had against such sudden Insurrections; and that he might make the thing go down the better: he went with them, and not onely made a Party in this Riot, but was the Ring-leader of it. Whereupon being call'd into the Senate, he discover'd the reasons of this device, and the danger of the Plot.

XIX. The Senate dissembling their knowledge of the thing sent some persons, who by fair words might persuade that Rabble to go home: telling them, the Senate would take care that the injury should be redress'd, and every one have justice done them. Thus the Conspirators thinking their Plot undiscover'd went away: but next Night every one put those of their Slaves in bonds, which by the discovery of Potilius they had understood to be partakers of this Villany: most also of the Samnites were taken in their Lodgings. It is not certainly known, whether C. Florus was hindred by this occasion, or else by some other business, or Disease from going sooner into Sicily, where Hannibal after the last Victory had mightily retriev'd the Carthaginian Affairs. For having taken Cannarina and Enna by treachery, he fortified Drepanum where there was a noble Port, and made it a Town, planting the Erycinians there, whose City, lest it might advantage the Enemy he had demolish'd, excepting the Temple of Venus. Afterwards, he took several other places by force or treachery, and seem'd like to carry all Sicily before him, had not Florus oppos'd him, who for that reason durst not leave the Island that Winter.

XX. The other Consul found it easier to encounter with the Sardinians and Carthaginians at Olbia. To which place when he was return'd again with greater Forces, he found Hanno there, whom upon Hannibals removal the Carthaginians had made Admiral at Sea. After a very sharp Battel, Hanno fighting bravely, when he saw his men beaten, rush'd among the thickest of the Enemies, and was slain, and thereupon the Town was surrendred. The Consul adorn'd the Fame of his Victory by a noble example of Humanity towards the Enemy. For he took care that Hanno's Body should be carried to be buried out of his own Pavilion; and honour'd him with a very noble Funeral, all hatred ceasing after death, whilst he rightly judg'd that Valour was to be honoured even in an Enemy.

XXI. Afterwards, improving the terror of his late Victory he took many other places in Sardinia, making use of Stratagems as well as downright fighting. For he was wont by Night to put some Soldiers ashore, being detach'd out of his Army, not far from those Towns he design'd to assault, who having posted themselves in some advantageous places, they waited there, till the Consul coming up to the Towns gave the alarm to the people, and pretending to fly, drew them far from their Walls. Then these advancing on high speed enter'd the Towns, having no Soldiers within to defend them. By this Stratagem he took several places: and carried on his Victories so successfully that the Carthaginian Army could not stand against him either in Corsica or Sardinia. For which reason it was not doubted, but when he return'd to Rome he should have a Triumph decreed to him. He triumph'd over the Carthaginians, Sardinia and Corsica before the 5th of the Ides of March, having carried away great spoils, and many thousand Prisoners out of those Islands.

XXII. In Sicily C. Florus besieged Mystratus, a strong place, and several times in vain attempted. Nor could it be taken then, till the new Consul A. Atilius Colatinus came thither, when the Province of Sicily had fallen to his share, and the Navy to his Colleague C. Sulpitius Paterculus. These two, with all their Forces in Battalia went to Panormus, where the Carthaginians had their Winter-quarters, before which place they offered them Battel; but no person opposing them, they went to Hippant: which they assaulted and took. In their Journey from thence Atilius advanced to Mystratus, which after a stout resistance made, the Defendants at last abandon'd, being tired by the cries and lamentations of the Women and Children. So that when the Carthaginian Garison departed away by Night, the Townsmen at break of day opened their Gates: but the Romans not forgetting the hardships they had suffer'd in the Siege, slew all they met without any distinction of Age or Sex: until Atilius caus'd it to be proclaim'd, that the booty and men should be theirs that took them.

XXIII. Then their Cruelty gave way to their Avarice: and the rest of the Mystratensians being saved were sold for Slaves: the Town was plundered and demolish'd. The Army from thence being led against Camarina, ran a great hazard for want of sending out Spies to view the Country. For the Carthaginian General having first possess'd himself of the Hills, had surrounded the Roman Army that were heedlessly got into a narrow Valley. And now when they expected nought but death, and such a slaughter as that of Caudium, Calpurnius Flamma a Colonel in the same Army, by his Valour, and good conduct saved the Army in this extremity of danger. He following the Example of P. Decius, who himself had been Colonel in Samnium, went with three hundred men to possess himself of a certain eminence: having no prospect of escaping, but only inflam'd both he and his men with a noble thirst after Honour, and a desire to save the Army. 'Tis reported, that when he had his men thither he should thus bespeak them: "Fellow-Soldiers, Let us die, and by our death rescue from danger, the Legions which are surrounded by the Enemy."

And so it happen'd; the Enemy charg'd them, and they receiv'd their Cannon bravely, and kept them in play till the Consul got out of these Streights. The Carthaginians having slain those, who had oppos'd themselves against their Arms, departed, no longer placing any hopes in their Stratagem, which was now discover'd.

XXIV. And here the good fortune of Calpurnius was almost a Miracle, who being found with breath yet in his body among great heaps of the Enemies Carcasses, and those of his own men, was taken up, and by good tendance recover'd again, having receiv'd among his numerous Wounds none that was mortal; so that he afterwards liv'd to do considerable service to the Commonwealth: and was a great terror to the Enemies. This man, if he had shewn such a proof of his Valour among Grecians, no Monuments or Rewards could have been thought sufficient for him. But, being a Roman, for so great an Act had only a Chaplet of Grafts: and the memory of the fact is so negligently deliver'd, that there is scarce any certainty what the Hero's name was. Most call him Calpurnius Flamma, but Cato lays his name was Ceditius, and Quadrigrarius calls him Laberius. However, the Consul having escap'd out of these Streights, whilst his Labour rais'd shame in him, and his danger procur'd watchfulness, attempting again with more Forces, and greater care to besiege the Town, but finding he could not succeed without Engines, he borrow'd some of Hiero, with which he batter'd the Wall: and the Camarinians being thus reduc'd were most of them sold to slavery by the Consul. Then they went to Enna: which place they also took by treachery, and the Garison Soldiers were partly slain by the Romans who were receiv'd into the Town, whilst others of them escaping by flight betook themselves to such places as belong'd to their own Party. Suttana was possess'd not by fraud, but Valour: for the Defendants were beaten by main might and strength, and the Town taken by Storm.

XXV. And now the lesser Towns of Sicily without any more ado sent Ambassadors to the Consul to surrender themselves to him: Who after he had put Garisons in convenient places march'd into the Country of Agrigentum, where he took the Castle of Camicum by treachery, which so amaz'd them at Erleffus, that they fled away abandoning the Town. Thus also was Erleffus recover'd by the Romans. The Consul elevated with his good fortune, and also because he thought several of the Lipareans to be well affected towards him, march'd towards their City. But there his affairs did not succeed so well as before; for Hamilcar having cunningly found out the Roman Generals design, entred privately into Lipara, and diligently waited his time to fight; which the Romans were ignorant of, and therefore whilst they approached the Walls too boldly and rashly, the Carthaginians suddenly sallied out and routed them. There were many killed in that encounter, and several wounded.
